OWEN, Wilfred (1893–1918), born in Shropshire, where his father was a station-master, educated in Birkenhead and at Shrewsbury Technical College. He began to experiment with verse from an early age, and read widely. After a period assisting in a poor country parish, he left in 1913 to teach English in Bordeaux, soon commissioned. After concussion and trench-fever on the Somme he was invalided to hospital in Edinburgh, where he was greatly encouraged in his writing by *Sassoon. He returned to France in 1918, won the MC, and was killed on the Sambre Canal a week before the Armistice. He found his own voice as a poet in the trenches, and most of the poems for which he is remembered were written in a creative burst between the summer of 1917 and the autumn of the next year. Only five of his poems were published in his lifetime, and they made little mark on a public revering Rupert *Brooke. However, his reputation slowly grew, greatly assisted by *Blunden’s edition of his poems, with a memoir, in 1931, and he is now generally regarded as a war poet of the first rank. His bleak realism, his energy and indignation, his compassion, and his high technical skills (he was a master of metrical variety and of assonance) are evident in most of his work. His poems were chosen by *Britten for the War Requiem. The poems were collected again in 1963, edited by Day-Lewis; Collected Letters (ed. H. Owen and J. Bell) appeared in 1967, and a biography by Jon *Stallworthy in 1974.

Owl and the Nightingale, The, an early Middle English poem of 1,794 lines of octosyllabic couplets, probably from the beginning of the 13th cent., two of the three known manuscripts of which survive. It is a debate between the grave owl and the gay nightingale as to the benefits each confers on mankind, the symbolic implications of which have been much disputed; they have been said, for example, to represent the religious poet and the love poet. It is a very learned work which touches with light, scholastic legalism on many matters of serious contemporary interest: foreknowledge, music, confession, papal missions, and so on. It is a virtuoso poem, highly accomplished in its style and in its humorous tone, which reaches no definite conclusion. The debate is to be submitted at the end to the judgement of one Nicholas of Guildford who is likely to be the author; a certain John of Guildford, who is known to have written c.1225, has also been proposed. See editions by E. G. Stanley (1960), J. W. Atkins (1922, with translation); see also K. Hume, The Owl and the Nightingale: The Poem and its Critics (1975).

Owlglass, see Eulenspiegel.

OXFORD, Edward De Vere, 17th earl of (1550–1604), educated at Cambridge. A. *Golding, the translator of Ovid, was his uncle. He married Lord Burleigh’s daughter, and high hopes were placed on him as a courtier and patron, but they were dissipated as his capricious and quarrelsome temperament became apparent. His most famous quarrel was with *Sidney, whom, according to *Greville, he addressed as ‘puppy’ in a dispute at the tennis court in 1579; there is also some evidence that he planned to kill him. It is perhaps appropriate that one of the 15 or so surviving poems attributed to him is entitled ‘Love compared to a tennis playe’. By some his literary capacities have been highly regarded: J. T. Looney identified him in 1920 as the author of Shakespeare’s plays, and a sizeable body of ‘Oxbridgean’ have since built on this claim. (See also BACONIAN THEORY.)

OXFORD, Robert, first earl of, see Harley, R.

Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, a periodical of the year 1856, of which 12 monthly numbers appeared, financed mainly by W. *Morris. Among its (anonymous) contributors were Morris and *Burne-Jones (of Oxford), and Henry Lushington (1812–55) of Cambridge, and by invitation D. G. *Rossetti, whose ‘Burden of Nineveh’ appeared in its pages. The contents were predominantly literary, and included poems, tales, fairy stories, essays, and reviews.

Oxford English Dictionary, The. The scheme of ‘a completely new English Dictionary’ was conceived in 1858, chiefly as the result of the reading of two papers ‘On some Deficiencies in Our English Dictionaries’ by Dr R. C. *Trench to the *Philological Society in 1857.
Herbert Coleridge (1830–61), and after him Dr F. J. *Furnivall, were the first editors. Their work, which covered 20 years, consisted mainly in the collection of materials, and it was not until Dr J. A. H. *Murray took the matter up in 1878 that the preparation of the dictionary began to take active form. The first part (A–Ant) was published in 1884, at which time Murray estimated that the whole might be completed in another 12 years. It was not in fact finished until 1928, 70 years from the inception of the undertaking. Murray, who laid down the lines of the work, did not live to see it completed (at his death, T had been reached); but more than half was produced under his personal editorship. His co-editors were Dr H. *Bradley (from 1888), Dr W. A. *Craigie (from 1901), and Dr C. T. *Onions (from 1914).

The essential feature of the dictionary is its historical method, by which the meaning and form of the words are traced from their earliest appearance on the basis of an immense number of quotations, collected by more than 800 voluntary workers. The dictionary contains a record of 4,148,825 words, whose history is illustrated by 1,827,306 quotations. A supplement of 867 pages appeared in 1933. In 1957 work began, under the editorship of R. W. *Burchfield, on the new supplement, superseding that of 1933, and treating all the vocabulary which came into use while the main dictionary was being published or after its completion. The outcome of this work, entitled A Supplement to the Oxford English Dictionary, contains a record of approximately 120,000 words and is about one-third of the length of the main dictionary. The second edition, by J. Simpson and E. Weiner, was published in 1989. It is also available in electronic form on CD-ROM. The original title of the main work was 'A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles' (abbreviated as NED). The title The Oxford English Dictionary first appeared in the reprint of 1933.

Oxford Gazette, the first real newspaper, other than a newsletter, to be published in England. It appeared in Nov. 1665, the court being then at Oxford owing to the great plague, and was started by H. *Muddiman under the direction of his patron Sir Joseph Williamson. It became the London Gazette in 1666. It still survives, not now a newspaper, but a record of official appointments, notices of bankruptcy, etc., having passed in 1923 into the keeping of the Stationery Office. See P. M. Handover, A History of the London Gazette 1665–1965 (1965), in which she describes its slow evolution to its present form, and describes its anomalies and eccentricities as 'relics of ancient pride and state'.

Oxford, or Tractarian movement, a movement of thought and doctrine within the Church of England, centred at Oxford, the impulse of which was the Assize Sermon on National Apostasy preached by *Keble in 1833. This criticized the prevalent Erastian and latitudinarian tendencies of the Anglican Church, and generated an investigation into the nature of the Church. The movement aimed to defend the Church of England as a divine institution with an independent spiritual status, and to revive the High Church traditions of the 17th cent.; the Reform Act of 1832, and the views of *Broad Church supporters such as T. *Arnold, had led many to believe that the Church was in danger of increasing subordination to the state. Keble's sermon inspired *Newman, R. H. *Froude, and others to launch their series Tracts for the Times in 1833 (which gave the Tractarian movement its name); the series gained the influential support of *Pusey, who gave the movement cohesion and authority. The tracts varied from short leaflets to learned treatises, and covered a wide range of theological issues; it was Newman's famous Tract XC (1841) on the compatibility of the Thirty-Nine Articles with Roman Catholic theology that brought the Tractarians under official ban, but hostility had already been aroused by the publication of the first volumes of Froude's Literary Remains in 1838, with its strictures on the Reforma­tion. W. G. *Ward's The Ideal of a Christian Church (1844), with its praise of the Roman Catholic Church, intensified hostility, and led to suspicions that the Tractarians (and principally Newman) were subversively leading their followers towards Rome. Newman himself became a Roman Catholic in 1845, a decision which dealt a severe blow to the unity of the movement. There is a notable and sympathetic history of the movement, The Oxford Movement, Twelve Years, 1833–1845 (1891) by Richard William Church (1815–90), dean of St Paul's; see also Newman's Apologia pro Vita Sua (1864), the autobiography of I. *Williams, and *Pattison's Memoirs. (Pattison, a hostile witness, recalled that 'the "Tracts" desolated Oxford life, and suspended, for an indefinite period, all science, humane letters, and the first strivings of intellectual freedom'.) Other leaders of the movement included J. W. Bowden, W. Palmer, and A. P. Perceval.

The impact of the Tractarians was immense. In literary terms, the revival of interest in the medieval and 17th-cent. Church influenced *Tennyson, W. *Morris and the *Pre-Raphaelites, C. *Rossetti, and C. M. *Yonge, among others; it also strengthened the revival of *Gothic architecture associated with *Pugin.
was excepted from the prohibition of printing outside London by a decree of the Star Chamber in 1586, and in 1632 a royal charter allowed the university three presses and to print and sell 'all manner of books'. *Laud in 1634 bound the university to provide itself with a printing house; but a press under its immediate control did not come into being until 1690. In the meantime *Fell had won an international reputation for Oxford books by his exercise of the university's privilege of printing, let to him in 1672. By his bequest his unsold books and printing equipment became the property of the university in 1690.

Under the management of the delegates since then the press has produced such famous books as *Clarendon's *History (1702), *Blackstone's Commentaries (1769), Kennicott's Hebrew Bible (1780), Clerk Maxwell's Treatise on Electricity and Magnetism (1873), the Revised Version of the English Bible (1885), and *The Oxford English Dictionary, completed in 1928, besides many millions of Bibles and prayer books and, in recent times, of standard classical and modern texts, schoolbooks, and English and bilingual dictionaries.

The copyright in Clarendon's works, once very profitable, is secured to the university in perpetuity, and in his honour the building to which the press moved in 1829 was named 'the Clarendon Press'. This is the imprint given to learned books published under the supervision of the secretary to the delegates at Oxford. Books of more general appeal, including verse anthologies and reference books covering a wide range of topics, were published between 1880 and 1976 from the press's London offices, subsequently from Oxford.

Oxymoron, from two Greek words meaning 'sharp', 'dull', a rhetorical figure by which two incongruous or contradictory terms are united in an expression so as to give it point; e.g. 'Faith unfaithful kept him falsely true' (Tennyson. Idylls of the King).

Oz, an underground magazine started in Sydney, Australia (1963–6), by Richard Neville (1941– ), and relaunched by him in London in 1966 with Jim Anderson and Felix Dennis. The 'Schoolkids' issue (No. 28) was the occasion of a notorious trial during which the editors were convicted of issuing a publication likely to 'corrupt public morals', but were freed on appeal. Oz faded away in the winter of 1973, having reached a peak print-run of 70,000 in 1971.

Oz, Amos (1939– ), Israeli novelist and political commentator, born in Jerusalem. His first novel to be widely translated from the Hebrew was My Michael (1968; trans. 1972), set in the 1950s and narrated by Hannah Gonon, who describes her hesitant student marriage to a young geologist, set against the background of the struggles of a newly independent nation: it gives a vivid portrait of her own unsettling fantasies and of the changing city of Jerusalem. Oz's fictional works (titles include A Perfect Peace, 1982, dealing with kibbutz life, and Fima, 1991, about a failed middle-aged poet) build up a strong physical and political sense of a developing country, and his reportage (see In the Land of Israel, 1983) gives a voice to its varied cultures and inhabitants.
Pacchiariotto and How He Worked in Distemper: With Other Poems, a collection of 19 poems, in various metres, by R. *Browning, published 1876. The title poem, the three which follow it, and the epilogue, were directed at Browning's critics, in satirical or serious vein; the remaining poems are a miscellany on topics of religion, love, and art. 'Nympholeptos', 'St Martin's Summer', and 'A Forgiveness' deserve particular mention. The most unusual poem in the volume is, however, the ballad 'Hervé Riel', about the heroic exploit of a French sailor in a fight against the British.

Padel, Ruth (1946— ), poet and classical scholar, born in London and educated at the Sorbonne, the Free University, Berlin, and Oxford University. Her volumes of poetry are Alibi (1985), Summer Snow (1990, with poems invoking Crete and the 'summer snow deep in the mountain' of Mount Ida), Angel (1993), Fusewire (1996), and Rembrandt Would Have Loved You (1995), which is an intimate exploration of a love affair. Her verse combines classical allusion with an increasingly contemporary idiom. Scholarly works include In and Out of the Mind: Greek Images of the Tragic Self (1992) and Whom Gods Destroy: Elements of Greek and Tragic Madness (1995).

Padlock, The, a comic opera by *Bickerstaffe, with music by *Dibdin, performed with much success in 1768.

The elderly Don Diego is the temporary guardian of the young Leonora and is about to make her his wife. But, in spite of a large padlock on the door, Leander, a young lover, presents himself during Diego's absence, cajoles the duenna and Mungo, the Negro servant, and gains admission to the lady. Diego returns unexpectedly, but sensibly accepts the situation and handsomely endows Leonora. The story is taken from one of *Cervantes's novels.

The part of Mungo (taken in the original production by Dibdin himself) provided the London stage with its first black-faced comedian, and created a sensation: for a while his lines 'Mungo here, Mungo dere, Mungo every where' were a catchphrase. As feeling for the oppressed Negro grew, the role appears to have been played with increasing stress on sentiment.

Paean, a song of thanksgiving for deliverance from evil or danger, addressed usually to Apollo who, as god of healing, was given the name Paean. Later the word is used for a shout or song of triumph.

Pain, Violet, see Lee, V.

Paine, Thomas (1737-1809), son of a Quaker staymaker of Thetford, who followed various pursuits before being dismissed as an exciseman in 1774 for agitating for an increase in excisemen's pay. At the suggestion of his friend Benjamin *Franklin he sailed for America, where he published in 1776 his pamphlet Common Sense and in 1776-83 a series of pamphlets, The Crisis, encouraging American independence and resistance to England; he also wrote against slavery and in favour of the emancipation of women. In 1787 he returned to England (via France), and published in 1791 the first part of *The Rights of Man in reply to Burke's Reflections on the *Revolution in France. The second part appeared in 1792, when, alerted by *Blake of an impending arrest, Paine left for France, where he was warmly received and elected a member of the Convention. However, he opposed the execution of Louis XVI, was imprisoned for nearly a year, and narrowly escaped the guillotine. *The Age of Reason (1793), an attack on Christianity and the Bible from a Deist point of view, greatly increased the violent hatred with which he was regarded in England, where his effigy and books were repeatedly burned; he was attacked in print by R. *Watson, bishop of Llandaff, and many others. He returned to America in 1802, where his views on religion and his opposition to Washington had made him unpopular, and his last years were saddened by ill health and neglect. He was buried at his farm in New Rochelle; ten years later *Cobbett, who had once vehemently opposed Paine, exhumed his bones and brought them back to England, planning some kind of memorial as reparation, but they were eventually mislaid.

Paine's early biographers did their best to denigrate him, but his writings became a textbook for the radical party in England and were extremely influential; his connection with the American struggle and the French Revolution gave him a unique position as an upholder of the politics of the *Enlightenment. His prose is plainer, more colloquial, and less rhetorical than that of *Burke, whose 'high-toned exclamation' he despised. He gave away most of the considerable earnings from his pen, in part to the Society of Constitutional Information, founded in 1780.

Pair of Blue Eyes, A, a novel by T. *Hardy, published 1873.

The scene is the northern coast of Cornwall. Stephen
Smith, a young architect, comes to Endelstow to restore the church tower and falls in love with Elfride Swancourt, the blue-eyed daughter of the vicar. Her father is incensed that someone of Stephen’s humble origin should claim his daughter. Elfride and Stephen run away together, but Elfride vacillates over marriage, and Stephen, hoping to better himself, accepts a post in India. Henry Knight, Stephen’s friend and patron, then meets Elfride, and after she has saved his life on a cliff they become engaged. However, Knight is horrified to hear of Elfride’s truancy with Stephen and is convinced that they must have been lovers. He harshly breaks off the engagement leaving Elfride heartbroken. Eventually he and Stephen meet; Stephen learns that Elfride is still unmarried and Knight learns the innocent facts of her past escapade with Stephen. But the train which carries them both to Cornwall is also carrying Elfride’s dead body. They learn when they arrive at Endelstow that she has died, and that she had recently married Lord Luxellian.

Palace of Pleasure, a collection of translations into English of ‘Pleasant Histories and excellent Novelles . . . out of divers good and commendable Authors’, made by William Painter (c.1525–95), Clerk of the Ordnance, and published in 1566, 1567, and 1575. Many of the translations are from *Boccaccio, *Bandello, and Marguerite of Navarre (see HEPTAMERON), but Painter also drew on *Herodotus, *Livy, and *Gellius. The book provided a storehouse of plots for Elizabethan writers, especially dramatists; Shakespeare probably used it for *The Rape of Lucrece and *All's Well that Ends Well, and Webster certainly drew the plot of *The Duchess of Malfi from it. It was edited by Joseph Jacobs (1890).

Paladins, the, in the cycle of *Charlemagne legends, the 12 peers who accompanied the king. The origin of the conception is seen in the Chanson de Roland (see ROLAND), where the 12 peers are merely an association of particularly brave warriors, under the leadership of Roland and *Oliver, who all perish at Roncesvalles. From the Spanish war the idea was transported by later writers to other parts of the cycle, and Charlemagne is found always surrounded by 12 peers. The names of the 12 are differently stated by different authors, most of the original names given by the Chanson de Roland being forgotten by them; but Roland and Oliver figure in all the enumerations. Among the best known are *Ottel, Fierabras or *Ferumbras, *Ogier the Dane, and the count palatine. In the early 13th cent. there was a French court, comprising six ecclesiastics and six laymen, known as ‘the Twelve Peers of France’; this court in 1202 declared King John deprived of his fiefs in France. Since the 16th cent. the word is applied to any great knightly champion (cf. the word ‘Peer’).

palaeography, see WANLEY, H.

Palamon and Arcite, the two Theban princes whose love for Emelye is the subject of Chaucer’s ‘The Knight’s Tale’ (see CANTERBURY TALES, 1), following the Teseida of *Boccaccio. The tale was paraphrased in heroic couplets by *Dryden under the title ‘Palamon and Arcite’. It is also the subject of The Two Noble Kinsmen.

Paley, Grace (1922– ), American short story writer and poet, who grew up in the Bronx, New York city, the daughter of Russian-Jewish parents. She was taught Russian and Yiddish by her father and attended but did not complete courses at Hunter College and New York University. She is the author of three acclaimed volumes of short stories: The Little Disturbances of Man (1959); Enormous Changes at the Last Minute (1974); and Later the Same Day (1985). Pungent and laconic, her tragicomic stories resound with the cadences of the city where she was raised and are carried by the spoken word. All embrace ‘the open destiny of life’ and the politics of dailiness. Paley has long campaigned on behalf of anti-war movements, nuclear disarmament, and women’s rights. Her essays and articles on family, community, and politics are collected in Just as I Thought (1997). Begin Again: New and Collected Poems (1992) features poems written from the 1950s onwards.

Paley, William (1743–1805), educated at Christ’s College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was one of the principal exponents of theological utilitarianism of which his Moral and Political Philosophy (1785), based largely on the doctrine of *Tucker, is the textbook; an attack on private property in Book III, drawing an analogy between human greed and the behaviour of a flock of pigeons, gave him his nickname ‘Pigeon’ Paley. In Evidences of Christianity (1794) and Natural Theology (1802) he finds proof of the existence of God in the design apparent in natural phenomena, and particularly in the mechanisms of the human body; the opening pages of Natural Theology introduce the celebrated analogy of an abandoned watch found upon a heath, from which he argues the existence of God as designer, for as ‘the watch must have had a maker’, so must the natural world.

Palgrave, Francis Turner (1824–97), son of barrister, historian, and antiquary Sir Francis Palgrave (1788–1861), who had changed his name from Cohen when he converted to Christianity in 1823. F. T. Palgrave was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, was an official in the education department 1855–84, and professor of poetry at Oxford, 1885–95. He is chiefly remembered for his anthology The Golden Treasury of Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language (1861, and much reprinted; 2nd series, 1897). In the selection for the first edition Palgrave was advised by his close friend *Tennyson; it contained no work by living poets, and is a reflection of the taste of the age (e.g. no *Donne and no *Blake, though work by these poets was added to subsequent editions). New and enlarged editions with poems by later writers have since appeared; the most recent in 1665, with a fifth book selected by John Press. Palgrave compiled other anthologies and selections, and published several volumes of his own verse.

PALGRAVE, William Gifford (1826–88), son of Sir F. Palgrave, educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He became a Jesuit missionary in Syria and Arabia. After undertaking a daring journey through Arabia for Napoleon III, in the guise of a doctor, he wrote Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia (1865), his interesting but somewhat unreliable reminiscences of this expedition. He then left the Jesuits to join the diplomatic service in which he held various posts from 1865. Shortly before his death he became reconciled to the Church.

palimpsest, from παλιμπήστ, 'again', and υπηροτος, 'rubbed smooth', a manuscript in which a later writing is superimposed on an effaced earlier writing. Of frequent occurrence in the early Middle Ages because of the cost of parchment.

palindrome, from παλινδρομομος, 'running back again', a word, verse, or sentence that reads the same forwards or backwards, e.g.:

Lewd did I live & evil I did dwell

and the Latin line descriptive of moths:

In girum imus noctes et consumimur igni.

palinode, from παλινωδος, 'singing over again', a poem of recantation. 'Palinode' is the name of the Catholic shepherd in the fifth eclogue of Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender.

Palinurus, see Connolly.

Palladianism, a revival of the style and ideas of Palladio and of his English follower Jones, dominated English architectural theory from c.1720 to 1770. The Whig aristocrat and man of taste admired the rationality and the mathematical proportions of Palladio's buildings; the movement marks a turning away from the panache of Hawksmoor and Vanbrugh towards a purer form of classicism. Palladianism opened with two publications: Colen Campbell's Vitruvius Britannicus (1st vol. 1715), a collection of engravings of English buildings inspired by antiquity, and Giacomo Leoni's English version of Palladio's Quattro libri dell'architettura (1st vol. 1715). In the 1720s the architect-earl Lord Burlington dominated; his Chiswick House (1725–9), deeply influenced by Palladio's Villa Rotonda and by Inigo Jones, epitomizes the Palladian movement in England. Pope was a Palladian enthusiast; his Epistle to Burlington (1731) both satirizes its excesses and sums up its aspirations; he invites the earl to:

Erect new wonders, and the old repair
Jones and Palladio to themselves restore,
And be whate'er Vitruvius was before.

Palladio, Andrea (1508–80), highly influential Italian architect of the late Renaissance, whose elegant style was formed by his passion for the buildings of antiquity, by his knowledge of Vitruvius, and by his response to High Renaissance and mannerist architects. The name Palladio (from Pallas Athena) was given him by the humanist Giangiorgio Trissino of Vicenza, who sensed in him a renewal of Greek wisdom and beauty. Palladio was unrivalled in his ability to express the ideas of antiquity in a modern idiom, yet he was a sophisticated mannerist architect, and as his career progressed his treatment of classical themes became increasingly imaginative. Palladio designed the churches of San Giorgio Maggiore (1566–80) and Il Redentore (begun 1577) in Venice, but most of his works are in and around Vicenza; they include many town palaces, the Teatro Olimpico (begun 1580; finished by Scamozzi), and many country houses and villas which were to affect English architecture in the early 18th cent. The characteristic Palladian villa has a symmetrically planned central block, with a portico deriving from a classical temple front and low wings. The most famous is the untypical Villa Rotonda (1550–1). Palladio's buildings became widely known through his Quattro libri dell'architettura (1570). (See also PALLIANISM.)

Palladis Tamia, see Meres.

PALLISER, Charles (1947– ), American novelist, born in Holyoke, Massachusetts, but resident in Britain since the age of 10. The Quincunx (1989) is a monumental and explicit homage to Dickens which matches his atmosphere, sense of place, and hatred of poverty and social injustice to an extraordinary degree. It was followed by a modernist novella (The Sensationalist, 1990) and an intricate book of parodies (Betrayals, 1994), but in The Unburied (1999) Palliser finally returned to the Victorian setting and neo-Gothic mode for which he has such a singular gift.

Palliser Novels, the, a term used to describe the political novels of A. Trollope, which are: Can You Forgive Her?, Phineas Finn, The Eustace Diamonds, Phineas Redux, The Prime Minister, and The Duke's Children.

Pall Mall Gazette, an evening paper founded in 1865 by Frederick Greenwood (1830–1909) and George Smith to combine the features of a newspaper with the literary features of the Spectator and the Saturday Review. Its name was taken from Thackeray's Pendennis, where Captain Shandon in the Marshalsea prepares the prospectus of 'The Pall Mall Gazette', 'written by gentlemen for gentlemen'. Its early contributors included Sir Henry Maine (1822–88), Trollope, Sir J. F. Stephen, L. Stephen, and M. Arnold (whose Friendship's Garland first appeared in it); in 1880 Smith parted with it to his Liberal son-in-law, and J. Morley took over as editor, to be succeeded (1883–9) by W. T. *Stead, whose sensational journalism altered the character of the paper. Greenwood produced instead the newly founded Conservative St James’s Gazette.

PALMER, Samuel (1805–81), Romantic painter and etcher, born in Newington, London, the son of a bookseller. His early aspirations were literary, and he greatly admired *Blake, to whom he was introduced in 1824 by the painter John Linnell (1792–1882). He settled for some years, 1826–32, in Shoreham, Kent, where he painted some of his most celebrated visionary pastoral landscapes. He later travelled in north Wales, Devon, and Italy, all of which provided inspiration. Some of his subjects were drawn from the Bible and the classics (he produced an English translation of Virgil’s Eclogues, published 1881), but he also looked to English literature, and produced illustrations for the work of *Bunyan and *Dickens (Pictures from Italy, 1846), among others. His fine watercolours on the themes of Milton’s L’Allegro and Il Penseroso belong to his later years, he worked on them from 1868 onwards. His powerfully poetic imagination has won the admiration of many writers. See The Followers of William Blake (1925) by L. Binyon and Samuel Palmer: The Visionary Years by G. *Grigson (1947).

Palmerin of England (Palmerin de Inglaterra), a chivalric romance attributed to the 16th-cent. Portuguese writer Francisco de Moraes.

The ‘Palmerins’ consist of eight books dealing with the exploits and loves of Palmerin d’Oliva, emperor of Constantinople, and his various descendants, of which Palmerin of England is the subject of the sixth. The daughter of Palmerin d’Oliva, Florida by name, married Don Duardos, son of Fadrique, king of Great Britain, and became the mother of Palmerin of England and his brother Floriano of the Desert. Duardos having been imprisoned in the castle of the giant Dramu­sando by Eutropa, a magician, a savage carries off Palmerin and Floriano intending them as food for his hunting lions, but his wife insists on bringing them up. Palmerin is taken to Constantinople and appointed to wait on his cousin Polinarda, with whom he falls in love; while Floriano is taken to London and appointed to wait on Florida. Palmerin and Floriano undertake the quest of Don Duardos, and the former is successful. Thereafter the identity of the brothers is revealed and Palmerin marries Polinarda. Then the soldan advances against the Christians and demands the surrender of Polinarda as a condition of peace. Finally the Turks attack Constantinople; all the Turks and most of the Christians perish, but Palmerin survives.

*Munday translated the Palmerin cycle into English (through a French intermediary), 1581–95. It was highly popular with the Elizabethan middle classes, and there are many references to Palmerin in the plays of the time (e.g. The Knight of the Burning Pestle, where the vogue for such chivalric fantasies is mocked). A revised translation by *Southey appeared in 1807, in which Southey suggests debts to Palmerin from Shakespeare, *Spenser, and *Sidney. See The Palmerin Romances in Elizabethan Prose Fiction by M. Tatchell (1947).

Palmerin of England and *Amadis of Gaul were two romances of chivalry specially excepted from the holocaust of such works carried out by the curate and the barber in Don Quixote.

Palomydes the Saracen, in *Malory, a prominent knight and great fighter who follows the *Questing Beast and who once abducts *Iseult, for whom he entertains an unrequited and mostly selfless passion. He is the great friend of Tristram who has him christened at the end. The French prose romance Palamedes seems to have been written as an addition to the Vulgate Tristan and Lancelot in the early 13th cent.; it achieved enormous popularity in the later Middle Ages and influenced *Boiardo and *Ariosto, who said it was his favourite among the Arthurian romances.

PALTOCK, Robert (1697–1767), author of Peter Wilkins. He was an attorney of Clement’s Inn.

Pamela, the heir to the dukedom of Arcadia in the romance of *Sidney. Richardson took her name for the heroine of his first novel (below).

Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded, a novel by S. *Richardson, published 1740–1.

The first of Richardson’s three novels, Pamela consists, like them, entirely of letters and journals, of which Richardson presents himself as the ‘editor’. He believed he had hit upon ‘a new species of writing’ but he was not the inventor of the *epistolary novel, several of which already existed in English and French. He did however raise the form to a level hitherto unknown, and transformed it to display his own particular skills.

There are six correspondents in Pamela, most with their own particular style and point of view, but Pamela herself provides most of the letters and journals, with the ‘hero’, Mr B., having only two. Pamela Andrews is a handsome, intelligent girl of 15 when her kind employer Lady B. dies. Penniless and without protection, Pamela is pursued by Mr B., Lady B.’s son, but she repulses him and remains determined to retain her chastity and her unsullied conscience. Letters reveal Mr B.’s cruel dominance and pride, but also Pamela’s half-acknowledged tenderness for him, as well as her vanity, prudence, and calculation. Angrily Mr B. separates her from her friends, Mrs Jervis the housekeeper and Mr Longman the steward, and dispatches her to Mrs Jewkes, only the chaplain, Mr Williams, is her friend, but he is powerless to help. For 40 days, allowed no visits or correspondence, she keeps a detailed journal, analysing her situation and her feelings, and at the same time revealing her faults of prudence and pride. She despairs, and begins to think of suicide. Mr
B., supposing her spirit must now be broken, arrives at B.— Hall, and, thinking himself generous, offers to make her his mistress and keep her in style. She refuses indignantly, and he later attempts to rape her and then to arrange a mock-marriage. Two scenes by the pond mark a turning point in their relationship. Both begin to be aware of their faults, and of the genuine nature of their affection. However, Pamela again retreats and refuses his proposal of marriage. She is sent away from B.— Hall, but a message gives her a last chance. Overcoming her pride and caution, she decides to trust him, accepts his offer, and they are married. In the remaining third of the book Pamela's goodness wins over even Lady Davers, Mr B.'s supercilious sister, and becomes a model of virtue to her circle of admiring friends; but (as in Pamela, Part II) the author's creative drive becomes overwhelmed by his urge to moralize.

The book was highly successful and fashionable, and further editions were soon called for. Richardson felt obliged to continue his story, not only because of the success of Pamela but because of the number of forged continuations that began to appear. Pamela, Part II appeared in 1741. Here Pamela is exhibited, through various small and separate instances, as the perfect wife, patiently leading her profligate husband to reform; a mother who adores (and breastfeeds) her children; and a friend who is at the disposal of all, and who brings about the penitence of the wicked. Much space is given over to discussion of moral, domestic, and general subjects. Shamela (1741, almost certainly by Fielding) vigorously mocked what the author regarded as the hypocritical morality of Pamela; and Fielding's Joseph Andrews, which begins as a parody of Pamela, appeared in 1742.

Pamphleteering, origins of. The word 'pamphlet' appears to derive, curiously, from the generalized use of the title of a popular 12th-century Latin love poem called Pamphilus, seu de Amore, which was adapted to Pamphilet. Orwell, in his introduction to British Pamphleters (vol. 1, 1948), describes a pamphlet as 'a short piece of polemical writing, printed in the form of a booklet and aimed at a large public', usually of 5,000–10,000 words, and without hard covers. Pamphleteering may be said to have started with the Reformation, and during the 16th century became widespread (see Nashe, Dekker, and Martin Marprelate); J. Knox's First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment (i.e. 'government') of Women (1558) was perhaps the first British political pamphlet. In the 17th century the religious and political ferment that gave rise to the Civil War produced many thousands of pamphlets, some of high literary quality; Milton's are perhaps the best known, but see also Winstanley, Overton, Walwyn, Clarkson, Coppe, Lillburne, Nedham, and Berkendon. Byranipocrity Disclosed and Light Shining in Buckinghamshire (1648) were both anonymous, as were many others. These writers played an important part in the transition from the learned, allusive prose of men like Donne, Andrewes, and Sir T. *Browne to the plain, clear, and colloquial style recommended by the Royal Society. (See C. Hill, The World Turned upside down, 1972.) In the 18th century, though important works in pamphlet form were produced by writers as considerable as *Swift, the rise of weekly periodicals tended to reduce the demand for this form of communication. The form was revived in the 19th century by two important intellectual movements, the Oxford movement, and the Fabian Society, both of which used the pamphlet (or tract) extensively and to much effect.

Pancks, a character in Dickens's Little Dorrit.

Pandarus, in classical legend, a son of Lycaon who assisted the Trojans in their war against the Greeks. The role that he plays in Chaucer's and Shakespeare's stories of Troilus and Criseyde (Cressida) was the invention of Boccaccio in his Filostrato (where he is called Pandaro; see N. R. Havely, Chaucer's Boccaccio, 1980). In Boccaccio he is the cousin of Cressida, presumably much the same age as her and Troilus; Chaucer strikingly changes him from her cousin to his uncle and guardian, for reasons that are not entirely clear but whose effect is to increase the sense of irresponsibility towards her in arranging their love affair. His role plays a striking part in the atmosphere of sourness in which the events of Shakespeare's play occur. The word 'pander' (as Shakespeare says: v. x. 34) derives from his role as go-between for Troilus and Cressyde.

Pandemonium, a word coined by Milton, the abode of all the demons; a place represented by Milton (Paradise Lost, i. 756) as the capital of Hell, containing the council-chamber of the Evil Spirits.

Pandosto, or The Triumph of Time, a prose romance by R. *Greene published 1588. It went through nine editions up to 1632, but is now best known as the source for The Winter's Tale. Shakespeare followed Greene's romance closely, except that he preserved the life of Hermione (Bellaria in Pandosto), and made Leontes, not Hermione/Bellaria, appeal to the oracle. Pandosto, the Leontes figure, is killed at the end of the romance, 'to close up the Comedie with a Tragicall stratageme'. Pandosto is one of Greene's best narratives, and of understandable popularity in its time.

Pangloss, Dr. (1) in Candide by Voltaire, an optimistic philosopher who holds that all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds, in spite of a series of most distressing adventures (including unsuccessful hanging by the Inquisition and subsequent dissection). He is brought, however, to recognize that, to be happy, man must work and must 'cultivate his garden'.
The intended object of the satire was *Leibniz. (2) In *The Heir-at-Law by G. *Colman the younger, a pompous pedant.

PANIZZI, Antonio (later Sir Anthony) (1797–1879), born in Italy. He fled to England as a political exile in 1823, where he was befriended by *Foscolo, W. *Roscoe, and Lord *Brougham. He taught Italian before obtaining a post in the *British Museum, where he eventually became (in 1856) principal librarian. He had a great talent for administration, and among many achievements was responsible for the preparation of a new catalogue and for the plans of the celebrated circular domed Reading Room which he opened personally in 1857. The Panizzi Lectures on *book history are delivered annually at the British Library; D. F. McKenzie delivered the inaugural lecture in 1985.

PANKHURST, Emmeline and Christabel, see women’s SUFFRAGE.

Panopticon, J. *Bentham’s term (1843) for a proposed type of prison, consisting of cells ranged round a central point from which a warder could observe the prisoners while they could see neither him nor their fellow prisoners in adjacent cells. *Foucault took up the idea in *Discipline and Punish (1975), his study of the change in the way power was exercised after the 16th cent. Before this he claims power was exerted through violence and coercion of the body, whereas the body was subsequently schooled to discipline itself. The Panopticon exemplifies this change; the prisoner, unable to see the guard and know whether observation is taking place at any given time, exercises self-control over behaviour and demeanour.

Pantagruel, see GARGANTUA.

Pantisocracy, a utopian scheme invented by *Coleridge and *Southey in 1794–5, to set up an egalitarian commune of six families ‘on the banks of the Susquehanna’ in New England, based on a joint-stock farm.

pantomime, (1) originally a Roman actor, who performed in dumb show, representing by mimicry various characters and scenes; (2) an English dramatic performance, originally consisting of action without speech, but in its further development consisting of a dramatized traditional fairy tale, with singing, dancing, acrobatics, clowning, topical jokes, a transformation scene, and certain stock roles, especially the ‘principal boy’ (i.e. hero) acted by a woman and the ‘dame’ acted by a man. (See MIME.)

Panurge, one of the principal characters in Rabelais’s *Pantagruel (see GARGANTUA), a cunning, voluble, witty, and in the later books cowardly buffoon, ‘and a very dissolute and debauched fellow, if there were any in Paris: otherwise and in all matters else, the best and most virtuous man in the world; and he was still contriving some plot, and devising mischief against the sergeants and the watch’.

Paolo and Francesca. Francesca, daughter of Giovanni da Polenta, count of Ravenna, was given in marriage by him to Giovanni (Sciancato, the Lame) Malatesta, of Rimini, an ill-favoured man, in return for his military services. She fell in love with Paolo, her husband’s brother, and, their relations being discovered, the two lovers were put to death in 1289.

*Dante, at the end of the fifth canto of the *Inferno, relates his conversation with Francesca, who told him how her fall was occasioned by the reading of the tale of Launcelot and Guinevere. The ‘Galeotto’ mentioned by Dante is Galahault, the prince who, in the story of the early loves of Launcelot and Guinevere, not included in *Malory, introduces Launcelot to the queen. The story of Paolo and Francesca was the subject of the poem *The Story of Rimini by Leigh *Hunt, and it remained popular throughout the 19th cent., most famously in *Tchaikovsky’s symphonic fantasy *Francesca da Rimini.

Paper Money Lyrics, burlesque poems by *Peacock, ridiculing political economists and bankers. They were written in the late 1820s, but not published until 1837, after the death of J. *Mill, Peacock’s immediate superior at the India Office.

Pappe with an Hatchet, the title of a tract contributed in 1589 by *Lyly to the Marprelate controversy (see MARTIN MARPRELATE) on the side of the bishops. The sense of the expression appears to be ‘the administration of punishment under the ironical style of a kindness or benefit’ [OED]. Lyly’s pamphlet is a mixture of abuse and ribaldry.

PARACELSUS (Theophrast Bombast von Hohenheim) (1493–1541), Swiss-born physician. He lectured on medicine in Basle in 1527–8, but instead of lecturing in Latin on *Avicenna and *Galen, as was required, lectured in German on his own experience of medical disorders. He quarrelled with the faculty and thereafter led a wandering life. He was attracted to alchemy, astrology, and mysticism, but was nevertheless credited with remarkable cures, had a genuinely original and enquiring mind, and initiated improvements in pharmacy and therapeutics. His arrogance, unconventionality, and ambiguous philosophy won him many enemies, and led to his being pronounced a charlatan, but he also had many followers and exerted considerable influence, particularly through the *Rosicrucian movement. He believed in the divine alchemy of the Creation, in which God (the Divine Artificer) separated by chemical process the elements from the primal matter, the Mysterium Magnum: he supported the notion of the four Aristotelian elements (earth, air, fire, water), and added the concept of the ‘three principles’ of sulphur, mercury, and salt. The elements were inhabited by spirits—the air by sylphs, the water by nymphs or undines, the earth by gnomes, the fire by Salamanders—and by many other spiritual or supernatural beings, such as syrens, nenuphar, lornis, etc. (Paracelsus: De Nymphis Pygmii, Salamandris, De Homunculis et Monstris, etc., Works, 1658). This mythological machinery was borrowed by Pope, via the Rosicrucians, in The Rape of the Lock. Paracelsus died shortly after being offered a permanent post in Salzburg in 1541. He was the subject of a poem by Browning (below). See also A. Debus, The English Paracelsians (1965); F. Yates, The Rosicrucian Enlightenment (1972).

Paracelsus, a dramatic poem in blank verse by R. Browning, published 1835. The career of the historical Paracelsus serves Browning, despite his claim to the contrary, as a stalking-horse for his own exploration of the processes of the creative imagination, in particular the conflict between 'Love' (self-forgetting) and 'Knowledge' (self-assertion) in the mind of the artist. The poem's critical success introduced Browning to literary London and launched his career, at first in the (unhappy) direction of the theatre. Browning's works up to the end of Bells and Pomegranates were published as by 'Robert Browning, author of Paracelsus'.

Parade's End, a tetralogy by F. M. Ford, now known under this collective title, but originally published as Some Do Not. . . (1924), No More Parades (1925), A Man Could Stand up (1926), and Last Post (1928).

The hero is Christopher Tietjens of Groby, a Tory Yorkshire squire and younger son, married to the neurotic, beautiful, unfaithful Catholic Sylvia. In the first volume Christopher agrees to take back his wife and to conceal her adultery; meanwhile he himself falls in love with a young suffragette schoolteacher, Valentine Wannop, but the affair is not consummated. The next two volumes cover his wartime experiences and his resolution, on Armistice Day, to leave Sylvia and make Valentine his mistress. In Last Post Valentine is pregnant, Christopher is making his living by restoring antiques, and his older brother Mark is dying; Sylvia eventually agrees to divorce Christopher. Other major characters include the Pre-Raphaelite hostess Edith Ethel Duchemin, both elegant and vulgar, who has an affair with and later marries Christopher's friend, critic and writer Vincent Macmaster. The subject of the novel appears to be the breakdown of the accepted standards of the old world and the necessary emergence of a new order; the breadth of Ford's canvas, his impressionistic and highly idiosyncratic narrative technique, and his creation of the deeply English 'saintly mealsack' Tietjens have been admired by many (including G. Greene), although others are made uneasy by a sense of unresolved conflict, narrative inconsistency, and emotional posturing.

Paradise Lost, an epic poem by Milton, originally in ten books, subsequently rearranged in 12, first printed 1667. Milton formed the intention of writing a great epic poem, as he tells us, as early as 1639. A list of possible subjects, some of them scriptural, some from British history, written in his own hand about 1640–1, still exists, with drafts of the scheme of a poem on 'Paradise Lost'. The work was not, however, begun in earnest until 1658, and it was finished, according to Aubrey, in 1663. It was licensed for publication by the Revd Thomas Tomkyns, chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury. Milton entered into an agreement for the copyright with Samuel Simmons by which he received £5 down, and a further £5 when the first impression of 1,300 copies was exhausted. His widow subsequently parted with all further claims for the sum of £8.

Milton added to later copies of the first edition not only an 'Argument', summarizing the contents of each of the books, but also a spirited defence of his choice of blank verse, 'Rime being no necessary Adjunct or true Ornament of Poem or good Verse, in longer works especially, but the Invention of a barbarous Age, to set off wretched matter and lame Meeter'.

Book I. The poet, invoking the 'Heav'nly Muse', states his theme, the Fall of Man through disobedience, and his aim, which is no less than 'to justify the ways of God to men'. He then presents the defeated arch-angel Satan, with Beelzebub, his second-in-command, and his rebellious angels, lying on the burning lake of hell. Satan awakens his legions, rouses their spirits, and summons a council. The palace of Satan, Pandemonium (a word coined by Milton), is built.

Book II. The council debates whether another battle for the recovery of Heaven be hazarded, Belial and Mammon recommending peace in order to avoid worse torments. Beelzebub announces the creation of 'another World, the happy seat of som new Race call'd Man', which may prove a means of revenge. Satan undertakes to visit it alone, and passes through hell-gates, guarded by Sin and Death, and passes upward through the realm of Chaos.

Book III. Milton invokes celestial light to illumine the 'ever-during dark' of his own blindness, then describes God, who sees Satan's flight towards our world, and foretells his success and the fall and punishment of man, emphasizing that man will fall not through predestination but through free will. The Son of God offers himself as a ransom, is accepted, and exalted as the Saviour. Satan alights on the outer convex of our universe, 'a Limbo large and broad, since call'd The Paradise of Fools'. He finds the stairs leading up to heaven, descends to the sun, disguises himself as 'a stripling Cherube', and in this shape is directed to earth by Uriel, where he alights on Mt Niphates in Armenia.

Book IV. Satan, at first tormented by doubts, resolves 'Evil be thou my Good' and journeys on towards the garden of Eden, where he first sees Adam and Eve 'in naked Majestie', and overhears their discourse about the forbidden Tree of Knowledge. He resolves to tempt... them to disobey the prohibition but is discovered by the guardian angels Ithuriel and Zephon as he squats like a toad near the ear of Eve, and expelled from the garden by their commander, *Gabriel.

Book V. Eve relates to Adam the disquieting dream of temptation which Satan had inspired. He comforts her, and they set about their daily tasks. Raphael, sent by God, comes to paradise, warns Adam, and enjoins obedience. They discourse of reason, free will, and predestination, and Raphael, at Adam's request, relates how Satan, inspired by hatred and envy of the newly anointed Messiah, inspired his legions to revolt, resisted only by Abdiel—'Among the faithless, faithful only hee'.

Book VI. Raphael continues his narrative, telling how Michael and Gabriel were sent to fight against Satan. After indecisive battles the Son of God himself, alone, attacked the hosts of Satan, and, driving them to the verge of heaven, forced them to leap down through chaos into the deep.

Book VII. Milton evokes Urania (in classical times the Muse of Astronomy, but perhaps here the Christian Muse: a much disputed passage), and requests her to aid him to 'fit audience find, though few', in the evil days on which he has fallen; then continues Raphael's narrative, with an account of God's decision to send his Son to create another world from the vast abyss. He describes the six days of creation, ending with the creation of man, and a renewed warning to Adam that death will be the penalty for eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge.

Book VIII. Adam enquires concerning the motions of the heavenly bodies, and is answered 'doubtfully'. (The controversy regarding the Ptolemaic and Copernican systems was at its height when Paradise Lost was written, and Milton was unable to decide between them, as seen in X. 668 ff.) Adam relates what he remembers since his own creation, notably his own need for rational fellowship, and his plea to his Maker for a companion, which is answered by the creation of Eve. Adam and Raphael talk of the relations between the sexes, then, with a final warning to 'take heed least Passion sway | Thy Judgement', Raphael departs.

Book IX. Insisting that his argument is 'not less but more Heroic' than the themes of Homer and Virgil, Milton describes Satan's entry into the body of the serpent, in which form he finds Eve, she having insisted, despite Adam's warnings, on pursuing her labours alone. He persuades her to eat of the 'Tree of Knowledge'. Eve relates to Adam what has passed and brings him of the fruit. Adam, recognizing that she is doomed, resolves to perish with her: 'If Death | Consort with thee, Death is to mee as Life; | So forcible within my heart I feel | The Bond of Nature draw me to my owne.' He also eats of the fruit, and after initial intoxication in their lost innocence, they cover their nakedness and fall to mutual accusation.

Book X. God sends his Son to judge the transgressors. They greet him with guilt and shame, and confess, and he pronounces his sentence. Sin and Death resolve to come to this world, and make a broad highway thither from hell. Satan returns to hell and announces his victory, whereupon he and his angels are temporarily transformed into serpents. Adam, recognizing that in him 'all Posteritie stands curst', at first reproaches Eve, but then, reconciled, they together resolve to seek mercy from the Son of God.

Book XI. The Son of God, seeing their penitence, interceded. God decrees that they must leave paradise, and sends down Michael to carry out his command. Eve laments; Adam pleads not to be banished from the 'bright appearances' of God, but Michael reassures him that God is omnipresent, then unfolds to him the future, revealing to him the consequences of his original sin in the death of Abel and the future miseries of mankind, ending with the Flood and the new Covenant.

Book XII. Michael relates the subsequent history of the Old Testament, then describes the coming of the Messiah, his incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension, which leads Adam to rejoice over so much good sprung from his own sin. Michael also foretells the corrupt state of the Church until the Second Coming. Eve meanwhile, during these revelations, has been comforted by a dream presaging 'some great good'. Resolved on obedience and submission, and assured that they may possess 'a Paradise within', they are led out of the Garden.

Paradise Lost has inspired a mass of critical commentary and histories of critical commentary, theological discussion, imitations and adaptations, and illustrations. (For bibliography, see under Milton.) Illustrators include Fuseli, 1802; Blake, 1806; *J. Martin, 1827, 1846, 1847, etc.; Turner, 1835; and Doré, 1866. See Milton and English Art by Marcia Pointon (1970).

Paradise Regained, an epic poem in four books by Milton, published 1671. (See Ellwood.)

It is a sequel to Paradise Lost, and deals exclusively with the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness. According to the poet's conception, whereas Paradise was lost by the yielding of Adam and Eve to Satan's temptation, so it was regained by the resistance of the Son of God to the temptation of the same spirit. Satan is here represented not in the majestic lineaments of Paradise Lost, but as a cunning, smooth, and dissembling creature, a 'Spirit unfortunate', as he describes himself. There is a comparative scarcity of similes and ornament, and only a vivid and ingenious expansion of the biblical texts.

Book I relates the baptism of Jesus by John at Bethabara, and the proclamation from heaven that he is the Son of God. Satan, alarmed, summons a council of his peers, and undertakes his temptation. Jesus is led into the wilderness, where, after 40 days, Satan in the guise of 'an aged man in rural weeds' approaches him and suggests that he, being now hungry, should prove his divine character by turning the stones around him into bread. Jesus, seeing through his guile, sternly replies. Night falls on the desert.

Books II and III. Meanwhile Andrew and Simon seek Jesus, and Mary is troubled at his absence. Satan confesses again with his council. He once more tries the power, and a disputation follows as to the real value of earthly glory. Satan, confuted, next reminds Jesus that he once more tried the attractions of the poets, and suggests that he should free it. He takes Jesus to a high mountain and shows him the kingdoms of the earth. A description follows (III. 251–346) of the contemporary state of the eastern world, divided between the powers of Rome and of the Parthians, as seen in this vision. Satan offers an alliance with, or conquest of, the Parthians, and the liberation of the Jews then in captivity.

Book IV. Jesus remaining unmoved by Satan’s ‘politic maxims’, the tempter, turning to the western side, draws his attention to Rome and proposes the expulsion of the wicked emperor Tiberius; and finally, pointing out Athens, urges the attractions of her poets, orators, and philosophers. All these failing, Satan brings Jesus back to the wilderness, and the second night falls. On the third morning, confessing Jesus orators, and philosophers. All these failing, Satan offers an alliance with, or conquest of, the Parthians, and the liberation of the Jews then in captivity.

Paradise of Dainty Devises, The, a collection of works by minor poets of the 1560s and 1570s: they include Lord *Vaux, the earl of *Oxford, *Churchyard, and William Hunnis. The volume was compiled by R. *Edwards, published after his death (1576), and frequently reprinted. It was edited by H. E. Rollins (1927).

Paradiso, of Dante, see Divina commedia.

paraleipsis, a rhetorical figure (sometimes called ‘pretention’) of apparent omission in which a speaker pretends to pass over what he actually calls to mind, as in ‘I shall not mention my opponent’s criminal record’.

Parasitaster, The, or The Fawn, a comedy by J. *Marston, published 1606.

Hercules, the widowed duke of Ferrara, wishes his son Tiberio to marry Dulcimel, daughter of a neighbouring prince, and, in order to defeat his unwillingness, declares that he will marry Dulcimel himself. He sends Tiberio to negotiate the marriage, and under the name of Faunus follows in disguise to see how matters develop. Dulcimel falls in love with Tiberio and, being a woman of wit and resource, manages to win him.

Parataxis is the absence of relative or dependent clauses (subordination), as in ‘I came, I saw, I conquered’. The adjectival form is ‘paratactic’. See hypotaxis.

Pardiggle, Mrs, in Dickens’s *Bleak House, a lady ‘distinguished for rapacious benevolence’.

‘Pardoner’s Tale, The’, see Canterbury Tales, 14.

Paridell, in Spenser’s *Faerie Queene, a false and libertine knight (III. viii, i, x, and iv. i, ii) who consorts with *Duessa and elopes with *Hellenore, the wife of *Malbecco.

Paris, Count, a Capuilet and suitor of *Juliet in Shakespeare’s *Romeo and Juliet.

Paris, Matthew (d. 1259), monk and historian, who entered the monastery of St Albans in 1217, succeeding *Roger of Wendover as chronicler, and compiling the *Chronica Majora, his greatest work, there from 1235 to 1259. He extends the range of the chronicle to include foreign events; as well as its great historical value, the work is outstanding for its expressive liveliness. He also wrote the *Historia Minor (or *Historia Anglorum), a summary of events in England from 1200 to 1250, and the *Vitae Abbatarum S. Albani, the lives of the first 23 abbots up to 1255, the last two or three of which were composed by him. It is unlikely that the *Vitae Duorum Offarum, which are found with manuscripts of the *Chronica, are by him. He went to Norway on a papal visit in 1248 and he knew French, which has been taken by some to suggest a period spent in Paris to explain his name. But Paris was an English surname in the 13th cent., especially in Lincolnshire.

Developing the form of *The Village, ‘The Parish Register’ relates the memories of a country parson, as he looks through the entries in his registers of births, marriages, and deaths. The work first revealed Crabbe’s gift for narrative, and reaffirmed his determination to present the truth, however sordid. The tales include the story of Phoebe Dawson, which pleased Sir W. *Scott and C. J. *Fox; and the terrible account, written in stanzas (and possibly under the influence of opium) in ‘Sir Eustace Grey’, of a patient in a madhouse.

Parisina, a poem by *Byron, published 1816, founded on a passage in *Gibbon’s *Antiquities of the House of Brunswick.

When his beloved wife Parisina murmurs the name of Hugo in her sleep, Prince Azo learns of her incestuous love for his bastard son. Hugo is a noble youth, loved by his father, but he must suffer death for his sin. Wild with grief, Parisina departs to an unknown fate, and Azo is left embittered and wretched.

PARK, Mungo (1771–1806), born near Selkirk. He was educated at Edinburgh and became a surgeon in the mercantile marine. He explored the course of the Niger and became famous by his vivid account of his travels, Travels in the Interior Districts of Africa . . . in the Years 1795, 1796 and 1797, published on his return in 1799. He went back to the Niger in 1805, and was killed in an attack on his party in the rapids of Bousaa (now submerged in Kainji Reservoir, Nigeria). He was a friend of Sir W. *Scott. See K. Lupton, Mungo Park, the African Traveler (1979).

PARKER, Dorothy (Rothschild) (1893–1967), New York-born American humorist and journalist, legendary for her instant wit and for her satirical verses; she also wrote sketches and short stories, many of them published in the New Yorker and various collections.

PARKER, Matthew (1504–75), educated at St Mary’s Hostel and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He was in 1544 elected master of the college, where he reformed the library, to which he was to bequeath his fine manuscripts. He fled to Frankfurt am Main during Queen Mary’s reign, reluctantly accepted the archbishopric of Canterbury on Elizabeth’s accession, and was consecrated at Lambeth in 1559. He identified himself with the party (afterwards known as the Anglican party) which sought to establish a via media between Romanism and Puritanism. From 1563 to 1568 he was occupied with the production of the Bishop’s Bible (see Bible, The English), his most distinguished service to the theological studies of the day. In his later years he retired more and more from society, being conscious of the strength of the opposing current, headed by Leicester. He was buried in his private chapel at Lambeth. In 1648 his remains were disinterred and buried under a dunghill, but after the Restoration they were restored to their original resting place. He was a great benefactor to his college and to the University of Cambridge, where he constructed a handsome new street, which he named University Street, leading from the schools to Great St Mary’s. To his efforts we are indebted for the earliest editions of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, important manuscript of the Theoricae Eclesiae et Principiorum Libri (1572-4) is said to be the first book privately printed in England.

PARKINSON, John (1567–1650), apothecary to James I, herbalist, author of Paradisi in Sole Paradisus Terrestris, or A Garden of All Sorts of Pleasant Flowers which Our English Ayre will Permit to Be Nourshed up . . . (1629), with woodcuts; also of a great herbal, Theatrwm Botanicum (1640).

PARKMAN, Francis (1823–93), American historian, born in Boston. After graduation from Harvard he travelled in Europe, then journeyed out to Wyoming to study Indian life, giving an account of his journey in The Oregon Trail (1849), which was dictated, owing to his own ill health, to his cousin and companion Quincy A. Shaw. His history of the struggle of the English and French for dominion in North America was published in a series of studies, beginning with his History of the Conspiracy of the Pontiac (1851) and continuing through several volumes, concluding with A Half-Century of Conflict (1892). D. Davie pays tribute to Parkman’s distinguished prose in A Sequence for Francis Parkman (1961), inspired by Parkman’s vivid evocation of Lasalle, Frontenac, Montcalm, Wolfe, Pontiac, and others.

Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in Their Day, a volume of poems in blank verse by R. Browning published 1887. The phrase ‘certain people of importance’ derives from a passage in Dante’s Vita nuova. Browning refers to a number of obscure historical figures whose works he had studied in his youth, and who had contributed to the formation of his mind. Each of these figures is matched by a contemporary of Browning’s, and Browning ‘parleys’ with them in a renewed consideration of the central topics of art and life that had preoccupied him since the beginning of his career. The collection therefore constitutes an oblique autobiography and personal testament, and is of unique value to an understanding both of the sources of Browning’s art and of the mature processes of that art. Perhaps the finest of the ‘Parleyings’ are the two concluding ones, with ‘Gérard de Lairesse’ and ‘Charles Avison’.

Parliament of Fowls, The, a dream-poem by Chaucer in 699 lines of rhyme-royal, centring on a conference of birds to choose their mates on St Valentine’s day; it has accordingly been thought to be a poem in celebration of a marriage, perhaps the marriage of the young Richard II to Anne of Bohemia in 1382. This date would accord with the Italian influences on the poem, which otherwise cannot be dated more closely than between 1372 and 1386.

The poet falls asleep after a prologue in which he makes the Boethian lament that he has not what he wants, and has what he does not want (this usually refers to unrequited love in medieval writing). He then has a vision of a garden of the kind which is the setting for the Roman de la rose and in which the goddess Nature presides over the choosing of mates. Three tercel eagles pay court to a beautiful ‘formel’ (female) and there follows a long dispute about the criteria for success in a love suit, the argument of which centres on the opposition between the courtly love approach of the noble eagles and the pragmatism of the duck (whose worldly advice has been called ‘bourgeois’): ‘But she will love him, let him take another.’ The debate is unresolved, and the birds agree to assemble again a year later to decide. Although the argument is incon-exclusive, the poem itself has a rounded completeness which makes it almost unique in Chaucer's works.

Parnassians, a group of French poets, headed by Leconte de Lisle, who sought restraint, precision, and objectivity in poetry, in reaction to the emotional extravaganzas of Romanticism. Their name derives from the three collections of their work published under the title Le Parnasse contemporain, in 1866, 1871, and 1876. Associated with the group, besides Leconte de Lisle, were José-Maria de Heredia (1842-1905), whose collection Les Trophées appeared in 1893, Catulle Mendès (1841-1909), and René-François-Armand Sully-Prudhomme (1839-1907).

Parnassus Plays, The, the name given to a trilogy produced between 1598 and 1602 by students of St John's College, Cambridge, consisting of The Pilgrimage to Parnassus and The Return from Parnassus, the latter apparently in two parts. Authorship has not been established, but they seem to be the work of two dramatists, unusually writing academic drama in the vernacular; they have been attributed to J. *Day and, more recently, to John Weever of Queen's and J. Hall. They treat amusingly of the attempts of a group of young men (one apparently modelled on Nashe) to catch a patron or cheat a tradesman, and following menial occupations, which they finally abandon in discouragement and 'returne' to Cambridge. They were first published together in 1886 and edited by J. B. Leishman (1949).

Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846-91), born at Avondale, Co. Wicklow, educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge. He became MP for Meath in 1875 and was elected chairman of the Home Rule party in its fight for Irish self-government, in spite of being a Protestant himself, and exerted enormous influence outside the House. In 1878 he was elected president of the Irish National Land League. Parnell formulated the tactic of 'boycotting' in 1880. He was imprisoned in Kilmainham Jail in 1881 for his incendiary speeches, and his career was ruined by his appearance as co-respondent in a divorce case brought by Capt. O'Shea against his wife; the scandal turned the Irish Catholics against him and contributed to a split amongst the Irish nationalists. He died five months after his marriage to Mrs O'Shea.

PARNELL, Thomas (1679-1718), born in Dublin and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He was archdeacon of Clogher and a friend of Swift and Pope (to whose Iliad he contributed an introductory essay). He was a member of the *Scriblerus Club. His 'Hymn to Contentment' was published in Steele's Poetical Miscellanies (1714) and his mock-heroic Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice with the Remarks of Zolius in 1717 (see BATRACHOMYOMACHIA), but most of his work was published posthumously by Pope in 1721. His poems include The Hermit, a moral narrative in heroic couplets, in which the mysterious ways of God are revealed to the hermit by the apparently ruthless and amoral actions of a disguised angel, and 'Night-Piece on Death', in fluent octosyllabics, perhaps the first of the 18th-cent. graveyard poems (though reminiscent of *'II Penseroso') which in Goldsmith's view inspired all those night-pieces and churchyard scenes that have since appeared (Goldsmith's Life of Parnell, 1770). Dr *Johnson praised 'the easy sweetness of his diction'. The first complete edition of his poems, ed. C. Rawson and F. P. Lock, was published in 1885.

parody, from the Greek παροδία, normally held to have meant a song sung counter to or alongside another song. The term parody first referred to a narrative poem in epic metre, but is not generally restricted in later use. The parodist must both imitate and create in congruity in relation to the textbook, and parody has, contrary to pastiche, traditionally had a comic dimension. Parody should be distinguished from satire: the former targets a pre-existing text, the latter persons or events in the real world. Parody is a double-coded form of discourse. The classical mock-epic tradition and Aristophanes' parodies of Euripides' tragedies provide early examples of the genre, liturgical parody and parodies of sacred texts flourished in the Middle Ages, and Chaucer's *Canterbury Tales contains parodic elements. Cervantès's Don Quixote is an outstanding example of what has been called 'general parody', a form in which parody is central to the plot and structure of the whole work. Sterne's Tristram Shandy and Joyce's Ulysses are celebrated examples of such parody. Often writing in the mock-epic tradition, Swift, Pope, Sterne, and Fielding all used parody. Shamela, attributed to Fielding, is an example of parody's potential as criticism. Rejected Addresses (1812), by James and Horace Smith, was influential in its time, and there was a strong popular tradition of parody in the 19th cent. Hone was acquitted in three famous trials after having parodied the litany, the Athanasian Creed, and the church catechism. There were innumerable short parodies of Shakespeare's work, and Carroll's nonsense verse is often parodic. *Beerbohm is perhaps the finest prose parodist in the language. The second half of the 20th cent. witnessed a renewed interest in parody—see Nabokov, Fowles, Stopard.

Parolles, the cowardly follower of Bertram in Shake-spear’s All’s Well that Ends Well; his name means ‘words’ and suggests that he promises more talk than action.

paronomasia, a play on words, a kind of pun, in which the repeated words are similar but not identical; e.g. Lady Macbeth: ‘I’ll gild the faces of the grooms withal,’ For it must seem their guilt.’

PARR, Samuel (1747–1825), a fine Latin scholar, who excelled as a writer of Latin epigrams, and wrote that on Dr *Johnson in St Paul’s. He was regarded as ‘the Whig Johnson’ (DNB), but his conversation was apparently far inferior to that of his model, and his works (collected in 8 vols, 1828) are marked by verbosity and mannerism.

PARRY, Sir Hubert (1848–1918), English composer and teacher, who, with *Stanford, began to put new life and standards into English music after the doldrums of the Victorian period. The year 1880 which saw the first performance of Parry’s Piano Concerto and the cantata Scenes from Prometheus Unbound (Shelley) marked the beginning of a musical renascence, and the choral settings of Milton which followed, Blessed Pair of Sirens (1887) and L’Allegro ed Il Penseroso (1890) confirmed Parry’s position as its figurehead: the former is generally considered his masterpiece. The later choral works sound more conventional, though there is a nice vein of humour in The Pied Piper of Hamelin (1905), and the six Songs of Farewell (1916, with words by *Vaughan, John *Davies, *Campion, *Lockhart, and *Donne) are outstanding. On a smaller scale he produced 12 sets of *English Lyrics for solo voice and piano settings of some of the greatest poems in the language. Parry by now is best known for the unison setting, made in the hardest days of the First World War, of *Blake’s short poem commonly known as ‘Jerusalem’.

PARRY, Sir William Edward (1790–1855), Arctic explorer, whose expeditions are described in his three Journals of voyages for the discovery of a North-West Passage, undertaken between 1819 and 1825 (published 1821, 1824, 1826) and in his Narrative of an Attempt to Reach the North Pole, 1827 (1828).

Parzifal, see *Perceval.

‘Parson’s Tale, The,’ see *Canterbury Tales, 24.

Parthenissa, see Boyle, Roger.

Parthenophil and Parthenophe, a collection of sonnets by B. *Barnes, issued in 1593, notable as one of the first of such collections to appear after Sidney’s *Astrophel and Stella.

Partlet, the hen in the tale of *Reynard the Fox and in Chaucer’s ‘The Nun’s Priest’s Tale’ (see *Canterbury Tales, 20) as Pertelote. ‘*Sister Partlet with her hooded head’ in Dryden’s *The Hind and the Panther stands for Catholic nuns.

Partridge, a character in Fielding’s *Tom Jones.

Partridge, Frances (Catherine) (1900– ), diarist and translator, educated at Bedales and Newnham College, Cambridge. She became with her husband Ralph Partridge assistant editor of the Greville Memoirs (ed. L. *Strachey and Roger Fulford, 8 vols, 1938). Six volumes of her own diaries, covering her experiences in and beyond the Bloomsbury Group between the late 1930s and mid-1970s, gained her a wide readership late in life.

Partridge, John (1644–1715), the victim of a mistification by *Swift. See Bickerstaff and Almanacs.

Pascoli, Giovanni (1855–1912), the major precursor of *Modernism in Italian poetry. A socialist sympathizer, he was imprisoned for some months after demonstrations in 1879. Nature and simple things often provide his themes, but he draws from Symbolism the suggestion of enigma and evanescence. His language spans the range from pure sound (animal- and baby-talk) to the literary conventions of lyric tradition. He translated from the classics and English Romantic poets. The essential Pascoli is in Myriace (1891–1905) and Canti di Castelvecchio (1903).

Pascal, Blaise (1623–62), French mathematician, physicist, and moralist. As gifted in science as in letters, he did important work in geometry, hydrodynamics, and atmospheric pressure, and invented a calculating machine, a syringe, and a hydraulic press. He came under the influence of Jansenism from around 1646, and entered the convent of Port-Royal in 1655. His literary fame rests on two works, Les Provinciales (1656–7), English trans., 1657, polemical letters directed against the casuistry of the Jesuits, and the posthumously published Pensées (1670, trans., 1688), fragments of an incomplete defense of the Christian religion. These form a survey of the contradications of human existence, pursued with an intensity of logic and passion characteristic of all his work, and encompassing all the major branches of knowledge, from history and ethics to rhetoric and psychology. He exercised an influence on a number of later thinkers, notably Rousseau, Bergson, and the *existentialists.

novels Ragazzi di vita (The Ragazzi, 1955) and Una vita violenta (A Violent Life, 1958), in which he explores the culture and language of outcast plebeians of the Roman shanty suburbs (he was murdered in such a setting); and for his anti-establishment polemics, as in Scritti corsari (Pirate Writings, 1975). His best critical essays are in Passione e ideologia (Passion and Ideology, 1966) and his best poetry is in Le ceneri di Gramsci (Gramsci's Ashes, 1957).

PASQUIL, or Pasquin. ‘Pasquino’ or ‘Pasquillo’ was the name popularly given to a mutilated statue disinterred at Rome in 1501, and set up by Cardinal Caraffa at the corner of his palace near the Piazza Navona. It became the custom to salute Pasquin on St Mark’s day in Latin verses. In process of time these pasquinate or pasquines tended to become satirical, and the term began to be applied, not only in Rome but in other countries, to satirical compositions and lampoons, political, ecclesiastical, or personal. According to Mazocchi, the name Pasquino originated in that of a schoolmaster who lived opposite the spot where the statue was found; a later tradition made Pasquino a caustic tailor or shoemaker; another calls him a barber [OED]. Replies to the pasquinades used to be attached to the Marforio, an ancient statue of a river-god, thought to be of Mars.

PASQUIN, Anthony, see Williams, J.

Passage to India, A, a novel by E. M. Forster, published 1924. It is a picture of society in India under the British Raj, of the clash between East and West, and of the prejudices and misunderstandings that foredoomed goodwill. Criticized at first for anti-British and possibly inaccurate bias, it has been praised as a superb character study of the people of one race by a writer of another.

The story is told in three parts, I, Mosque, II, Caves, III, Temple, and concerns Aziz, a young Muslim doctor, whose friendliness and enthusiasm for the British turn to bitterness and disillusionment when his pride is injured. A sympathy springs up between him and the elderly Mrs Moore, who has come to visit her son, the city magistrate. Accompanying her is Adela Quested, young, earnest, and charming, who longs to know the ‘real’ India and tries to disregard the taboos and snobberies of the British circle. Aziz organizes an expedition for the visitors to the famous Caves of Marabar, where an unforeseen development plunges him into disgrace and rouses deep antagonism between the two races. Adela accuses him of insulting her in the Caves, he is committed to prison and stands trial. Adela withdraws her charge, but Aziz turns furiously away from the British, towards a Hindu-Muslim entente. In the third part of the book he has moved to a post in a native state, and is bringing up his family in peace, writing poetry and reading Persian. He is visited by his friend Mr Fielding, the former principal of the Government College, an intelligent, hard-bitten man. They discuss the future of India and Aziz prophesies that only when the British are driven out can he and Fielding really be friends. Among the many characters is Professor Godbole, the detached and saintly Brahman who is the innocent cause of the contretemps, and who makes his final appearance in supreme tranquillity at the festival of the Hindu temple.

Passetyme of Pleasure, or The Historie of Graunde Amoure and La Bell Pucel, an allegorical poem in rhyme-royal and decasyllabic couplets by Hawes, written about 1506 and first printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1509 (edited by Southey, 1831, and by Wright for the Percy Society, 1845). It describes the education of a certain Graunde Amour in the accomplishments required to make a knight perfect and worthy of the love of La Bell Pucel, and narrates his encounters with giants (representing the vices), his marriage, and his death; the whole constituting an allegory of life in the form of a romance of chivalry. It contains a well-known couplet in perhaps its original form:

> For though the day be never so longe,
> At last the belles ryngeth to evensonge.

'Passing of Arthur, The’, see Morte D’Arthur.

Passionate Pilgrim, The, an unauthorized anthology of poems by various authors, published by Hawes, during this time he earned his living by translating, notably Goethe’s Faust, the poetry of *Ralegh, Jonson, Shelley, Byron, and Keats, and Shakespeare. His excellent translations of Hamlet, Othello, Romeo and Juliet, King Lear, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra, and Henry IV are highly valued in Russia.
His main literary concern in the final decades of his life, however, was fervor activity, despite declining health, on the work he intended to be his testament, a witness to the experience of the Russian intelligentsia before, during and after the revolution, the novel Doctor Zhivago. In October 1946 he met Olga Ivinskaya, who was to become the companion of his last years and on whom Lara, the heroine of Doctor Zhivago, is largely based. Despairing of publication in the USSR, he gave permission for publication in Italy, where the novel appeared in 1957. In 1958 he wrote a second ‘Autobiographical sketch’, and was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature. This led to a vehement and shameful campaign against him, the so-called ‘Pasternak affair’, and he declined the prize. Ivinskaya was arrested and imprisoned. Publication of Pasternak’s poetry resumed in the USSR soon after his death, and a volume of his short prose appeared in 1982. But Doctor Zhivago, on which his worldwide fame is based, was not published in Russia until 1987, where his reputation depends on the poetic achievement of My Sister Life and Second Birth.

pastiche, a literary composition made up from various authors or sources, or in imitation of the style of another author; or a picture made up of fragments pieced together or copied with modification from an original, or in professed imitation of the style of another artist: the imitative intention is now the most usual meaning.

Paston Letters, the, a collection of letters preserved by the Pastons, a well-to-do Norfolk family, written between c.1420 and 1504. They are of great value for the evidence they give of the language of their time, but even more for the general historical, political, and social interest they provide. They concern three generations of the family, and most were written in the reigns of Henry VI, Edward IV, and Richard III. They are unique as historical material, showing the violence and anarchy of 15th cent. England and the domestic conditions in which a family of this class lived. The letters were published in three volumes, in 1787, 1789, and 1823. The originals were recovered in the second half of the 19th cent. Ed. Norman Davis (1971, 1976); Selections (1958); Selections (modernized) (1963).

pastoral, a form of escape literature concerned with country pleasures, which is found in poetry, drama, and prose fiction. Its earliest examples appear in the Idylls of Theocritus in which shepherds lead a sunlit, idealized existence of love and song. The eclogues of Virgil and Longus’ romance Daphnis and Chloe blended the idealization with a more authentic picture of country life, and Virgil added an important new feature to the tradition in making his poems a vehicle for social comment. Neglected during the Middle Ages, the pastoral reappeared during the Renaissance when Petrarch and his imitators composed eclogues in Latin and in the vernaculars. These were often more realistic and richer in contemporary references than their Virgilian models; but it was with drama (*Tasso, *Guarini, Fletcher) and the prose romance (*Sanzar, *Cervantes, *Sidney, d’Urfé) that pastoral attained the peak of its popularity. In the 17th cent., however, the Theocritean vision which had so far satisfied men’s desire to escape from the pressures of urban life gave place to a more realistic dream of enjoying a rural retreat. Poets like James Thomson extolled country pleasures and represented rural trades as enjoyable, until Crabbe showed that their descriptions were divorced from reality, and Wordsworth taught men to seek comfort in a Nature endowed with visionary power. The pastoral in its traditional form died with the rise of Romanticism.

Pastorella, in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (vi. ix–xii), a shepherdess, loved by Coridon the shepherd and by Sir Calidore, believed to be the daughter of Meliboe. She is carried off by brigands, rescued by Sir Calidore, and discovered to be the daughter of Sir Bellamour and the Lady Claribell.

pastor fido, see Guarini.

PATER, Walter Horatio (1839–94), born in Stepney, the son of a surgeon who died in 1842; his mother died in 1854. From 1869 he lived with his unmarried sisters Hester and Clara (one of the founders of Somerville College, Oxford). After a childhood in rural Enfield, he was educated at King’s School, Canterbury, and The Queen’s College, Oxford, where his interests in Hellenism, pre-Socratic and German philosophy, European art and literature were encouraged, variously, by B. Jowett, W. W. Capes, and M. Arnold. He became a fellow of Brasenose in 1864; his Oxford career was marked by personal and professional controversies. Jowett blocked a university appointment when he suspected Pater’s involvement with a student; colleagues attacked the ‘Conclusion’ to Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873) because it postulated the relativity of existence (‘that strange, perpetual, weaving and unwaving of ourselves’), celebrated ‘pagan’ art, and ‘the love of art for its own sake’, and advised ‘To burn always with this hard gem-like flame, to maintain this ecstasy, is success in life.’ Many of his writings on art provide a counterpart to those of Ruskin, then Oxford’s Slade professor of art. Hoppin was among the students who appreciated his critical and aesthetic independence.

Early essays for the Westminster Review and the Fortnightly Review articulated a radical critique of absolutism and expressed admiration for Hellenic homoerotic discourse and culture. Studies in the History of the Renaissance, later acclaimed by Wilde and others as ‘the holy writ of beauty’, traces the rebirth of Hellenism in medieval France, the art of Pater's prose fiction examines the possibilities of subjectivity within a specific historical and cultural milieu. The quality of life is always measured against the fact of death; the 'aesthetics of pain' is paramount. Marius the Epicurean (1885) is set in the days of Marcus Aurelius; Gastón de Latour (published 'unfinished' in 1896 but reissued with new materials in 1995) in the era of Montaigne and the religious controversies of 16th-century France. The Child in the House (Macmillan's Magazine, 1878) is one of many texts blurring the boundaries between autobiography and fiction. Four Imaginary Portraits (1887) are experiments in genre-blending. Narratives such as 'Apollo in Picardy' (Harper's New Monthly, 1893) exploit the rebirth/twilight of the gods motif. Appreciations: With an Essay on Style (1889) and Essays from the Guardian (1896) encapsulate his engagement with Victorian periodical journalism and belles-lettres. Plato and Platonism (1893), based on lectures and scholarly essays, represents an eclectic synthesis of ancient and then-contemporary philosophy, and justifies a homoerotic sensibility. Demeter and Persephone, an 1876 lecture later published in Greek Studies (1895), praises ancient matriarchal religious practices; Modernists such as Doolittle and V. Woolf were influenced by its revisionary myth-making and the story of female empowerment.

Pater's works have long been associated with the *'art for art's sake' movement, and the cultivation of decadence in the 1880s and 1890s. Yeats insisted that Pater's writings are 'permanent in our literature' because of their 'revolutionary importance'. In the decades immediately following the Wilde trial, many male Modernists, including T. E. *Hulme, T. S. *Eliot and W. *Lewis, felt compelled to denigrate Pater's writings, but his contribution to Modernist aesthetics and theories of subjectivity, his importance to *Joyce, *Woolf, and others, have been reconsidered by critics such as F. McGrath (The Sensible Spirit, 1986). See Letters of Walter Pater, ed. L. Evans (1970); M. Levey, The Case of Walter Pater (1978); R. Seiler (ed.), Walter Pater: A Life Remembered (1987); L. Brake, Walter Pater (1994).

Pathetic fallacy, a phrase coined by Ruskin in Of the Pathetic Fallacy (Modern Painters, iii, 1856, ch. 12), indicating the tendency of writers and artists to attribute human emotions and sympathies to nature. Ruskin sees in it morbidity and 'a falseness in all our impressions of external things', preferring the 'very plain and leafy fact' of a primrose to those poets (e.g. Wordsworth in Peter Bell) 'to whom the primrose is anything else than a primrose'. The technique was extensively used in the late 18th and 19th cents by *Goethe, *Gray, *Collins, *Cowper, *Wordsworth, *Shelley, and *Tennyson: Shelley’s Adonais and Tennyson’s In Memoriam contain notable examples. Wordsworth in particular used the pathetic fallacy with great seriousness, not as a decorative device, but its use declined after Ruskin’s formulation. Nevertheless it is still widely though perhaps not so conspicuously employed. See J. Miles, Pathetic Fallacy in the Nineteenth Century (1942); I. D. Thomas, Poetic Truth and Pathetic Fallacy, Texas Studies in Literature and Language, 3 (1961).

Path to Rome, The, see Belloc.

Patience, an alliterative poem in 531 lines from the second half of the 14th cent., the only manuscript of which is the famous Cotton Nero A. X which is also the sole manuscript of *Pearl, *Cleanness, and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. It tells in a vigorous and humorous way the story of Jonah and his trials sent by God. Modern critical practice usually treats the four poems in the manuscript as the work of a single author, and there are some affinities between them (particularly between Patience and Pearl) which make this not implausible. Ed. J. J. Anderson (1969).

Patience, an opera by *Gilbert and Sullivan produced in 1881, a deliberate satire on the *Aesthetic movement, in which *Bunthorne is said to be modelled on *Wilde and Grosvenor on *Swinburne.

Patient Grissil, a comedy by Dekker in collaboration with Chettle and Haughton, written 1600, printed 1603.

The marquess of Salucia, smitten with the beauty of Grissil, the virtuous daughter of a poor basket-maker, makes her his bride. Wishing to try her patience, he subjects her to a series of humiliations and cruelties, robbing her of her children and making her believe them dead, and finally pretending to take another wife and making her attend upon the new bride. All these trials she bears submissively. The new bride is revealed to be Grissil’s daughter, and Grissil is restored to honour. The play contains the well-known songs ‘Art thou poore yet hast thou golden slumbers, | O sweet content' and 'Golden slumbers kisse your eyes'.

The same subject is treated in Chaucer's 'Clerk's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales, 9). It was taken originally from the *Decameron (Day 10, Tale 10). *Perrault also wrote a playful version of it.

PATMORE, Coventry Kersey Dighton (1823–96), son of P. G. *Patmore. He published his first volume of Poems (including 'The Woodman's Daughter', later the subject of a well-known painting by *Millais) in 1844. In 1846, after his father's financial collapse, he became assistant in the printed book department of the British Museum, on the recommendation of *Milnes. His work was much admired by the *Pre-Raphaelites, with whom he became acquainted, and he contributed to the *Germ. In 1847 he married his first wife Emily, who inspired his long and popular sequence of poems in praise of married love, *The Angel in the House (1854–63); together the Patmores represented an image of the ideal Victorian couple, and in this role entertained many eminent literary figures, including *Tennyson, *Ruskin, and R. *Browning, who wrote a poem to Emily. Emily died in 1862, leaving him with six children. In 1864 he travelled to Rome, where he met his second wife Marianne, a Roman Catholic, and was himself converted to Catholicism, factors which may have contributed to his decline in popularity as a poet; *The Unknown Eros (1877) was received with much less enthusiasm than his previous work. It contains odes marked by an erotic mysticism, but also some more autobiographical pieces (now the most anthologized), including 'The Azalea', 'Departure', 'A Farewell', directly inspired by Emily's illness and death, and 'The Toys', inspired by a moment of anger and grief aroused by one of his sons. *Amelia, Tamerton Church-Tower, etc., with a preface on English metrical law, appeared in 1878. His second wife died in 1880 and he married Harriet, the governess of his children, who survived him. In his later years he formed new friendships, predominantly with other Catholic writers including G. M. *Hopkins, F. *Thompson, and A. *Meynell, who helped to revive interest in his poetry. His *The Rod, the Root and the Flower (1895) is chiefly meditations on religious subjects.

PATMORE, Peter George (1786–1855), the father of C. *Patmore, a close friend of *Lamb and *Hazlitt, and an active journalist. He was editor of the *New Monthly Magazine, 1841–53, and among other varied works published in 1854 My Friends and Acquaintances, a lively, unreliable account of Lamb, Hazlitt, T. *Campbell, *Sheridan, and others. Many of the intimate letters in Hazlitt's *Liber Amoris are addressed to him.

PATON, Alan (1903–88), the author of *Cry, the Beloved Country.

PATRICK, St (c.389–c.461), the patron saint of Ireland, the son of a Roman decurion, was probably born in Scotland (or Wales). He was taken captive to Ireland when he was a child, and returned there voluntarily to preach the gospel in 432, after years of study in Gaul, directed by Martin of Tours. He journeyed first through Ulster and then, it is said, through the whole of Ireland. Many stories, legends, and purported writings of his are current in Ireland. See J. T. McNeill, The Celtic Churches: A History A.D. 200 to 1200 (1974), ch. 4; R. P. C. Hanson, St Patrick, His Origins and Career (1968).

Patronage, the Idea of a, see Bolingbroke, H. St J. patronage, literary, traditionally, individual patronage, in the form of financial help, payment in kind, or more indirect assistance, exercised by royalty and the wealthy in return for dedications, entertainment, and prestige (as well as sometimes for more altruistic motives). Among innumerable examples, *Chaucer was assisted by *John of Gaunt, *Shakespeare by the earl of Southampton, *Donne by Sir Robert Drury, Dr *Johnson (belatedly) by the earl of *Chesterfield, *Wordsworth by Sir G. *Beaumont. The relationship was not always happy, as Johnson's definition of a patron as 'a wretch who supports with insolence, and is paid with flattery' suggests, but it also directly inspired many fine works, such as *Jonson's tribute to the *Sidneys in his 'country house poem' 'To Penshurst' (see Penshurst Place).

Patronage was also exercised through the gift of clerical livings; *Crabbe, befriended by the duke of Rutland, wrote of the possible misfortunes of such an experience in 'The Patron' (1812). See also Publishing, Subscription.

Early in the 18th cent. new sources of support for authors began to develop. The circulating *libraries offered new openings for sales, and the rising success of *periodicals provided more work until well into the 20th cent. So in the course of the 18th cent. patronage passed largely from men of individual wealth to men of professional power or commercial interest, such as literary editors and library owners and suppliers. Dr *Johnson, for example, called the bookseller R. *Dods- ley 'my patron'. *Goldsmith commented that 'the few poets of England no longer depend on the great for subsistence; they have now no other patrons than the public.'

In 1790 *David Williams founded the *Royal Literary Fund, and in 1837 the Civil List Act permitted the treasury to assist authors by the grant of pensions (and by the occasional gift of a 'bounty'), provided they could demonstrate 'desert and distress'. Over 750 authors (and their dependants) have benefited, including Wordsworth, *Tennyson, M. *Arnold, W. H. *Hudson, W. B. *Yeats, and T. F. *Powys. *Conrad eventually returned his pension; Mrs *Craik set hers aside for less fortunate authors, and H. *Martineau refused several offers, fearing they would compromise her independence. The proportion of the Civil List monies awarded to authors has declined from over 40 per cent in the last century, to around 35 per cent, and the pension is now worth on average only £600 p.a. It is awarded on the recommendation of the Royal Literary Fund, the *Society of Authors, the *Poetry Society, and other bodies. The *Arts Council also has provided grants to individual writers, as well as assisting literature in more indirect ways through grants to bodies, support for schemes such as ‘Writers in Schools’, ‘Writers in Residence’, etc., support for periodicals, and other projects.

PATTEN, Brian (1946— ), poet, born and educated in Liverpool, where he became one of the group known as the *Liverpool poets. He published with R. *McGough and A. *Henri in The Mersey Sound (1967), and has many subsequent volumes of his own, including Little John’s Confession (1967), Vanishing Trick (1976), and Armada (1996). He also writes prolifically for children, in both prose and verse: titles include Mr Moon’s Last Case (1977), Gangsters, Ghosts and Dragon Flies (1981), and Impossible Parents (1994).

Patterne, Sir Willoughby, Eleanor and Isabel, Lieutenant, and Crossjay, characters in Meredith’s *The Egoist.

PATTISON, Mark (1813–84), educated at Oriel College, Oxford, a supporter of Newman and the *Oxford movement until Newman’s departure for Rome. He was ordained priest in 1843 and became successively fellow and tutor (1843–55) of Lincoln College, Oxford; he would have been elected rector in 1851 but for an intrigue among the reactionary fellows of the college. He was an influential tutor, keenly interested in university reform, and travelled to Germany to study continental systems of education. His ideas on education can be found in Oxford Studies (1855) and Suggestions on Academical Organisation (1868); his life work—a history of European learning surrounding a biography of *Scaliger—was never completed. His best-known work was his classic life of Issac Casaubon 1559–1614 (1875). His other published works included an important post-war Northern Irish poet. He is the most overtly ‘political’ Ulster poet, imagining a form of non-sectarian Republican socialism deriving from the Protestant political radicalism which climaxed in the 1798 revolt. A State of Justice (1977) and The Strange Museum (1980) drew on *Auden and Douglas *Dunn, while in Liberty Tree (1983) Paulin’s language took in Ulster dialect and assumed a jagged, improvised ‘spoken’ quality which is both compelling and forbidding, ranging from revolutionary France to the Second World War. See Selected Poems 1972–1990 (1993) and Walking a Line (1994). Poetry and criticism seem continuous for Paulin. Prose includes Writing to the Moment: Selected Critical Essays 1980–1996 (1996) and The Day Star of Liberty: William Hazlitt’s Radical Style (1998).

Paulina, the wife of *Antigonus and loyal defender of *Hermione in Shakespeare’s *The Winter’s Tale.

Pauline, a poem in blank verse, the first poem to be published by R. *Browning; it appeared anonymously in 1833. Subtitled ‘A Fragment of a Confession’, it is marked by the influence of Browning’s Romantic predecessors, notably *Shelley; but its form and theme already declare Browning’s independence. The ‘confession’ is addressed to Pauline by the first in a long series of ‘fallen’ speakers whose ambivalent rhetorical combines self-reproach and self-justification. The poem was barely noticed, but an important commentary by J. S. *Mill, in the form of an annotated copy, reached Browning through their common friend W. J. *Fox. Mill assumed the speaker of the poem to be the author, and severely criticized his morbidity and self-regard. Partly in response to this misunderstanding of the poem’s ‘dramatic’ form, Browning suppressed it for over 30 years, finally acknowledging it ‘with extreme repugnance’ in the collected edition of 1867, to avoid the threat of pirate publication.

Paul’s, Children of, a company of boy actors, recruited from the choristers of St Paul’s Cathedral, whose performances enjoyed great popularity at the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th cents. They performed among others the plays of *Lyly. The Children of the Chapel, recruited from the choristers of the Chapel Royal, was another company enjoying popular favour at the same time. Their rivalry with men actors is alluded to in *Hamlet (ii. ii).

Paul’s Letters to his Kinsfolk, a series of letters by Sir
W. *Scott, published in 1816, describing a visit by the author to Brussels, Waterloo, and Paris a few weeks after the battle of Waterloo. The account of the battle is interesting for the details it contains, some of them obtained from Napoleon’s Belgian guide.

Paul’s School, St, founded between 1509 and 1512 by *Colet. *Lily was its first high master. The school was removed from St Paul’s Churchyard to Hammersmith in 1884, and to Barnes in 1968. Among its many distinguished scholars may be mentioned *Camden, *Milton, *Pepys, Sir P. *Francis, G. K. *Chesterton, and E. *Thomas.

PAVESI, Cesare (1908–50), Italian novelist and poet, whose last novel, La luna e i falò (The Moon and the Bonfire, 1950), is his finest. Realism and myth, lyrical memoir and contemporary reality, combine in the highly individual texture of his prose, which expresses the heart-searchings of a solitary man with a restless social conscience. Other main novels are: Il compagno (The Comrade, 1947), Prima che il gallo canti (Before Cock-Crow, 1949), La bella estate (The Beautiful Summer, 1949). His best poems are in Lavorare stanca (Work Wearies, 1936). He made many translations from English and American authors (*Joyce, *Faulkner, etc.) who influenced him; his translation of Melville’s *Moby-Dick is definitive. His suicide was seen as representative of intellectuals broken by the tensions of post-war Europe.

PAYN, James (1830–98), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was a regular contributor to *Household Words and became editor of Chambers’s Journal (1859–74) and the *Cornhill Magazine (1882–96). He published a volume of poems in 1853 and several volumes of essays, including Some Private Views (1894), Some Literary Recollections (1884), Gleams of Memory (1894), and The Backwater of Life (1899), with an introduction by Sir L. *Stephen. He wrote 100 novels of which Lost Sir Massingberd (1864) and By Proxy (1878) were the most popular.

PAZ, Octavio (1914–98), poet, who was born and died in Mexico City. He made his name interrogating Mexican identity and history in El laberinto de la soledad (1950; The Labyrinth of Solitude: Life and Thought in Mexico, 1961). Águila o sol? (1951; Eagle or Sun?, 1970) and Piedra de sol (1957; Sun Stone, 1962) explore Mexican motifs guided by a fascination with how the mind perceives through language and how poetry and eroticism defeat history, collected in Poemas (1935–1975) (1979; The Collected Poems of Octavio Paz, 1957–1987, 1987). His best works is his journey-meditation El mono gramático (1974; The Monkey Grammarians) and his biography of the Mexican nun Sor Juana o las trampas de la fe (1986; Sor Juana: or, The Traps of Faith, 1988). Paz was a political commentator, an art critic, a translator, and editor of distinguished magazines. He was awarded the *Nobel Prize in 1990.

PEACHAM, Henry (1578–1643), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, an author and a man of very varied talents. He published in 1606 The Art of Drawing with the Pen, a practical treatise on art, issued in 1612 as Graphice, and in many subsequent editions under the title The Gentleman’s Exercise. He published The Compleat Gentleman, the work by which he is best known, in 1622. From the last edition of this (1661) Dr *Johnson drew all the heraldic definitions in his dictionary.

Peacham, and his daughter Polly, characters in Gay’s *The Beggar’s Opera.

PEACOCK, Thomas Love (1785–1866), satirist, essayist, and poet, the son of a London glass merchant, though brought up by his mother. He inherited private means just sufficient to enable him to live as a man of letters. He had published two volumes of verse when, in 1812, he met *Shelley, whose close friend he afterwards remained. Peacock’s prose satires, *Headlong Hall (1816), *Melincourt (1817), and *Nightmare Abbey (1818), survey the contemporary political and cultural scene from a radical viewpoint. Formally they owe most to two classical genres: the ‘Anatomy’, or miscellaneous prose satire, and the Socratic dialogue, especially perhaps Plato’s *Symposium which, like many of Peacock’s convivial arguments, takes place over a dinner table. The satiric debate is diversified by a romantic love-plot, increasingly important in *Crotchet Castle (1831) and *Gryll Grange (1860–1), and by amusing, clever songs. Peacock’s fictional world is an exceptionally pleasant one, for he assembles his characters in English country houses, and sends them on excursions into mountain and forest scenery. In *Maid Marian (1822) and *The Misfortunes of Elphin (1829) he varies his format by employing a historical setting, 12th-cent. England and 6th-cent. Wales, but the topical satirical reference remains unmistakable. Peacock’s early volumes of poetry are of antiquarian interest, but *Rhododaphne (1818) is a fine and historically important poem, in the mythological manner of Keats’s *Lamia; Peacock also wrote some touching lyrics, especially ‘Long Night Succeeds Thy Little Day’ (1826) and ‘Newark Abbey’ (1842). Of his satirical poems and squibs, *The Paper Money Lyrics (1837) lampoon the dogmas of political economists and the malpractices of bankers. Peacock’s sceptical attitude to the fashionable cult of the arts is apparent in his two most sustained critical essays, ‘Essay on Fashionable Literature’ (a fragment, written 1818) and ‘The Four Ages of Poetry’ (1820), to which Shelley replied in a *Defence of Poetry. In 1819 Peacock married Jane Gryffydh, the ‘White Snowdonian antelope’ of Shelley’s ‘Letter to Maria Gisborne‘; she suffered a breakdown at the death of their third daughter in 1826, though she lived on until 1851. His favourite child was his eldest daughter Mary Ellen, who became the first wife of G. *Meredith, and features in Meredith’s sonnet sequence *Modern Love. Peacock entered the East India Company’s service in 1819 and worked immediately under J. *Mill until the latter's death in 1836, when he succeeded to the responsible position of examiner.

PEAKE, Mervyn Laurence (1911–68), novelist, poet, and artist, born at Kuling in China, the son of a medical missionary; he came to England aged 11, was educated at Eltham College, Kent, then attended the Royal Academy Schools. He spent three years from 1934 with a group of artists on the island of Sark, then returned to London, where he taught art, exhibited his own work and illustrated books, published verse and stories for children, etc. He was invalided out of the army in 1943 after a nervous breakdown, but was later commissioned as a war artist, and also visited Belsen in 1945 on a journalistic expedition for the Leader, an experience which profoundly affected him. Meanwhile he was working on a novel, Titus Groan, which was published in 1946; it was followed by Gormenghast (1950) and Titus Alone (1959), which as a trilogy form the work for which Peake is best remembered, a creation of grotesque yet precise Gothic fantasy, recounting the life of Titus, 77th earl of Groan, in his crumbling castle of Gormenghast, surrounded by a cast of characters which includes the colourful Fuchsia, Dr Prunesquallor, and the melancholy Muzzlehatch. Peake’s poetry includes The Glassblowers (1950) and The Rhyme of the Flying Bomb (1962), a ballad of the Blitz; he illustrated most of his own work, and also produced memorable drawings for *The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1943), Treasure Island (1949), and other works. A lighter side of his prolific imagination is seen in his posthumous A Book of Nonsense (1972). The last years of his life were overshadowed by Parkinson’s disease, as described by his widow Maeve Gilmore in her memoir A World Away (1970). For an account of the relationship between his drawings and his prose, see Hilary Spurling’s introduction to The Drawings of Mervyn Peake (1974).

PEARCE, Philippa A., see CHILDREN’S LITERATURE.

Pearl, an alliterative poem in 1,212 lines of twelve-line octosyllabic stanzas from the second half of the 14th cent., the only manuscript of which is the famous Cotton Nero A. X which is also the sole manuscript of *Patience, *Cleanness, and Sir *Gawain and the Green Knight and which comes from the north-west Midlands. Pearl was the author’s daughter and only child who has died before she was 2 years old. Wandering in misery in the garden where she is buried, he has a vision of a river beyond which lies paradise. Here he sees a maiden seated whom he recognizes as his daughter. She chides him for his excessive grief and describes her blessed state. He argues with her about the justice that makes her queen of heaven when she died so young. Convinced by her, he plunges into the river in an attempt to join her, and awakes, comforted and reassured of his faith in God. Discussion of the poem has centred on the extent to which it is to be interpreted literally, as elegy, or allegorically. The form and language of the poem are extremely brilliant, and its literary relations apparently not confined to England: *Boccaccio’s Olympia and the earthly paradise sections of *Dante’s Purgatorio (from Canto xxviii to the end) seem to be parallels to the poem. Ed. E. V. Gordon (1953); P. M. Keen, The Pearl: An Interpretation (1967).

PEARS, Tim (1956– ), novelist, born in Tunbridge Wells, Kent. His first novel, In the Place of Fallen Leaves (1993), was set in an English village during the long drought of 1984, and provided a gentle counterblast to the prevailingly urban fiction of his contemporaries. A Land of Plenty (1997) was a family saga on the grand scale, an epic of English provincial life, peopled by warmly sympathetic characters. Pears has also written a screenplay, Loop, filmed in 1996.

PEARSON, Sir (Cyril) Arthur (1866–1921), newspaper magnate, educated at Winchester, who embarked on a career in journalism with *Tit-Bits, inspired by his own passion for quizzes and puzzles. He soon set up a successful rival to Tit-Bits in the form of Pearson’s Weekly, in 1890, and in 1900 founded the Daily Express. He went blind, and was more widely honoured for his work for the blind than for his journalistic talents.

PEARSON, (Edward) Hesketh (Gibbons) (1887–1964), actor and biographer, who joined the company of Beervanhm *Tree as a young man, and whose first book, Modern Men and Mummies (1921), contained portraits of many of the theatre personalities of the time. The Whispering Gallery (1926), an anonymous work purporting to be ‘leaves from the diary of an ex-diplomat’, occasioned a scandal, a court case, and an acquittal for Pearson, who went on to write many lively and widely read biographies, of (for example) *Hazlitt (1934), Sydney *Smith (The Smith of Smiths, 1934), G. B. Shaw (1942), *Wilde (1946), Beervanhm Tree (1956), and several others. He also wrote literary travel books in collaboration with *Kingsmill, and his autobiography, Hesketh Pearson by Himself, appeared posthumously in 1965.

PEARSON, John (1613–86), educated at Eton and Cambridge, a Royalist chaplain during the Civil War, and after the Restoration master of Jesus College, then of Trinity, Cambridge. He became bishop of Chester in 1673. From 1654 he preached at St Clement’s, Eastcheap, the series of lectures which he published in 1659 as his classic Exposition of the Creed, the notes of which are a rich mine of patristic learning. He was one of the most erudite theologians of his age.
Peasants' Revolt, the popular insurrection of the labourers of Essex and Kent which began in May 1381, provoked in part by the tyrannies of John of Gaunt. While the Kentish leader Wat Tyler was treating with the king, the 14-year-old Richard II, he was pulled from his horse and killed by Walworth, the mayor of London. The rebels dispersed and by the end of June the revolt had been repressed with ferocity everywhere. Its principal motivation—the wish of tenants to end repressive feudal rights—is reflected in literature, most famously in the couplet of the preacher John Ball (who was condemned after the revolt):

When Adam delved and Eve span
Who was then a gentleman?

The introduction of the fable of Belling the Cat into the later B and C texts of *Piers Plowman is thought to be a response to the revolt and accordingly to date those later texts after 1381. See R. B. Dobson, The Peasants' Revolt of 1381 (1970).

PECOCK, Reginald (1395–c.1460), a Welshman who became bishop successively of St Asaph and Chichester. Most of his writings employ the syllogistic logic of the Scholastics (in a somewhat debased form), and many were directed against the Lollards, notably his Repressor of Over Much Blaming of the Clergy (1455), a monument of 15th-century English prose of considerable eloquence and lexical variety. His Book of Faith, also in English, was issued in 1456, and in his Donet and the Fol ewer to the Donet he sought to define a body of faith acceptable to all. He alienated by his writings all sections of theological opinion in England, was arraigned before the archbishop of Canterbury, and obliged to resign his bishopric and recant his opinions (1458), whereupon he was sent to Thornie Abbey where he probably lived in seclusion. His work has considerable importance from a literary viewpoint for its development of the English vocabulary, which he added to, both by loan-translations such as ‘unto-thoughtupon’ (imponderabile) and by borrowings such as ‘anagogy’ and ‘tropology’.

Pecunia, Lady, the rich heiress in Jonson’s *The Staple of News.

Pedro, Don, the prince of Aragon who has defeated his illegitimate brother Don John and who woos *Hero on Claudio’s behalf in Shakespeare’s *Much Ado about Nothing.

PEELE, George (1556–96), the son of James Peele, clerk of Christ’s Hospital and author of city pageants and books on accountancy. He was educated at Christ’s Hospital, Broadgates Hall (Pembroke College), and Christ Church, Oxford. From about 1581 he was mainly resident in London, and pursuing an active and varied literary career. He was an associate of many other writers of the period, such as T. *Watson and R. *Greene. His works fall into three main categories: plays, pageants, and ‘gratulatory’ and miscellaneous verse. His surviving plays are The Araygment of Paris (1584); Edward I (1593); The Battle of Alcazar (1594); The Old Wives Tale (1595); and David and Fair B ethsabe (1599). His miscellaneous verse includes Polyhymnia (1590) and The Honour of the Garter (1593), a gratulatory poem to the Earl of Northumberland. Pele’s work is dominated by courtly and patriotic themes, and his technical achievements include extending the range of non-dramatic blank verse. The jest book The Merrie Conceited Jests of George Peele (1607) seems to bear little relation to Peele’s actual personality. His Life and Works were edited by C. T. Prouty (3 vols, 1952–70).

Peggotty, Daniel, Clara, and Ham, characters in Dickens’s *David Copperfield.

PEGUY, Charles (1875–1914), French poet and essayist. Profoundly responsive to traditional French forms of life, he expressed his nonconformist Catholic faith in such poems as the biblical Le Porche du mystère de la deuxième vertu (1911) and the fresco-like stanzas of Sainte Geneviève (1912) and Ève (1913). His death at Villeroy, the first battle on the Marne, only served to deepen the effect of his almost mystical vision of France on his contemporaries. He is the subject of a long poem by G. *Hill, published 1983, *The Mystery of the Charity of Charles Péguy.

Peg Woffington, a novel by C. *Reade, based on an episode in the life of Peg Woffington, and adapted from his play Masks and Faces.

Pelagian, derived from Pelagius, the Latinized form of the name of a British monk, Morgan, of the 4th and 5th centuries whose doctrines were fiercely combated by Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, and by St Augustine, and condemned by Pope Zosimus in 418. The Pelagians denied the doctrine of original sin, asserting that Adam’s fall did not involve his posterity, and maintained that the human will is itself capable of good without the assistance of divine grace. In spite of their condemnation, their beliefs died slowly and were only finally defeated by the Augustinian view at the Council of Orange (529) that grace is God-given. Even so, the voluntarist tendency of Pelagianism revived in the Middle Ages; many of the thinkers opposed by Bradwardine (d. 1349) he called ‘modern Pelagians’ in their attempts to qualify the immanence of God’s grace by their views of free will. See R. E. Evans, Pelagius, Inquiries and Appraisals (1968).

Pelham: or The Adventures of a Gentleman, a novel by Bulwer-Lytton, published 1828. This was his second novel, and is generally considered his best.

It recounts the adventures of Henry Pelham, a young dandy, wit, and aspiring politician, who falls in love with Ellen, sister of his old friend from Eton days, Reginald Glanville. The latter is falsely suspected of a murder, and tells his story to Pelham, who unearths the real murderer, Thornton, a character drawn from the well-known murderer Thurtell. But the interest of the novel lies in its lively portrayal of fashionable society, in English country houses, in Paris, in Cheltenham, in London, etc., and in such minor characters as Lady Frances, Pelham's worldly mother, and Lord Vincent, whose conversation is laced with puns, largely in Latin. Bulwer-Lytton mocks the genre of the fashionable novel even while employing it, which adds to the tone of sparkling cynicism which captivated contemporary readers and made his hero's name a catchphrase.

Pell, Solomon, in Dickens's Pickwick Papers, an attorney in the Insolvent Court.

Pellam, King, 'the Maimed King', in Arthurian legend, father of the Grail King, Pelles. Wounded by Balfyn's 'Dolorous Stroke', he is healed by his great-grandson Galahad in the Grail quest.

Pelleas, Sir, 'the Noble Knight', in Arthurian legend the lover of Ettarde. After her death he marries Nimue, the Lady of the Lake.

Peléas et Mélisande, see MAETERLINCK.

Pelles, King, 'the Grail King', in Malory, one of the Fisher Kings and said to be 'cousin nigh unto Joseph of Arimathe'. He is maimed for drawing the sword of David on the mysterious ship. Founded perhaps on Pwyll of Welsh mythology, he was the father of Elaine who was the mother of Galahad by Launcelot.

Pellinore, King, 'the King of the Waste Lands', in Malory the father of Sir Lamorak, Sir Perceval, and Sir Torre, and the brother of King Pelles. He follows the Questing Beast and kills King Lot of Orkney, because of which ten years later he is killed by Lot's son Gawain. Charles Moorman (in The Book of King Arthur, 1965) believes that the rivalry between the houses of King Lot and King Pellinore is one of the three principal running themes in Malory.

Pembroke, Mary Herbert, countess of (1561–1621), the younger sister of P. Sidney, whose first version of the Arcadia was written for her at Wilton early in her married life. After her brother's death in 1586 she became in effect his literary executrix, overseeing the publication of the Arcadia and the rest of his works for the editions of 1593 and 1598 and undertaking literary projects of which he would have approved. She completed the Psalms, of which Sidney had translated only the first 42, rendering them in a very wide variety of English verse forms; they were not published as a whole until the edition of J. C. A. Rathmell (1963), but Ruskin, who much admired them, made a selection from them under the title of Rock Honeycomb (1877). She translated Du Plessis Mornay's Discourse of Life and Death and R. Garnier's Senecan tragedy Antonius (both published in 1592; the latter also published as Antonie, 1595), and at an unknown date she translated Petrarch's Triomfo della morte. Her reputation as a patroness perhaps outstripped her specific achievements (T. S. Eliot's essay 'Apology for the Countess of Pembroke', 1932, implies a deliberate control of a literary clique which she probably never had); but she certainly had links with such writers as S. Daniel, N. Breton, and Sir J. Harington. A letter from her once seen at Wilton by Cory said 'we have the man Shakespeare with us'; it has since disappeared, and her connection with Shakespeare, if any, cannot be proved. The epitaph on her by W. Browne was popular throughout the 17th cent.:

Underneath this sable herse
Lies the subject of all verse:
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother:
Death, ere thou hast slain another,
Fair, and learn'd, and good as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.

There is an edition of her works by Margaret P. Hannay, Noel J. Kinnamon, and Michael G. Brennan (2 vols, 1998).

PEN, an international association of Poets, Playwrights, Editors, Essayists, and Novelists founded in 1921 by Mrs Dawson-Scott, under the presidency of J. Galsworthy, to promote co-operation between writers all over the world in the interests of literature, freedom of expression, and international goodwill.

Pendennis, The History of, a novel by Thackeray, serialized in numbers Nov. 1848–Dec. 1850, and illustrated by himself. Its publication was interrupted by the serious illness of its author, who fell ill with cholera in 1849, and the second half of the novel, after its hero's own illness, is correspondingly more sombre in tone. It is a Bildungsroman in which the main character, Arthur Pendennis, who has many of Thackeray's own traits, is the only son of a devoted and unworldly widow, Helen. As a very young man he falls in love with an actress, Emily Costigan ('Miss Mothering'), and is only rescued from an unsuitable marriage by the tactful intervention of his uncle, Major Pendennis, who persuades her disreputable old father, Captain Costigan, that Arthur has no money of his own.
Pendennis then goes to the university of Oxbridge, where he runs up bills and has to be rescued by a loan from Helen's adopted daughter Laura Bell. Helen hopes that Laura and her son will marry, but Pendennis's next entanglement is with Blanche Amory, an affected and hard-hearted girl, the daughter of the rich, vulgar Lady Clavering by her first husband. Major Pendennis encourages a match between his nephew and Blanche, although he is secretly aware that Blanche's father is an escaped convict who is still alive and is blackmailing Sir Francis Clavering.

Pendennis goes to London and is supposed to be reading for the bar. He shares chambers with George Warrington (descended from the Warringtons in *The Virginians), who starts him on a literary career by introducing him to Captain Shandon, a debt-ridden Irish journalist (based on *Maginn) who is editing a new magazine, the 'Pall Mall Gazette', from prison. Pendennis has a mild flirtation with a working-class girl, Fanny Bolton, and, when he falls ill, Fanny nurses him devotedly. Helen Pendennis jumps to the false conclusion that Fanny is Pendennis's mistress, and treats the girl very unkindly. Pendennis is so indignant when he discovers this, that he threatens to marry Fanny, but is dissuaded by Warrington, who tells the story of his own unfortunate early marriage. Fanny soon finds consolation with Sam Huxter, a medical student, but Blanche is harder to shake off. After the exposure of the existence of her villainous father, Pendennis feels obliged to go through with an engagement to her, although he does not really care for her. Fortunately Blanche decides in favour of Harry Foker, heir to a brewing fortune, and Pendennis and Laura finally marry, after Helen's death.

Pendragon

A title given to an ancient British or Welsh chief holding or claiming supreme power. In English chiefly known as the title of Uther Pendragon, father of *Arthur. The word means 'chief dragon', the dragon being the war standard.

Penguin Books

The name first given to a series of paperback books published in 1935 by A. *Lane, and established in its own right as a publishing company in 1936. The first ten titles, which sold for sixpence each, included Ariel by Maurois (No. 1), and *fiction by A. *Christie, *Hemingway, D. L. *Sayers and M. *Webb. In 1937 the non-fiction Pelican series was launched with the publication, in two parts, of Shaw's Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism, and Puffin Picture Books for children followed in 1940. Other notable ventures include the Penguin Classics, edited for many years by E. V. Rieu (1887–1972), whose own translation of the Odyssey (1946) was its first and best-selling volume; *Pevsner's series The Buildings of England (1951–74); and the first unexpurgated edition of Lady Chatterley's Lover (1960), which led to a celebrated trial and acquittal at the Old Bailey.

PENN

William (1644–1718), a Quaker and founder of Pennsylvania, son of the admiral Sir William Penn. He was committed to the Tower in 1668 for publishing The Sandy Foundation Shaken (an attack on orthodox doctrines of the Trinity and the Atonement, and on the Calvinist theory of justification) and there wrote No Cross, No Crown (1669), an eloquent and learned dissertation on Christian duty and a Quaker classic. He suffered frequent persecutions, turned his thoughts to America as a refuge for his faith, and in 1682 obtained grants of East New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and framed, possibly in concert with A. *Sidney, a new constitution for the colony by which religious toleration would be secured. He travelled twice to America, returning in 1701 to spend the rest of his life in England. Some Fruits of Solitude, a collection of aphorisms praised by R. L. *Stevenson, was published anonymously in 1693.

PENNANT

Thomas (1726–98), naturalist, antiquary, and traveller. He published A Tour in Scotland in 1771, A Tour in Wales in 1778–81, A Tour in Scotland and Voyage to the Hebrides in 1774–6, and The Journey from Chester to London in 1782. His travel writings were admired by Dr *Johnson, though *Boswell disapproved of his portrait of Scotland. He was also a distinguished zoologist, and figures in G. *White's *Selborne as one of the author's correspondents. Literary Life of the Late Thomas Pennant, Esq., by Himself appeared in 1793.

Penshurst Place, in Kent, has been in the possession of the Sidney family since 1552, and was the birthplace of Sir P. *Sidney. Many writers enjoyed its hospitality, including *Jonson, who paid a graceful tribute in 'To Penshurst' (The Forest, 1616), praising the fruitfulness of the landscape and the gardens, the 'high huswifery' of its lady, the generosity of its lord, and the virtues of the whole household, who learned there 'the mysteries of manners, armes and arts'. Pentameron, The, a prose work by W. S. *Landor, published 1837, an expression of Landor's admiration of *Boccaccio. The book consists of imaginary conversations between *Petrarch and Boccaccio, while the latter lies ill at his village near Certaldo, and Petrarch visits him on five successive days. They speak mainly of Dante's *Divina commedia; but Petrarch also reproves Boccaccio for the licentious character of some of his tales.

Penthea, a character in Ford's The Broken Heart.

PEPSY (pron. Peeps or Peppis), Samuel (1633–1703), son of John Pepys, a London tailor, educated at St *Paul's School, London, and at Magdalene College, Cambridge. In 1655, when 22, he married Elizabeth St Michel, a girl of 15, the daughter of a French father and English mother. He entered the household of Sir Edward Montagu (afterwards first earl of Sandwich), his father's first cousin, in 1656; and his subsequent successful career was largely due to Montagu's patronage. His famous Diary opens on 1 Jan. 1660, when Pepys was living in Axet Yard, Westminster, and was very poor. Soon after this he was appointed 'clerk of the King's ships' and clerk of the privy seal, with a salary of £350 (supplemented by fees). In 1665 he became surveyor-general of the victualling office, in which capacity he showed himself an energetic official and a zealous reformer of abuses. Owing to an unfounded fear of failing eyesight he closed his diary on 31 May 1669, and in the same year his wife died. In 1672 he was appointed secretary to the admiralty. He was committed to the Tower on a charge of complicity in the 'Popish Plot' in 1679 and deprived of his office, but was soon set free. In 1683 he was sent to Tangier with very poor. Soon after this he was appointed 'clerk of the admiralty, a post which he held until the revolution, labouiring hard to provide the country with an efficient fleet. At the revolution he was deprived of his appointment and afterwards lived in retirement, principally at Clapham. His Diary remained in cipher (a system of shorthand) at Magdalen College, Cambridge, until 1825, when it was deciphered by John Smith and edited by Lord Braybrooke. An enlarged edition by Mynors Bright appeared in 1875–9, and an edition in ten volumes (1893–9) by Henry B. Wheatley remained the standard text until the appearance of a new and unbowdlerized transcription by R. Latham and W. Matthews (11 vols, 1970–83). On his death his handwriting, which belonged to Humphrey Pitt of Axet, was found and buried in the Grail land of Sarras where the three are borne in Solomon's boat.

Percy, a tragedy by Hannah *More.

 Percy, Thomas, born Piercy (1729–1811), son of a Bridgnorth grocer. He was educated at Oxford and became bishop of Dromore in 1782. He was a man of varied intellectual and antiquarian interests; in 1761 he published a translation (from the Portuguese) of the first Chinese novel to appear in English, Hau Kiou Chooaan, and in 1763 his Five Pieces of Runic Poetry Translated from the Icelandic Language, including the 'Incantation of Hervor' and the 'Death-Song of Ragnar Lodbrog'. The latter had a considerable influence on the study of ancient Norse in England. Percy also published poetry (including his ballad The Hermit of Warkworth, 1771), translated from the Hebrew and Spanish, and wrote a Memoir of Goldsmith (1801). He is best known for his celebrated collection Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (3 vols, 1765), which was attacked by later writers (see Ritson) as unscholarly, but which nevertheless contributed greatly to the understanding of and enthusiasm for the older English poetry, reached a fourth edition by 1794, and has since been several times re-edited. (See also Percy Folio and Ballad.)

Percy Folio, the, a manuscript in mid-17th-cent. handwriting, which belonged to Humphrey Pitt of Shifnal, the most important source of our ballad literature and the basis of *Child's collection. From it T. *Percy drew the ballads included in his *Reliques. It also contains the 14th-cent. alliterative allegorical poem 'Death and Life' (modelled on *Piers Plowman) and 'Scottish Feilde' (mainly on the battle of *Flodden). The Percy Folio was printed in its entirety by Hales and *Furnivall in 1867–8. It is now in the British Library.

Percy Society, the, founded in 1840 by T. C. *Croker, *Dyce, *Halliwell-Phillipps, and J. P. *Collier, for the purpose of publishing old English lyrics and ballads. It was named in honour of T. *Percy.

Perdita, the daughter of *Hermione and *Leontes, brought up in Bohemia, in *Shakespeare's *The Winter's Tale; her name means 'the lost one'.

Perceforest, a vast French prose romance of the 14th cent., in which the author seeks to link the legends of *Alexander and *Arthur. Alexander, after the conquest of India, is driven by a storm on the coast of England, and makes one of his followers (called Perceforest because he has killed a magician in an impenetrable forest) king of the land. Under the latter's grandson the *Grail is brought to England.

Perceval, Sir, probably to be identified with Peredur of the *Mabinogion. He is a legendary figure of great antiquity, first found in European poetry in the 9.000-line, incomplete Perceval, ou le conte del Graal of *Chrétien de Troyes (c.1182) and the German Parzival (c.1205) of *Wolfram von Eschenbach (which was the inspiration for *Wagner's opera). In English he appears in Sir Perceval of Galles, a 2,288-line romance, in 16-line stanzas in tail-rhyme from the 15th cent. (ed. W. H. French and C. B. Hale, Middle English Metrical Romances, 1930) and in *Malory. The former tells of the childhood of Perceval and his being knighted by Arthur, without any allusion to the *Grail. Malory makes him a son of King *Pellinore, describing his success in the quest for the Grail with Galahad and Bors. In the French prose Vulgate La Queste del Saint Graal, the three successful questers are joined on Solomon's ship by Perceval's sister who dies by giving her blood to heal a lady suffering from a great illness, and is committed to the waves in a boat; her body is found and buried in the Grail land of Sarras where the three are borne in Solomon's boat.

At this point, the lengthy, scandalous, and erotic memoirs of Lady *Vane are inserted into the narrative. The story is broken, but the tale of a life of pleasure is not irrelevant to Peregrine's own. Debauchery now takes almost complete hold on Peregrine. Emilia again rejects him, he loses a vast sum in an attempt to enter politics, and is eventually sent to prison for a gross libel. Another long story, of the unfortunate poet Mack- ercher, whose generous character contrasts strongly with those of both Peregrine and Lady Vane, is interpolated at this point. In prison Peregrine becomes morose and withdrawn, quarrels with the faithful Pipes and Hatchway, and begins to long for death. But this is the beginning of repentance. He is rescued by Godfrey, Emilia returns to him, and he inherits his father's fortune. When he and Emilia marry he rejects the fashionable urban world, pays his debts, and retires with her to the country.

The novel, which contained many savage caricatures of, for instance, *Fielding as Mr Spondy, *Garrick as Marmozet, and *Akenside as the Doctor, was only moderately successful, and was modified both in form and tone for the second edition of 1758.

perfectibilism, the doctrine that man, individual and social, is capable of progressing indefinitely towards physical, mental, and moral perfection. Mr Foster, in Peacock's *Headlong Hall, was a 'perfectibilian'.

performance poetry, a term applied to poetry specifically written to be performed out loud. The work may sometimes transfer successfully to the printed page, but its true power usually lies in the moment of public performance.

Often with an anti-establishment edge, performance poetry covers a wide range of poetic activity, from topical satire and burlesque to ranting and agitprop, including avant-garde sound poetry and mixings of word and music. Usually performed from memory, rather than read, it can be accompanied by highly choreographed gestures and subtle voice techniques, leading to accusations (not always unjust) of style over substance. A term also in vogue is 'Spoken Word'.

'It is very important to get poetry out of the hands of the professors and out of the hands of the squares,' declared American jazz poet Kenneth Rexroth (1905–82) in 1958. 'We simply want to make poetry a part of show business.' Rexroth's motivation to broaden the audience remains at the heart of performance poetry today. Performing poets are less likely to appear at literary clubs than in music venues, bars, comedy festivals, and on radio; they may issue a *CD before a book.

Jazz (see Jazz Poetry) has been a consistently dominant influence, starting with Langston Hughes (1902–67) and Vachel Lindsay (1879–1931); to Rexroth's 1950s jazz-poetry collaborations with *Ferlinglehetti; and continuing since the 1970s, with Amiri Baraka (b. Everett LeRoi Jones, 1934– ), Jayne Cortez...
(1936– ), Gil Scott Heron (1949– ), and the Last Poets, through to contemporary hip-hop poetry.

In the 1960s, Allen Ginsberg took oral poetry into coffee houses, pop festivals, and art happenings. In Britain, the spirit was spread by Michael Horovitz, Adrian Mitchell, and the Liverpool poets. Off the coast of Pentapolis Pericles alone survives the wreck of his ship, and in a tournament defeats the suitors for the hand of Thaisa, daughter of King Simonides, whom he marries.

Hearing that Antiochus has died, Pericles sets sail for Tyre, and during a storm on the voyage Thaisa gives birth to a daughter, Marina, and faints. Apparently dead, Thaisa is buried at sea in a chest, which is cast ashore at Ephesus, where Cerimon, a physician, opens it and restores Thaisa to life. She, thinking her husband drowned, becomes a priestess in the temple of Diana. Pericles takes Marina to Tarsus, where he leaves her with its governor Cleon and his wife Dionyza.

When the child grows up Dionyza, jealous of her being more favoured than her own daughter, seeks to kill her; but Marina is carried off by pirates and sold in Mytilene to a brothel, where her purity and piety win the admiration of Lysimachus, the governor of the city, and the respect of the brothel-keeper’s servant, Boult, and secure her release. In a vision Pericles is shown Marina’s tomb, deceivingly erected by Cleon and Dionyza. He puts to sea again and lands at Mytilene, where through Lysimachus and to his intense joy Pericles discovers his daughter. In a second vision, Diana directs him to go to her temple at Ephesus and there recount the story of his life. In doing this, the priestess Thaisa, his lost wife, recognizes him, and is reunited with her husband and daughter. At the end of the play the chorus tells how Cleon and Dionyza are burnt by the citizens of Tarsus as a penalty for their wickedness.

Performance poetry has become most closely identiﬁed with black writers such as Benjamin Zephaniah, Linton Kwesi Johnson, and the more playful Guyan­ese-born poet John Agard (1949– ).

Most recently, performance activity has been sparked by New York’s Nuyorican Poets Café, home of the Poetry Slam, a raucous stand-up poetry talent contest.

Peri Bathous, or The Art of Sinking in Poetry (1727), a treatise by *Pope, in which he examines bathsos, or the insipid, in poetry, illustrating his work with examples from his contemporaries, including R. Blackmore, John Dennis, A. Phillips, and Lewis Theobald. Pope’s satirical treatise and the outraged replies it engendered led to the publication of the *Dunciad.

Pericles and Aspasia, a prose work by W. S. Landor, published 1836. The book consists of imaginary letters, the bulk of them from Aspasia to her friend Cleone, together with Cleone’s replies. Others are addressed by Pericles to Aspasia, or by her to him; while others again are from or to prominent figures of the time, such as Anaxagoras and Alcibiades. The letters, which end with the death of Pericles, include discussions of artistic, literary, religious, philosophical, and political subjects.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre, a romantic drama by Shakespeare, the ﬁrst two acts probably written by George Wilkins: there may have been an element of collaboration between the two men. It was composed between 1606 and 1608, when it was registered and when Wilkins’s prose narrative The Painful Adven­tures of Pericles Prince of Tyre, which was based on a performance of the play, was published. A textually corrupt quarto of Pericles appeared in 1609 and was reprinted ﬁve times; the play was omitted from the First Folio of 1623, but was included in the second issue of the third Folio of 1664. The play is based on the story of Apollonius of Tyre in *Gower’s Confessio Amantis and a prose version (itself derived from the *Gesta Romanorum), The Patterne of Painefull Adven­tures, registered 1576 and reprinted 1657, by Laurence Twyne.

The play is presented by Gower, who acts as chorus throughout, and tells how, having solved the riddle set by King Antiochus and discovered his incestuous relationship with his daughter, Pericles, prince of Tyre, finds his life in danger. He leaves his government in the hands of his honest minister, Helicanus, and sails from Tyre to Tarsus where he relieves a famine. Sir Walter Elliot, a spendthrift baronet and widower, with a swollen sense of his social importance and personal elegance, is obliged to retrench and let his seat, Kellynch Hall. His eldest daughter Elizabeth, haughty and unmarried, is now 29; the second, Anne, who is pretty, intelligent, and amiable, had some years before been engaged to a young naval officer, Frederick Wentworth, but had been persuaded by her trusted friend Lady Russell to break off the engagement, because of his lack of fortune and a misunderstanding of his easy nature. The breach had brought great unhappiness to Anne, and caused angry indignation in Wentworth. When the story opens Anne is 27, and the bloom of her youth is gone. Captain Wentworth, who has had a successful career and is now prosperous, is thrown again into Anne's society by the letting of the Kellynch estate, who is also indulging in an intrigue with Mrs Clay, an artful woman with matrimonial designs on Sir Walter. There Wentworth finds another suitor involved with Louisa. During a visit of the party to Lyme Regis, Louisa, being 'jumped down' from the Cobb by Wentworth, falls and is badly injured. Wentworth's partial responsibility for the accident makes him feel an increased obligation to Louisa at the very time that his feelings are being drawn back to Anne. However, during her convalescence Louisa becomes engaged to Captain Benwick, another naval officer, and Wentworth is free to proceed with his courtship. He goes to Bath, where Sir Walter is now established with his two elder daughters and Elizabeth's companion Mrs Clay, an artful woman with matrimonial designs on Sir Walter. There Wentworth finds another suitor for Anne's hand, her cousin William Elliot, the heir to Kellynch to Admiral and Mrs Croft, his sister and brother-in-law. Sir Walter's youngest daughter Mary is married to Charles Musgrove, the heir of a neighbouring landowner. Wentworth is attracted by Charles's sisters Louisa and Henrietta, and in time becomes involved with Louisa. Wentworth renews his offer of marriage to Anne, and is accepted. In this, Jane Austen's last completed work, satire and ridicule take a milder form, and the tone is more grave and tender. Peterborough Chronicle, The, the last part of the Laud manuscript of the *Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, written in Peterborough at various times between 1121 and 1154, the date of its last annual. It is the only part of the chronicle to extend beyond 1080, and is of great linguistic interest in exemplifying the developments between Old and Middle English. The 12th-cent. entries, in particular, as they describe the disasters and hardships of Stephen’s reign, have a vigour and circumstantiality far beyond the earlier parts of the chronicle. See C. Clark, The Peterborough Chronicle 1070–1154 (1958); facsimile edn D. Whitelock (1954); trans. G. N. Garmonsway (1953).

‘Peter Grimes’, one of the tales in Crabbe’s *The Borough. Grimes is a fisherman who ‘fish’d by water and who filch’d by land’ and killed his apprentices by ill-treatment, until, becoming suspect and forbidden to keep apprentices, he lived and worked in solitude. Under the pressure of guilt and remorse he became insane, and died after enduring terrible imagined terrors. He is the principal figure in *Britten’s opera Peter Grimes.

Peter Pan, or, The Boy Who Would Not Grow up, a play by J. M. *Barrie, written for the sons of Arthur and Sylvia Llewlyn Davies, and first performed on 27 Dec. 1904 with Gerald du Maurier playing both Mr Darling and Captain Hook. Peter Pan, the eternal boy, flies off from a London nursery to the Never Never Land with Wendy, John, and Michael Darling, where Wendy becomes a mother to Peter’s tribe of Lost Boys. Barrie’s original subtitle was The Boy Who Hated Mothers’ and there is an interesting subtext of jealousy, possessiveness, and family conflict which explains some of the work’s enduring appeal, although it also has the more evident attractions of the dog-nurse Nana, exotic scenery, flying ballet, a crocodile which devours Captain Hook, and a disembodied fairy, Tinkerbell. The name ‘Wendy’ was coined by Barrie from the childish mispronunciation of ‘Fwend’ or ‘Fwendy’ (for ‘friend’) of W. E. *Henley’s daughter Margaret, who died when she was 6. Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens (1906, with illustrations by A. *Rackham), took stories from an earlier novel, The Little White Bird (1902), about a lonely bachelor who meets a boy in Kensington Gardens. The play itself has been through many versions and adaptations, and was first published in book form in 1911.

PETRARCH (Francesco Petrarca) (1304–74), Italian poet and humanist, and the most popular Italian poet of the English Renaissance. He was born at Arezzo, the son of a notary who was expelled from Florence (in the same year as *Dante) by the Black Guelfs and migrated to Avignon in 1312. Here in 1327 Petrarch first saw the woman who inspired his love poetry. He calls her Laura; her true identity is unknown. Until 1353 Petrarch’s life was centred in Provence (Avignon and his beloved retreat at Vauclose), but he made extended visits to Italy, on the first of which, in 1341, he was crowned poet laureate in Rome, for him the most memorable episode of his life. From 1353 onwards he resided in Italy, though he travelled widely, both on his own account and at the instance of his patrons. He died in Arquà in the Euganean Hills near Padua.

Today Petrarch is best known for the collection of Italian lyrics variously known as the Canzoniere or the ‘Rime sparse’, which includes the long series of poems in praise of Laura, now regarded as the fountainhead of the European lyric; but to his contemporaries and the generations that immediately succeeded him he was best known as a devoted student of classical antiquity. This enthusiasm he shared with his friend *Boccaccio. The encouragement which Petrarch gave to Cola di Rienzo in 1347, at the time of the restoration of the Roman republic, may be seen as an expression of the humanist spirit with which he was imbued, and in accordance with which he wrote the majority of his works in Latin. These include: a large number of letters and treatises (De Vita Solitaria, De Remediis Utriusque Fortunae, etc.); a Latin epic, Africa, on the struggle between Rome and Carthage; and the Secretum, a self-analysis in the form of a dialogue between himself and St *Augustine.

Petrarch is justly regarded as the father of Italian humanism and the initiator of the revived study of Greek and Latin literature, but for English writers his chief inspiration was to the early sonneteers (see under SONNET); he was imitated and translated by *Surrey, *Wyatt, T. *Watson, and, later, by *Drummond of Hawthornden. *Sidney, while mocking the poets who slavishly echoed ‘poor Petrarch’s long deceased woes’, yet bears witness to his powerful and pervasive influence. (See George Watson, The English Petrarchans, 1967.) Henry Parker, Lord Morley (1476–1556), translated at some point before 1546 his Trionfi as The Triumphes of Fraunces Petrarcke (?1555; ed. D. D. Carnicelli, 1971), and the countess of Pembroke translated the Trionfo della morte into terza rima. The Petrarchan vogue declined in the 17th cent. with the waning popularity of the sonnet sequence, and in 1756 J. Warton in his essay on Pope dismissed Petrarch as 'metaphysical and far fetched'. Gray, in a note on the last stanza of his Elegy, credits Petrarch with his phrase 'trembling hope' (paventosa speme), which indicates a renewal of interest in the later 18th cent.

PETRONIUS, the author of the Satyricon, a realistic novel of low life, sexually explicit, but written in a purely elegant Latin, interspersed with verses and containing a great deal of parody. He is traditionally identified with the Gaius Petronius Arbiter who having been one of Nero's favourites was forced to commit suicide AD 65. Internal evidence certainly suggests that the novel was written in Nero's reign. Only excerpts have survived, the most striking of which are Cena Trimalchionis (Trimalchio's Banquet), the description of a dinner given by a rich freedman, a poem on the Civil War covering the same ground as Lucan, and a story, The Matron of Ephesus. After a long period of obscurity during the Middle Ages, the Cena was discovered by the Florentine collector Poggio, copied in 1423, and promptly lost again, and until its rediscovery and its publication in 1650 only the smaller excerpts were known. Petronius is mentioned by religious writers like John Hales and Jeremy Taylor in the first half of the 17th cent. and by Dryden in his critical works. The first English translation was Lavengro and The Romany Rye, founded upon the Norfolk gypsy Ambrose Smith, with whom Borrow was acquainted in his youth. Petulengro means 'shoeing smith'.

Petruchio, a gentleman of Verona and suitor to Katharina in Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew.

PETTY, Sir William (1623–76), a political economist who studied on the Continent and became the friend of Hobbes. He executed for the Commonwealth the 'Down Survey' of forfeited lands in Ireland, the first attempt on a large scale at carrying out a survey scientifically. Petty acquiesced in the Restoration, and was knighted and made an original member of the Royal Society in 1662. He published economic treatises, the principal of which was entitled Political Arithmetic (1690), a term signifying that which we now call statistics. Swift parodied this work in A Modest Proposal. Petty examined, by the quantitative method, the current allegations of national decay. He rejected the old 'prohibitory' system, and showed the error of the supporters of the 'mercantile' system in regarding the abundance of precious metals as the standard of prosperity. He traced the sources of wealth to labour and land.

Petulengro, Jasper, the principal gypsy character in Borrow's Lavengro and The Romany Rye, founded upon the Norfolk gypsy Ambrose Smith, with whom Borrow was acquainted in his youth. 'Petulengro' means 'shoeing smith'.

Peveril of the Peak, a novel by Sir W. Scott, published 1823.

The novel is set in the Restoration England of Titus Oates's Popish Plot, and its plotting was described by Lockhart as 'clumsy and perplexed'. The action is chiefly concerned with corruption at the court of Charles II, with fanaticism turned sour, and with conflicting loyalties. These are worked out most effectively in the characters of Major Bridgenorth and young Julian Peveril, in both of whom there is profound psychological development. The part played by the apparent deaf-mute, Fenella, is less convincing.

PEVSNER, Sir Nikolaus Bernhard Leon (1902–83), architectural historian, born in Germany and educated at the universities of Leipzig, Munich, Berlin, and Frankfurt. He lectured for four years at Göttingen before the rise of Hitler brought him to England, where he became in 1941 associated with Penguin Books, as editor of King Penguins and of his celebrated county-by-county series The Buildings of England (1951–74). His association with Birkbeck College began formally in 1942, where he continued to teach until 1967, and he was professor of fine art at Cambridge (1949–55) and at Oxford (1968–9). His many works on art, design, and architecture include Pioneers of the Modern Movement, from William Morris to Walter Gropius (1936), High Victorian Design (1951), and The Englishness of English Art (1956).

Pew, the blind buccaneer in Stevenson's Treasure Island.
The rightful heir, Philaster, loves and is loved by Arethusa, daughter of a Sicilian lord, in love with Philaster. Reassured thus of Arethusa's virtue, Philaster regains both his loved one and his kingdom, whereas Bellario is left with their gratitude, to devote herself to a life of chastity.

An edition in the Revels series by Andrew Gurr was published in 1969.

Philip Quarl, The Adventures of, an adventure story originally published as The Hermit (1727) by 'Edward Dorrington', but generally attributed to Peter Longueville, though some authorities ascribe it to Alexander Bicknell. A derivative of Robinson Crusoe, it describes Quarl's 50 years of solitude and suffering on a South Sea island. It went through many editions, and was much adapted for children.

Philips, see Adventures of Philip, The.

philippics, see Cicero and Demosthenes.

Philip Quarl, The Adventures of, an adventure story originally published as The Hermit (1727) by 'Edward Dorrington', but generally attributed to Peter Longueville, though some authorities ascribe it to Alexander Bicknell. A derivative of Robinson Crusoe, it describes Quarl's 50 years of solitude and suffering on a South Sea island. It went through many editions, and was much adapted for children.

PHILIPS, Ambrose (1674–1749), poet, and fellow of St John's College, Cambridge, was a member of Addison's circle. He wrote The Distrest Mother (1712), a successful adaptation of Racine's Andromaque, but is remembered chiefly for his quarrel with Pope over the relative merits of their pastorals. Pope drew, in the Guardian (No. 40, 1713), 'a comparison of Philips's performance with his own, in which, with an unexampled and unequalled artifice of irony, though he has himself always the advantage, he gives the preference to Philips' (Johnson, Lives of the English Poets). Philips’s 'Epistle to the Earl of Dorset' (1709) memorably evokes the frozen landscape of Denmark. His infantile trochaics addressed to children ('Dimply damsels, sweetly smiling', etc.) earned him the nickname of 'Namby Pamby', though Johnson described them as his pleasantest pieces. For the 'pastoral war', see also Gay's The Shepherd's Week.

PHILIPS, John (1676–1709), educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He was the author of The Splendid Shilling (unauthorized 1701, authorized 1705), a burlesque in Miltonic blank verse, in which Philips contrasts the happy possessor of the splendid shilling, who 'norr hears with pain l New oysters cry'd, nor sighs for dearl ale', with the poor poet in his garret, hungry and thirsty, and beset by creditors. In 1705 he published Blenheim, written at the suggestion of Harley and Bolingbroke, as a Tory counterpart to The Campaign of Addison. Cyder (1708), a poem in blank verse written in imitation of Virgil's Georgics, celebrates the cultivation, manufacture, and virtues of cider; it provided a model for later blank verse georgics, such as *Smart's The Hop-Garden and parts of Thomson's *The Seasons. Thomson, in 'Autumn', salutes 'Philips, Pomona's bard' both for his 'native theme' and for his 'rhyme-unfetter'd verse' (ll. 640–50), and later critics have endorsed this view of his place in literary tradition. There is an edition by M. G. L. Thomas (1927).

PHILIPS, Katherine (1631–64), known as the 'Matchless Orinda', the daughter of Royalist John Fowler, a London merchant. She lived in London until the age of 15, attending Mrs Salmon's School, Hackney. Upon her father's death her mother married a Welsh baronet, whose castle in Pembrokeshire became Katherine's home. In 1648 she married Parliamentarian James Philips of Cardigan: he was 59, she 17. Her poems were widely circulated in manuscript, inspiring eulogies by H. *Vaughan ('It was thy light showed me the way' in Olor Iscanus and Thalia Redevida); a commemorative poem by 'Orinda' was prefixed to the latter volume. Her translation of *Corneille's Pompée was acted in Dublin with great success in 1663, and her version of Horace, completed by *Denham, in 1668. Her collected poems appeared unauthorized in 1664. She died of smallpox, and was mourned in elegies by *Cowley and Sir W. *Temple; her collected poems were published in 1667. They memorialize a coterie, a Platonic Society of Friendship, whose members were known by poetic sobriquets, including Anne Owen (Lucasia), Mary Aubrey (Rosania), John *Berkhead (Cratander), and Sir Charles Cotterell (Polliarchus), her correspondent with whom was published as Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus in 1705. These letters show Philips's careful construction of the persona of 'Orinda'. She was pre-eminently a poet of female friendship. Her lyrcs, marrying Cavalier and metaphysical influences, applied Petrachan love conventions to present women's friendship as an ideal. Friendship is 'our passion . . . the strongest thing I know'. See P. W. Souers, The Matchless Orinda (1931); E. Hobby, The Virtue of Necessity (1988); G. *Greer, Kissing the Rod (1988).

Philistine, the name of an alien warlike people who in early biblical times constantly harassed the Israelites. The name is applied, (1) humorously or otherwise to persons regarded as 'the enemy' into whose hands one may fall, bailiffs, literary critics, etc.; (2) to persons deficient in liberal culture and enlightenment, from philister, the term applied by German students to one who is not a student at the university, but a townsman. In sense (2) the word was introduced into English by M. *Arnold ('Heine, Essays in Criticism); he describes *Heine as a progressive, a lover of ideas and hater of philistinism, and the English as a nation dominated by 'inveterate inaccessibility to ideas'. In other works, notably *Culture and Anarchy, he develops the concept; the English middle classes are predominantly philistine, whereas the aristocracy, with its love of field sports, physical prowess, and external graces, is described as 'Barbarian'. The working classes are described as the 'Populace'.

PHILLIPS, Sir Thomas (1792–1872), educated at Rugby and University College, Oxford. He early developed a passion for collecting books and, more particularly, manuscripts (he described himself as 'a perfect vello-maniac'), and assembled an extremely valuable library at his home in Broadway, Worcestershire. He also established there a private printing press, the Middle Hill Press, where he printed visitations, extracts from registers, cartularies, etc. In 1863 he moved his library to Thirlestaine House, Cheltenham, and on his death left it to his youngest daughter Mrs Fenwick (his eldest, Henrietta, had married the Shakespearean scholar J. O. *Halliwell): it has been gradually dispersed in sales to public institutions at home and abroad and to private collectors. Some unique items (such as the manuscript of part of a translation of *Ovid's Metamorphoses associated with *Caxton) came to light as late as 1964: the Caxton manuscript is now reunited with its other half, which had been in the possession of *Pepys, in the Pepys Library at Magdalene College, Cambridge. See A. N. L. *Munby, Phillips Studies (1951–60); N. J. Barker, Portrait of an Obsession (1967).

PHILLIPS, Caryl (1958 – ), novelist and playwright, born in St Kitts, West Indies. He came to England with his family as a baby and was educated in Leeds, Birmingham, and at Oxford University. Early plays include Strange Fruit (1980) and The Shelter (1983). His first novel, The Final Passage (1985), described the experiences in Britain of the post-war immigrant generation: later works include A State of Independence (1986), in which the protagonist returns to his West Indian home, with a severe sense of dislocation, and Higher Ground (1989). Cambridge (1991) is a tour de force of *historical fiction set in the West Indies just after the abolition of the slave trade: much of the novel is narrated by English visitor Emily Cartwright, who is disturbed and shocked by the brutal world she enters, but we also hear other voices, including that of Cambridge himself, an educated plantation slave. Crossing the River (1994) is a many-layered polyphonic narration, linking past and present, Africa and England, which celebrates the difficulties and triumph of a mixed-race love affair during the Second World War; this was followed by The Nature of Blood (1997), a novel which deals with the consequences of the *Holocaust. Non-fiction works include The European Tribe (essays, 1987); he also edited Extravagant Strangers: A Literature of Belonging (1997), a survey and anthology of non-British-born writers and the invigorating effects of 'mongrelization' on the native tradition.

PHILLIPS, Edward (1630–96), brother of John Phillips (below) and nephew of *Milton, by whom he was educated. He was tutor to the son of *Evelyn, and then to Philip Herbert, afterwards seventh earl of Pembroke. His various literary works include an edition of the poems of *Drummond of Hawthornden (1656); a popular philological dictionary called *The New World of English Words (1658); and *Theatrum Poetarum (1675), a collection of literary biographies in the preface to which some have seen the hand of Milton. He also wrote a short life of his uncle, published 1694. *Lives of Edward and John Phillips by W. *Godwin was published in 1815.

PHILLIPS, John (1631–1706), younger brother of Edward Phillips (above) and nephew of *Milton, by whom he was educated. He wrote a scathing attack on Puritanism in his poem A Satyr against Hypocrites (1655), supported Charles II and *Oates, and worked as translator and hack-writer; he translated *La Calprenède’s Pharamond, *Scudéry’s Almahide, and wrote a travesty of Don Quixote (1687) in which he mentions Paradise Lost, but his biographer Godwin (who much prefers his elder brother Edward) was unable to determine whether the reference was ‘intended as a compliment or a slur’.

PHILLIPS, Stephen (1864–1915), actor and poet, who resolved, after the success of his Poems (1898), to revive poetic drama; his Paolo and Francesca (pub. 1900, perf. 1902) was received with great enthusiasm and compared by serious critics to Sophocles and Shakespeare. Herod (1901), Ulysses (1902), and Nero (1906) were also well received, but his later plays were failures.

PHILLIPTON, Eden (1862–1960), prolific and popular novelist, playwright, and poet, most of whose many novels are set in Dartmoor. He collaborated as playwright with Arnold *Bennett and J. K. *Jerome.

Philoclea, younger sister of Pamela in Sidney’s Arcadia.

Philological Society, the, founded in its present form in 1842 to investigate and to promote the study and knowledge of the structure, the affinities, and the history of language. Active in its formation were Thirlwall, A. P. Stanley, and T. *Arnold; prominent members were to include Furnivall, Trench, and James Murray, all of whom were involved in the creation of the Oxford English Dictionary. See H. Aarsleff, The Study of Language in England 1780–1860 (1967).

Philosophes, the collective name of a group of 18th-century writers and thinkers united by their faith in the efficacy of reason and their dislike of repressive traditions. Its most significant representatives included Montesquieu, Voltaire, Diderot, Rousseau, Buffon, Condillac, Condorcet, d’Alembert, d’Holbach, and Helvétius. They inclined to scepticism in religion, materialism in philosophy, and hedonism in ethics.

Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, see Sublime and Beautiful.

Philosophical View of Reform, A, a political essay by P. B. Shelley, written at Pisa 1820, not published until 1920.

Intended as an ‘instructive and readable’ octavo booklet, this was Shelley’s most mature political statement about Liberty, Revolution, and Reform: it confirms his position as a radical (rather than a liberal)—but not a revolutionary. Chapter 1 is a historical sketch of the continuous overthrow of imperial powers in Europe; it argues that periods of great literary creativity have always coincided with libertarian movements. Chapter 2 describes conditions of political and economic oppression in contemporary Britain and proposes specific measures of radical change, including parliamentary reform and alteration of laws regarding marriage, property inheritance, capital investment, and working hours. Chapter 3 (unfinished) suggests actual means of enforcing political change, including non-violent protest, the intervention of ‘poets and philosophers’, and the ‘last resort’ of resistance which is ‘undoubtedly insurrection’. The essay illuminates the thinking behind Shelley’s political poems of 1817–20, and provided much material for the Defence of Poetry, such as the concept of ‘unacknowledged legislators’.

Philotocia, a Senecan tragedy in blank verse by S. Daniel, published 1605.

Philotas, a gallant and bountiful soldier held in high estimation among the Macedonians, incurs the suspicion of Alexander by his boasts. He is accused of concealing his knowledge of a conspiracy against the king, is tortured, and, having confessed, is stoned to death.

The author had subsequently to defend himself against the charge of covertly defending, by this play, the rebellion of Essex. Performance of the play was suppressed in 1604.

Phineas Finn, the Irish Member, a novel by A. Trollope, published 1869, the second of the ‘Palliser’ series.

Phineas Finn, a young Irish barrister, catches the eye of Lord Tulla and is elected to Parliament for the family seat of Loughshane. In London Phineas wins friends on all sides, is admitted to high society, and falls in love with the politically minded Lady Laura Standish. Lady Laura’s personal fortune is considerably diminished after paying the debts of her brother Lord Chiltern, and she feels she must marry money, in the person of the chilly but wealthy Mr Kennedy. Phineas is at first disappointed, and is later deeply grieved at the unhappiness and finally the collapse of the Kennedy marriage, but turns for consolation elsewhere. He first pursues Violet Effingham, Lord Chiltern’s childhood sweetheart, but after a brief quarrel between the two suitors (featuring a duel fought in Belgium), Violet settles for Chiltern, and they are married. Madame Max Goesler, the rich widow of a Viennese banker, is Phineas’s next favourite. Phineas has lost his government salary by sticking to his principles over the issue of Irish Tenant Right, and has no money to cover the cost of re-election. Madame Max offers to help him out, and when Phineas refuses she offers him her hand in marriage and her fortune to finance a fresh political career. This he is too scrupulous to accept in view of his prior engagement to a pretty Irish girl, Mary Flood-Jones, and he returns to Ireland.

Phineas Redux, a novel by A. *Trollope, published 1874, the fourth in the ‘Palliser’ series.

Phineas Finn returns to politics in time for the fall of Mr Daubeny’s government, and earnestly hopes for office under Mr Gresham. Unhappily a series of quarrels makes his progress anything but smooth. First Mr Kennedy, outraged at Phineas’s visit to his wife Lady Laura in her Dresden exile, unsuccessfully tries to shoot him. Then Phineas exchanges heated words with the president of the board of trade, Mr Bontteen, and when, later that night, Bontteen is murdered, the burden of circumstantial evidence against Phineas is very strong. He is arrested and remanded for trial, and only the spirited efforts of Madame Max in discovering the true culprit, and a brilliant courtroom performance by Chaffanbrass in presenting her findings, succeed in getting him off. For a time Phineas is shattered by his experiences, but towards the end of the novel he rallies, returns to politics, and marries Madame Max.

In this novel the old duke of Omnium dies, and Plantagenet and Lady Glencora become his heir. Madame Max, the old duke’s favourite, is left some valuable jewellery in his will, but refuses to accept it. Instead the legacy is made over to Plantagenet’s cousin Adelaide Palliser, who is thus able to marry the impoverished Gerard Maule.

Bontteen’s murderer turns out to have been the Revd Mr Emilius, the converted Jew who married Lizzie *Eustace. Emilius, who has a previous wife still living at Prague, is convicted of bigamy and imprisoned, but there is insufficient evidence to hang him.

Phiz, see Brown, H. K.

Phoenix, The, an Old English poem of 677 lines, found in the *Exeter Book and possibly written in the later 9th cent. It is a beast allegory of the kind found in the bestiaries but developed over a greater length than usual. The descriptive part of the poem is closely based on Carmen de Ave Phoenice, probably by Lactantius (d. c.340), and the later allegorizing section has not been attributed to any certain source. The poem is admired for the vividness of its imagery and the accomplishment of its syntax. Ed. N. F. Blake (1964).

Phoenix and the Turtle, The, an allegorical elegy ascribed to Shakespeare which was included in Robert Chester’s collection Love’s Martyr (1601).

Phoenix Nest, The, a poetic miscellany published in 1593 and compiled by one R.S., who has never been identified. It includes poems by *Ralegh, *Lodge, and *Breton, and opens with three elegies on *Sidney, the ‘Phoenix’ of the title. It was edited by H. E. Rollins (1931).

Phunky, Mr, in Dickens’s Pickwick Papers, Serjeant Snubbins’s junior in the case of Bardell v. Pickwick.

Phyllyp Sparowe, a poem by *Skelton.

‘Physician’s Tale, The’, see Canterbury Tales, 13.

Physiocrat, one of a school of political economists founded by François Quesnay (1694–1774) in France in the 18th cent. They maintained that society should be governed according to an inherent natural order, that the soil is the sole source of wealth and the only proper object of taxation, and that security of property and freedom of industry and exchange are essential. The other principal exponents of the physiocrat doctrines were Jacques Turgot (1727–81), an able financier, whose dismissal in 1776 from the post of controller-general of the finances was the prelude of the French national bankruptcy; and Victor de Riquetti, marquis de Mirabeau (1715–89), the author of L’Ami des hommes and father of the revolutionary statesman. Adam *Smith, though no physiocrat in the technical sense of the word, was strongly influenced by the school.

picaresque, from the Spanish picaro, a wily trickster; the form of novel accurately described as ‘picaresque’ first appeared in 16th cent. Spain with the anonymous Lazarillo de Tormes (1553) and Alemán’s Guzmán de Alfarache (1599–1604), which relate the histories of ingenious rogues, the servants of several masters, who eventually repent the error of their ways; examples of their descendants in English would be Moll Flanders, Roderick Random, and Tom Jones. The term was apparently first used in England in the 19th cent.; Sir W. *Scott, for example, writing in 1829, describes the Memoirs of Vidoq as ‘a picaresque tale ... a romance of roguery’, and The Bookman in 1895 defined a picaresque tale as that of a ‘trickster’. Nowadays the term is commonly, and loosely, applied to episodic novels, especially those of *Fielding, *Smollett, and others of the 18th cent. which describe the adventures of a lively and resourceful hero on a journey. The Golden Ass of *Apuleius is regarded as a forerunner of the picaresque novel, while Nashe’s The Unfortunate Traveller (1594) is commonly accepted as the first picaresque romance in English.

PICCOLOMINI, Aeneas Silvio (1405–64), Pope Pius II from 1458, was a patron of letters and author of... romance in Latin, Eurialus and Lucretia, of treatises on many subjects, and of commentaries on his times. His secular works include the Miseriae Curialium, which provided one of the models for the Eclogues of A. *Barclay. He visited Scotland in 1435, and wrote a somewhat hostile report of its poverty-stricken condition. His third-person autobiography was translated as Memoirs of a Renaissance Pope by F. A. Gragg (1959).

Pickard, Tom (1946– ), poet, born in Gateshead, Newcastle upon Tyne: in 1963 he instigated a celebrated series of poetry readings and performances at the Morden Tower in Newcastle, including a reading by Basil *Bunting, whose work he did much to revive. He has published several collections, from High on the Walls (1967) to Tippin Eros: New and Selected Poems (1994). See underground poetry.

Pickering, William (1796–1854), publisher, commenced business in London in 1820, and did much to raise the standard of design in printing. He published the 'Diamond Classics' 1821–31, and in 1830 adopted the trademark of the Aldine Press (see Aldus Manutius). He increased his reputation by his Aldine edition of the English poets in 53 vols.

Pickwick Papers (The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club), a novel by *Dickens, first issued in 20 monthly parts Apr. 1836–Nov. 1837, and as a volume in 1837 (when Dickens was only 25 years old).

Mr Samuel Pickwick, general chairman of the Pickwick Club which he has founded, Messrs Tracy Tupman, Augustus Snodgrass, and Nathaniel Winkle, members of the club, are constituted a Corresponding Society of the Club to report to it their journeys and adventures, and observations of characters and manners. This is the basis on which the novel is constructed, and the Club serves to link a series of detached incidents and changing characters, without elaborate plot. The entertaining adventures with which Mr Pickwick and his associates meet are interspersed with incidental tales contributed by various characters. The principal elements in the story are: (1) the visit of Pickwick and his friends to Rochester and their falling in with the specious rascal Jingle, who gets Winkle involved in the prospect of a duel (fortunately averted). (2) The visit to Dingley Dell, the home of the hospitable Mr Wardle; the elopement of Jingle with Wardle's sister, their pursuit by Wardle and Pickwick, and the recovery of the lady; followed by the engagement of Sam Weller as Pickwick's servant. (3) The visit to Eatanswill, where a parliamentary election is in progress, and Mr Pickwick makes the acquaintance of Pott, editor of a political newspaper, and Mrs Leo Hunter. (4) The visit to Bury St Edmunds, where Mr Pickwick and Sam Weller are fooled by Jingle and his servant Job Trotter. (5) The pursuit of Jingle to Ipswich, where Mr Pickwick inadvertently enters the bedroom of a middle-aged lady at night; is in consequence involved in a quarrel with Mr Peter Magnus, her admirer; is brought before Mr Nupkins, the magistrate, on a charge of intending to fight a duel; and obtains his release on exposing the nefarious designs of Jingle on Nupkins's daughter. (6) The Christmas festivities at Dingley Dell. (7) The misapprehension of Mrs Bardell, Mr Pickwick's landlady, regarding her lodger's intentions, which leads to the famous action of Bardell v. Pickwick for breach of promise of marriage, in which judgement is given for the plaintiff, with damages £750. (8) The visit to Bath, in which Winkle figures prominently, first in the adventure with the blustering Dowler, and secondly in his courtship of Arabella Allen. (9) The period of Mr Pickwick's imprisonment in the Fleet in consequence of his refusal to pay the damages and costs of his action; and the discovery of Jingle and Job Trotter in that prison, and their relief by Mr Pickwick. (10) The affairs of Tony Weller (Sam's father) and the second Mrs Weller, ending in the death of the latter and the discomfiture of the pious humbug and greedy drunkard Stiggins, deputy shepherd in the Ebenezer Temperance Association. (11) The affairs of Bob Sawyer and Benjamin Allen, medical students and subsequently struggling practitioners. The novel ends with the happy marriage of Emily Wardle and Augustus Snodgrass.

Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni (1463–94), an Italian humanist and philosopher, born at Mirandola, of which his family were the lords. He spent part of his short life at Florence in the circle of Lorenzo de' Medici. In 1486 he published 900 theses, offering to maintain them at Rome, but some of his propositions were pronounced heretical and the public debate did not take place. The famous oration De Dignitate Hominis, with which he intended to introduce the debate, is one of the most important philosophical works of the 15th cent. Pico was a daring syncretist, who vainly tried to make a synthesis of Christianity, Platonism, Aristotelianism, and the Jewish cabbala. As a pioneer in the study of Hebrew philosophy he influenced Reuchlin. His life (The Lyfe of Johan Picus, Erle of Myrandula a Grete Lorde of Italy) and some of his pious writings were translated by Sir T. *More. *Colet was influenced by Pico.

picturesque, a term which came into fashion in the late 18th cent., principally to describe a certain kind of scenery. Writers on the picturesque include W. *Gilpin, W. *Mason, William Payne Knight (1750–1824, who published The Landscape in 1794), Uvedale Price (1747–1829, who published Essays on the Picturesque, 1794), and the landscape gardener Humphry Repton (1752–1818) (see LANDSCAPE GARDENING). The impact of these writers on the sensibility and vocabulary of writers of the 19th cent. was considerable. The 'picturesque', as defined by Price, was a new aesthetic category, to be added to *Burke's recently established categories of the *sublime and the beautiful; its attributes were roughness and irregularity, and its most complete exponent in terms of painting was *Rosa, whose works enjoyed much popularity at this period; Constable described him as 'a great favourite with novel writers, particularly the ladies'. Mrs *Radcliffe's works dwell frequently on the picturesque, and J. *Austen and many of her characters were familiar with the works of Gilpin; in *Mansfield Park she mocks the spirit of 'improvement' in the character of the foolish Mr Rushworth. The entertaining aesthetic disputes of Price and Knight, both of whom owned estates near the Welsh borders, are satirized in Peacock's *Headlong Hall, and *Combe's adventures of Dr Syntax are aimed at the movement in general and Gilpin in particular. Although the excesses of picturesque theory became a popular target for satire, these writers made a lasting contribution to our vision, and we have mistook ourselves with the Low-countries, is by R. Browning, included in *Mansfield Park, which is a composition by Piero—luminously explicit, an equation in balanced voids and solids, in harmonising and contrasting hues.'

Piers Plowman, the greatest poem of the Middle English *Alliterative Revival, by *Langland. It survives in about 50 manuscripts, in three widely varying versions, known as the A, B, and C texts. The A-text, totalling 2,567 lines in its longest version, was probably written about 1367–70; the B-text, a very considerable extension of the A-text which both rewrites the parts of the poem that occur in the A-text and adds more than as much again to the end of it, extends to 7,277 lines (or more) and probably dates from about 1377–9; and the C-text is a substantial revision of the B-text, about the same length, dating from about 1385–6. It is now generally agreed (following Kane, Piers Plowman: The Evidence for Authorship, 1965, and Donaldson, Piers Plowman: The C-Text and Its Poet, 1949) that the three versions were all the work of Langland, who would, therefore, have been occupied with the work and its revisions for at least the last 20 years of his life. Structurally, the poem is divided in a number of ways which are also problematical because the evidence of the manuscripts is conflicting. The principal division of the poem has been into two parts, the 'Visio' and the 'Vita', the 'Visio' comprising the prologue and the first seven passus ('step': the term used in the poem for the section divisions, varying from 129 to 642 lines in length) in the B-text (prologue and the first eight in A; the first ten passus in C which sometimes does not have a prologue). This 'Visio'–'Vita' distinction has been seen to be of such importance by some critics that they have argued that they are properly to be regarded as two distinct poems (see T. P. Dunning, Piers Plowman: An Interpretation of the A-Text, rev. T. P. Dolan, 1980); but the distinction is not found in B manuscripts at all (see Schmidt's edition, 1978, p. xx). There has been argument too whether B or C is to be taken as the more authoritative text; C is the latest and in many places clarifies points which remained obscure in B, but its revisions have damaged the shape of the poem at some points so that it no longer divides into coherent visions, describing falling asleep—vision—awakening. B has the advantage of being complete and coherent in this way (and it can also be claimed that some of the very obscurities that C clarifies, such as the tearing of the pardon in Passus VII, display great imaginative power). A, though some claims have been made for its integrity as a poem, may be regarded as superseded by the other versions. The following account follows the B-text (where there is any divergence in plot), in its division into eight separate visions.

Vision I. While wandering on the Malvern Hills, the narrator (who, it transpires later, is called Will) falls asleep and has a vision of a Tower where Truth dwells, a deep Dungeon, and between them 'a fair feeld ful of folk' (prologue, 17) where all the order of human society can be seen about their business. The worldly values thus raised are expounded by Lady Holy Church in Passus I; the theme is sustained by the analytical trial of Lady Meed in Passus II–IV which considers whether Meed (Reward or payment) is to be given to Wrong or according to Conscience and Reason.

Vision 2. The narrator observes what J. A. Burrow has shown to be an established sequence of events: Sermon (preached here by Reason); Confession (by the Seven Deadly Sins, colourfully personified in Passus V, the longest in the poem); Pilgrimage (to Truth, led by Piers the Plowman who first appears as the just leader on the road to Salvation); and Pardon (a paper pardon sent to Piers by Truth, but torn up by him when its validity is questioned by a priest, who rejects it as a moral statement rather than a papal document). The conflict with the priest awakens the dreamer; this is the end of the ‘Visio’ as distinct from ‘Vita’, if such a distinction is indicated (as in A and C manuscripts).

Vision 3 shows Will turning to the faculties and sources of knowledge and understanding, as the search for Truth (now referred to as ‘Dowel’) becomes individualized. In Passus VIII–XII Will progressively consults Thought, Wit, Study, Clergy, Scripture, Imagination—linked with Nature in an inner dream containing an inspired description of the workings of nature, ll. 326–67), and Reason.

Vision 4 and 5. The theme of these visions is Charity, and Passus XIII–XVII attempt to show in action the ideas concerning doing well which were offered in Vision 3. Piers Plowman reappears, in a transfigured form in which his action is indistinguishable from that of Christ.

Vision 6. The Passion of Christ is described as the culmination of doing well in Passus XVIII, where the death of Christ is evoked with great power (ll. 57–63), and after his death the *Harrowing of Hell.

Visions 7 and 8. These Passus (XIX and XX) continue with the liturgical cycle begun in Lent in Passus XVI (l. 172) and show the attempts to put into practice the lessons gained from observing the saving actions of Christ. The attempts to perfect the Church are still frustrated by evildoers, as Piers Plowman had first been in Passus VI as he set out on his first pilgrimage, and the poem ends with Conscience setting out to find Piers, to lead the perfected search for salvation.

The strength of Piers Plowman does not lie in its structure or argument, both of which are often confusing and uncertain. The same crypticism that often results in sublimely imaginative poetry often blocks a literal understanding (as Rosemary Woolf says). But the passages of greatest imaginative power (such as those mentioned in Passus XI and XVIII, or the metaphor of ‘the plant of peace’ 1148–57) have a sublimity beyond the reach of any other medieval English writer.

Pilgrim’s Progress, The, from This World to That Which Is to Come, a prose allegory by *Bunyan, Part I published 1678 (a second edition with additions appeared in the same year, and a third in 1679), Part II 1684.

The allegory takes the form of a dream by the author. In this he sees *Christian, with a burden on his back and reading in a book, from which he learns that the city in which he and his family dwell will be burned with fire. On the advice of Evangelist, Christian flees from the *City of Destruction, having failed to persuade his wife and children to accompany him. Pt I describes his pilgrimage through the *Slough of Despond, the Interpreter’s House, the House Beautiful, the *Valley of Humiliation, the *Valley of the Shadow of Death, *Vanity Fair, *Doubting Castle, the *Delectable Mountains, the country of *Beulah, to the *Celestial City. On the way he encounters various allegorical personages, among them Mr *Worldly Wiseman, *Faithful (who accompanies Christian on his way but is put to death in Vanity Fair), Hopeful (who next joins Christian), Giant *Despair, the foul fiend *Apollyon, and many others.

Pt II relates how Christian’s wife Christiana, moved by a vision, sets out with her children on the same pilgrimage, accompanied by her neighbour Mercy, despite the objections of Mrs Timorous and others. They are escorted by *Great-heart, who overcomes Giant Despair and other monsters and brings them to their destination. The work is a development of the Puritan conversion narrative (see GRACE ABOUNDING), drawing on popular literature such as *emblem books and *chapbooks, as well as *Foxe’s Book of Martyrs and the Bible. It is remarkable for the beauty and simplicity of its language (Bunyan was permeated with the Bible. It is remarkable for the beauty and simplicity of its language (Bunyan was permeated with the English of the Bible, though he was also a master of the colloquial English of his own time), the vividness and reality of the characterization, and the author’s sense of humour and feeling for the world of nature. It circulated at first mainly in uneducated circles, and its wide appeal is shown by the fact that it has been translated into well over 100 languages. It became a children’s classic, regarded by generations of parents as a manual of moral instruction and an aid to literacy, as well as a delightful tale. It was a seminal text in the development of the realistic novel, and Bunyan’s humorously caustic development of the tradition of name symbolism influenced *Dickens, *Trollope, and *Thackeray.
PILKINGTON, Laetitia (1709–50), Irish autobiographer and poet, the daughter of the distinguished Dublin physician John Van Lewen and successively a friend of J. *Swift, C. *Cibber, and S. *Richardson. She turned to verse, playwriting, autobiography, and miscellaneous ghost-writing when her father died unexpectedly poor in 1737 and her ambitious husband, the Revd Matthew Pilkington (below), promptly divorced her. Between 1739 and 1747, when she returned for good to Ireland, she lived in London supporting herself largely through Cibber and his circle of friends at White’s. Appearing in stages between 1748 and 1754 after she returned to Dublin, her three-volume Memoirs incorporate a fragmentary tragedy and almost all her known poems. The unfinished last volume appeared posthumously in 1754, with a supplementary appendix by her son John Carteret Pilkington (1730–63). Celebrated for their vignettes of Swift as she knew him in private life, the Memoirs exhibit a breezy conversational style and a mastery of dialogue uncommon in narrative at so early a date. Ten years after her death John tried to repeat her success with The Real Story of John Carteret Pilkington, a *picaresque account of his boyhood travels after he escaped from the scullery of his father’s house in 1740 or 1741 until 1744, a year or two before he was reunited with his mother in London. See Memoirs of Laetitia Pilkington, ed. A. C. Elias (2 vols, 1997).

PILKINGTON, Matthew (1701–74), Irish poet turned art historian. Educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and ordained in 1723, he began to publish verse as early as 1725. J. *Swift helped him to revise his collected Poems on Several Occasions (1730) and procured his appointment as chaplain to the lord mayor of London for 1732–3. In London Pilkington successfully passed off as Swift’s one of his own satires, An Infallible Scheme to Pay the Public Debt of This Nation in Six Months, wrote a libellous short biography of the mayor, and apparently turned government informer when arrested for his part in publishing Swift’s Epistle to a Lady (1734). Growing notoriety at home, where in 1738 he divorced his wife Laetitia (see above), seems to have cut short his literary career. By the mid-1750s he had re-emerged as a leading authority on Old Master paintings. In 1770 he published his classic reference work, The Gentleman’s and Connoisseur’s Dictionary of Painters which, periodically revised, expanded, and retitled, held its own for nearly a century.

Pimlyco, or Runne Red-Cap, a satirical pamphlet, published 1609, of unknown authorship, in which the poet describes a crowd of persons of all classes of society, from courtiers to ‘greasy lownes’, pressing towards Hogsden to drink Pimlico ale.

PINDAR (c.522–443 BC), Greek lyric poet, the majority of whose surviving works are odes celebrating victories in the games at Olympia and elsewhere. Antiquity’s most notable exponent of the Greater Ode, he served as an inspiration to all subsequent poets attempting this difficult genre. His compositions were elevated and formal, distinguished by the boldness of their metaphors and a marked reliance on myth and gnomic utterance. He used a framework of strophe, antistrophe, and epode which his imitators sought to copy, but in Pindar this framework rested on an elaborate prosodic structure that remained unknown until it was worked out by August Boeckh in his edition of the Odes (1811). The 17th- and 18th-cent. writers of Pindarics—*Cowley, *Dryden, *Pope, *Gray—employed a much looser prosodic system, so that their odes, although elevated and rich in metaphor, lack Pindar’s architectural quality. See also ODE.

PINERO, Sir Arthur Wing (1855–1934). He left school at 10 to work in his father’s solicitor’s practice, but, stage-struck from youth, became an actor, and was noticed by H. *Irving who later produced some of his plays. His first one-act play, Two Hundred a Year, performed in 1877, heralded a successful and prolific career. The first of his *farces, The Magistrate (perf. 1885), involves a series of ludicrous confusions between Mr Posket, the magistrate, and his family; it brought Pinero both fame and wealth. Later farces, such as The School-Mistress (1887), did nearly as well, as did his sentimental comedy Sweet Lavender (1888). His first serious play, on what was to be the recurrent theme of double standards for men and women, was The Profligate (1889); it was praised by *Archer, and noted not only for its frankness but also for its absence of the standard devices of soliloquy and aside. *Lady Bountiful (1891) was the first of the ‘social’ plays in which Pinero was deemed to display his understanding of women. *The Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893), returning to the theme of double standards, was a lasting success. The Notorious Mrs Ebbsmith (1895) again dealt with a woman’s dubious past. Trelawny of the Wells (1898), a sentimental comedy nostalgically recalling his own passion for the theatre he had haunted as a boy, also had great success. He continued to write, but, although knighted in 1909, lived through many years of dwindling reputation and disillusion, eclipsed by the rising popularity of the new theatre of *Ibsen and G. B. *Shaw.

PINTER, Harold (1930—), poet and playwright, born in east London, the son of a Jewish tailor, and educated at Hackney Downs Grammar School. He began to publish poetry in periodicals before he was 20, then became a professional actor, working mainly in repertory. His first play, The Room, was performed in Bristol in 1957, followed in 1958 by a London production of The Birthday Party, in which Stanley, an out-of-work pianist in a seaside boarding house, is mysteriously threatened and taken over by two intruders, an Irishman and a Jew, who present him with a Kafkaesque indictment of unexplained crimes. Pinter's distinctive voice was soon recognized, and many critical and commercial successes followed, including *The Caretaker (1960), The Lover (1963), *The Homecoming (1965), Old Times (1971), and No Man's Land (1975). Betrayal (1978; film, 1982) is an ironic tragedy which ends in beginning and traces with a reversed chronology the development of a love affair between a man and his best friend's wife. Later plays include A Kind of Alaska (1982), based on a work by O. *Sacks, One for the Road (1984), Mountain Language (1988), Party Time (1991), and Ashes to Ashes (1996), a short drama of the *Holocaust. Pinter's gift for portraying, by means of dialogue which realistically produces the nuances of colloquial speech, the difficulties of communication and the many layers of meaning in language, pause, and silence, have created a style labelled by the popular imagination as 'Pinteresque', and his themes—nameless menace, erotic fantasy, obsession and jealousy, family hatreds, and mental disturbance—are equally recognizable. Pinter has also written extensively for radio and television, directed plays, and written several screenplays, which include versions of L. P. *Hartley's The Go-Between (1966), *À la recherche du temps perdu (1978) and J. *Fowles's The French Lieutenant's Woman (1982). Poems and Prose, 1947—1977 was published in 1978. See The Life and Work of Harold Pinter (1996) by Michael Billington.

PINTO, Fernão Mendes (1509–83), a Portuguese traveller in the East, who left a narrative of his voyages (Peregrinaçao, 1614), marked by a vivid imagination. It was translated by Henry Cogan (1653). *Cervantes calls him the 'Prince of Liars', and Congreve in *Love for Love (II. i) couples his name with that of *Mandeville when describing a 'Lyar of the first Magnitude'.

Pipchin, Mrs, in Dickens's *Dombey and Son, a boarding-house keeper in Brighton.

Pippa Passes, by R. *Browning, published 1841 as No. I of the series *Bells and Pomegranates. Although subtitled 'A Drama', it was not written for the stage. In its final version it consists of an 'Introduction', in verse and four parts, entitled 'Morning', 'Noon', 'Evening', and 'Night'. The first two parts have a verse section followed by one in prose; the third part has two verse sections; the fourth part has a prose section followed by one in verse. (This combination of verse and prose was influenced by Browning's study of Elizabethan and Jacobean drama; see also SOUL's Tragedy, A.)

The play is set in and around Asolo, a small town near Venice which Browning visited in 1838 (see ASOLANDO). The plot is a web of dramatic ironies. The Introduction shows Pippa, a young silk-worker, waking up on the morning of her annual holiday. She contrasts the life of 'Asolo's Four Happiest Ones' with her own, and decides to 'pass' by them all in the course of the day. These four constitute an ascending scale of value, from carnal love (Ottima, wife of a rich silk merchant, and her lover Sebald), through married love (Jules, a sculptor, and his bride), filial love (the young patriot Luigi and his mother), reaching at last the love of God (the good bishop). Each life turns out to be different from Pippa's imagining of it, though she herself does not realize this. Ottima and Sebald are quarrelling after their murder of Ottima's husband; Jules's bride turns out not to be the cultivated patrician he thought her, but an ignorant peasant girl; Luigi and his mother are disputing over his intention to carry out a political assassination; and the bishop is negotiating with a corrupt official about the destruction of Pippa herself, who turns out to be his own lost niece, heiress to a fortune he might otherwise appropriate. Pippa 'passes' by each of the four main scenes in turn, singing as she goes; each song,ironically juxtaposed with the action, effects a moral revolution in the characters concerned. (The famous concluding lines of Pippa's first song, 'God's in his heaven—All's right with the world!', are often quoted out of context as evidence of Browning's own naïve optimism.) At the end of the drama we see Pippa back in her room at nightfall, unaware of the day's events. The focus of modern criticism is the ambivalent moral and aesthetic value of Pippa's 'innocence', a theme repeated in the figure of Pomplia in *The Ring and the Book.

PIRANDELLO, Luigi (1867–1936), Italian dramatist, short story writer, and novelist, awarded the *Nobel Prize in 1934. He exercised a pervasive influence on European drama by challenging the conventions of *naturalism. Among his plays, ten of which he published as Maschere nude (Naked Masks, 1918–22), the best known are: Così è (se vi pare) (Right You Are, If You Think You Are, 1917), Sei personaggi in cerca di autore (Six Characters in Search of an Author, 1921), and Enrico IV (Henry IV, 1922). In these plays he anticipated the anti-illusionist theatre of *Brecht, *Wilder, and *Weiss; his exploration of the disintegration of personality foreshadowed *Beckett; his probing of the conflict between reality and appearance has echoes in the work of *O'Neill; and his examination of the relationship between self and persona, actor and character, face and mask, is a precursor of the work of *Anouilh, *Giraudoux, and *Genet. Yet much of Pirandello’s best work is to be found in his very short stories (28 of which were dramatized), where themes in common with his plays are more deeply explored. His main full-length novels are: *L’esclusa (The Outcast, 1901), which deals with a woman’s desire for independence within patriarchal Sicilian society; *Il fu Mattia Pascal (The Late Mattia Pascal, 1904), where Pascal goes home to discover it is impossible to alter his status as ‘deceased’; and *I vecchi e i giovani (The Old and The Young, 1909), dealing with the effects of the unification of Italy on Sicily at the turn of the century.

PIRANESI, Giovanni Battista (1720–78), an Italian architect, who published many dramatic etchings of the ruins of classical Rome. In literary circles Piranesi is most famous for the Carceri d’invenzione (c.1745; rev. edn c.1761), dark visions of Roman prisons where chains and instruments of torture swing before mas­ sive arches, and isolated figures wander aimlessly along stairs, ladders, and bridges that lead nowhere. Before his death his works were already popular in England, where they were associated with the Burke­ ian sublime; Horace *Walpole wrote of ‘the sublime dreams of Piranesi . . . He piles palaces on bridges, and temples on palaces, and scales Heaven with mountains of edifices’; The Castle of Otranto perhaps shows this influence. Piranesi’s deepest influence was on the Romantics. In Confessions of an English Opium Eater (1821) De Quincey compared Piranesi’s prisons with the illusions induced by opium: ‘With the same power of endless growth and self-reproduction did my architecture proceed in dreams.’ Curiously, he had not seen the etchings but had listened to *Coleridge’s description of a print showing Piranesi groping up endless flights of stairs. This passage became famous in France, where *Musset, *Gautier, and *Hugo were fascinated by Piranesi. Later Piranesi appealed to writers who saw the Carceri as symbolizing meta­physical despair.

Pirate, The, a novel by Sir W. *Scott, published 1821. Set in 17th-cent. Shetland, the plot deals with the tension between long-established tradition and new ideas brought into a closed community by outsiders. Mordaunt Mertoun, though the son of an outsider, has been reared in Shetland, and occupies a half-way house between tradition and common sense, familiar to many of Scott’s heroes. The heroines, Minna and Brenda Troil, embody an equally familiar contrast between romance and realism. Fantasy is supplied by the half-crazed seer Norra of the Fitful Head, whose machinations control the plot.

Pisanio, in Shakespeare’s Cymbeline, the servant *Posthumus leaves to *Imogen’s service when he is banished.

Pistol, Ancient or Ensign, in Shakespeare’s 2 *Henry IV, *Henry V, and *The Merry Wives of Windsor, one of Falstaff’s associates, a braggart with a fine command of bombastic language.

Pistyl of Susan (or The Pistel of Swete Susan), meaning ‘the epistle of Susanna’, a northern alliterative poem, c.1350–60, in 364 lines of 13-line tail-rhyme stanzas, telling the story of Susanna and the Elders (Dan. 13). Up to recently, though no longer, scholars accepted the attribution of the work to Huchown made in the Orygynale Cronykil (c.1420) of Andrew of *Wyntoun. Ed. H. Koster, *Huchown’s Pistel of Swete Susan (Quellen und Forschungen LXXVI, 1895).

PITT, William, first earl of Chatham (1708–78), a great Whig statesman and orator, who entered Parliament in 1735. He was secretary of state in 1765–7, but his fame as a great administrator rests on the period that immediately followed, when Pitt and Newcastle were the chief ministers in the coalition. He strenuously opposed from 1774 onwards the harsh measures taken against the American colonies, though unwilling to recognize their independence. His speeches were marked by lofty and impassioned eloquence and, judged by their effect on their hearers, place him among the greatest orators, but only fragments have survived.

PITT, William, the Younger (1759–1806), second son of the first earl of Chatham. He became chancellor of the exchequer in his 22nd and prime minister in 1783 in his 25th year, and retained the position until 1801. He returned to office in 1804, formed the third coalition, and died shortly after the battle of Austerlitz.

Pizarro, a tragedy adapted by *Sheridan from a German play by *Kotzebue, on the Spanish conqueror of Peru (1471–1541).

Plagiary, Sir Fretful, a character in Sheridan’s The Critic, a caricature of R. *Cumberland.

Plague Year, A Journal of the, a historical fiction by *Defoe, published 1722.

It purports to be the narrative of a resident in London during 1664–5, the year of the Great Plague; the initials ‘H.F.’ which conclude it have been taken to refer to Defoe’s uncle Henry Foe, a saddler, from whom the author may have heard some of the details he
It tells of the gradual spread of the plague, the terror of the inhabitants, and the steps taken by the authorities, such as the shutting up of infected houses and the prohibition of public gatherings. The symptoms of the disease, the circulation of the dead-carts, the burials in mass graves, and the terrible scenes witnessed by the supposed narrator are described with extraordinary vividness. The general effects of the epidemic, notably in the closing down of trading and the flight from the city, are also related, and an estimate of the total number of deaths is made. The Journal embodied information from various sources, including official documents; some scenes appear to have been borrowed from *Dekker’s The Wonderful Year (1603). Defoe’s subject was suggested by fears of another outbreak, following the one in Marseilles in 1721 which occasioned Sir R. *Walpole’s unpopular Quarantine Act. *Hazlitt ascribed to the work ‘an epic grandeur, as well as heart-breaking familiarity’.

Plain-Dealer, The, a comedy by *Wycherley, probably performed 1676, published 1677. It was highly praised by *Dryden and *Dennis, though from the start it was criticized for obscenity, and in the 18th cent, was performed in a version bowdlerized by *Bickerstaffe. It is loosely based on *Molière’s Le Misanthrope; Wycherley’s hero Manly, an honest misanthropic sea-captain (from whom the playwright took the nickname ‘Manly’ Wycherley), corresponds to Molière’s Alceste, and his treacherous, worldly beloved Olivia to Célimène. Manly, returned from the Dutch wars, has lost faith in all but Olivia, to whom he has confided his money, and his friend Vernish: he finds Olivia married to Vernish, and faithless even to him. Manly is beloved by Fidelia, a young woman who has followed him to sea in man’s clothes; she intercedes with Olivia on his behalf, in a scene reminiscent of the Olivia—Viola scene in *Twelfth Night, discovered by Vernish, who attempts to rape her, and is finally wounded in an attempt to defend Manly from Vernish. Manly forsweares Olivia and pledges himself to Fidelia. There is a sub-plot in which the litigious widow Blackacre, who has a passion for legal jargon, trains up her son Jerry (a literary ancestor of Tony Lumpkin in *She Stoops to Conquer) in her footsteps, and thereby overreaches herself.

The Plain Dealer is also the name of a periodical established by A. *Hill.

Plain Speaker, The, a volume of essays by W. *Hazlitt, published in 1826, the last such collection to appear before his death. The title fittingly captures his gift for forthright assertion and invective. The collection includes several of his finest pieces, such as ‘On Dreams’ (‘We are not hypocrites in our sleep’) and ‘On the Pleasures of Hating’, which concludes with Hazlitt’s self-description as ‘the dupe of friendship, and the fool of love’.

PLANCHÉ, James Robinson (1796–1880), a prolific dramatist of Huguenot descent. Besides his many original pieces for the stage, mainly burlesques and extravaganzas, he made translations and adaptations from French, Spanish, and Italian authors, including *fairy tales by the Countess d’Aulnoy (1855) and by Perrault (1858). His stage works include *The Vampyre; or The Bride of the Isles (1820), an adaptation of a French melodrama which introduced the ‘vampire’ trap to the English stage, and The Island of Jewels (1849). He wrote several opera librettos including Maid Marian (1822) adapted from a tale by *Peacock, *Weber’s Oberon (1826), and English versions of William Tell and The Magic Flute. Planché also made a reputation as an antiquary and a scholar of heraldry and costume; his History of British Costumes (1834) long remained a standard work; he also published an edition of Strutt’s Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of England (1842). He was appointed Somerset herald in 1866.

Plantagenet Palliser, see Omnium, Duke of.

PLATER, Alan (1935– ), writer, born in Jarrow and educated at Kingston High School, Hull, and King’s College, Newcastle upon Tyne. After contributing many episodes to BBC TV’s Z Cars and its sequel Softly Softly in the 1960s, several stage plays followed: the moving Close the Coalhouse Door (1972, from a story by ex-miner and novelist Sid Chaplin) heralded the effects of pit closures upon regional communities. Life in the north-east, sport, and jazz feature in his considerable television output, the first predominant in Seventeen Per Cent Said Push Off (1972) and The Land of Green Ginger (1974), Rugby League featuring in Trinity Tales (1975, a ‘Chaucerian’ pilgrimage of supporters to a cup final) and the recordings of cornet-player Bix Beiderbecke inspiring The Beiderbecke Affair (1985). His adaptations for the small screen include A. *Trollope’s Barchester Chronicles (1982) and O. *Manning’s The Fortunes of War (1987) (from her Balkan Trilogy). All Credit to the Lads (1998) is a stage play about football.

PLATH, Sylvia (1932–63), poet and novelist, born in Boston, Massachusetts, the daughter of a German immigrant professor and entomologist, who died when she was 8. She was educated at Smith College, Massachusetts, and Newnham College, Cambridge. She married Ted *Hughes in 1956. After teaching for a while in America, she and Hughes returned to England in 1959, where they lived in London before moving to Devon in 1961. Her first volume of poetry, The Colossus, appeared in 1960, and in 1963 her only novel *The Bell Jar. Less than a month after its publication, in the coldest February for many years, she committed suicide in London. In 1965 appeared her best-known collection, Ariel, which established her reputation with its courageous and controlled treatment of extreme and painful states of mind. Much of her symbolism was deeply rooted in actuality; the poems on bee-keeping ("The Bee Meeting", "The Arrival of the Bee Box", etc.) are based on her own attempts to keep bees in Devon, and other poems—"Elm", "Letter in November", "The Moon and the Yew Tree"—describe the physical surroundings of the house and the views from it. Other poems refer directly to her own experiences: 'Lady Lazarus' is based on her two previous suicide attempts, 'Daddy' on the early loss of her father, 'Tulips' on a week spent in hospital undergoing an appendectomy: in the first of these two she uses powerful imagery drawn from the *Holocaust, though she was not herself Jewish. Other posthumous volumes include *Crossing the Water and *Winter Trees (both 1971); *Johnny Panic and the *Bible of *Dreams (1977, collected prose pieces); and *Collected Poems (1981, with an introduction by T. Hughes). A volume of letters, *Letters Home, edited by her mother, A. S. Plath, with a commentary, appeared in 1975. Although her best-known poems deal with illness, suffering, and death, others (particularly those addressed to her two children, such as 'Morning Song' and 'You're') are exhilarating, tender, and affectionate, and her tone is frequently witty as well as disturbing. There is a biography, *Bitter Fame, by the poet Anne *Stevenson (1989), written with the approval of the Plath estate.

PLATO (c.428/7-c.348/7 BC), Greek philosopher, eminent for the profundity of his thought, the number of his surviving writings, and the extent of his influence. Born in Athens of an aristocratic family, he was a friend and admirer of *Socrates, after whose death in 399 BC he went into exile; he returned to Athens in the 380s and set up a school which was then or at a later stage known as the Academy. The majority of his works are in dialogue form and may have been intended for public performance or for performance to a select audience of pupils. The principal speaker is nearly always Socrates, but it is impossible to say how close Plato's 'Socrates' stands to the real man either in character or in his teaching. The dialogues fall roughly into three groups. About a dozen demonstrate what has been called the Socratic Method. Socrates plies his interlocutors with a chain of questions, and their replies trap them into self-contradiction. These dialogues, the best known of which are the *Ion, *Euthyphro, *Protakoras, and *Gorgias, are considered Plato's earliest work. The second group includes the *Crito, *Apology, *Phaedo, *Symposium; these do not employ the Socratic Method and are considered to have been written between 371 and 367 BC. Finally, the profound and technically subtle dialogues such as the *Theaetetus, *Parmenides, *Timaeus, *Sophistes, *Philebus are the products of Plato's old age. There are also two monumental treatises, *The Republic and *The Laws, which were probably compiled over a period, *The Laws being the later.

Plato's ideas have had a lasting appeal for philosophers, and some of them also caught the popular imagination. Notable among these were: (1) the Theory of Forms which is best illustrated by an example. The concept 'cat' is derived from our knowledge of particular cats. Plato held that concepts of this nature have a real existence outside the world of sense, and this belief served to reinforce men's hope that there existed an eternal order. (2) The project of establishing philosopher-kings which produced a multitude of schemes for the education of princes. (3) *Platonic love, a devotion inspired by the best qualities of the beloved and aiming at their further development, was formulated originally by Plato in the context of a homosexual relationship, but by the 16th cent. it was applied to a heterosexual love that could rise above sexual desire.

Plato has played a markedly vitalizing role in the history of European thought. Through *Augustine he came to exercise a formative influence on Christianity. Through the Florentine Platonists of the 15th cent. he made a manifold impact on art and ideas in the major countries of Europe. It is impossible, however, to separate Plato's direct from his indirect influence. *Platonic themes appear in many writers—*Spenser, *Chapman, *Donne, *Marvell, and later *Wordsworth, *Bridges—the extent of whose reading of Plato must remain in doubt, as well as in the work of his attested students such as the *Cambridge Platonists, *Milton, *Gray, *Shelley, E. B. *Browning, M. *Arnold, and *Pater. But what we find in all these cases are just generalities that could have issued from a Christian or *Neo-Platonic source as surely as from a reading of Plato himself.

Platonic love, now used to mean love of a purely spiritual character, free from sensual desire. Amor Platonicus was used by *Ficino synonymously with *Amor Socraticus to denote the kind of interest in young men which was imputed to Socrates; cf. the last few pages of Plato's *Symposium. As thus originally used it had no reference to women, but by the 16th cent. it was extended to include heterosexual love that rose above sensual desire (see e.g. *Castiglione). The ennobling and idealizing aspects of the homosexual Platonic concept appear in many English writers, however, particularly towards the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th cents; the 'love that dared not speak its name' appeared frequently in a pagan-Hellenic context, consciously or subconsciously, in the works of *Pater, J. A. *Symonds, F. *Reid, E. M. *Forster, and many others.

Platonists, Cambridge, see Cambridge Platonists.

PLATONOV, Andrei Platonovich (A. P. *Klimentov) (1899–1951), Russian prose writer. He was born in Voronezh in central Russia and from the age of 13 had various manual jobs. He fought for the Bolsheviks in the Civil War and then qualified as an engineer. In 1927 he gave up his job to devote himself to literature. His first collection of stories, The Epifan Locks, appeared in 1927. During 1928–30 he wrote his most important works, Chevengur, which relates with bitter irony the tale of a group of proletarians who dream of building a communist utopia and choose the steppe town of Chevengur for their experiment, and Katlovian (The Foundation Pit), in which the inhabitants of a village plan to build a house for communal living but get no further than the enormous foundation pit. Both these works have now been published abroad (1972, 1968) and translated into English (1978, 1973), but they did not appear in the Soviet Union. The publication of his story For Future Use: A Poor Farmhand’s Chronicle (1931) led to accusations of ‘kulak tendencies’ and a ban on his work till 1936, and he was again in disfavour from 1946 until his death. He began to be published again in 1958.

PLAUTUS, Titus Maccius (c.254–184 BC), early Roman dramatist who adapted the Greek New Comedy for the Roman stage. The extent of his originality remains uncertain. He does not seem to have translated exactly, but he certainly worked within the Greek convention using the same stock characters—miserly fathers, spendthrift sons, boastful soldiers, resourceful parasites, courtesans, and slaves—and often borrowing the plots of his Greek models. Twenty of his plays have survived, and it was from him and from his successor *Terence that Europe learned about ancient comedy. His direct influence on English literature is slight, though Udall was indebted to him in Ralph Roister Doister, Shakespeare adapted his Menaechni in The Comedy of Errors, Jonson conflated the Captivi and the Aulularia in The Case Is Altered, and Dryden adapted his Amphitryon; but the tradition he represented is responsible for the form taken by English comedy up to the 19th cent.

Plays of the Western World, The, a comedy by *Synge, performed and published 1907. Christy Mahon, a slight young man, very tired and frightened, arrives at a village in Mayo. He gives out that he is a fugitive from justice, who in a quarrel has killed his bullying father, splitting him to the chin with a single blow. He is hospitably entertained, and his character as a dare-devil gives him a great advantage with the women (notably Pegeen Mike and Widow Quin) over the milder-spirited lads of the place. But admiration gives place to angry contempt when the father himself arrives in pursuit of the fugitive, who has merely given him a crack on the head and run away. The implication that Irish peasants would condone a murder and the frankness of some of the language (Christy speaks of ‘all the girls in Mayo . . . standing before me in their shifts’) caused outrage and riots when the play was first performed at the Abbey Theatre. In his preface, Synge compares the ‘joyless and pallid’ language of the naturalistic theatre of *Ibsen with the “rich and living” imagination and language of the Irish people, and this play is his best-known effort to fuse the language of ordinary people with a dramatic rhetoric of his own making.

Pleasant Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis, Ane, in Commandatioun of Vertew and Vituperatioun of Vyce, a morality play by Sir D. Lindsay, produced 1540.

Pt I represents the temptation of Rex Humanitas by Sensuality, Wantonness, Solace, and other evil companions, while Good Counsel is hustled away, Verity is put in the stocks, and Chastity is warned off. An interlude follows in which are described the adventures of Chastity among humbler folks, a tailor, a soutar, and their wives. Then Chastity is put in the stocks. But the arrival of Correction alters the situation. Verity, Good Counsel, and Chastity are admitted to the king, and Sensuality is banished.

After an interlude in which an impoverished farmer exposes his sufferings at the hands of the ecclesiastics and a pardoner’s trade is ridiculed, Pt II presents the Three Estates summoned before the king, and their misdeeds denounced by John the Common Weal. The Lords and Commons repent, but the clergy remain impenitent, are exposed, and the malefactors brought to the scaffold.

The play, which is extremely long and exists in three different versions, is written in various metres, eight- and six-lined stanzas and couplets. It is, as a dramatic representation, in advance of all contemporary English plays, and gives an interesting picture of the Scottish life of the time.

Pleasures of Hope, The, a poem by T. Campbell published 1799.

In Pt I the poet considers the consolation and inspiration of Hope and by contrast the hard fate of a people deprived of it, described in a passage on the downfall of Poland. In Pt II he reflects on Love in combination with Hope, and on the belief in a future life.

Pleasures of Imagination, The, a philosophical poem by Akenside, published 1744; it was completely rewritten and issued as The Pleasures of the Imagination in 1757.

The poem is based on the philosophical and aesthetic doctrines and distinctions of *Addison, *Shaf tesbury, and *Hutcheson; *Gray found it ‘too much infected with the Hutchesonian jargon’. It examines the primary and secondary pleasures of the imagination, the first connected with the *sublime, the wonderful, and the beautiful, the second with passion and sense. Akenside’s speculations, which many found obscure (and Dr *Johnson ‘loquacious’), range from Platonic theories of form and essence to I. *Newton’s account of the rainbow. Mrs *Barbauld in her 1794 edition gives a sympathetic and useful interpretation.

Pleasures of Memory, The, see Rogers, S.

Pléiade, la, a group of seven French writers of the 16th cent., led by *Ronsard. The name, deriving ultimately from the seven stars of the constellation of the Pleiades, had originally been applied by Alexandrian critics to a group of seven poets from the reign of Ptolemy II.
Ronsard's use of the term dates from 1556. The other members of the group were *du Bellay, Pontus de Tyard, Jean-Antoine de Baïf, Étienne Jodelle, Remi Belleau, and either Peletier du Mans or, according to some authorities, Jean Dorat. The group, inspired by a common interest in the literatures of antiquity and of the Italian Renaissance, sought to promote the claims of the French language to a comparably dignified status as a medium for literary expression, and their aims were set forth in du Bellay's *Deffence et illustra-dation de la langue françoysse of 1549. The Pléiade were largely responsible for the acclimatization of the sonnet form in France, and for the establishment of the alexandrine as the dominant metrical form for much later French poetry. Indeed, the group did much, in ways both formal and intuitive, to create the conditions for the emergence of modern poetry in France.

Pleonasm, a rhetorical figure characterized by the use of superfluous words, as in ‘I saw the wound, I saw it with mine eyes’ (Romeo and Juliet, III. ii. 52) or ‘Th’inaudible and noiseless foot of time’ (All’s Well that Ends Well, V. iii. 41).

Pliable, in Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, one of Christian’s companions, who turns back at the Slough of Despond.

Pliant, Dame, the rich widow in Jonson’s The Alchemist.

PLINY THE ELDER (Gaius Plinius Secundus) (AD 23–79), Roman compiler of a Natural History, which is an encyclopaedic rag-bag of popular science. Widely read in the Middle Ages, it provided a cosmology for Du Bartas’ La Semaine, ou création du monde (1578), which Sylvester’s translation established for the 17th cent. as an English classic. The Natural History was translated by Holland in 1601.

PLINY THE YOUNGER (Gaius Plinius Caecilius Secundus) (AD 62–c.112), Roman letter writer, nephew of the above. The vogue for letter writing in the 1690s led to its central incident the death and resurrection of the Cape. His first volume of poetry, Notes for Poems (1927), was followed by several others, and his Collected Poems appeared in 1973. His poems are largely satirical and urbane, with a sharp eye for character and social setting; many of them, like the title piece of The Dorking Thigh (1945), are modern ballads with a macabre touch. His edition of Kilvert’s Diary appeared in three volumes, 1938–40. He wrote the librettos for several of Britten’s operas, including Gloriana, which is based on L. Strachey’s Elizabeth and Essex.

Plornish, Mr and Mrs, in Dickens’s Little Dorrit, a plasterer and his wife who lived in Bleeding Heart Yard. Mrs Plornish was a notable interpreter of the Italian language.

Plotinus (AD c.203–62), Greek philosopher, the chief exponent of Neoplatonism. His Enneads did much to shape Christian theology in the 4th cent. and also exercised a wide influence on Renaissance thought through Ficino’s translation (1492). They were studied by the Cambridge Platonists. The concept of the Chain of Being which Plotinus elaborated was generally accepted until the end of the 18th cent., as was the principle, which Sidney learnt from Scaliger, that a poet is a second creator, Art reascending to the Ideas from which Nature is derived.

Plough and the Stars, The, see O’Casey.

Plough Monday play, a folk drama of the east Midlands, surviving in versions from Cropwell in Nottinghamshire and from Lincolnshire. Like the St George play, the Plough Monday play probably symbolizes in its central incident the death and resurrection of the year. See E. K. Chambers, The Mediaeval Stage (2 vols, 1903) and The English Folk-Play (1933).

Plowman’s Tale, The, an early 15th-cent. poem in 1,380 lines of eight-line stanzas rhyming on alternate lines, of Wycliffite sympathies. It was (improbably, on stylistic grounds) attributed to Chaucer and included in earlier editions of his works. It was relegated by Skew to the seventh volume of his Works of Geoffrey Chaucer (1897), amongst the ‘Chaucerian and other Pieces’, and its text is still to be found there.

Kate Leslie, an Irish widow of 40, weary of Europe, arrives in Mexico at a turning point in her life. She has had lovers and children, and loved her husband Joachim ‘to the bounds of human love’. The theme of the novel is Kate’s struggle for deliverance, for a mystical rebirth. She meets and is drawn to General...
Don Cipriano Viedma, who introduces her to Don Ramón Carrasco, a mystic and revolutionary leader, reviver of the cult of the ancient god Quetzalcoatl, the plumed serpent. The book contains scenes of violent Aztec ‘blood-lust’ (Cipriano ceremoniously stabbing half-naked prisoners, the drinking of the victims’ blood); Kate, though repelled, is fascinated by the darkness and elemental power of Mexico and its people, and herself enters the cult as the fertility goddess Malintzi and the bride of Cipriano. The novel ends with her acceptance of the subjugation and loss-of-self demanded of her by Cipriano and her hopes for fulfilment. This is the Lawrence of ‘dark gods’ and ‘phallic power’, containing besides much of his usual vivid descriptive writing.

Plurabelle, Anna Livia, a character in Joyce’s *Finnegans Wake, and also the title of a section of the novel published as ‘Work in Progress’ (1928), with an introduction by P. *Colum.

PLUTARCH (AD c.50–c.125), biographer and moralist, the most popular of Greek authors at the time of the Renaissance. His *Parallel Lives exemplified the tradition of biography associated with the Peripatetic school, illustrating the moral character of his subjects through a series of anecdotes. Translated by T. *North (1579), they served as a source-book for Shakespeare’s Roman plays and later for *Otway’s Caius Marius and Addison’s *Cato. They also served as a model for I. *Walton’s Lives (1670). Sir T. *Browne gave them to his sons to read, *Dryden gave a pioneer analysis of their style and structure in his Life of Plutarch (1683), and in America the Founding Fathers turned to them for models of republican virtue.

The Moral Essays provide a compendium of ancient wisdom on a variety of topics: moral philosophy, religious belief, education, health, literary criticism, and social customs. Individual essays were translated into English during the 16th cent., including the probably pseudonymous love stories (by James Sanford, 1567), and material from Plutarch’s Morals can be found in a number of Elizabethan authors: *Elyot, *Painter, *Lyly, Thomas Fenne, *Meres, Sir Thomas Cornwallis the younger, *Chapman. The first complete version in English, by *Holland, appeared in 1603, when its popularity was enhanced by the almost simultaneous publication of *Florio’s translation of *Montaigne, for the latter cites Plutarch on nearly every page. After the middle years of the 17th cent., when they were read by Jeremy *Taylor and *Milton, the popularity of the Moral Essays declined. By then there were more recent examples of the genre with which they could not compete. (See also BIOGRAPHY.)

Plymley, Letters of Peter, by Sydney *Smith, published 1807–8.

The letters purport to be written by Peter Plymley to his brother in the country, the Revd Abraham Plymley (‘a bit of a goose’), in favour of Catholic emancipation. The arguments, both serious and absurd, of the Revd Abraham for maintaining the disabilities of the Catholics are taken one by one, and demolished with sense, wit, and humour; while at the same time the author makes his own Anglican position plain, and ridicules the ‘nonsense’ of the Roman Catholic Church.

POCAHONTAS, or MATOAKA (1595–1617), a Native American princess, the daughter of Powhatan, a chief in Virginia. According to Capt. John *Smith, one of the Virginia colonists who had been taken prisoner by the Native Americans, he was rescued by her when her father was about to kill him in 1607 (she was then only 12). In 1612 she was seized as a hostage by the colonists for the good behaviour of the indigenous tribes (or for the restitution of English captives), became a Christian, was named Rebecca, and married a colonist, John Rolfe. She was brought to England in 1616, where she at first attracted considerable attention, but died neglected. Those who claim descent from her are legion. She is introduced by Jonson in his *The Staple of News, ii. i. George Warrington in Thackeray’s *The Virginians composes a tragedy on her, and she becomes a national symbol in H. *Crane’s The Bridge (1930).

Podsnap, Mr, a character in Dickens’s *Our Mutual Friend, a type of self-satisfaction and self-importance.

POE, Edgar Allan (1809–49), born in Boston, Massachusetts, the son of itinerant actors. He became an orphan in early childhood, and was taken into the household of John Allan, a tobacco exporter of Richmond; he took his foster-father’s name as his middle name from 1824 onwards. He came to England with the Allans (1815–20) and attended Manor House school at Stoke Newington (which he describes, in an imaginative manner but with some accurate detail, in his Doppelgänger story ‘William Wilson’, 1839); he spent a year at the University of Virginia, which he left after incurring debts and gambling to relieve them. He published his first volume of verse, Tamerlane and Other Poems (1827), anonymously and at his own expense; then enlisted in the US army under the name of Edgar A. Perry. He was sent to Sullivan’s Island, South Carolina, which provided settings for ‘The Gold Bug’ (1843) and ‘The Balloon Hoax’ (1844). Allan (from whom he had been estranged) procured his discharge from the army, and he entered West Point in 1830, having published a second volume of verse, Al Aaraaf (1829); he was dishonourably discharged in 1831, for intentional neglect of his duties, and published a third volume of Poems (containing ‘To Helen’) in the same year. He now turned to journalism, living from 1831 to 1835 with a relative, Mrs Clemm, in Baltimore, whose 13-year-old daughter, his cousin Virginia, he married in 1836. He worked as editor on various papers, including the Southern Literary Messenger, and began to publish his stories in magazines. His first collection, Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque (1839, for 1840), contains one of his most famous works, 'The Fall of the House of Usher', a Gothic romance in which the narrator visits the crumbling mansion of his childhood companion, Roderick Usher, to find both Usher and his twin sister Madeline in the last stages of mental and physical weakness; Madeline is buried alive while in a trance, arises, and carries her brother to death 'in her violent and now final death agonies', whereupon the house itself splits asunder and sinks into the tarn. In 1845 his poem 'The Raven', published in a New York paper and then as the title poem of The Raven and Other Poems (1845), brought him fame, but not security; he and his menage continued to suffer poverty and ill health, his wife dying in 1847 and he himself struggling with alcohol addiction and nervous instability. His end was characteristically tragic; he died in Baltimore, five days after having been found semi-conscious and delirious, from alcohol, heart failure, epilepsy, or a combination of these. His posthumous reputation and influence have been great; he was much admired by *Baudelaire, who translated many of his works, and in Britain by *Swinburne, *Wilde, *Rossetti, and *Yeats. *Freudian critics (and Freud himself ) have been intrigued by the *morbid metaphysical speculation of 'The Facts in the Case of M. Walther, Marston and Dekker replied to the attack in *Satiromastix, where the main characters of this play reappear.

Poetic diction, a term used to mean language and usage peculiar to poetry, which came into prominence with *Wordsworth's discussion in his preface (1800) to the Lyrical Ballads, in which he claims to have taken pains to avoid 'what is usually called poetic diction', and asserts that there is and should be no essential difference between the language of prose and the language of metrical composition. Wordsworth thus implies that there should be no such thing as 'language and usage peculiar to poetry', and illustrates his point by attacking a sonnet of *Gray (who had, he said, attempted to widen the gap between poetry and prose); Gray himself had declared (1742, letter to West) that 'the language of the age is never the language of poetry.' Wordsworth's attack on *neo-classicism, archaisms, abstractions, personifications, etc., was both forceful and revolutionary, although it is noticeable that he himself did not always consider it necessary to use 'the real language of men', and his views were later repudiated by *Coleridge; moreover, although poetry became less stilted in its language, its vocabulary remained on the whole distinctive throughout the Romantic and Victorian periods, and few followed Wordsworth in his faith that the language of low and rustic life is plainer, more emphatic, and more philosophical than the 'gaudiness and inane phraseology' which he condemned. *Clare is a rare and isolated example of a poet capable of resisting conventional notions of 'poetic diction' and writing in his own idiom; it was not until the 20th cent. and the advent of *Modernism in the works of *Yeats, T. S. *Eliot, *Pound, and others that another major attempt to enlarge the poetic vocabulary and bring it closer to ordinary speech was made.

Poetics, The, a fragment of a treatise by *Aristotle which greatly influenced the theory of *neo-classicism. It is the source of the principles elaborated by later critics as the *unities, and it also introduced many much-discussed concepts related to the theory of tragedy, such as *mimesis (imitation); *catharsis (purification or purgation); peripetia (reversal); and hamartia (either 'tragic flaw' or, more accurately, 'error of judgement'). Hubris (overweening pride or confidence) was a form of hamartia.

poet laureate, the title given to a poet who receives a stipend as an officer of the royal household, his duty (no longer enforced) being to write court odes, etc. The title was sometimes conferred by certain universities. For a list of poets laureate see Appendix 2. The title of poet laureate in the USA was established in 1985 by the US Senate: the salaried post has been held by, among others, R. *Wilbur (1987), J. *Brodsky (1991), and R. Tambimuttu (1915-83), Anthony Dickins, and Keito write court odes, etc. The title poet laureate, (overweening pride or confidence) was a form of Hubris (overweening pride or confidence) was a form of hamartia.

Poetry Bookshop, see Monro.

Poetry London, a bi-monthly which became the leading poetry magazine of the 1940s. It was conceived by a group of four, Dylan *Thomas, James Meary Tambimuttu (1915–83), Anthony Dickens, and Keidrych Rhys, and edited by Tambimuttu, who had arrived in 1938 from Ceylon, almost penniless, and entered the literary London of Soho and *Fitzrovia. The first issue appeared in Feb. 1939; Tambimuttu produced 15 numbers, and it was subsequently edited by Richard Marsh and Nicholas Moore. It published work by G. *Barker, V. *Watkins, G. *Ewart, H. *Pinter, C. *Tomlinson, D. *Gascoyne, L. *Durrell, and many others.

Poetry Review, see Monro and Poetry Society.

Poetry Society, the, a society founded in 1909 (as the Poetry Recital Society) for the promotion of poetry and the art of speaking verse, and sponsored by many figures in the literary world, including G. *Murray, A. P. *Graves, Sturge *Moore, *Gosse, *Newbolt, Arnold *Bennett, E. V. *Lucas, and A. C. *Benson. Its many activities now include the organization of poetry competitions, workshop sessions, and examinations in and awards for the speaking of verse and prose. Its journal, Poetry Review, was founded in 1912; its first editor was H. E. *Monro.

Poins, in Shakespeare's 1 and 2 *Henry IV, one of Prince Henry's companions.

POLIDORI, John William (1795–1821), physician and literary fellow traveller. The son of an Italian translator, he was educated at Ampleforth before taking an Edinburgh medical degree at the age of 19. In 1816 he was hired by Lord *Byron as personal physician and travelling companion for a few months; and kept a journal of this association, much later published as his Diary (1911). He participated in the famous ghost story competition in June 1816 that gave rise to M. *Shelley's *Frankenstein and eventually to Polidori's only novel, Ernestus Berchtold (1819). Byron's incomplete tale 'Augustus Darvell' provided the basis for Polidori's story 'The Vampyre', written in 1816 and misleadingly published under Byron's name in 1819 by the *New Monthly Magazine. Frequently reprinted and adapted for the stage in the 1820s, 'The Vampyre' laid the foundations of modern vampire fiction, notably in the use of an aristocratic villain, Lord Ruthven, evidently modelled upon Byron himself. Polidori established an unsuccessful medical practice in Norwich, and committed suicide in 1821.

POLITIAN, see Poliziano.

Political Register (1802–35), a weekly newspaper founded by *Cobbett. It began as a Tory paper but by 1809 was thoroughly Radical. He continued to issue it even when committed to prison for an article condemning military flogging. His new version of the paper produced in 1816 at 2d. reached a remarkable circulation of 40,000–50,000 a week. In 1821 *Rural Rides began to appear serially. Cobbett continued the paper until his death.

Politic Would-be, Sir and Lady, the foolish traveller and his loquacious wife in Jonson's *Volpone.

Polixenes, the king of Bohemia in Shakespeare's *The Winter's Tale.

POLIZIANO (in English Politian), Angelo (1454–94), the name assumed from his birthplace, Montepulciano, by Angelo Ambrogini, Italian humanist and friend of Lorenzo the Magnificent, in whose household in Florence he lived as tutor and scholar. In this period he combined philological studies with the composition of poetry in Latin and Italian. In 1479 he moved to Mantua, where he wrote Orfeo, the first pastoral drama in Italian. The following year he returned to the chair of Greek and Latin at the University of Florence. The two volumes of editorial and philological studies that he published at this period established him as the greatest textual scholar of his time, and his Greek epigrams showed him to be the first Italian humanist with the fluency in Greek requisite for the composition of poetry of real quality. *Linacre was one of his students, and G. *Chapman translated and imitated his verse.

POLLARD, A[lfred] W[illiam] (1859–1944), honorary secretary of the Bibliographical Society, keeper of the Department of Printed Books at the British Museum, 1919–24. He was an authority on Chaucer and Shakespeare, edited several volumes of Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales (1886–7) and the ‘Globe’ Chaucer (1898), and published other pioneering works which influenced the study of medieval literature. His important contributions to Shakespearian criticism included Shakespeare’s Folios and Quartos 1594–1685 (1909) and Shakespeare’s Fight with the Pirates (1917). He was largely responsible for the completion of the Short-Title Catalogue of Books Printed in England, Scotland and Ireland . . . 1475–1640 (1926).

Pollente, in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (v. ii), the ‘cruell Sarazin’ who holds a bridge and despoils those who pass over it, the father of *Munera. He is slain by Sir Artegall.

Polly, a musical play by J. Gay, published 1729, the sequel to The Beggar’s Opera. Its performance on stage was prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain.

Macheath has been transported to the West Indies, and has escaped from the plantation; he is disguised as Morano, chief of the pirates. Polly comes to seek him, but is trapped in the household of an amorous planter, whose advances she escapes owing to an attack by the pirates. Disguised as a man, she joins the loyal Indians, helps to beat off the attack, takes Morano prisoner, discovers his identity too late to save him from execution, and marries an Indian prince. Polly brought Gay nearly £1,200 in subscriptions.

POLO, Marco (1254–1324), a member of a patrician family of Venice, who accompanied his father and uncle in 1271 on an embassy from the pope to Kublai, grand khan of Tartary. They travelled overland to China, where they were well received by the emperor. After 17 years in the territories of the grand khan, the Polos obtained permission to return home, which they did by sea to the Persian Gulf, eventually reaching Venice after an absence of 24 years. Marco Polo’s account of his travels was written while imprisoned by the Genoese, by whom he had been captured in a sea-fight with the Venetians. The original text appears to have been in French, but it was widely read in Latin and in various vernacular translations. The existence of other and wilder romances of Eastern travel (such as Mandeville, etc.) tended to make Polo ‘suspect’, at least in places; but there is no reason for any such suspicion. The work was Englished by John Frampton in 1579; but the first serious English translation was by W. Marsden early in the 19th cent.

Polonius, the lord chamberlain, father of *Ophelia and Laertes in Shakespeare’s Hamlet. Dr *Johnson described him as ‘a man bred in courts, exercised in business, stored with observation, confident of his knowledge, proud of his eloquence, and declining into dotage’.

Polydore, (1) in Shakespeare’s Cymbeline, the name borne by Guiderius while in the Welsh forest; (2) a character in Otway’s The Orphan; (3) a character in J. Fletcher’s The Mad Lover.

POLYDORE VERGIL, see Vergil, P.

Polyglot Bible, the, edited in 1653–7 by Brian Walton (?1600–61), bishop of Chester, with the help of many scholars. It contains various oriental texts of the Bible with Latin translations, and a critical apparatus.

Polychymnia, a poem by *Peele written in 1590 commemorating the retirement of Sir H. *Lee from the office of queen’s champion, and describing the ceremonies that took place on this occasion. It contains at the end the beautiful song ‘His Golden lockes, ’Time hath to Silver turn’d’ made widely known by Thackeray’s quotation of part of it in The Newcomes, ch. 76.

Poly-Olbion, The (this is the spelling of the 1st edn), the most ambitious work of *Drayton. It was written between 1598 and 1622 and consists of 30 ‘Songs’ each of 300–500 lines, in hexameter couplets, in which the author endeavours to awaken his readers to the beauties and glories of their country.

Travelling from the south-west to Chester, down through the Midlands to London, up the eastern counties to Lincoln, and then through Lancashire and Yorkshire to Northumberland and Westmorland, he describes, or at least enumerates, the principal topographical features of the country, but chiefly the rivers and rivulets, interspersing in the appropriate places, legends, fragments of history, catalogues of British saints and hermits, of great discoverers, of birds, fishes, and plants with their properties. The first part, published 1612–13, was annotated by Selden. The word ‘poly-olbion’ (from the Greek) means ‘having many blessings’.

polypoton is the repetition of the same word or root with varying grammatical inflections, as in ‘And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest’ (Shelley, or ‘Love is an irresistible desire to be irresistibly desired’ (Robert Frost).

polysyndeton (from Greek, ‘using many connectives’) is the repetition of conjunctions in close succession for rhetorical effect, as in 'Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea' (Shakespeare, Sonnet 65).

POMFRET, John (1667–1702), a Bedfordshire vicar remembered for his poem The Choice (1700), derived from Horace, Satire 6, which describes the pleasures of a quiet country estate where the author 'might live genteelly, but not great'. It enjoyed considerable success, and secured its author inclusion in Johnson's Lives of the English Poets, where Pomfret's choice was described as 'such a state as affords plenty and tranquillity, without exclusion of intellectual pleasures'.

Pompey the Great, His Faire Corneliae Tragedie, see Cornelia.

Pompey the Little, The History of, see Coventry, F.

PONSONBY, Sarah, see Llangollen, The Ladies of.

PONTOPPIDAN, Erik (1698–1764), a Danish author and bishop of Bergen in Norway. His principal works are the Gesta et Vestigia Danorum extra Daniam (1740), and a Natural History of Norway (1755), frequently mentioned on account of its description of the kraken.

POOLE, John (?1786–1872), a dramatist of great success, who also produced poems and essays and wrote for many years for the New Monthly Magazine. His comedies and farces were produced at Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and the Haymarket, with C. *Kemble and other well-known actors. There were few years between 1813 and 1829 when no play of his was ponded with him for many years. Another of his successes obtained him a state pension of £100 p.a.

POOLE, Thomas (1765–1837), farmer and tanner, born at Nether Stowey; he became a close friend of *Coleridge and *Wordsworth, and assisted them both in finding homes to rent in his neighbourhood in 1796–7. Coleridge wrote 'This lime tree bower my prison' in Poole's garden, and Sara Coleridge corresponded with him for many years. Another of his friends was Sir H. *Davy. He was a man of progressive and generous spirit; Wordsworth said of him, 'he felt for all men as his brothers.'

Poor Tom, a name assumed by one who feigns madness in the Fraternitie of Vacabondes, and by *Edgar in Shakespeare's King Lear (II. iii).

Pooter, the archetypally suburban protagonist of The Diary of a Nobody by G. and W. Grossmith.

POPE, Alexander (1688–1744), the son of a Roman Catholic linen draper of London. His health was ruined and his growth stunted by a severe illness at the age of 12 (probably Pott's disease, a tubercular affection of the spine). He lived with his parents at Binfield in Windsor Forest and was largely self-educated. He showed his precocious metrical skill in his 'Pastorals' written, according to himself, when he was 16, and published in Tonson's Miscellanies (vol. vi) in 1709. (For Pope's quarrel with Ambrose Philips on this subject see under Philips, A.) He became intimately with *Wycherley, who introduced him to London life. His Essay on Criticism (1711) made him known to *Addison's circle, and his Messiah was published in the Spectator in 1712. The Rape of the Lock appeared in Lintot's Miscellanies in the same year and was republished, enlarged, in 1714. His Ode for Music on St Cecilia's Day (1713), one of his rare attempts at lyric, shows that his gifts did not lie in this direction. In 1713 he also published Windsor Forest, which appealed to the Tories by its references to the Peace of Utrecht, and won him the friendship of *Swift. He drifted away from Addison's 'little senate' and became a member of the *Scriblerus Club, an association that included Swift, *Gay, *Arbuthnot, and others. He issued in 1715 the first volume of his translation in heroic couplets of Homer's Iliad. This work, completed in 1720, is more *Augustan than Homeric in spirit and diction, but has nevertheless been much admired; *Coleridge thought it an 'astonishing product of matchless talent and ingenuity'. It was supplemented in 1725–6 by a translation of the *Odyssey, in which he was assisted by William Broome and Elijah Fenton. The two translations brought him financial independence. He moved in 1718 with his mother to Twickenham, where he spent the rest of his life, devoting much time to his garden and grotto; he was keenly interested in *landscape gardening and committed to the principle 'Consult the Genius of the Place in all'.

In 1717 had appeared a collection of his works containing two poems dealing, alone among his works, with the passion of love. They are Verses to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady, an elegy on a fictitious lady who had killed herself through hopeless love, and Eloisa to Abelard, in which Eloisa describes her inner conflicts after the loss of her lover. About this time he became strongly attached to Martha *Blount, with whom his friendship continued throughout his life, and to Lady M. W. *Montagu, whom in later years he assailed with bitterness; Lady Mary left for Turkey in July 1716 and Pope sent her 'Eloisa to Abelard' with a letter suggesting that he was passionately grieved by her absence.

Pope assisted Gay in writing the comedy Three Hours after Marriage (1717), but made no other attempt at drama. In 1723, four years after Addison's death, appeared (in a miscellany called Cytherea) Pope's portrait of *Atticus, a satire on Addison written in 1715. An extended version appeared as 'A Fragment of a Satire' in a 1727 volume of Miscellaneies (by Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, and Gay), and took its final form in An Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot (1735). In the same Miscellaneies volume Pope published his prose treatise *Peri Bathous, or The Art of Sinking in Poetry, ridiculing among others Ambrose Philips, *Theobald, and J.
In 1725 Pope published an edition of Shakespeare, the errors in which were pointed out in a pamphlet by Theobald, Shakespeare Restored (1726). This led to Pope's selection of Theobald as hero of his Dunciad, a satire on Dullness in three books, on which he had been at work for some time; the first volume appeared anonymously in 1728. Swift, who spent some months with Pope in Twickenham in 1726, provided much encouragement for this work, of which a further enlarged edition was published in 1729. An additional book, The New Dunciad, was published in 1742, prompted this time, it appears, by Warburton. The complete Dunciad in four books, in which C. *Cibber replaces Theobald as hero, appeared in 1743. Influenced in part by the philosophy of his friend Bolingbroke, Pope published a series of moral and philosophical poems, Essay on Man (1733–4), consisting of four Epistles; and Moral Essays (1731–5), four in number: Of the Knowledge and Characters of Men, Of the Characters of Women, and two on the subject Of the Use of Riches. A fifth epistle was added, addressed to Addison, occasioned by his dialogue on medals. This was originally written in Addison’s lifetime, c.1716. In 1733 Pope published the first of his miscellaneous satires, Imitations of Horace, entitled ‘Satire I,’ a paraphrase of the first satire of the second book of Horace, in the form of a dialogue between the poet and William Fortescue, the lawyer. In it Pope defends himself against the charge of Malignity, and professes to be inspired only by love of virtue. He followed this up with his Imitations of Horace’s Satires 2.2 and 1.2 (‘Sober Advice from Horace’), in 1734, and of Epistles 1.6; 2.2; 2.1; and 1.1, in 1737. Horace’s Epistle 1.7 and the latter part of Satire 2.6, ‘imitated in the manner of Dr Swift,’ appeared in 1738. The year 1735 saw the appearance of the Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot, the prologue to the above Satires, one of Pope’s most brilliant pieces of irony and inventiveness, mingled with autobiography. It contains the famous portraits of Addison (ll. 193–214) and Lord Hervey, and lashes his minor critics, Dennis, Cibber, Curll, Theobald, etc. In 1738 appeared One Thousand Seven Hundred and Thirty Eight, two satirical dialogues. These satires, and the ‘Satires (2 and 4) of Dr Donne Versified’ (1735), with the New Dunciad, closed his literary career.

He was partly occupied during his later years with the publication of his earlier correspondence, which he edited and amended in such a manner as to misrepresent the literary history of the time. He also employed discreditable artifices to make it appear that it was published against his wish. Thus he procured the publication by Curll of his ‘Literary Correspondence’ in 1735, and then endeavoured to disavow him.

With the growth of Romanticism Pope’s poetry was increasingly seen as artificial; Coleridge commented that Pope’s thoughts were ‘translated into the language of poetry,’ *Hazlitt called him ‘the poet not of nature but of art,’ and W. L. *Bowles compared his work to ‘a game of cards’; *Byron, however, was highly laudatory: ‘Pope’s pure strain I sought the rapt soul to charm, nor sought in vain.’ M. *Arnold’s famous comment, ‘Dryden and Pope are not classics of our poetry, they are classics of our prose’ (Essays in Criticism, 1880), summed up much 19th-cent. opinion, and it was not until *Leavis and *Empson that a serious attempt was made to rediscover Pope’s richness, variety, and complexity.

Minor works that deserve mention are: Verse: the Epistles ‘To a Young Lady [Miss Blount] with the Works of Voiture’ (1712), to the same ‘On her Leaving the Town after the Coronation’ (1717); ‘To Mr Jervas with Dryden’s Translation of Frensy’s Art of Painting’ (1716) and ‘To Robert, Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer’ (1721); ‘Vertumnus and Pomona,’ ‘Sappho to Phoan,’ and ‘The Fable of Dryope’, translations from Ovid (1712); ‘*January and May’, ‘The Wife of Bath, her Prologue’, and The Temple of Fame, from Chaucer (1709, 1714, 1715).

Prose: The Narrative of Dr Robert Norris (1713), a satirical attack on Dennis; A Full and True Account of a Horrid and Barbarous Revenge by Poison, on . . . Mr Edmund Curll (1716), an attack on Curll (to whom he had secretly administered an emetic).

Popish Plot, a plot fabricated in 1678 by Titus Oates. He deposed at the end of September before the Middlesex magistrate Sir Edmond Berry Godfrey that it was intended to murder Charles II, place James on the throne, and suppress Protestantism. Godfrey disappeared on 12 Oct. and was found murdered on 17 Oct. The existence of the plot was widely believed and great excitement prevailed. Many persons, especially Catholics, were falsely accused and executed. These events occasioned John Caryll’s poem Naboth’s Vineyard (1679) which was an important predecessor of Absalom and Achitophel and thus contributed to the efflorescence of the mock-biblical as a satirical mode.

POPPER, Sir Karl Raimund (1902–94), Austrian philosopher of science, born in Vienna, and originally connected with the Vienna circle, the source of logical positivism. He left Vienna for New Zealand on Hitler’s rise to power, and came to England in 1946, where, in 1949, he was appointed professor of logic and scientific method at the London School of Economics. Popper asserted that a statement, if it is to count as scientific rather than merely metaphysical, must be falsifiable:
such that the conditions that would make it false are clearly known. His philosophy of science claimed to solve the problem of induction: the problem of extrapolating from past to future, or, more precisely, from limited evidence to a general conclusion. This work appealed greatly to many scientists. He also contributed to political philosophy and a defence of free will and the 'self-conscious mind'. His works include The Logic of Scientific Discovery (Logik der Forschung, 1934); The Open Society and Its Enemies (1945), and The Self and Its Brain (1977, with John C. Eccles).

POPPLE, William (1701–64), dramatist, *theatre critic, and friend of A. *Hill, with whom he edited the Prompter (1734–6), a bi-weekly theatrical periodical (selection ed. W. Appleton and K. A. Burnim, 1966). He wrote two comedies, The Lady's Revenge (1734) and The Double Deceit: or A Cure for Jealousy (1735), in which two young men, intended to marry two heiresses, conspire to avoid their fate by exchanging places with their valets. The ladies, apprised of the trick, exchange places with their maids, the pseudo-valets fall in love with the pseudo-maids, and all ends well.

PORSON, Richard (1759–1808), a distinguished classical scholar, who was elected Regius professor of Greek at Cambridge in 1792. He edited four plays of *Euripides (most notably Hecuba), and advanced Greek scholarship by his elucidation of Greek idiom and usage, by his study of Greek metres, and by his emendation of texts. He is also remembered for various witticisms and for contributions to the *Gentleman's Magazine, in which appeared in 1787 letters ironically praising *Hawkins's Life of Johnson and in 1788–9 his Letters to Mr Archdeacon Travis (repr. separately 1790) on the authenticity of the contentious proof text of the Trinity known as the J ohannine Comma (1 John 5:7, 'For there are three that bear record in heaven.'). There is a life by M. L. Clarke (1937).

Porter, in Shakespeare's *Macbeth; he lets *Macduff and Lennox into Macbeth's castle (ii. iii), and is the subject of *De Quincey's essay 'On the Knocking at the Gate'.

PORTER, Anna Maria (1780–1832), poet and novelist, whose martial tale of the French Revolution, The Hungarian Brothers (1807), was a considerable success and went into several editions. She published Don Sebastian in 1809, and several other novels, as well as ballads and poems.

PORTER, Endymion (1587–1649), groom of the bedchamber to Charles I, and the friend and patron of painters and poets. He was painted by *Van Dyck, and *Jonson, *Herrick, *D'Avenant, and *Dekker, among others, celebrated him in verse. He sat in the Long Parliament but was expelled, lived abroad in poverty, and compounded with the Parliament for a small fine in 1649.

PORTER, Jane (1776–1850), sister of A. M. *Porter. She published in 1803 Thaddeus of Warsaw, which was immensely successful and led to friendship with one of its heroes, the Polish General Kosciusko: it describes the adventures of a young Polish nobleman who accompanies his grandfather to join the army of King Stanislas against the invading Russians. In 1810 she published The Scottish Chiefs, a story of William Wallace, which ends with the battle of Bannockburn. This was also successful, and was translated into German and Russian: it is of interest as a precursor of the *historical fiction of Sir W. *Scott. The Pastor's Fireside (1815) is a story of the later Stuarts. Her tragedy Switzerland, produced in 1819 with *Kean and C. *Kemble, was a disastrous failure. Among several other volumes she produced Sir Edward Seaward's Narrative, on Caribbean exploration, a work which purported to be a genuine diary but which was almost certainly largely fictitious.

PORTER, Katherine Anne (1890–1980), Texan-born short story writer and novelist whose collections of short stories include Flowering Judas (1930), Pale Horse, Pale Rider (1939), and The Leaning Tower (1944). Her novel Ship of Fools (1962) is a heavily allegorical treatment of a voyage from Mexico to Germany on the eve of Hitler's rise to power.

PORTER, Peter Neville Frederick (1929– ), poet, born and educated in Brisbane, where he worked as a journalist before coming to England in 1951. Since then he has worked as clerk, bookseller, and as copywriter in an advertising agency (in the company of G. *Ewart, P. *Redgrove, and other poets), before becoming a full-time writer, broadcaster, and critic in 1968. He was briefly associated with the *Group in the 1960s, and the work in his early collections (Once Bitten, Twice Bitten, 1961; Poems, Ancient and Modern, 1964; The Last of England, 1970) provides a sharply satiric portrait of London in the 'swinging sixties', with a gallery of fops, publishers, concrete poets, filmmakers, etc. In the 1970s, his work became more meditative, complex, and allusive, though no less colloquial and urbane; its learned references to a vast range of subjects, from Italian baroque to classical mythology, opera, and German Romanticism, add both richness and obscurity. His technical command of complex stanza forms, sometimes used parodically, is striking. The Cost of Seriousness (1978) and English Subtitles (1981) introduce a new and sombre exploration of the poet's conflicting responsibilities to his art and to others. After Martial (1972) is a volume of translations. Later volumes include Fast Forward (1984), The Automatic Oracle (1987), Possible Worlds (1989), The Chair of Babel (1992), A Porter Selected (1989), Millennial Fables (1994), and Collected Poems 1961–1999 (2 vols, 1999). A critical biography by Bruce Bennett, Spirit in Exile, appeared in 1991.
Portia, (1) the heroine of Shakespeare's *The Merchant of Venice; (2) in his *Julius Caesar, the wife of Brutus.

Portrait of a Lady, The, a novel by H. *James, published 1881.

This is one of the best of *James’s early works, in which he presents various types of American character transplanted into a European environment. The story centres on Isabel Archer, the 'Lady', an attractive American girl. Around her we have the placid old American banker, Mr Touchett; his hard repellent wife; his ugly invalid, witty, charming son Ralph, whom England has thoroughly assimilated; and the outspoken, brilliant, indomitably American journalist Henrietta Stackpole. Isabel refuses the offer of marriage of a typical English peer, the excellent Lord Warburton, and of a bulldog-like New Englander, Caspar Goodwood, to fall a victim, under the influence of the slightly sinister Madame Merle (another cosmopolitan American), to a worthless and spiteful dilettante, Gilbert Osmond, who marries her for her fortune and ruins her life; but to whom she remains loyal in spite of her realization of his vileness.

Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog (1940), a collection of stories by Dylan *Thomas.

Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, A, an autobiographical novel by J. *Joyce, first published in the *Egoist, 1914–15. It describes the development of Stephen Dedalus (who reappears in *Ulysses in a slightly different incarnation) from his early boyhood, through bullying at school and an adolescent crisis of faith inspired partly by the famous 'hellfire sermon' preached by the Jesuit Father Arnall (ch. 3) and partly by the guilt of his own precocious sexual adventures, to student days and a gradual sense of his own destiny as poet, patriot, and unbelver, who paradoxically must leave his own land in order to 'encounter... the reality of experience and to forge in the smithy of my soul the uncreated conscience of my race'. Though not as innovative as the later work (its experimentation lies principally in its prose style changing as the novel progresses to mirror the growth and development of Stephen’s mind), the novel foreshadows many of the themes and verbal complexities of Ulysses.

positivist philosophy, see Comte.

post-colonial literature, see overleaf.

Posthumus Leonatus, the hero of Shakespeare’s Cymbeline and husband of *Imogen, 'The fit and apt construction’ of his name, as the Soothsayer partially explains, is that he was the last-born of his father Sicilius Leonatus and his mother, who died in labour.

postmodernism, the term applied by some commentators since the early 1980s to the ensemble of cultural features characteristic of Western societies in the aftermath of artistic *Modernism. In this view, ‘post-modernity’ asserts itself from about 1956 with the exhaustion of the high Modernist project, reflected in the work of S. Beckett among others, and the huge cultural impact of television and popular music. The term has been applied as a ‘period’ label more confidently by architectural historians than by students of literature, and many disputants maintain that artistic or literary works described as ‘postmodernist’ are really continuations of the Modernist tradition. Nevertheless, some general literary features of the period have been identified as tendencies to parody, pastiche, scepticism, irony, fatalism, the mixing of ‘high’ and ‘low’ cultural allusions, and an indifference to the redemptive mission of Art as conceived by the Modernist pioneers. Postmodernism thus favours random play rather than purposeful action, surface rather than depth. The kinds of literary work that have been described as postmodernist include the Theatre of the Absurd and some experimental poetry. Most commonly, though, it is prose fiction that is held to exemplify the postmodernist mood or style, notably in works by American novelists such as V. *Nabokov, J. *Barth, T. *Pynchon, and K. *Vonnegut, and by the British authors J. *Fowles, A. *Carter, S. *Rushdie, J. *Barnes, P. *Ackroyd, and J. *Winterson. Outside the English-speaking world, the fictions of J. L. *Borges and the later work of I. *Calvino show similar tendencies. Distinctive features of this school include switching between orders of reality and fantasy (see magic realism), resort to *metafiction, and the playful undermining of supposedly objective kinds of knowledge such as biography and history.

Pott, Mr, in Dickens’s Pickwick Papers, the editor of the ‘Eatanswill Gazette’.

POTTER, (Helen) Beatrix (1866—1943), born in Kensington to wealthy parents and never sent to school. She grew up a lonely child. She taught herself to draw and paint small natural objects and as a young woman did serious work dissecting, drawing, and classifying fungi. She invented a cipher so elaborate that the half-million words she wrote in it were not deciphered until Leslie Linder broke the code and published The Journal of Beatrix Potter (1966). In a letter to the son of her former governess in 1893 she began The Tale of Peter Rabbit, and other books began in the same way. Copied out and more fully illustrated, Peter Rabbit was published at her own expense in 1901 and The Tailor of Gloucester in 1902. Warne then took over publication and in 1903 Squirrel Nutkin was her first great success. Her farm at Sawrey in the Lake District, which she bought in 1905, became the background for six of her books. In 1913 she married William Heelis, a Lakeland solicitor, and for the rest of her life devoted herself almost entirely to her farms and the new National-Trust. Johnny Town-Mouse (1918) was the last of her books in the old style; those later written for the USA, such as The Fairy Caravan (1928), are of little interest. A biography by Margaret Lane appeared in 1968 (rev. edn 1985); see also Beatrix Potter (rev. edn 1996) by Judy Taylor.

POUTTER, Dennis Christopher George (1935–94), playwright, born in the Forest of Dean, the son of a miner. He was educated at New College, Oxford, where he became involved in left-wing politics, and subsequently worked as journalist and critic; The Glittering Coffin (1960) is an analysis of the Labour Party and the political climate of the time. He wrote fiction, stage plays, screenplays, and adapted works for television but is best known for his own television plays, which show an original and inventive use of the medium. These include two plays dealing with the career of an aspiring working-class, Oxford-educated politician, Vote, Vote, Vote for Nigel Barton (1965) and Stand up, Nigel Barton (1965), published together in 1968; Pennies from Heaven, a six-part serial (1978, pub. 1981); and Blue Remembered Hills (1979, a tragic evocation of childhood). Brimstone and Treacle (1978) was first performed on stage after being banned for television performance. Potter’s experience of psoriatic arthropathy, a debilitating condition affecting skin and joints, is central to his six-part serial The Singing Detective (1986), widely held to be his finest work: this is a multi-layered narrative, moving between a moody and lyrical world of the protagonist, a nightmarish thriller, Po, via a transliteration. Pound was thus moving towards the rich, grandly allusive, multicultural world of the Cantos, his most ambitious achievement; the first three Cantos appeared in 1917 in *Poetry. In 1920 Pound left London for Paris with his English wife Dorothy Shakespear, where he lived until 1924, finding a new literary scene figuring Gertrude Stein, *Hemingway, etc.; in 1925 he settled permanently in Rapallo, where he continued to work on the Cantos, which appeared intermittently over the next decades until the appearance of the final Drafts and Fragments of Cantos CX to CXVII (1970).

In Italy Pound became increasingly preoccupied with economics, embraced Social Credit theories, and was persuaded that ‘Usura’, or credit capitalism, lay at the root of all social and spiritual evils. (See Canto XLV for his violent attack on usury.) His own interpretations of these theories led him into anti-Semitism and at least partial support for Mussolini’s social programme. During the Second World War he broadcast over Italian radio: in 1945 he was arrested at Genoa, then sent to a US Army Disciplinary Training Centre near Pisa, a period which produced the much-admired Pisan Cantos (1948). He was then moved to Washington, found unfit to plead, and confined to a mental

Post-colonial literature consists of a body of writing emanating from Europe’s former colonies which addresses questions of history, identity, ethnicity, gender, and language. The term should be used loosely and hesitantly, for it is replete with contradictions and conundrums. What, for instance, is the difference, if any, between imperialism and colonialism? Were not the forms of colonial rule and the processes of decolonization too varied to admit of a single definition? Is the literature of the United States of America to be included in such a body? Why does the once favoured term ‘Commonwealth literature’ no longer seem appropriate? Is it that it contains too many implied assumptions of a multicultural community in which each country is working towards a sense of shared enterprise and common purpose? Did empire end with Indian independence in 1947, or in 1956 with Suez, or was it later, when many of the African countries gained their independence, or in 1970 or 1973 when Fiji and the Bahamas respectively were granted theirs?

Such questions abound, but the term ‘post-colonial literature’ is to date the most convenient way of embracing the powerful and diverse body of literary responses to the challenges presented by decolonization and the transitions to independence and post-independence in a wide variety of political and cultural contexts.

Of course criticism of empire and imperial practices is not a 20th-cent. phenomenon, but originated among the colonists themselves. Recusants such as Bartolomé de las Casas and the Dominican Antonio Montesinos were busy challenging the savage practices which were to depopulate vast swathes of the Caribbean of their indigenous inhabitants. When in 1511 Montesinos asked whether the Indians were not themselves men, his intervention was greeted by the almost unanimous demand from his fellow colonists that he be forced to recant and be repatriated to Spain. Any opposition from the indigenous population was met with more summary treatment.

Out of the circumstances of this first colonial encounter was born an argument which has continued to be rehearsed right up to the present day. The dispute has been conducted around the contrast between natural and artificial societies: on one side, Montaigne argued that primitive peoples were more virtuous by reason of their uncorrupted existence in nature. As he put it in his famous essay ‘Of Cannibals’, ‘there is no reason, art should gaine the point of honour of our great and puissant mother nature’. On the other side, the social achievement of art and its superiority over nature was stressed:

not all That beare the name of men.

. . . Are for to be accounted men: but such as under awe Of reasons rule continually doo live in vertues law,
And that the rest doo differ nought from beast, but rather be Much worse than beasts, because they do not abase their owne degree.

The terms of the debate, then, were already well established by the time Shakespeare wrote The Tempest, in which there emerges the recognizable paradigm of the native who is first amicable, only later to become duplicitous and require the correcting hand of the ‘cultivated’ man. This theme was to continue, with few exceptions, to the fiction of the present day through *Robinson Crusoe and the writings of *Kipling, who, in conceding the passing of the British Empire, could exhort the United States of America to take up the moral duty of the ‘White Man’s Burden’ and bring the backward races to maturity. *Heart of Darkness (1899) marks a key moment in colonial literature, Joseph *Conrad questioning the certainties about racial superiority which underpinned white rule. Simple greed is what motivates empire, Conrad suggests, the quest for money making Europeans more barbarous than the supposed black cannibals they governed and worked to death.

Post-colonial authors have advanced Conrad’s perspectives, contesting European versions of the colonial experience: ‘the Empire writes back’, as Salman *Rushdie puts it. The forms of retaliation are manifold. Post-colonial literature, in seeking to awaken political and cultural nationalism, has dwelt on popular revolts against colonial rule, exposing the lie of the passive native. Writers like the Trinidadian C. L. R. *James have brought to the fore neglected black heroes like *Toussaint L’Ouverture, who led the greatest slave revolt in history, defeating French, Spanish, and British military forces to set up Haiti, the first free black republic in the West. History, however, is not an epic narrative of kings and rebels, but a record of the day-to-day existence of the common people; the cane-cutters for instance, whose labour produced the sugar which not only boosted the profits of imperial commerce but, in the 18th cent., created a taste among the gentry for taking sweetened tea. By giving voice and character to cane-cutters and the like, post-colonial writers point to the people who truly mattered to history but who, for political and related reasons, were written out. The world-view of such ‘lowly’ people, expressed in their myths and legends, is also given space, writers like the Guianese Wilson *Harris arguing that Amerindian mythology reveals values and perspectives as complex and mysterious as any originating from the Graeco-Roman or Judaeo-Christian traditions. There is a corresponding reappraisal of oral expression, the riddles and proverbs and songs and stories handed down over generations and shared by the whole community. These forms of orality are often spurned by literary academics as lesser forms of ‘literature’ and relegated to the dubious category by the whole community. These forms of orality are mythologies are also given space, writers like the such ‘lowly’ people, expressed in their myths and legends, is also given space, writers like the Nigerian writer Chinweizu reminds us, the African folk tale is a product of ancient traditions of eloquence and rhetoric, created for courtship or wedding ceremonies, or ceremonies marking birth and death. The folk tale is therefore an ‘integral part of the fabric of personal and social life’, often with profound religious significance. To ignore it is to ignore the cultural history of a nation.

Western power has been most seriously challenged by being placed in a new historical perspective. In 1992, despite the almost deafening propaganda organized by the government of the USA, the 500th anniversary celebrations of Columbus’s arrival in the Americas were significantly contested by a vast array of post-colonial writing which repudiated the very idea that the Americas were ‘discovered’ or ‘brought into discursive being’ by the appearance of European adventurers. Amongst many other examples, they pointed out that, at the height of the Aztec civilization, the capital Tenochtitlan was five times larger than Madrid at the time of the Spanish conquest, while, on the other side of the world, Akbar, the Mughal emperor of India, had, at the same time that Elizabeth I allowed the founding of the East India Company, established dominion over a much larger trading area than his English contemporary.

Repositioning the co-ordinates of history has also involved coming to terms with the language of expression itself. Language is inextricably bound up with culture and identity, and as the colonizers attempted, with varying degrees of success, to impose the English language on subject peoples, the response from the formerly colonized has ranged from the outright rejection of English as a medium through which to exercise their art to the appropriation of it with subversive intent. After first using English as the medium for his novel, the Kenyan writer Ngugi wa *Thiong’o finally decided to reject it. For him ‘language is at the heart of the two contending forces in the Africa of the 20th century’ and is crucial to maintaining control over one’s own culture and mental universe. For others, such as the Nigerian writer Chinua *Achebe, English has been a means of unifying peoples across continents and of reaching a wider audience than would have been possible in their own mother tongues. However, whether or not the English language is capable of supplying the rhythms and cadences necessary to dramatize foreign landscapes, this has not prevented writers from doing ‘unheard of things with it’; certainly Caribanists like Derek *Walcott and V. S. *Naipaul have used techniques such as switching in and out of standard English and local Creoles to emphasize that the post-Columbian world is irrevocably multicultural and hybridized. The debate continues to rage, and, although the view is by no means universally shared, there are now many people in all parts of the world who see English as having become detached from Britain or Britishness. They claim the language as their own property, for they have moulded and refashioned it to make it bear the weight of their own experience.

Another important progression has been the acknowledgement and reappearance of women’s experience after being hidden from the histories of colonial societies. Many of the fixed representations of non-Western women have been powerfully rejected in a host of contemporary writings, most of which in their different ways refute imaginings deeply rooted in Western narrations and their subsequent over-simplistic depictions. The 1997 winner of the *Booker Prize, Arundhati Roi, is only the latest to join a distinguished list of women writers which already includes Jean *Rhys, Anita *Desai, Buchi *Emecheta, Olive *Senior, Nadine *Gordimer, and Grace *Nichols. Such writers have placed women at the centre of history, as makers and agents of history, not silent witnesses to it.

Whatever the irony contained in the fact that very many post-colonial writers choose both to write in English, the language of their former colonizers, and in the literary forms, such as the novel, developed in European societies, there is no doubt that the new literatures in English constitute a body of exciting and dynamic texts capable at once of forcing a reassessment of the traditional canon and of providing a vigorous alternative to what are often regarded as rather defensive and introspective English texts.
institution; he was released in 1958 and returned to Italy, where he died.

Inevitably, Pound’s literary reputation was obscured by the tragedy of his last decades, and also by the difficulty of the work itself, which resides principally in its astonishingly wide range of reference and assimilation of cultures; Hugh Selwyn Mauberley, despite the advocacy of Eliot and *Leavis (who described it as ‘the summit of Mr Pound’s superbly supple and varied art’), never quite reached the ‘popular classic’ status of The Waste Land, and the Cantos remain formidable both in style and content. As Eliot said, Pound suffers from being seen as ‘objectionably modern’ and ‘objectionably antiquarian’ at the same time. Nevertheless, he is widely accepted both as a great master of traditional verse forms and as the man who regenerated the poetic idiom of his day.

POUSSIN, Nicolas (1593/4–1665), French painter, who worked mainly in Rome. His early works are romantic treatments of subjects from *Ovid and *Tasso; later he developed an austere, classically inspired style. In the early 17th cent. Poussin was deeply admired by Englishmen, and many of his greatest works were in English collections. James *Thomson’s descriptions of landscapes are indebted to Poussin and, in the second half of the century, poets, travellers, and landscape gardeners frequently contrasted the nobility of Poussin’s landscapes with the wildness of *Rosa and the beauty of *Claude. In the late 17th cent. Poussin’s most severe works were most admired. *Hazlitt wrote many passionate descriptions of his painting; *Keats was inspired by the lyrical Ovidian pictures; *Ruskin described the Triumph of Flora (Paris, Louvre) as ‘a Keats-like revel of body and soul of most heavenly creatures’. The picture most admired by literary men was Poussin’s second treatment of the theme Et in Arcadia Ego, The Shepherds of Arcady, c. 1650–5 (Paris, Louvre), a picture which fascinated later writers and painters. It has been suggested that *Gray thought of it when he wrote his *Elegy (1751); The Monument in Arcadia: A Dramatic Poem (1773) by the minor poet and dilettante George Keate (1729–97) derives from it.

English admiration paused with *Ruskin, but revived in the late 19th cent. when he was most admired for his formal brilliance. *Powell’s image of A Dance to the Music of Time was inspired by Poussin’s picture in the Wallace Collection, London.

POWELL, Anthony Dymoke (1905–2000), novelist, whose initial reputation was that of a satirist and light comedian rests on five pre-war books, beginning with Afternoon Men (1931) which maps a characteristically seedy section of pleasure-loving, party-going London: a territory contiguous with E. *Waugh’s, bounded at opposite extremes by N. *Mitford and by Powell’s Oxford contemporary and friend, Henry *Green.

After the war he embarked on a more ambitious sequence of twelve novels, A Dance to the Music of Time (named after *Poussin’s painting, with which the sequence shares a certain classical severity as well as an architectural command of structural rhythm). They are: A Question of Upbringing (1951), A Buyer’s Market (1952), The Acceptance World (1955), At Lady Molly’s (1957), Casanova’s Chinese Restaurant (1960), The Kindly Ones (1962), The Valley of Bones (1964), The Soldier’s Art (1966), The Military Philosophers (1968), Books Do Furnish the Room (1971), Temporary Kings (1973), and Hearing Secret Harmonies (1975). The whole cycle is framed and distanced through the eyes of a narrator, Nicholas Jenkins, whose generation grew up in the shadow of the First World War to find their lives dislocated by the Second. Jenkins’s canvas, following the perspectives of time rather than space, is hospitable and broad, especially rich in literary and artistic hangers-on, stiffened by a solid contingent from society, politics, and the City, en­livened and sometimes convulsed by eccentricities, dere­licts, and drop-outs of all classes and conditions from the socialist peer Erridge to a shifty crew of baleful, semi-fraudulent gurus and seers. Against these looms Kenneth Widmerpool, one of the most memorable characters of 20th-century fiction, whose ruthless pursuit of power, which carries him from innately ludicrous beginnings to a position of increasingly formidable, eventually sinister, authority, is the chief of many threads binding this higgledy-piggledy, jampacked, panoramic view of England.

The narrative is part humorous, part melancholy, and at times so funny that readers have tended if anything to underrate its sombre, even tragic, sweep and range. Powell’s naturalism takes on the almost surrealist overtones implicit in Jenkins’s rule of thumb: ‘All human beings, driven as they are at different speeds by the same Furies, are at close range equally extraordinary.’ Powell’s memoirs, which shed considerable light on the creation of the characters of his fictional world, were published in four vols, 1976–82, under the general title To Keep the Ball Rolling. Later works include the novels O, How the Wheel Becomes It! (1983) and The Fisher King (1986), two volumes of criticism, Miscellaneous Ver­dicts (1990) and Under Review (1992), and Journals 1982–6 (1995).

Power and the Glory, The, a novel by G. *Greene, published 1940.

Set in Mexico (which Greene had visited in 1938) at a time of religious persecution in the name of revolution, it describes the desperate last wanderings of a whisky priest as outlaw in his own state, who, despite a sense of his own worthlessness (he drinks, and has fathered a bastard daughter), is determined to continue to func­tion as priest until captured. He is contrasted with Padre José, a priest who has accepted marriage and humiliation; with 'the gringo', bank robber, murderer, and materialist, also on the run; and with the lieutenant, portrayed as an angry idealist and 'a good man', who pursues the priest and corners him when he is drawn back (by the Judas-figure of a half-caste) to offer the last rites to the dying gringo, just as he has reached safety over the border. His execution (and martyrdom?) is witnessed by the grotesque expatriate dentist Mr Tench, and the final episode indicates that the Church will survive its persecution. Greene describes it as his only novel 'written to a thesis'; it was condemned as 'paradoxical' by the Holy Office, but not publicly. Like many of Greene's works, it combines a conspicuous Christian theme and symbolism with the elements of a thriller.

POWYS, John Cowper (1872–1963), the son of a country parson, brother of Llewelyn and Theodore *Powys (below), brought up in the Dorset–Somerset countryside which was to become of great importance in his later writing, even though he spent much of his life in the USA. Educated at Sherborne and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, he became a prolific writer, including poetry and many essays on philosophy, religion, literature, and the arts of living among his publications, as well as a remarkable Autobiography (1934). It is, however, for his highly individual novels that he is chiefly remembered; the first, Wood and Stone (1915; NY; 1917, London) contains many hints of the powerful characters and intense relationships, the attachment to place, and the arresting oddity of personal names which were more fully developed in later works. Rodmoor (1916) was followed by Ducdame (1925), one of the simplest of his novels, with a single plot, relating a hapless Dorset love story. His first major novel, and major success, was Wolf Solent (1929), a crowded work, set again in the West Country, of many interweaving stories, but chiefly concerning Wolf and Gerda, and the destructive pull of opposites. A Glastonbury Romance (1932, NY; 1933, London), probably the best known of Powys's novels, is a work on a huge scale, in which *Glastonbury and its legends, both Christian and pagan, exert a supernatural influence on the life of the town—on the religious revival led by Johnny Geard, on the hard commercial interests of Phil Crow, on the communist workers, and on the complex loves, both sacred and sexual, of the town's inhabitants. Weymouth Sands (1934, NY) had, because of a libel action, to be recast as Jobber Skald (1935), but was restored and republished as Weymouth Sands in 1963. Against a sombre background of Portland and the sea, the human struggle centres on Jobber, his love for Perdita and his hatred of Dog Cattistock, and on the final relinquishing of dream in favour of the possible. Maiden Castle (1936, NY; 1937, London), set in Dorchester and among the excavations of the fort, follows the interlocking loves of several couples, no longer young; dominated by Dud No-man, and the girl Wizzie, the lives of the protagonists move towards disillusion and endurance. Most of the later novels, written after Powys had settled in Wales, share an extravagance of subject and style and strong elements of the supernatural. In Morwyn (1937), cast as a letter from the narrator to his son, the theme of man’s cruelty, to his fellows and to animals, is carried through various meetings with characters from history. Owen Glendower (1940, NY; 1941, London), the most successful of his historical novels, describes the confused events and passions surrounding Owen and his cousin Rhisiart. Set in the Dark Ages of Wales, Porius (1951) presents a fraught world of giants, Mithraic cults, and Arthurian legend filling the void the Romans have left. This was followed by The Inmates (1952), on the theme of madness; Atlantis (1954), containing Powys's most extreme flight of imagination, in which Odysseus, returned from Troy, sets out again through a world of giants, heroes, talking animals, and inanimate objects, to discover the continent of America, where he settles; and The Brazen Head (1956), on the subject of Roger *Bacon.

Much controversy centres on Powys's stature as a writer. Some regard him as unjustly neglected, an arresting and major novelist, while others find his talent spurious and verbose. See The Brothers Powys (1983), a life of all three brothers by R. P. Graves.

POWYS, Llewelyn (1884–1939), brother of John Cowper and Theodore *Powys. He was educated at Sherborne and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and shared his brothers' individuality of temperament. He was a prolific essayist and journalist; the best of his many books and collections are generally thought to be Skin for Skin (1925), a sombre account of the course of his tuberculosis and the idyllic Dorset interludes when it seemed to be cured; Impassioned Clay (1931), an intensely personal account of the human predicament, the Epicurean ethic, and the confrontation with death; and Love and Death (1939), an eloquent 'imaginary autobiography', on the theme of his lost first love and his approaching death. Apart from these works, and among many others, was a novel, Apples Be Ripe (1930), and two volumes, Earth Memories (1934) and Dorset Essays (1935), the essays in which had originally achieved wide circulation in London newspapers. Damnable Opinions (1935) presented many of the radical, iconoclastic views he shared with his brothers.

POWYS, T(heodore) F(rancis) (1875–1953), brother of John Cowper and Llewelyn Powys (above). He was sent away from the West Country to school in East Anglia, where he later farmed. But in 1902 he returned to Dorset and settled in East Chaldon, whose local landscape became the significant background to almost all his novels and stories. His first book, Soliloquies of a Hermit (1916), a series of brief meditations, gave notice of a highly original, idiosyncratic mind. A collection of three long stories, The Left Leg (1923), was followed by the novels Black Bryony (1923), Mark Only (1924), and Mr Tasker’s Gods (1925), pessimistic tales of village life in which the author’s sensitivity to cruelty and injustice sets the prevailing tone. Mockery Gap (1923) and Innocent Birds (1926) develop his religious concerns and include elements of the fable and the supernatural. They were followed in 1927 by the novel for which Powys is best remembered, Mr Weston’s Good Wine. In this vivid allegory Mr Weston (or God) comes to the worldly village of Folly Down, selling from his old van his vintages of Love and Death; after his departure he leaves no paradise, but the good are happier, and the evil (such as Mrs Vesper, the procurress) are vanquished. Fables (1929), in which Powys’s beliefs are most clearly exposed, was followed by his other major novel, Unclay (1931), in which John Death (or the archangel Michael) arrives in Dodder with instructions from God to ‘unclay’, or kill, various people; however, he loses his instructions, is unsettled by the mysterious Tinker Jar, and falls in love with a village girl. The most complex of Powys’s works, it interlocks the stories of several bizarre characters, innocent, evil, and mad, whose lives and loves are altered by Death’s arrival. Other volumes of short stories, including the melancholy Bottle’s Path (1946) and the sunnier God’s Eyes A-Twinkle (1947), followed, but Powys almost stopped writing about 1940.

practical criticism, the term used in academic literary studies for an exercise in which students are required to comment upon a poem or short prose passage without knowledge of its authorship, date, or circumstances of composition. This procedure encourages attention to form, diction, and style rather than ‘extraneous’ associations. It was adopted by I. A. *Richards at the University of Cambridge in the 1920s as an experiment which he records and analyses in his book Practical Criticism (1929). Thereafter it became a standard exercise, especially under the influence of the *New Criticism in America. In a more general sense, the term has been used, by S. T. Coleridge and others, to designate the applied uses of criticism as distinct from the purely theoretical.

PRAED, Winthrop Mackworth (1802–39), educated at Eton, where he founded the Etonian, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was called to the bar, then went into Parliament, and was appointed secretary to the board of control in 1834. He is remembered principally as a humorous poet and composer of elegant vers de société; ‘The County Ball’, ‘A Letter of Advice’, ‘Stanzas on Seeing the Speaker Asleep’, and ‘The Vicar’ are characteristic examples of his light verse. Like *Hood, with whom he is often compared, he sometimes uses humour to clothe a grim subject, as in ‘The Red Fisherman’. He also wrote verse epistles, some to his sister, and historical ballads similar to those of his Cambridge friend Macaulay, e.g. ‘Sir Nicholas at Marston Moor. His verse was published largely in periodicals and annuals, and his early death from consumption prevented him from taking an interest in more formal publication, but his inoffensive satire, gentle wit, and fluent metrical variations assured him a more lasting readership; his Poems, with a memoir by his friend Derwent Coleridge, appeared in 1864. See also D. Hudson, A Poet in Parliament (1939).

Praeterita, see Ruskin, J.

pragmatism, in philosophy, the doctrine that the test of the value of any assertion lies in its practical consequences, i.e. in its practical bearing upon human interests and purposes. See James, W.

Prague Circle, see structuralism.

PRATCHETT, Terry, see fantasy fiction; science fiction.

PRATT, Samuel Jackson (1749–1814), who wrote as ‘Courtney Melmoth’. He was a failed actor who became a voluminous and popular writer of poetry, essays, biography, travel, letters, plays, and anthologies. A play, The Fair Circassian (1781, based on Hawkesworth’s Almoran and Hamet), was a success, but his novel Shenstone-Green (1779), together with his many other novels of *sentiment, made no permanent mark, and his work in general was much criticized, by *Byron and *Lamb among others.

PRAZ, Mario (1896–1982). Italian critic and scholar, born in Rome, who spent ten years in England, in Liverpool and Manchester (1924–34), as senior lecturer, then professor, of Italian studies, before returning to Rome as professor of English literature. He wrote on many aspects of English literature and the connections between the English and Italian traditions; his best-known work is La carne, la morte e il diavolo nella letteratura romantica (1930; published in a translation by Angus Davidson as The Romantic Agony, 1933) in which he explores the legacy of de *Sade, the perverse and pathological elements in *Poe, *Swinburne, *Wilde, etc., and the cult of the Fatal Woman. His other works include The Flaming Heart (1958; essays on *Crashaw, *Machiavelli, T. S. *Eliot, and others) and La casa della fama (1952; as The House of Life, 1958).

Prelude, The: or, Growth of a Poet’s Mind, an autobiographical poem in blank verse by *Wordsworth, addressed to *Coleridge, and begun in 1798–9; a complete draft in 13 books was finished in 1805, but it was several times remodelled, and published posthumously in its final version in 1850, with its present title, suggested by Mary Wordsworth. The full text, showing the work of Wordsworth on it in his later years (which increased the number of books to 14, tuned down some of the earlier political views, tidied up structure, syntax, etc.), was published by de Selincourt in 1926. The poem was originally intended as an introduction to 'The Recluse', a vast work which Wordsworth planned but never completed (see Excursion, The).

The Prelude is thus composed of passages written at various periods, and sometimes with another purpose; in the first book Wordsworth describes his search for a conventional epic theme, and moves from this to an evocation of his own childhood which leads him less by logic than by imaginative association to his central subject, his own development as a poet and the forces that shaped his imagination. Although profoundly autobiographical, the poem does not proceed in terms of strict chronology; it deals with infancy, school days, Cambridge, his walking tour through the Alps, his political awakening in France, and consequent horrors, etc., but (for example) the passage describing the 'visionary dearness' of a highly charged moment in his early boyhood is delayed until Book XI ('Imagination, How Impaired and Restored') and the landscape there described is immediately linked in the immediate past with his sister Dorothy and Coleridge, both of whom are intermittently addressed throughout the work. The tone is similarly flexible and variable; conversational and informal in some passages, narrative and naturalistic in others, it rises at points to an impassioned loftiness. A constant theme throughout is Wordsworth's sense of himself as a chosen being, with an overriding duty to his poetic vocation. Wordsworth was aware that his choice of subject (highly original in its day, when the confessional mode in poetry was little developed) might be construed as 'self-conceit', but he insisted that he wrote thus through 'real humility' and 'diffidence'. Apart from its poetic quality, the work is remarkable for its psychological insight into the significance of childhood experience, a theme dear to Romanticism, but rarely treated with such power and precision. There is an edition by S. M. Parrish (1977).

Premium, Mr, the name taken by Sir Oliver Surface in Sheridan's *The School for Scandal.

Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, a group of artists, poets, and critics—J. E. *Millais, D. G. *Rossetti, W. Holman *Hunt, W. M. *Rossetti, T. *Woolner, Frederic George Stephens (1828–1907), and James Collinson (1825–81)—who first met as a group, led by the first three, in 1848. Various derivations have been assigned to the term 'Pre-Raphaelite', which indicated the group's admiration for the Italian quattrocento and its defiance of the authority both of *Raphael as a master and of 19th-cent. academic painting. The initials 'P.R.B.' first appeared on their work in the RA exhibition of 1849. As its periodical the *Germ (1850) suggests, the movement was strongly literary, and some of its most striking paintings were inspired by *Keats (see Millais's *Isabella), *Dante, Shakespeare, political matters. It is a reply to an anonymous pamphlet attributed to George Grenville, in which the decision of the Grenville administration to tax America was defended on the ground that the charges left by the war had made this course necessary. Burke reviews the economic condition of England and France, and defends the repeal of the Stamp Act by the Rockingham administration for the reason that 'politics should be adjusted, not to human reasonings, but to human nature', and that 'people must be governed in a manner agreeable to their temper and disposition'.

PRESTON, Thomas (1537–98), a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, master of Trinity Hall, and vice-chancellor of Cambridge, 1589–90. He is thought to have been the Thomas Preston who wrote A Lamentable Tragedie Mixed Ful of Pleasant Mirth, Conteyning the Life of Cambises King of Persia (?1570) (see CAMBYSES).

PRÉVOST, Antoine-François, l'Abbé (1697–1763), French novelist. Successively Jesuit novice, professional soldier, Benedictine priest, Protestant convert, and literary hack, he is remembered today for one novel, Manon Lescaut (1731), the story of a mutually destructive passion between a refined but weak nobleman (des Grieux) and a bewitching demi-mondaine. Although classical in form, the novel was romantic in substance, and acquired a huge readership: it formed the basis of operas by Massenet and Puccini. Prévost translated *Richardson's Pamela (1742), Clarissa (1751), and Histoire du Chevalier Grandisson (1755–8).

PRICE, Richard (1723–91), a Dissenting minister who became, with his friend Joseph *Priestley, one of the original members of the Unitarian Society in 1791; he was from 1758 minister at Newington Green, which had been a centre of Dissent for many years, where he 'conscience he was in sympathy.) He was a close friend of *Franklin, and supported the cause of American independence; he also supported the French Revolution, and his sermon delivered on 4 Nov. 1789, celebrating 'the ardour for liberty' of the French, provoked Burke to write his Reflections on the *Revolu­tion in France.

Pride and Prejudice, a novel by J. *Austen, published 1813. It was originally a youthful work entitled 'First Impressions' and was refused by Cadell, a London publisher, in 1797.

Mr and Mrs Bennet live with their five daughters at Longbourn in Hertfordshire. In the absence of a male heir, the property is due to pass by entail to a cousin, William Collins. Through the patronage of the haughty Lady Catherine de Bourgh, Collins has been presented with a living near Rosings, the Kentish seat of Lady Catherine. Charles Bingley, a rich young bachelor, takes Netherfield, a house near Longbourn, bringing with him his two sisters and his friend Fitzwilliam Darcy, nephew of Lady Catherine. Bingley and Jane, the eldest of the Bennet girls, very soon fall in love. Darcy, though attracted to the next sister, the lively and spirited Elizabeth, greatly offends her by his supercilious behaviour at a ball. This dislike is increased by the account given her by George Wickham, a dashing young militia officer (and son of the late steward of the Darcy property), of the unjust treatment he has met with at Darcy's hands. The aversion is further intensified when Darcy and Bingley's two sisters, disgusted with the vulgarities of Mrs Bennet and her two youngest daughters, effectively separate Bingley from Jane.

Meanwhile the fatuous Mr Collins, urged to marry by Lady Catherine (for whom he shows the most gruelling and obsequious respect), and thinking to remedy the hardship caused to the Bennet girls by the entail, proposes to Elizabeth. When firmly rejected he promptly transfers his affections to Charlotte Lucas, a friend of Elizabeth's, who accepts him. Staying with the newly married couple in their parsonage, Elizabeth again encounters Darcy, who is visiting Lady Catherine. Captivated by her in spite of himself, Darcy proposes to her in terms which do not conceal the violence the proposal does to his self-esteem. Elizabeth indignantly rejects him, on the grounds of his overweening pride, the part he has played in separating Jane from Bingley, and his alleged treatment of Wickham. Greatly mortified, Darcy in a letter justifies the separation of his friend and Jane, and makes it clear that Wickham is, in fact, an unprincipled adventurer.

On an expedition to the north of England with her uncle and aunt, Mr and Mrs Gardiner, Elizabeth visits Pemberley, Darcy's seat in Derbyshire, believing Darcy to be absent. However, Darcy appears, welcomes the visitors, and introduces them to his sister. His manner, though still grave, is now gentle and attentive. At this point news reaches Elizabeth that her youngest sister Lydia has eloped with Wickham. With considerable help from Darcy, the fugitives are traced, their marriage is arranged, and (again through Darcy) they are suitably provided for. Bingley and Jane are reunited and become engaged. In spite, and indeed in consequence, of the insolent intervention of Lady Catherine, Darcy and Elizabeth also become engaged. The story ends with both their marriages, an indication of their subsequent happiness, and an eventual reconciliation with Lady Catherine.

PRIEST, Christopher (1943— ), novelist and short story writer, born in Cheshire. Like Geoff *Ryman and M. John Harrison, Priest was first published as a *science fiction writer, with *Indoctrinaire (1970), *Fugue for a Darkening Island (1972), and *The Inverted World (1974), but by the early 1980s he was edging towards the mainstream. In *The Affirmation (1981), in which a lottery winner is promised eternal life, he patrols the frontier between sanity and insanity, rendering his narrator's fantasy world more real than the 'real' world. *The Glamour (1984) explored not dissimilar psychological territory in a world where little is what it seems. *The Prestige (1995) is a compelling tale of doppelgängers and magicians, while *The Extremes (1998) takes a Priestian look at virtual reality, which essentially has been his subject since the beginning. In an interview in *The Third Alternative in 1998 he stated: 'Perception of memory, and understanding it, is probably the central theme in most of my novels.'

PRIESTLEY, J(ohn) B(oynton) (1894–1984). He was born in Bradford, the son of a schoolmaster, and worked as junior clerk in a wool office before serving in the infantry in the First World War; he then took a degree at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and in 1922 settled in London, where he quickly made a name as journalist and critic. His first major popular success as a novelist was with the high-spirited, rambling *The Good Companions (1929), an account of theatrical adventures on the road, which was followed by the grimmer, somewhat self-consciously *'realist' novel of London life, *Angel Pavement (1930). His many other novels, which vary greatly in scope, include *Bright Day (1946), *Festival at Farbridge (1951), *Lost Empires (1965), and *The Image Men (1968). Priestley also wrote some 50 plays and dramatic adaptations; amongst the best known are his *'Time' plays, influenced by the theories of J. W. *Dunne (Dangerous Corner, 1932; *I Have Been Here Before, 1937; *Time and the Conways, 1937), his psychological mystery drama *An Inspector Calls (1947), and his West Riding farce *When We Are Married (1938). He also published dozens of miscellaneous works, ranging from *English Journey (1934, an acutely observant documentary account of his own travels through England, which foreshadowed *Orwell's *Road to Wigan Pier) to collections of his popular and influential wartime broadcasts (Britain Speaks, 1940; All England Listened, 1968); from the ambitious, *Jungian *Literature and Western Man (1960) to informal social histories and commentaries, many of which attempt to define the Englishness of the English, such as *The Edwardians (1970) and *The English (1973). He also wrote *Journey down a Rainbow (1955) with his wife, Jacquetta *Hawkes, describing travels in New Mexico; and several volumes of autobiography, including *Margin Released (1962) and *Instead of the Trees (1977). He was awarded the OM in 1977.

Priestley consciously cultivated various poses—of grumbling patriot, cosmopolitan Yorkshireman, professional amateur, cultured philistine, reactionary radical, etc. He much admired H. G. *Wells (whose spirited disregard of the 'mandarin conventions' of the literary novel he applauded), and in a sense inherited his role as Man of Letters, who remained nevertheless a spokesman for the common sense of the common man. His plays continue to be successfully revived.

PRIESTLEY, Joseph (1733–1804), the son of a Yorkshire cloth-dresser. He became Presbyterian minister at Nantwich and other places, but his views grew increasingly unorthodox and he became with his friend R. *Price one of the original members of the Unitarian Society in 1791. In politics he was a radical, labelled 'Gunpowder' Priestley for his remarks about laying gunpowder 'under the old building of error and superstition'; on 14 July 1791 his Birmingham house was wrecked by a mob outraged by his public support of the French Revolution and his attacks on *Burke. Finding life in England uncomfortable, he emigrated to America in 1794, and died there ten years later.

He wrote on theology, grammar, education, government, psychology, and other subjects; his *Essay on the First Principles of Government (1768) considerably influenced *Bentham's development of the principle of utilitarianism. He was himself influenced by *Hartley. His work as a chemist was of the first importance; he was the discoverer of oxygen and the author of various valuable scientific works. *Coleridge, in describing him as 'Patriot, and Saint, and Sage' (Religious Musings, 1796), expresses the esteem in which he was held by radical Dissenters.

Prig, Betsey, a character in Dickens's *Martin Chuzzlewit, who nurses in partnership with Mrs Gamp, until her remark concerning the apocryphal Mrs Harris, 'I don't believe there's no sich person', causes a difference between them.

Primas, the name (meaning 'first', 'chief') given to Hugo of Orléans, a canon of Orléans c. 1140 and a *Goliardic poet who excelled in Latin lyrics which reveal both scholarship and a libertine disposition. Although he taught in Paris and Orléans and was admired by his contemporaries, his career was erratic and he died in the *Hospitium amongst the destitute. See K. Langorsch, *Hymnen und Vagantenlieder (Basle, 1954). 170 ff.

Prime Minister, The, a novel by A. *Trollope, published 1876, the fifth in the *Palliser series. Ferdinand Lopez is disappointed in his marriage to Emily Wharton. He had hoped it would bring him money and social position, but Emily's father ties up her fortune, and Lopez is revealed as an improvident adventurer. The duchess of Omnium promises Lopez support in the Silverbridge by-election, but the duke, who is now prime minister, refuses to exert his influence. Lopez claims he has been cheated, and presses the duke to pay his election expenses, to the duke’s political embarrassment. But even this effrontery does not save Lopez from financial ruin. Briefly flirting with the idea of managing a Guatemalan mine, he prefers death to exile, and walks in front of an express train.

The novel also records the history of the duke of Omnium’s ministry. He is appointed head of a rickety coalition, which few observers believe will last long, but which he holds together for three years, while the duchess makes a determined attempt to support the ministry by a programme of lavish entertainment.

Set in Edinburgh during the 1930s, it describes the career of eccentric and egotistical Miss Brodie, teacher at the Marcia Blaine School for Girls, and her domination of her ‘set’ of 16-year-olds, Monica Douglas (‘famous mostly for mathematics’), Rose Stanley (‘famous for sex’), Eunice Gardiner (‘spirited gymnastics and glamorous swimming’), Jenny Gray (an intended actress), Mary Macgregor (famed as ‘silent lump’ and scapegoat), and Sandy Stewart, who becomes Miss Brodie’s betrayer. With many flashes back and forward, it describes the manner in which Miss Brodie fascinates her disciples, who are particularly intrigued by her relationships with two male teachers, the married and Catholic art master, Mr Lloyd, and the bachelor Church of Scotland singing master, Mr Lowther, who, rejected after much dalliance by Miss Brodie, in despair marries the science mistress. Sandy (rather than Rose, as Miss Brodie plans) has an affair with Mr Lloyd while Miss Brodie is away in the summer of 1938 touring Hitler’s Germany; the results of this are that Sandy becomes a Catholic and arranges the dismissal of Miss Brodie on the grounds of her sympathy with Fascism, manifested not only in her enthusiasm for Hitler but also in her indirect responsibility for the death of another schoolgirl, not one of ‘the set’, who had died on a journey to Spain in the Spanish Civil War, encouraged by Miss Brodie to support Franco. Miss Brodie herself, dangerous but compelling, ‘an Edinburgh Festival all on her own’, is the centre of the novel’s considerable moral ambiguity and complexity; she is seen most clearly through the ‘treacherous’ little eyes of Sandy, who, we are told in the second chapter, in a characteristic omniscient narrative leap, becomes a nun and writes a ‘psychological treatise on the nature of moral perception, called “The Transfiguration of the Commonplace”’.

Primer, a term in English from the 14th cent. (used by both Chaucer and Langland) for a first reading-book of prayers. Because it was used as the basic instruction in reading for children, the term gradually came to be applied to a book containing the rudiments of instruction in reading or any language, an elementary schoolbook. This sense survived up to the 20th cent. (archaically pronounced ‘primmer’), in the titles of works such as the Anglo-Saxon Primer of *Sweet.

Primitivism, and the cult of ‘the Noble Savage’, have been closely associated with the 18th cent., though they are clearly in some aspects descended from the classical concept of the Golden Age, and preceded by individual works like A. Behn’s Oroonoko (which was extremely successful during the 18th cent. in *Southern’s stage version). Primitivism took the form of a revolt against luxury (see Goldsmith’s The Deserted Village), against sophistication (see Colman’s Inkle and Yarico, Cumberland’s *The West Indian, Mrs Inchbald’s The Child of Nature, Bage’s Hernsprong, all works which stress the superiority of a simple education), and, in terms of critical theory, against Neoclassicism. (See Hurd; Gray, T.; Herder. Primitivism proposed a belief in man’s natural goodness, and in the inevitable corruptions of civilization. Interest in the educational and philosophic theories of *Rousseau was accompanied by great enthusiasm for travel writings and for real-life South Sea Islanders, Eskimos, Laplanders, Negroes, etc.; the South Sea Islander Omai from Tahiti received a warm welcome in London in 1776 from men of the world like *Boswell, who found him ‘elegant’. *Reynolds’s portrait of Omai is a powerful emblem of this fascination with so-called ‘primitives’. There was also much curiosity about the phenomenon of the ‘wild child’ (which found recent versions in *Kipling’s Mowgli, *Burroughs’s Tarzan, Truffaut’s film L’Enfant sauvage, and Jill Paton *Walsh’s Knowledge of Angels; *Monboddo, a keen disciple of Rousseau, wrote a preface to a French case history of a ‘savage girl’ in 1768. Home-grown primitives were also in demand, and ‘peasant’ poets such as S. *Duck and A. *Yearsley were taken up by eager patrons: the notorious fake primitives *Macpherson and *Chatterton enjoyed a considerable vogue. They in turn were stimulated by the scholarly researches of *Percy and *Ritson, who revived an interest in early English poetry. One of the most important figures in the movement was Gray, whose poems *The Bard and *The Progress of Poesy reflect his own interest in and feelings for the non-classical past: a note on the latter insisted on the ‘extensive influence of poetic genius over the remotest and most uncivilized nations; its connection with liberty, and the virtues that naturally attend on it’ (see also *Stukeley). It was in the cause of liberty that writers such as *Cowper and T. *Day defended the Noble Savage and attacked the slave trade. The ideas embodied in primitivism were in many ways continued in the *Romantic movement, with its stress on Nature, freedom (both political and artistic), and the natural man. (See *Slavery, Literature of, and C. B. Tinker, Nature’s Simple Plan (1922); H. N. Fairchild, The Noble Savage (1928); L. Whitney, Primitivism and the Idea of Progress (1934).) In recent years writers like Edward *Said took exception to the Eurocentric implications that the concept of primitivism carried, and the subject has been redefined in the context of *post-colonial studies. See *The Myth of Primitivism: Perspectives on Art (1991) by Susan Hiller

PRIMROSE, Diana (fl. 1630), possibly a daughter or daughter-in-law of James Primrose, clerk of the Privy Council of Scotland. Her poem-sequence Chaine of Pearle, Or a Memoriall of... Queen Elizabeth (1630), based on *Camden’s Annals of Queen Elizabeth (1615), is a nostalgic panegyric on a Protestant queen, obliquely angled at King Charles I’s pro-Catholic policies. ‘Shee banged the Pope, and took the Gospells part’ is the core of her message. The poem, in serviceable rhyming pentameter, consists of a chain of ten ‘pearls’, dealing with Elizabeth’s virtues.

Primrose, Dr, the vicar of Wakefield in *Goldsmith’s novel of that name. His family consists of his wife Deborah; daughters Olivia and Sophia; sons George and Moses; and two younger boys.

Prince, The, see Machiavelli.

PRINCE, F(rank) T(empleton) (1912– ), poet, born in South Africa, and educated there and at Balliol College, Oxford, and Princeton. From 1957 to 1974 he was professor of English at Southampton University. His collections of poetry include Poems (1938), Soldiers Bathing and Other Poems (1954), and The Doors of Stone: Poems 1938–62 (1963); his Collected Poems appeared in 1979. His poems range from dramatic monologues (The Old Age of Michelangelo) to long meditations on R. *Brooke (Afterword on Rupert Brooke, 1977) and on *Sterne’s Eliza (‘A Last Attachment’, 1979); from technical experiments with little-used verse forms (e.g. the Italian strambotto) to the wartime immediacy and pictorial qualities of the title poem of Soldiers Bathing.

PRINCE Mary, see Black British Literature.

Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau, Saviour of Society, a poem in blank verse by R. *Browning, written and published 1871. The prince is based on the Emperor Napoleon III.

The title ‘saviour of society’ was often used of Napoleon by his adherents; Browning makes ironic use of it in his depiction of a statesman who reviews his long career of compromise and tergiversation, ostensibly addressing himself to his mistress in a hotel in Leicester Square, where he is living in exile and disgrace, and justifying his conduct by appeal to a pragmatism which he believes is inherent in the relation between humanity and God. But the last lines of the poem reveal that the prince has been fantasizing the whole episode; that he has been meditating, on the brink of an important political decision, what he would say if his plans failed and he were forced into exile. Thus, while the poem alludes in detail to Napoleon III’s career, its form also raises questions about truth and imagination which are central to Browning’s aesthetics: political and poetic idealism, opposed to and yet dependent on the materialism of action and language, mirror one another.

Princess, The: A Medley, a poem by *Tennyson, published 1847. Some of the well-known lyrics (‘The splendour falls’, ‘Ask me no more: the moon may draw the sea’) were added in the third edition of 1850, but others, including ‘Tears, idle tears’ (composed in 1834 at Tintern) and ‘Now sleeps the crimson petal, now the white’, were included in the first. The poem, which opens with a description of a summer fête based on an event at the Lushingtons’ home Park House, near Maidstone, purports to be a tale of fancy composed in turn by some young people, based on an old chronicle.

A prince has been betrothed since childhood to Princess Ida, daughter of neighbouring King Gama. She becomes a devotee of women’s rights, abjures marriage, and founds a university. The prince and two companions, Cyril and Florian, gain admission to the university dressed as women, and are detected by the two tutors, Lady Psyche and Lady Blanche, who from different motives conceal their knowledge. The deceit is presently detected by Ida, but not before the prince has had occasion to rescue her from drowning. Her determination is unshaken, and a combat ensues, between fifty warriors led by the prince and fifty led by Gama’s son, during which the three comrades are wounded. The university is turned into a hospital, the prince urges his suit, and he wins Ida, envisaging a future in which ‘The man [may] be more of woman, she of man’; the epilogue is a plea for gradual social reform: ‘Maybe wildest dreams ARE but the needful prelude of the truth.’ The work was well received on the whole, though Tennyson wrote of it to his friend E. *FitzGerald ‘I hate it and so will you’, and subjected it to considerable revision. It formed the basis of the satirical *Gilbert and Sullivan opera Princess Ida.

PRINGLE, Thomas (1789–1834). He studied at Edinburgh University, became a friend of Sir W. *Scott, and was for a short time editor of the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine, the first of several editorships of various journals. In 1809 he published his first volume of poems, which included ‘The Emigrant’s Farewell’, and emigrated to South Africa. He is remembered chiefly as a poet of that country. His Ephemerides (1828) and African Sketches (1834) reveal his sympathetic interest in the native races and the wildlife of Africa, and contain some poems of quality, such as ‘The Hottentot’ and ‘Afar in the Desert’, which was highly praised by *Coleridge.
PRIOR, Matthew (1664–1721), the son of a joiner of Wimborne, Dorset, educated at Westminster School and St John's College, Cambridge. He began writing early, and joined with Charles Montagu (later earl of Halifax) in The Hind and the Panther Transvers'd to the Story of the Country Mouse and the City Mouse (1687, see TOWN MOUSE AND COUNTRY MOUSE), a satire on Dryden's The Hind and the Panther. He was appointed secretary to the ambassador at The Hague and employed in the negotiations for the Treaty of Ryswick; his poem The Secretary (1696) gives a lively picture of this period of his life. He joined the Tories and in 1711 was sent to Paris as a secret agent at the time of the peace negotiations, the subsequent Treaty of Utrecht (1713) being popularly known as 'Matt's Peace'. He was recalled on Queen Anne's death and imprisoned for over a year. A handsomefolio edition of his poems was brought out in 1718 after his release, by which he gained 4,000 guineas in subscriptions; *Harley gave him £4,000 for the purchase of Down Hall in Essex. Prior is best remembered for his brilliant occasional verses, epigrams, and familiar pieces ('My noble, lovely, little Peggy' and 'Jenny the Just', for example, in which he combines lightness of touch with mock seriousness), but also wrote longer works in various styles. Carmen Seculare (1700) is an ode celebrating the arrival of William III; 'Alma; or the Progress of the Mind' (1718) is a *Hudibrastic dialogue ridiculing various systems of philosophy; and 'Solomon on the Vanity of the World' (1718) is a long soliloquy in heroic couplets on the same theme. 'Hans Carvel' (1701) and 'The Ladle' (1718) are narratives ending with coarse jests, in a genre popular at the time, whereas 'Henry and Emma' (1709) (described by *Cowper as 'enchanting') is a sentimental burlesque of the old ballad The Nut-Brown Maid. Down-Hall, a Ballad (1723), a lively account of a trip to Essex, also deserves mention. His prose works include an Essay upon Learning, an Essay upon Opinion, and Four Dialogues of the Dead, which were not published until A. R. Waller's two-volume edition of 1805–7. His Literary Works, ed. H. B. Wright and M. K. Spears, were published in two volumes, 1859.

Priestess's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales, 16.

Prisoner of Chillon, The, a dramatic monologue principally in rhymed octosyllabics by *Byron, written in 1816 after a visit with *Shelley to the castle of Chillon on Lake Geneva, and published in the same year. It presents the imprisonment of a historical character, the Swiss patriot François de Bonnivard (1496–1570), who in the poem describes his years spent chained with his two brothers in the castle's dungeons. He survives their slow deaths, and in time his guards relax their vigilance, and he is able to glimpse the outside world from his barred windows. At first tormented by the vision of the lake, the mountains, and the joy of nature, he becomes at last reconciled to his fate, a friend in 'long communion' of his fellow inmates, the mice and the spiders: when he is released he leaves his hermitage and regains his freedom 'with a sigh'. This simple and powerful work of dignified resignation became one of Byron's most popular poems.

They deal with the perilous and romantic adventures of Rudolf Rassendyll, an English gentleman, in Ruritania, where, by impersonating the king (to whom he bears a marked physical resemblance), he defeats a plot to oust him from the throne. He falls in love with the king's betrothed, Princess Flavia, and she with him, but gallantly relinquishes her to the restored king. In the sequel he defeats a plot of the villain Rupert of Hentzau against Flavia, now the unhappy wife of the king, and has another chance of taking the throne and of marrying Flavia. But he is assassinated before his decision is known.

Pritchett, Sir V(ictor) S(awdon) (1900–97), novelist, critic, and short story writer. He was born in Ipswich, the son of a travelling salesman, and spent a periapatic childhood in the provinces and various London suburbs before attending Alleyn's School, Dulwich, which he left at 15 to work in the leather trade. He went to Paris at the age of 21, where he worked in the photographic trade; he then became a journalist, writing for the Christian Science Monitor in Ireland, Spain, before settling to a literary life in London. His first novel, Clare Drummer (1929), was followed by several others, but Pritchett is principally known for his short stories, the first of which appeared in the Cornhill, the New Statesman, etc., in the 1920s; his first collection, The Spanish Virgin and Other Stories (1930), was followed by many others, including You Make Your Own Life (1938), When My Girl Comes Home (1961), and The Camberwell Beauty (1974). Two volumes of Collected Stories appeared (1982, 1983). They are distinguished by their wide social range, shrewd observation of the quirks of human nature, and humane irony. Pritchett's other works include The Living Novel (1946), studies of Balzac (1973) and Turgenev (1977), and two volumes of much-praised autobiography, The Cab at the Door: Early Years (1968, of which the title refers to his household's frequent removals, which he claimed gave him a lifelong love of travel) and Midnight Oil (1971), which ends with the Second World War. He also edited the Oxford Book of Short Stories (1981). As critic he contributed most regularly to the New Statesman, of which he became a director in 1946.

Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner, The, a novel by J. *Hogg, published 1824, a macabre and highly original tale, inviting psychological as well as literary interpretation.

In the first part of the book Colwan, believing himself to be one of the ‘saved’ (according to the Calvinist doctrine of predestination), and under the influence of a malign stranger who may be interpreted as his evil alter ego, commits a series of horrifying crimes, including the murder of his half-brother. The second section of the book purports to be a memoir written by Colwan, and discovered when his grave was opened a century after his suicide. This reveals that he also murdered his mother, a girl, and a preacher, all under the supposed auspices of divine justice, before coming eventually to believe that the stranger who haunts him is in fact the devil. His skull, on exhumation, is found to have two horn-like protuberances.

private presses are distinguished by aims that are aesthetic rather than commercial and by printing for the gratification of their owners rather than to order. Many such have been set up since the 17th cent. by amateurs of books or printing: that of Horace *Walpole at *Strawberry Hill (1757–97) is a well-known example. At the end of the 19th cent. presses of this kind were intended as a protest against the low artistic standards and degradation of labour in the printing trade. W. *Morris set up the Kelmscott Press (1891–8) with this object; and others, notably C. H. St John Hornby (the Ashendene Press, 1895), *Ricketts (the Vale Press, 1896), and T. J. Cobden-Sanderson and Emery Walker (the Doves Press, 1900), followed him. The *Cuala Press was founded in Ireland in 1902. The 1920s saw the foundation of the *Golden Cockerel Press, the *Grevynog Press, and the *Nonesuch Press, and a considerable revival of interest in the art of wood engraving. The term ‘private press’ is sometimes applied, perhaps unjustifiably, to such publishing companies as the Nonesuch, which used commercial printers and called itself ‘architects rather than builders’ of books. See W. Ransom, *Private Presses and Their Books (1929) and Roderick Cave, *The Private Press (1971).

PROCTER, Adelaide Anne (1825–64), daughter of B. W. Procter (Barry *Cornwall). She was *Dickens’s most published poet in *Household Words. She lived in London and was a leading member of the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women as well as supporting a hostel for homeless women and children in east London. In addition to her popular devotional lyrics Procter wrote witty, ironic poems about women’s position (‘A Woman’s Last Word’ is a rewriting of Robert *Browning’s poem of the same title) and some lyrical ballads which draw attention to the position of fallen and single women at mid-19th cent. She also wrote some humane lyrics about the Crimea. Her most famous poem ‘A Lost Chord’ (Legends and Lyrics, 1858–61) was set to music by Arthur *Sullivan. The poem combines conventional devotional sentiment with a more unconventional concern that a woman’s expressive voice be heard. See Gill Gregory, *The Life and Work of Adelaide Procter: Poetry, Feminism and Fathers (1998).

PROCTER, Brian Waller, see CORNWALL.

Prodigal Son, the, the general subject of a group of plays written about 1540–75, showing the influence of the continental neo-classic writers of the period, particularly Gnapheus in his Acolastus, on the early Tudor dramatists and novelists. The chief of these are Misogonus, dating from about 1560 (author unknown), *Jacke Jugeler (1562), and *Gascoigne’s *Glasses of Government (1575). The parable of the Prodigal Son is in Luke 15: 11–32.

Professor, The, a novel by C. *Brontë, written 1846 (before *Jane Eyre), but not published until 1857.

The story is based, like *Villette, on the author’s experiences in Brussels, and uses much of the same material, though the two principal characters are transposed. William Crimsworth, an orphan, after trying his hand at trade in the north of England, goes to seek his fortune in Brussels. At the girls’ school where he teaches English he falls in love with Frances Henri, an Anglo-Swiss pupil-teacher and lace mender, whose Protestant honesty and modesty are contrasted with the manipulating duplicity of the Catholic headmistress, Zoraide Reuter. Crimsworth resists Mlle Reuter’s overtures; she marries the headmaster of the neighbouring boys’ school, M. Pelet, Crimsworth resigns his post, and, after finding a new and better one, is able to marry Frances.

Progress of Poesy, The, a Pindaric *ode by T. *Gray, published 1757. Gray describes the different kinds of poetry, its varying powers, its primitive origins, and its connections with political liberty. He recounts its progress from Greece, to Italy, to Britain, paying homage to Shakespeare, *Milton, and *Dryden—a footnote singling out Dryden’s *Sublime ‘Ode on St Cecilia’s Day’—and concludes that no one in his day can equal them. Dr *Johnson found the poem obscure. (See also BARD, THE.)

PROKOFIEV, Sergei (1891–1953), Russian composer. His first composition with English connections was a Soviet commission towards the end of his time abroad (1918–36), the music for a theatrical experiment combining excerpts from G. B. *Shaw’s *Caesar and *Cleopatra, Shakespeare’s *Antony and Cleopatra, and *Pushkin’s Egyptian Nights, given in Moscow in 1935 with little success.

In the same year the first version of Prokofiev’s ballet Romeo and Juliet was heard by the directors of the Bolshoi Theatre and turned down as unsuitable for dancing: the composer revised and improved his score (restoring the tragic ending, which he had originally altered because of the difficulty of dancing it), but he had to wait until 1940 for the first performance in his own country of this classically beautiful score. Another Shakespearian enterprise was the incidental music for *Hamlet (1939), but more important was the opera Betrothal in a Monastery, based on Sheridan’s *The Duenna. Here Prokofiev laid aside the well-meaning *Socialist Realism of more recent compositions and produced a brightly lyrical score which perfectly matches Sheridan's play. It was completed by 1941, but not performed until 1946, after the premiere of the composer's greatest opera, the epic adaptation of *Tolstoy's *War and Peace.

prolepsis (from Greek, 'to anticipate'), the assignment of something, such as an event or a name, to a time that precedes it, as in 'If you tell the cops, you're a dead man'; the use of a descriptive word in anticipation of the act or circumstances that would make it applicable, as in 'overwhelm the sunken ships' for 'overwhelm and sink the ships'.

Prometheus (the name means 'Forethought') appears in Greek myth as a divine being, one of the Titans, descended from the original union of the Sky God with the Earth Mother. In some stories he is the creator of mankind and he is always their champion. He is supposed to have stolen fire for them from heaven when they were denied it by Zeus, and to have been punished by being fastened to a cliff in the Caucasus where an eagle tore daily at his liver. *Hesiod explains were his gifts to mankind were not an unmixed benevolent demiurge, whom the Olympians supplanted—possible that behind the rebellious Titan of *Aeschylus there lurks an early Greek or Indo-European divinity, a benevolent demiurge, whom the Olympians supplanted. But even if we allow for a measure of distortion in the story as we know it, this primitive deity must have been an ambivalent figure. The fire and the skills which were his gifts to mankind were not an unmixed blessing, since they were also the source of work and war. It is interesting that Prometheus seems as a god to have been firmly rooted in the real world of effort, danger, and pain, while the Olympians who successfully supplanted him were the products of an idealizing daydream, beautiful, potent, happy, and free from suffering and death.

The modern popularity of the Promethean myth dates from the 1770s when *Goethe came to see in the Titan a symbol of man's creative striving and of his revolt against the restraints of society and life. Goethe set the pattern which the 19th cent. followed. Shelley's *Prometheus Unbound (1820) glorified the virtues of revolt, representing authority as responsible for man's sufferings. *Coleridge wrote an essay on the *Prometheus of Aeschylus (1825), Elizabeth Barrett (*Browning) translated the play (1833), and *Bridges wrote a version called *Prometheus the Firegiver (1883). In the 20th cent., *Gide's enigmatic *Prométhée mal enchaîné presented a hero who is still a symbol of mankind's quest to transcend the obvious.

Prometheus Unbound, a lyrical drama in four acts by P.B. *Shelley, written in Italy 1818–19, published 1820. A great but uneven work that orchestrates all Shelley's aspirations, and contradictions, as a poet and radical, it is partly mythical drama (or 'psychodrama') and partly political allegory. Shelley began with the idea of completing the Aeschylian story of *Prometheus the firebringer and champion of mankind, who is bound to his rock for all eternity by a jealous Jupiter. He combined this with his view of Satan as the hero of *Paradise Lost, and of God as the Oppressor. Boldly rewriting or updating these two myths, he presents a Prometheus–Lucifer figure of moral perfection and 'truest motives', who is liberated by 'alternative' and benign forces in the universe and triumphs over Tyranny in the name of all mankind. The work is executed in a bewildering variety of verse forms, some more successful than others: rhetorical soliloquies, dramatic dialogues, love songs, dream visions, lyric choruses, and prophecies.

Act I shows Prometheus chained in agony, 'in a ravine of Icy rocks in the Indian Caucasus', comforted by his mother Earth, but tempted to yield to Jupiter's tyranny by Mercury and the Furies. Act II introduces Asia and Panthea, the lovely daughters of Ocean, who determine to release Prometheus by confronting the ultimate source of power, *Demogorgon, a volcanic force dwelling in a shadowy underworld. Act III abruptly presents Jupiter vanquished by the eruption of Demogorgon, and Prometheus released and united with his beloved Asia. Their child, the Spirit of the Hour, prophesies the liberation of mankind. Act IV is a cosmic coda, or epithalamium, sung by a chorus of Hours, Spirits, Earth, and Moon.

The sexual, scientific, and political symbolism of the drama have been variously interpreted: but the concept of liberation is central. Act II sc. iv in which Asia (the Spirit of Love) confronts and questions Demogorgon (Fate, Historical Necessity, or perhaps 'the People-Monster') must count among Shelley's poetic masterpieces. The work has an important preface on the role of poetry in reforming society, which links with the *Defence of Poetry.

Protopertius, Sextus (c.50–c.16 BC), Roman poet, whose four books of poetry celebrate his passion for the lover whom he calls Cynthia. His poetry ranges from poems of rare elegance and refinement to allusively mythological pieces in the Hellenistic tradition to which he is deeply indebted. Echoes of his verse can be found in B. *Barnes and T. *Campion and he is the subject of *Pound’s 'Homage to Sextus Propertius' (1919).

Prophecy of Famine, The, see Churchill, Charles.

Prophetic Books, the name sometimes given to the symbolic and prophetic poems of *Blake, e.g. The Book of *Urizen, The Book of *Los, *Milton, and *Jerusalem.

Prose Brut, The, see Brut, The Prose.

prosody, see Brut, The Prose.

prosopopeia, see Persoenification.
'Prosopopoia', the subtitle of Spenser's *'Mother Hubberds Tale'.

Prospero, (1) in Shakespeare's The Tempest, the usurped duke of Milan and father of Miranda; (2) a character in Jonson’s Every Man in His Humour, a play in which Shakespeare himself acted.

Proteus, one of The Two Gentlemen of Verona in Shakespeare’s play; his name suggests his fickle and changing nature.

Prothalamion, a 'Spousall Verse' written by Spenser, published 1596, in celebration of the double marriage of the Lady Elizabeth and the Lady Katherine Somerset, daughters of the earl of Worcester. The name was invented by Spenser on the model of his Epithalamion.

Proudhon, Pierre-Joseph (1809–65), French social philosopher and political activist. His writings laid the basis for the organized anarchist movement in France, and exercised considerable influence on the thought and practice of anarchist and socialist movements throughout Europe. He published a large number of works, including Qu'est-ce que la propriété? (1840; What is Property?, 1876), which begins with the celebrated paradox 'La propriété, c'est le vol!'; Idée générale de la révolution au XIXe siècle (1851); De la justice dans la révolution et dans l'église (1858); and De la capacité politique des classes ouvrières (1865). His prose style was admired by Baudelaire and Flaubert, and Tolstoy, as well as to large numbers of political activists in Italy, Spain, Russia, and elsewhere.

Proudie, Mrs, the violently evangelical wife of the bishop of Barchester, and a leading character in the 'Barsetshire novels of A. Trollope.

Prout, Father, see Mahony.

Provençal, or langue d'oc (as distinct from the 'langue d'oïl, the language of the southern part of France, and the literary medium of the 'troubadours. Their language was a koiné, a class language avoiding marked regional features; it was known as lemosí (Llimousin), probably because some of the most famous troubadours came from the area around Limoges. Provençal declined as a literary language after the defeat of the south in the Albigensian War. The language is now generally called occitan, though the terms Provençal and langue d'oc are still in use (but see also under Félibrige).

Provençal literature in the medieval period consisted chiefly of the lyric poetry composed by the troubadours for the feudal courts of the Midi, northern Italy, and Spain. The canso, the love song in the courtly style which was the troubadours’ special achievement, was known all over western Europe, and inspired the courtly poetry of northern France, the minnesang of Germany, and the Petrarchan poetry of Italy. The sirventes, the satirical poem mostly on political or moral themes, was also much cultivated by the troubadours. There is little literature of an epic kind, or literature in prose, extant in Old Provençal, and Provençal was considered the language par excellence of lyric poetry, courtly in content and very elaborate in style. This poetic flowering came to an end with the decline, after the Albigensian crusade, of the aristocratic society which had produced it.

Proverbs of Alfred, The, an early Middle English poem, dating, in the form in which it has reached us, from the 13th cent., though probably composed about 1150–80. The poem’s 600 lines begin by giving an account of Alfred and proceed to a series of 35 sayings, each beginning 'Thus quath Alfred', containing proverbial instructions. The attribution of the proverbs to Alfred is no more than traditional: many different proverbs are attributed to him in *The Owl and the Nightingale: see H. P. South's edition (1931), 43–63.

Proverbs of Hell, see Marriage of Heaven and Hell, The.

Provok'd Husband, The, or A Journey to London, a comedy by *Vanbrugh, finished by C. *Cibber, produced 1728.

The 'provok'd husband' is Lord Townly, who, driven to desperation by the extravagance of his wife, decides to separate from her and to make his reasons public. The sentence (according to Cibber's ending) brings Lady Townly to her senses, and a reconciliation is promoted by Manly, Lord Townly's sensible friend and the successful suitor of Lady Grace, Lord Townly's exemplary sister. A second element in the plot is the visit to London of Sir Francis Wronghead, a simple 'Proverbs of Hell', the plot nearly succeeds, but is frustrated by Manly.

Provok'd Wife, The, a comedy by *Vanbrugh, produced 1697, but possibly written before *The Relapse.

Sir John Brute, a debauched man of quality, married his wife for love, but is now disillusioned with her and with matrimony, and rails against both. Lady Brute married for money, but has remained technically faithful; she is courted by Constant, whose cynical friend Heartfree falls in love with her niece Belinda. The two ladies, for a frolic, invite Constant and Heartfree to meet them in Spring Garden. Here Lady Brute is on the point of yielding to Constant when they are interrupted by the jealous and affected Lady Fancyfull. The two couples return to Lady Brute's house and sit down to cards, confident that Sir John will not return from a drinking bout for some hours. Sir John, however, having been arrested by the watch for brawling in the streets disguised in a parson's gown, has been dismissed by the magistrate. (Vanbrugh rewrote scenes i and iii of Act IV for the 1725/6 revival and had Sir John put on 'a light lady's short cloak and wrapping goun' and call himself 'Bonduca, Queen of the Welchmen' when arrested, but 'Lady Brute' before the justice.) He comes home unexpectedly, finds the two men hidden in a closet, but declines the duel offered by Constant. The presence of the men is attributed to the proposed marriage of Heartfree and Belinda, and in spite of Lady Fancyfull's attempts to make mischief all ends relatively well, though the problems of the Brutes clearly remain unresolved.

Provost, The, a novel by J. *Galt, published 1822, a book in which Galt's particular skills are at their best.

The Provost, Mr Pawkie, reflects on the arts of authority and rule, and his own successful manipulation of them throughout his life. The ironic revelation of his self-righteous, contriving character is of more importance in this work than the Scottish social scene he describes.

PRUDENTIUS (Aurelius Prudentius Clemens) (348–post-405), a Christian Latin poet born in Spain, the composer of many hymns and of the Psychomachia, an allegorical account of the battle for the soul of man which was a very important influence on the development of medieval and Renaissance allegorical works. It is given extended attention in The Allegory of Love by C. S. *Lewis, who had little admiration for the work. It is translated (along with some of the hymns) in H. Isbell's The Last Poets of Imperial Rome (1971).

Pryderi, see Mabinogion.

Prynne, Hester, the heroine of Hawthorne's *The Scarlet Letter.

PRYNE, William (1600–69), Puritan pamphleteer. He was educated at Bath grammar school and Oriel College, Oxford, and was a barrister of Lincoln's Inn. He wrote against Arminianism from 1627, and endeavoured to reform the manners of his age. He published Histriomastix, an enormous work attacking stage plays, in 1633. For a supposed aspersion on Charles I and his queen in it he was sentenced by the Court of Star Chamber, in 1634, to be imprisoned during life, to be fined £5,000, and to lose both his ears in the pillory. He continued to write in the Tower of London, and in 1637 was again fined £5,000, deprived of the remainder of his ears, and branded on the cheeks with the letters S. L. ('seditious libeller') which Prynne humorously asserted to mean 'Stigmata Laudis' (i.e. of Archbishop *Laud). He was released by the Long Parliament, and his sentences declared illegal in Nov. 1640. He continued an active paper warfare, attacking Laud, then the independents, then the army (1647), then, after being arrested by Pride, the government. In 1660 he asserted the rights of Charles II, and was thanked by him. He was MP for Bath in the Convention Parliament and was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower of London. He published his most valuable work, Brevia Parlamentaria Rediviva, in 1662. He published altogether about 200 books and pamphlets.

Psalms, the, the Book of Psalms, one of the books of the Old Testament, often called the Psalms of David, in accordance with the belief that they, or part of them, were composed by David, king of Israel. This belief, maintained by many of the Latin Fathers (e.g. St Ambrose and St Augustine), was largely dismissed in the 19th cent., although modern scholars assign some to him and date many from the early years of the monarchy. The Psalms were the basis of the medieval church services, probably the only book in the Bible on the use of which, by the laity, the medieval Church imposed no veto at all. The Prayer Book version of them, attributed to *Coverdale, is one of our greatest literary inheritances. A *Metrical Version of the Psalms was begun by *Sternhold and Hopkins (2nd edn, 1551), and continued at Geneva during Mary's reign by Protestant refugees. The complete *Old Version (metrical) was published in 1562. The *New Version by *Tate and Brady appeared in 1669. The Psalms have been translated and adapted by many English poets, including *Wyatt, P.*Sidney, the countess of *Pembroke, G. *Herbert, *Addison, *Smart (whose *A Song to David celebrates their supposed author, and whose *Jubilate Agno displays many characteristics of antiphonal psalms), and *Watts.

PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, see Dionysius the Areopagite.

Pseudodoxia Epidemica: or, Enquiries into Very Many Received Tenets, and Commonly Presumed Truths, often referred to as Vulgar Errors, by Sir T. *Browne, first published 1646, revised and augmented 1650, 1658, and 1672.

Whereas Religio Medici made him famous for wit, this, his longest work, established him as a man of learning. Fulfilling Bacon's desire in The Advancement of Learning for a 'Calendar of Dubitations, or Problems' and a 'Calendar of Falsehoods, and of Popular Errors,' it comprises one general book, treating of the sources and propagation of error—original sin, popular gullibility, logical fallacy, learned credulity and laziness, reverence for antiquity and authority, influential authors, and Satan—and six particular books, three on natural history—mineralogy, botany, zoology, physiology—and three on civil, ecclesiastical, and literary history—iconography, magic and folklore, chronology, historical geography, and biblical, classical, and medieval history. Browne examines more than 100 problems in the light of his extensive learning, the verdicts of reasoned argument, and the results of his own experiments and observations. The standard edition, comprising a critical text with introduction and full commentary, is by Robin Robbins (1981).

psychoanalytic criticism, a form of literary interpretation that employs the terms of psychoanalysis (the unconscious, repression, the Oedipus complex, etc.) in order to illuminate aspects of literature in its connection with conflicting psychological states. The beginnings of this modern tradition are found in Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams (1900), which provides a method of interpreting apparently unimportant details of narratives as 'displacements' of repressed wishes or anxieties. Freud often acknowledged his debts to the poets, and his theory of the Oedipus complex is itself a sort of commentary upon Sophocles' drama. He also attempted posthumous analyses of *Michelangelo, Shakespeare, E. Hoffmann, and other artists. Ambitious interpretations of literary works as symptoms betraying the authors' neuroses are found in 'psychobiographies' of writers, such as Marie Bonaparte's Edgar Poe (1933), which diagnoses sadistic necrophilia as the problem underlying Poe's tales. A more sophisticated study in this vein is E. Wilson's The Wound and the Bow (1941). As L. *Trilling and others have objected, this approach risks reducing art to pathology. More profitable are analyses of fictional characters, beginning with Freud's own suggestions about Prince Hamlet, later developed by his British disciple Ernest Jones: Hamlet feels unable to kill his uncle because Claudius's crimes embody his own repressed incestuous and patricidal wishes, in a perfect illustration of the Oedipus complex. A comparable exercise is Wilson's essay 'The Ambiguity of Henry James' (1934), which interprets the ghosts in The Turn of the Screw as imaginative projections of the governor's repressed sexual desires. A third possible object of analysis, after the author and the fictional protagonist, is the readership. Here the question is why certain kinds of story have such a powerful appeal to us, and numerous answers have been given in Freudian terms, usually focusing on the overcoming of fears (as in Gothic fiction) or the resolution of conflicting desires (as in comedy and romance). Although Freud's writings are the most influential, some interpretations employ the concepts of heretical psychoanalysts, notably Adler, *Jung, and Klein. Since the 1970s, the theories of Jacques Lacan (1901–81) have inspired a new school of psychoanalytic critics who illustrate the laws of 'desire' through a focus upon the language of literary texts. In Lacan's very complicated scheme, literary works may embody a quest for an imaginary wholeness that we, as 'split' subjects, have lost upon our entry into the linguistic world of differences and distinctions. The advent of post-structuralism has tended to cast doubt upon the authority of the psychoanalytic critic who claims to unveil a true 'latent' meaning behind the disguises of a text's 'manifest' contents. The subtler forms of psychoanalytic criticism make allowance for ambiguous and contradictory significances, rather than merely discover hidden sexual symbolsm in literary works.

PTOLEMY (Claudius Ptolemaeus), who lived at Alexandria in the 2nd cent. AD, was a celebrated mathematician, astronomer, and geographer. He devised the system of astronomy (according to which the sun, planets, and stars revolved round the earth) which was generally accepted until displaced by that of *Copernicus. Combined with Aristotle's natural philosophy, which saw Nature as orderly, hierarchical, and teleological, Ptolemaic astronomy when suitably Christianized formed the core of the medieval world picture. Ptolemy's work on this subject is generally known by its Arabic name of Almagest. His great geographical treatise remained a textbook until superseded by the discoveries of the 15th cent. Ptolemy compiled a map of the world in which both the parallels and the meridians are curved.

Public Advertiser, originally the *London Daily Post and General Advertiser, started in 1752 and expired in 1798. From 1758 to 1793 it was edited by Henry Sampson Woodfall (1739–1805), who published the famous letters of Junius. It contained home and foreign intelligence, and correspondence, mainly political, from writers of all shades of opinion. *Wilkes and *Tooke carried on a dispute in its columns. The notable pamphlets of 'Candor' against Lord Mansfield (1764) also appeared originally as letters to the Public Advertiser. The author of these is unknown.

Public Lending Right, a right achieved by Act of Parliament in 1979. The idea that the author of a book (in copyright) should be paid for its use by a public, commercial, or other kind of lending library was first advanced by the novelist John Brophy in 1951. It was then formally adopted by the *Society of Authors which conducted a prolonged campaign—for what became known as ‘Public Lending Right’ (PLR). The campaign was reinforced and brought ultimately to a successful conclusion by the Writers’ Action Group—which was set up in 1972 by Brigid *Brophy (daughter of the campaign’s originator) and Maureen *Duffy. Initially the campaign was opposed by many librarians, who feared that the payments to authors would have to come from library budgets. There was also disagreement among authors themselves over the nature of the proposed right and how the payments should be calculated.

PLR was finally secured, not by amendment to the Copyright Act, but by a separate statute, followed three years later by the PLR scheme which set out detailed arrangements for the operation of the new right. The scheme is administered by the Registrar of PLR from an office in Stockton-on-Tees and is financed by a central government grant. Qualifying authors received their first payments in 1984.

publishing, subscription, a system by which the author (sometimes with his publishers’ help) collected a pre-publication list of buyers prepared to pay for his book in advance and usually at a reduced rate. The first book known to be published by a fully developed form of this system was John Minshew’s lexicographical Guide into Tongues of 1617, but it is known that *Caxton, in the late 15th cent., acquired promises of sales before producing his major works. The system flourished most widely in the 18th cent. when authors frequently issued ‘Proposals’ for future works and collected subscribers; for instance, *Pope enlisted *Swift’s help in obtaining subscribers for his *Iliad; Dr *Johnson, who had great trouble with the list for his edition of Shakespeare, said, ‘he that asks subscriptions soon finds that he has enemies’; *Burns, proposing to issue the Kilmarnock second edition of his poems, was delighted to obtain a list of over 300 subscribers; and the name of the young *Austen appears in 1796 on a subscription list for F. *Burney’s forthcoming *Camilla. Subscription publishing was still flourishing at the end of the 19th cent. and survives in a modified form in certain areas of scholarly and technical publishing.

PUCCINI, Giacomo (1858–1924), Italian composer, almost exclusively of opera. Only two of his completed operas have any connection with English literature: both Madame Butterfly (1904) and La Fanciulla del West (1910, from The Girl of the Golden West) are based on plays by the American actor-manager and playwright David Belasco, the former taken in its turn from a magazine story by John Luther Long. The uncompleted operas, however, included, at various stages of his career, works based on Enoch Arden, Oliver Twist, works by *Wilde and Shakespeare, *Bulwer-Lytton’s *Last Days of Pompeii, *Lorna Doone, and *Trilby.

Pucelle, La (The Maid), a burlesque epic by *Voltaire on the subject of *Joan of Arc, published 1755. Joan is called ‘la Pucelle’ in Shakespeare’s Henry VI.

Puck, originally an evil or malicious spirit or demon of popular superstition; from the 16th cent. the name of a mischievous or tricksy goblin or sprite, called also Robin Goodfellow and Hobgoblin. In this character he figures in Shakespeare’s A Midsummer Night’s Dream (II. i. 40) and Drayton’s Nymphidia (xxxvi).

PUDNEY, John Sleigh (1909–77), poet, novelist, and journalist, born at Langley, Buckinghamshire, and educated at Gresham’s School, Holt, where he was a contemporary and friend of *Auden and B. *Britten. His first volume of verse, Spring Encounter (1933), was followed by ten works of fiction, but he is principally remembered for his poem lamenting pilots who died in the war, ‘For Johnny’ (‘Do not despair | For Johnny-head in air’), written while he was an intelligence officer with the RAF in 1941, and first published in the News Chronicle. It became one of the most quoted poems of the Second World War.

Puff, Mr, a character in Sheridan’s *The Critic.

PUGH, Sheenagh (1950– ), poet and translator, born in Birmingham and educated at the University of Bristol: she now lives in Wales. Her volumes include Crowded by Shadows (1977); Earth Studies and Other Voyages (1982), the title section of which is a geographical-ecological meditation in the form of a 19-poem sequence, celebrating the beauty and fragility of the earth and its inhabitants; Beware Falling Tortoises (1987), which wryly questions accidental death and individual worth and survival; and Sing for the Taxman (1993). Her poetry springs from saga, ancient history, contemporary politics, and everyday life, and is marked by a lyrical detachment. Prisoners of Transience (1985) contains translations from *Christine de Pisan, *Charles d’Orléans, and German poets of the Thirty Years War.

PUGIN, Augustus Welby Northmore (1812–52), architect, son of the French artist Auguste-Charles Pugin (1762–1832). He was the protagonist and theorist of... the *Gothic Revival, and developed his thesis that Gothic was the only proper Christian architecture in Gothic was the only proper Christian architecture in *Contrasts: or, A Parallel between the Noble Edifices of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries and Similar Buildings of the Present Day, Shewing the Present Decay of Taste (1836), an important work that foreshadowed *Ruskin and *Carlyle’s *Past and Present. He wrote various other works on architectural and ecclesiastical matters, including An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture in England (1843), and was also responsible for designing the decorations and furniture for Barry’s Houses of Parliament.

PULCI, Luigi (1432–84), Florentine poet of the circle of Lorenzo de’ *Medici. His poem *Morgante maggiore was the first romantic epic to be written by an Italian letterato, and was a major source for *Rabelais.

Pulitzer Prizes, annual prizes established under the will of Joseph Pulitzer (1847–1911), an American newspaper proprietor of Hungarian birth, who used sensational journalism for the correction of social abuses. The prizes, which are confined to American citizens, are offered in the interest of letters (American history and biography, poetry, drama, and novel writing), music, and good newspaper work. A fund of 500,000 was set aside for the prizes, which are controlled by the School of Journalism (also founded under the terms of Pulitzer’s will) at Columbia University.

Pullet, Mr and Mrs, characters in G. Eliot’s The Mill on the Floss.

pun, a play on words, depending on similarity of sound and difference in meaning. Shakespeare was greatly given to punning, both in comic and in serious contexts: for an example of the latter, see Sonnet 138, ‘Therefore I lie with her, and she with me, / And in our faults by lies we flattered be.’ The pun fell into disrepute in the 18th and 19th cents, but was reinstated as a form of ambiguity in W. Empson’s *Seven Types of Ambiguity. (See also PARONOMASIA.)

Punch, the principal character in the most famous of English puppet plays, distinguished by humped back, hooked nose, and a tendency to beat his wife Judy and other victims: he is accompanied by his faithful dog Toby. The name of Punch came into the language after the Restoration through Pulcinella, a similar character in the *commedia dell’arte. See also GUIGNOL.

Punch, or The London Charivari, an illustrated weekly comic periodical, founded 1841; at first a rather strongly radical paper, gradually becoming more bland and less political. It suspended publication in 1992, and was revived in 1996.

Various accounts have been given of the birth of this famous paper. One or two illustrated comic papers had already appeared in London, notably Gilbert Abbott *à Beckett’s *Figaro in London (1831) and *Punchinello (1832), illustrated by *Cruikshank. It appears that the idea of starting in London a comic paper somewhat on the lines of Philippon’s *Charivari first occurred to Ebenezer Landells, draughtsman and wood-engraver, who submitted it to *Mayhew. Mayhew took up the proposal and enlisted the support of *Lemon and Joseph Stirling Coyne (1803–68), who became the first joint editors. The first number was issued on 17 July 1841. Joseph Last was the first printer, and Landells the first engraver. A Beckett and *Jerrold were among the original staff, soon joined by *Thackeray, *Hood, *Leech, and *Tenniel, among others. Shirley Brooks (1816–74) became editor in 1870, Tom *Taylor in 1874, and *Bunrard in 1880. Sir Owen Seaman was editor from 1906 to 1932; he was succeeded by E. V. *Knox, 1932–49. Kenneth Bird (better known as the cartoonist ‘Fougasse’) was editor from 1949 to 1952; Malcolm *Muggeridge 1953–7; Bernard Hollowood 1958–68; William Davis 1969–78; and Alan Coren (who introduced full colour cartoon covers) from 1978. Recent regular contributors have included M. *Bragg, Hunter Davies, Benny Green, and Alan Brien.

Among other famous draughtsmen of the past may be mentioned Charles Keene (1823–91), whose first drawing in *Punch appeared in 1851 and who joined the staff in 1860; and G. *du Maurier, who contributed drawings from 1860 and joined the staff in 1864. The most famous drawing for the cover, by R. *Doyle, was used from 1849 to 1956, when it was replaced by a full-colour design, different each week. The Punch figure and the dog Toby usually appeared in the design on the front cover until 1969, and the last vestige of the original Doyle frieze disappeared from the inside pages in 1978. Amongst the many eminent cartoonists of later years, mention may be made of Ronald Searle, Bill Tidy, Michael Heath, Norman Thelwell, and Gerald Scarfe.

puppet-play, see MOTION.

PURCELL, Henry (1659–95), English composer, who began his musical career as a chorister and later organist of the Chapel Royal, and at the age of 20 succeeded *Blow as organist at Westminster Abbey. A considerable part of his output consisted of anthems and other sacred works, the former to texts from the Bible or Book of *Common Prayer, the latter with words by *Cowley, *Tate, *Quarles, *Flatman, and others. Comparable to these in the secular field are the various Odes and Welcome songs, written mainly for royal occasions to texts in courtly language, which drew from the composer music that was often splendid but generally uncomplicated in style.

The mixture of instrumental, choral, and vocal styles in works like these is complex and varied, yet throughout it is the solo vocal line, idiomatic, flexible, and richly coloured by a vivid harmonic sense, that most profoundly influenced later composers. His 250 solo songs range from simple, almost folk song-like tunes to elaborate sequences of recitative and aria that develop and improve on the declamatory style introduced from Italy by *Lawes and M. *Locke; some of these were independent compositions, but many more were written for the 49 stage works (by *Dryden, *Shadwell, *D’Urfey, *Southerne, and others) for which Purcell is known to have provided music. 'The Author’s extraordinary Talent in all sorts of Musick is sufficiently known,' wrote musician John Playford in 1698, 'but he was especially admir’d for the Vocal, having a peculiar Genius to express the Energy of English Words, whereby he mov’d the Passions of all his Auditors.'

It was this distinctive gift that assured the position of Purcell’s one opera Dido and Aeneas (modelled in part on Blow’s Venus and Adonis) in the history of music. It was written to a libretto by Tate for performance by the young gentlewomen of Josias Priest’s boarding school at Chelsea in 1689. Though short and restricted in theatrical scope, Dido achieves an astonishing range of dramatic expression: from the ribald vitality of the sailors to the fiery exchanges between Dido and Aeneas and the noble resignation of Dido’s lament, 'When I am laid in earth,' there is a sureness of characterization and depth of human understanding that justifies the work’s place as the most famous of English operas.

It was Purcell’s only opera in the strict sense of the word, but he also provided music for five ‘semi-operas’ in the last five years of his life. Of these, only King Arthur (by Dryden, 1691) was written with Purcell’s music in mind, and it is therefore perhaps the most satisfactory whole; the song ‘Fairest Isle’ comes in the fifth act. The music for The Prodigal Son (1690), adapted from *Pressel and Betery, includes a much admired masque that is complete in itself, and The Fairy Queen (1692), an elaboration of A Midsummer Night’s Dream, consists almost entirely of masques, to the virtual exclusion of Shakespeare’s play. (This is the longest of Purcell’s dramatic works, but it contains no setting of Shakespeare’s words.) The two last stage works, The Indian Queen and a final Shakespearean adaptation, Shadwell’s arrangement of Dryden and *D’Avenant’s version of The Tempest, were both written in the last year of Purcell’s life. They exhibit the composer’s dramatic and musical gifts at their highest, yet they remain obstinately hybrid period pieces. (See also LIBRETTO; OPERA.)

PURCHAS, Samuel (1577–1626), educated at St John’s College, Cambridge, and rector of St Martin’s, Ludgate. He published in 1613 Purchas His Pilgrimage. Or Relations of the World and the Religions Observed in All Ages; in 1619 *Purchas His Pilgrim; and in 1625 Hakluytus Post-humus, or Purchas His Pilgrimes, Containing a History of the World in Sea Voyages and Land Travell by Englishmen and Others. This last is in part based on manuscripts left by *Hakluyt, and consists of two sections, each of ten books. The first section, after an introductory book, contains accounts of voyages to India, China, Japan, Africa, and the Mediterranean. The second part deals with attempts to discover the North-West Passage, the Muscovy expeditions, and explorations of the West Indies and Florida. Among the best narratives are William Hawkins’s description of his voyage to Japan and residence there and William Hawkins’s account of his visit to the court of the great mogul at Agra. *Coleridge, according to his own account, was reading about Kubla Khan in Purchas when he fell into the trance that produced his own poem on the subject, and J. L. *Lowes in The Road to Xanadu (1927) further traces his debt. (See also ROMANTICISM.)

Puritan, The, or The Widow of Watling-Street, a comedy published in 1607 as ‘written by W.S.’ and included in the third and fourth Shakespeare folios, but by some other hand, almost certainly Middleton’s. The play is a farcical comedy of London manners, and sets forth the tricks played on the widow and her daughter by Captain Idle and George Pye-boord in order to win their hands, with scenes in the Marshalsea.

PUSEY, Edward Bouverie (1800–82), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, elected a fellow of Oriel College in 1823. In 1828 he was ordained deacon and priest, and appointed Regius professor of Hebrew. He became attached to the *Oxford movement in 1833 and joined *Keble and *Newman in contributing, in 1834, No. 18 for Tracts for the Times and Nos 67–9, in 1836, on ‘Scriptural Views of Holy Baptism’; Pusey gave the movement cohesion and prestige by his erudition, and in 1841 when Newman withdrew he became its leader. His most influential activity was preaching and his sermon on ‘The Holy Eucharist, a Comfort to the Penitent’ (1843) caused his suspension for heresy from the office of university preacher for two years. The condemnation drew him wide publicity and attracted attention to the doctrine of the Real Presence of which he was a devoted defender. He was a principal defender of the doctrines of the High Church movement, a passionate believer in the union of the English and Roman Churches, and endeavoured to hinder secessions to the Roman Catholic Church which prevailed at that time.

PUSHKIN, Alexander Sergeyevich (1799–1837), widely considered Russia’s greatest poet. Born in Moscow into an ancient gentry family, he attended the Lyceum at Tsarskoe Selo, outside St Petersburg, where he began to write poetry. He worked in government service, but was expelled from St Petersburg in 1820 for writing revolutionary epigrams. In August 1824 he was dismissed from the civil service for atheistic writings, and his seclusion at his mother's estate prevented him from taking part in the revolt of the Decembrists, with whom he sympathized. In 1832 he married a young beauty, Natalia Goncharova. The attentions paid to his wife by Baron Georges D'Anthès, a French royalist in the Russian Service, caused him to challenge D'Anthès to a duel, in which Pushkin was fatally wounded.

Pushkin wrote in a variety of genres: lyric poems, among the most important of which are 'Winter Evening' (1825), 'The Prophet' (1826), 'I remember a wondrous moment' (1827), 'The Poet' (1827), 'The Upastree' (1828), and 'I loved you' (1829); narrative poems in various styles, including Ruslan and Ludmilla (1820), a Romantic epic, The Prisoner of the Caucasus (1820–1) and The Fountain of Bakhchisarai (1822), which examine Romantic and Byronic themes, The Gypsies (1824), in which Romantic influences are discarded, the comic Count Nulin (1825) and The Little House in Kolonma (1830), the historical Poltava (1829), and The Bronze Horseman (1833), in which the statue of Peter the Great chases the clerk Evgeny through St Petersburg during the flood of 1824; the novel in verse Eugene Onegin (1823–31), his greatest and most sophisticated work; plays, including the blank verse historical drama Boris Godunov (1825) and the four 'Little Tragedies': 'Mozart and Salieri', 'The Covetous Knight', 'The Stone Guest', and 'The Feast during the Plague' (all 1830); and prose, on which he concentrated after 1830, The Tales of Belkin (1830), The Queen of Spades (1834), and The Captain's Daughter (1836).

Pushkin was widely read in English literature, and particularly interested in Shakespeare, Sterne, Richardson, Byron, and Sir W. Scott. The first English translation, by G. Borrow, was The Talisman: From the Russian of Alexander Pushkin. With Other Pieces (St Petersburg, 1835). Recent translations include those by John Fennell (1964), Gillon Aitken (The Complete Prose Tales, 1962, etc.), Antony Wood (1982), and D. M. Thomas (1982). Nabokov's controversial but scholarly translation (in unrhymed iambics) of Eugene Onegin appeared in 1964 (rev. edn 1977, when it was described by R. Lowell as a work of 'fascinating eccentricity'); it was followed by Sir Charles Johnston's stanzaic version, which also appeared in 1977.

PUTTENHAM, George (c.1529–91), a nephew of Sir T. Elyot, and almost certainly author of The Arte of English Poesie, sometimes ascribed to his brother Richard. It appeared anonymously in 1589, but is thought to have been in manuscript in some form perhaps 20 years earlier. It is a critical treatise in three books, Of Poets and Poesie, Of Proportion, and Of Ornament, important as a record of Elizabethan taste and theory, and lively in its own right. The author's tone is personal, and he mingles anecdotes with serious appraisal, illustrating the view that epitaphs should be briefly by telling us that he was locked up in a cathedral by the sexton while reading a long one. He condemns Gower for 'false orthographie', finds Skelton 'a rude rayling rimer and all his doings ridiculous', and praises Wyatt and Surrey as the stars of a 'new company of courtly makers'. In the second book he discusses 'courtly trifles' such as anagrams, 'emblems, and posies, showing a fondness for 'ocular representations'—in particular for poems shaped liked eggs and pillars. The third book defines and illustrates various figures of speech and suggests vulgar names for Greek and Latin originals, e.g. 'single supply, ringleader and middlemarcher' (zeugma, prozeugma, and mezozeugma), 'the drie mock' (irony), 'the bitter taunt' (sarcasm), and 'the over racher' (hyperbole). He attacks excessive use of foreign words, but was aware of the rapidly changing vernacular. The Arte was edited by G. D. Willcock and Alice Walker (1936). George Puttenham may also be the author of a royal panegyric, Partheniades.

PYCLETIUS (c.116–c.163), Graeco-Spanish geographer and traveller, trading ambassador in Spain for Antonius Pius. His wise and subversive Histories record with unflinching though unreliable authority details of Mediterranean life under the Romans in the 2nd cent. AD. Amongst his discoveries were lands 'where citizens are as dextrous with their toes as with their fingers'. Stylistically, Pycletius is judged an early magic realist, with tributes to his work by Calvino, Emile dell'Ova, and Borges. A second manuscript, discovered in 1787, Hoc Genus Omne, was published in verse translation by the minor English poet Abraham Howper. It provides evidence that the Histories might have been wholly invented and that Pycletius never travelled beyond his home town of Carthago Nova (Carthagena). Contemporary commentators, however, considered Hoc Genus Omne to be the work of Howper himself, a fantasist.

PYE, Henry James (1745–1813). He became poet laureate in 1790, and was the constant butt of contemporary ridicule.

Pygmalion, one of the most popular plays of Bernard Shaw, first performed 1913 in Vienna, published in London, 1916.

It describes the transformation of a Cockney flower-seller, Eliza Doolittle, into a passable imitation of a duchess by the phonetician Professor Henry Higgins (modelled in part on H. Sweet, and played by Beerbohm Tree), who undertakes this task in order to win a bet and to prove his own points about English speech and the class system: he teaches her to speak standard English and introduces her successfully to social life, thus winning his bet, but she rebels against his dictatorial and thoughtless behaviour, and 'bolts' from his tyranny. The play ends with a truce between the two of them, as Higgins acknowledges that she has achieved freedom and independence, and emerged from his treatment as a 'tower of ledges that she has achieved freedom and independence...' Higgins tells us that she marries the docile and devoted Freddy, and 'bolts' from his tyranny. The play ends with a toadies of Sir Mulberry Hawk.

The Pylon school, a nickname for the group of younger left-wing poets of the 1930s, chiefly Auden, Day-Lewis, MacNeice, and Spender, alluding to the rather self-conscious use of industrial imagery in their work. Spender's poem 'The Pylons' was published in 1933, and pylons and skyscrapers appear in Day-Lewis's poem to Auden ('Look west, Wystan, lone flyers') in The Magnetic Mountain (1933); Auden's own verse features power stations ('Out on the lawn I lie in bed', 1933), and landscapes of arterial roads and filling stations are evoked in, e.g., Auden and Isherwood's The Dog beneath the Skin (1935), whereas MacNeice's early work has a high preponderance of poems about trains and trams.

PYKE and PLUCK, in Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby, the toadies of Sir Mulberry Hawk.

PYM, Barbara Mary Crampton (1913–80), novelist, the daughter of a Shropshire solicitor. She was educated at St Hilda's College, Oxford, and later worked at the International African Institute in London. Her novels include Excellent Women (1952), Less than Angels (1955), A Glass of Blessings (1958, described by Larkin as 'the sublest of her books'), and Quartet in Autumn (1977). They are satirical tragi-comedies of middle-class life, and contain some distinctive portraits of church-going spinsters and charismatic priests; many of the relationships described consist of a kind of celibate flirtation.

PYNCHON, Thomas (1937– ), American novelist, born on Long Island, New York, and educated at Cornell. His novels are less concerned with character than with the effects of historical and political processes on individual behaviour. Their fragmented picaresque narratives, often based around outlandish quests, blend paranoia, literary game-playing, bawdy humour, social satire, and fantasy; science provides an important source of metaphor and subject matter. He began his first novel while working as a technical writer for the Boeing Aircraft Corporation. This was V (1963), a long and complex allegorical fable interweaving the picaresque adventures of a group of contemporary Americans with the secret history of a shape-changing spy, 'V', who represents a series of female archetypes. The Crying of Lot 49 (1966, UK 1967) is a paranoid mystery story mixing philosophical speculation with satirical observation of American culture in the 1960s. Gravity's Rainbow (1973) is a multi-layered black comedy set at the close of the Second World War: its convoluted plots and conspiracies reflect the socio-political processes threatening personal freedom. In Vineland (1990), a darkly humorous conspiracy thriller, participants in the 'counter-culture' of the 1960s face up to the conservative political scene of the 1980s. Mason & Dixon (1997) is a pastiche historical novel, based on the adventures of the two 18th-cent. British surveyors who established the Mason–Dixon line, drawing parallels between the political and scientific upheavals of the Age of Reason and those of the late 20th cent.

Pyrocles, in Spenser's Faerie Queene, symbolizes rage. He is the brother of Cymochles, the son of old Acrates and Despight (ii. iv. 41). On his shield is a flaming fire, with the words Burnt I do burne. He is overcome by Sir Guyon (ii. v), and tries to drown himself in a lake to quench his flames. He is rescued and healed by Archimago (ii. vi. 42–51), and finally killed by Prince Arthur (ii. viii).

Pyrocles, the young prince of Macedon in Sidney's Arcadia, who adopts a disguise as an Amazon in order to woo Philoclea.

PYTHAGORAS, a Greek philosopher, native of Samos, who lived in the second half of the 6th cent. BC. He settled in Cortona in Italy where he founded a brotherhood who combined ascetic practices and mystical beliefs with the study of mathematics. Pythagoras is credited with the discovery of the proof of the proposition that the square on the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on the other two sides, which is called therefore the Pythagorean Theorem. He worked out a mathematical basis for music and supposed the heavenly bodies to be divided by intervals according to the laws of musical harmony, whence arose the idea of the harmony of the spheres. He discovered the rotation of the earth on its axis and found in this the causes of day and night. His religious teaching centred on the doctrine of metempsychosis, or the transmigration of souls from man to man, man to animal, or animal to man in a process of purification or punishment. There are references to this Pythagorean doctrine in the dialogue between Feste and Malvolio (Twelfth Night, iv. ii), in The Merchant of Venice (iv. i), and in As You Like It (iii. ii); and Faustus, in Marlowe's tragedy, cries in his last moments of anguish, 'Ah, Pythagoras' metempsychosis, were that true? This soul should fly from me' (Dr Faustus, v. ii). The Pythagorean Letter is the Greek letter upsilon Υ used as symbol of the divergent paths of vice and virtue. His teachings exerted a marked influence on later Greek philosophers and notably on *Plato.

Pythias, see DAMON AND PITHIAS.
The initial of German Quelle, ‘source’, is the symbol used, in the comparative study of the synoptic Gospels, to designate a supposed Greek translation of a collection attributed to Matthew of the logia of Christ, from which the parts common to the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, but omitted from Mark, are derived. It is supposed to have contained certain narrative parts, but not the Passion.

‘Q’, see Jerrold, D. W., and Quiller-Couch.

Quadrivium, the higher division of the Seven Liberal Arts, comprising the sciences, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music (as distinct from the methodological subjects of the Trivium, grammar, rhetoric, and logic). Although the Liberal Arts in groupings of this kind were a staple of Greek and Roman education, the Quadrivium as such originates with Martianus Capella (early 5th cent.), followed by Boethius and his pupil Cassiodorus whose 6th-cent. On the Arts and Disciplines of the Liberal Letters was the definitive text for the Middle Ages. The Quadrivium had great importance for the writers of Chartres in the 11th-12th cents; it was neglected by the metaphysical synthesists of the 13th cent., and became associated thereafter with Oxford rather than with the Schools of Continental Europe, which were less interested in the material sciences. (See Bacon, R.) See G. Leff, Medieval Thought: St Augustine to Ockham (1958), passim.

Quakers, members of the Society of Friends.

Quaritch, Bernard (1819–99), bookseller. At first employed by Bohn, he started his own firm in 1847. He was the first to publish FitzGerald’s The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (1859). He was the author of the valuable bibliographical work A General Catalogue (1887–97). His interests were wide and above all he was known as a collector of incunabula, fine manuscripts, Bibles, Shakespeariana, early English literature, and cartography.

Quarles, Francis (1592–1644), born near Romford in Essex, was educated at Christ’s College, Cambridge, and at Lincoln’s Inn. He made his reputation in the 1620s by a series of biblical paraphrases (e.g. A Feast for Wormes, 1620), and in 1629 published a ‘vain amatory poem’, Argalus and Parthenia, based on an episode in Sidney’s Arcadia. He is chiefly remembered for his extremely successful and popular Emblems (1635) and Hieroglyphikes of the Life of Man (1638). In 1639 he was appointed chronologer to the City of London. From 1640 he turned to prose, publishing pamphlets, some anonymous, holding a constitutionalist–royalist position. A petition circulated against him in 1644 accused him of popery, but A. Wood declared that he was a Puritan. Eclogues (1646) and a comedy, The Virgin Widow (1649), were published posthumously. A nearly complete collection of his works was edited by Grosart (3 vols, 1880–1) and additional poems by J. Hordern (1960).

Quarterly Review (1809–1967), founded by John Murray as a Tory rival to the Whig Edinburgh Review. Sir W. Scott, who had been harshly reviewed in the Edinburgh, became an ardent supporter of the venture but refused the editorship. The journal stood for the defence of the established order, Church, and Crown; its unwavering adherence to the bishops and the Church was satirized by Peacock in Melincourt. Its tone was magisterial from the beginning, and its influence, both literary and political, was for the best part of the century matched only by that of the Edinburgh. The first editor, Gifford, brought with him several clever writers from the Anti-Jacobin, including Canning and Frere, but the quality of his chief writers (largely Scott and Southey) could not match that of the Edinburgh, who had Hazlitt, Macaulay, Carlyle, and Jeffrey, among many others. The Quarterly’s enemies averred that its political bias strongly affected its literary criticism. However, unlike the Edinburgh, it supported the Lake school and Byron, although it fiercely condemned Keats, Hunt, Hazlitt, Lamb, Shelley, and later Tennyson, Macaulay, Dickens, and Brontë. Two of its more famous early articles were those of Scott in praise of J. Austen’s Emma; and Croker’s review of Keats’s Endymion. Gifford was succeeded as editor in 1825 by Lockhart, who was followed by a distinguished line, including members of the Murray family.

Quasimodo, Salvatore (1901–68), Italian poet associated with hermeticism, awarded the Nobel Prize (1959). His main collections are Acque e terre (Water and Land, 1930), Oboe sommerso (Sunken Oboe, 1932), and Ed è subito sera (And it’s Suddenly Evening, 1942). After the Second World War his hermeticism yielded to a more extrovert poetry of social conscience, as in Con il piede straniero sopra il cuore (With the Alien Foot on Our Heart, 1946), La vita non è sogn (Life Is Not Dream, 1949), and Dare e avere (Giving and Having, 1966). He has been translated by R. Wilbur.

Queen Mab, a visionary and ideological poem by P. B. Shelley, written in England and Wales during his early period of political activism, published privately 1813, when he was 21.
The poem is in nine cantos, using 'didactic and descriptive' blank verse greatly indebted to *Milton and to Southey's *Thalaba. Despite its lyrical opening, invoking 'Death and his brother Sleep' and Mab the Fairy Queen in her time-chariot (Cantos I and II), the poem largely consists of attacks on Monarchy (III), War (IV), Commerce (V), and Religion (VI and VII). In place of these Shelley celebrates a future of Republicanism, Free Love, Atheism, and Vegetarianism. The verse is furious and polemical in style, with occasional passages of grandiloquent beauty, such as Canto VIII, presaging Asia's speeches in *Prometheus Unbound. Seventeen remarkable prose Notes are attached as Appendices, many of them substantial essays, 'against Jesus Christ, & God the Father, & the King, & the Bishops, & Marriage, & the Devil knows what', as Shelley himself later put it. They are often better than the poetry: Note 9 on Free Love is especially striking, showing the influence of *Hume, *Godwin, *Wollstonecraft, and *Rousseau. The work was extremely popular among working-class radicals, and ran to 14 cheap editions by 1840.

Queen of Cornwall, The Famous Tragedy of the, a poetic drama by T. *Hardy, published 1923.

The play is a retelling of the old story of King Mark, the two Iseults, and Tristram. The events are conjured up by Merlin, and the Chanters perform as chorus. Queen Iseult has been to seek her love Tristram in Brittany, but is told that he is dead. Tristram discovers that his wife, Iseult of Brittany, had deceived him in telling him that the queen would not come to him. Disguised as a harper, he travels to Cornwall, followed by his wife. King Mark, the jealous husband of Queen Iseult, discovers his wife with Tristram and kills him. The queen then stabs Mark and leaps over a cliff to her death. The play was first produced in 1923 by the Hardy Players in Dorchester.

Queen of the May, see MAY DAY.

Queen's Maries, or Marys, the, the four ladies named Mary attendant on *Mary Queen of Scots. The list is variously given, including: Mary Seton, Mary Beaton, Mary Livingstone, Mary Fleming, Mary Hamilton, and Mary Carmichael. They are frequently mentioned in Scottish ballads.

Queen's Wake, The, a poem by J. *Hogg, published 1813. Queen Mary of Scotland holds her 'wake' at Holyrood, during which seventeen bards, including Rizzio, sing their songs in competition. These are verse tales in various styles: martial, comic, horrible, or mystical. The most memorable is the tale of *Kilmeny, but 'The Witch of Fife' is also an effective work.

QUENNELL, Peter (1905–94), poet, biographer, and editor, and the son of social historians Marjorie and C. H. B. Quennell, educated at Berkhamsted Grammar School and Balliol College, Oxford. He was editor of the Cornhill Magazine (1944–51). His first volume, Masques and Poems (1922), was followed by many other works, including Four Portraits (1945; studies of Boswell, Gibbon, Sterne, and Wilkes) and works on Pope, Byron, Ruskin, and Dr Johnson. The Marble Foot (1976) is a volume of autobiography.

Quentin Durward, a novel by Sir W. *Scott, published 1823.

One of the most vigorous and readable of Scott's novels, Quentin Durward is set in 15th-cent. France and Burgundy. It was Scott's first venture onto the mainland of Europe, and his story of a young Scots soldier of fortune serving in the guard of Louis XI had an enthusiastic reception in Paris. As in many of Scott's novels, the plot deals with the breakdown of traditional chivalric values and the opposition (and here, the reconciliation) of romance and reality.

Querno, in Pope's Dunciad (II. 15), was an Apulian poet to whom the author compares C. *Cibber. According to Paulus Jovius, Querno, hearing that Pope Leo X patronized literature, set out for Rome where he recited some 20,000 lines of his Alexias and was made poet laureate as a joke.

Quest for Corvo, The: An Experiment in Biography, a life of Frederick *Rolfe by A. J. A. *Symons, published in 1934. This account dwells as much on the author's pursuit of his evasive and eccentric subject as on his findings, and was a pioneer in what was to be a new genre of biography, in which the biographer's difficulties and setbacks were to become part of the story: see Ian *Hamilton’s life of *Salingcr, and R. *Holmes, *Footsteps (1985).

Questing Beast, the, in *Malory, pursued by *Palomydes the Saracen. See GLATYSAUNT BEAST.

QUEVEDO Y VILLEGAS, Francisco de (1580–1645), great Spanish satirist, author of the picaresque novel La vida del Buscón (1626), translated into English (through a French intermediary) by John Davies of Kidwelly as The Life and Adventures of Buscan (1657), and later by J. Stevens as The Life of Paul the Spanish Sharper (1707). His Suenos (1627), which are biting satiric portraits of members of all classes of society, were translated by Richard Croshawe of the Inner Temple (from the French) as Visions, or, Hels Kingdom (1640), and later by *L'Estrange (1667). Quevedo also wrote political works, satirical poetry, etc.

Quickly, Mistress, in Shakespeare's 1 and 2 *Henry IV, hostess of the Boar's Head Tavern in Eastcheap; Falstaff is betrothed and in debt to her. In The Merry Wives of Windsor she is housekeeper to Dr Caius. In Henry V she is married to *Pistol and describes Falstaff's death (II. iii.

Quietism, a form of religious mysticism (originated before 1675 by *Molinos), consisting in passive devotional contemplation, with extinction of the will and withdrawal from all things of the senses [OED]. One of the best-known exponents of Quietist doctrines was *Fénelon, whose *Maximes des saints, embodying his opinions, was condemned by Rome. Another noted Quietist was Mme Guyon (1648–1717).

QUILLER-COUCH, Sir Arthur Thomas (1863–1944), son of a Cornish doctor, educated at Clifton and Oxford, where he began writing parodies under the pseudonym 'Q', which he used all his life. His prolific literary career opened with the publication of a novel of his early years. See a life by F. Brittain (1947).

Quilp, Daniel and Mrs, characters in Dickens's *The Old Curiosity Shop.

QUILTER, Roger (1877–1953), English composer, remembered chiefly for his many songs, which were fluently and sensitively written and very popular in their day. His Three Shakespeare Songs (1905) are outstanding among his many Shakespeare settings, and songs like 'Love's Philosophy' (*Shelley) and 'Now sleeps the crimson petal' (*Tennyson, *The Princess) were staple recital diet during the first half of the 20th cent.

QUIN, Ann (1936–73), novelist, born in Brighton, Sussex. Her best-known novel is Berg (1964), the story of a young man who travels to an English seaside resort in order to murder his father. Like Three (1966), Passages (1969), and Tripticks (1972), it is unorthodox in form, owing more to the French nouveau roman than the English social realist novel. Quin's lifelong struggle against depression ended in suicide at the age of 37.

QUIN, James (1693–1766), an actor who first made his name playing Bajazet in Rowe's Tamerlane. He took leading parts in tragedy at Drury Lane, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and Covent Garden. He was the last of the old school of actors, which gave place to that of *Garrick. Smollett introduces him in Humphry Clinker. Quinbus Flestrin, 'the Great Man-Mountain', the name by which Gulliver was known in Lilliput (Gulliver's Travels, ch. 2), and sometimes used as a pseudonym in magazines of the period.

Quince, Peter, in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, a carpenter, the stage manager of the interlude 'Pyramus and Thisbe'.

QUINE, Willard Van Orman (1908– ), American mathematical logician and philosopher, born in Ohio and educated at Harvard, where he became Edgar Pierce professor of philosophy. He has defended a system of logic, inspired by B. *Russell, where singular terms are eliminated in favour of general terms. He has argued against the existence of a sharp distinction between analytic truths (e.g. 'All bachelors are unmarried') and synthetic truths (e.g. 'Hume was a bachelor'). He has also doubted the extent to which translation is possible between languages. His slogan, To be is to be the value of a variable, is a logician's criterion of what it is for something to exist. Quine's works include Methods of Logic (1950), From a Logical Point of View (1953), and Word and Object (1960).

QUINTILIAN (Marcus Fabius Quintilianus) (AD c.35–c.100), Roman rhetorician, educationist, and literary critic. His monumental De Institutione Oratoria (On the Education of an Orator) is not only a treatise on rhetoric, but discusses also the training of an ideal orator for whom Quintilian like Cicero advocates a wide general education; Book 10 contains a critical history of Greek and Roman literature. Petrarch lamented in his Epistle to Quintilian that 'he came torn and mangled into my hands'; the complete text of the Institutio became known only after Poggio Bracciolini unearthed a complete text in St Gall in 1416, after which it served the humanists as a guide on all literary and educational matters. Jonson excerpted it in Timber, Milton referred to it in the Tetrachordon sonnet, and *Dryden cited it on a number of points.

Quixote, see Don Quixote.
Raban, Jonathan (1942– ), travel writer, sailor, and novelist, born in Norfolk, the son of an Anglican clergyman, and educated at the University of Hull; he subsequently lectured at the universities of Aberystwyth and East Anglia. His works include Soft City (1974), a study of London life; Arabia through the Looking Glass (1979); and Old Glory (1982), an account of a voyage down the Mississippi. Coasting (1986) is an account of a 1982 journey by ketch round the British Isles, which combines autobiography, marine scholarship, and sharp political commentary. Foreign Land (1985) is a novel which also returns to England, seen through the eyes of a returning exile. For Love and Money (1987) combines essays and autobiography. Hunting Mister Heartbreak (1990) is a journey exploring American emigration and identity, and Bad Land: An American Romance (1996) is an account of the settling of Montana by aspiring immigrant farmers and homesteaders, and of the disillusionment that overcame so many of them when beset by drought. Both are characteristic mixtures of a first-hand exploration and reading of the landscape, interviews, personal encounters, and imaginative interpretation of documentary sources: they manifest Raban’s understanding of adventurers and loners, pitted against powerful natural forces. Raban edited The Oxford Book of the Sea (1992).

Rabelais, François (c.1494–c.1553), French physician, humanist, and satirist. The son of a Touraine lawyer, he became successively a Franciscan monk, the secretary of the bishop of Maillezais (c.1524), and a bachelor of medicine from Montpellier (1530). He published various works on archaeology and medicine in Latin, and in French the satirical entertainments with the popular giants *Gargantua and Pantagruel for which he is remembered. He travelled regularly in France and Italy, and acquired a widespread reputation for his erudition and medical skill. For much of his life he enjoyed the patronage of Cardinal Jean du Bellay and the protection of Francis I, but he was subject to frequent proscriptions and condemnations. Rabelais’ great prose work is a unique expression of Renaissance energy and plenitude. His comic inventiveness, ranging from obscenity, wit, and jokes to parody, invective, and fantasy, is inexhaustible. His intellectual curiosity, which encompasses virtually all the sciences of his age—theology, law, medicine, natural science, politics, military art, navigation, botany, Hebrew, Basque, etc.—is insatiable. His knowledge of contemporary life and society, from rustics, artisans, and monks to merchants, landowners, and academics, is without rival. His command of the vernacular, sustained by an encyclopaedic vocabulary and a virtuoso’s rhetorical repertoire, and extending beyond French and its dialects to a dozen contemporary languages, remains unique in French literature. His realism recognizes the physical functions of mankind, affirms its uncorrupted origins, trusts in the effectiveness of virtuous action, and urges gaiety of mind as a supreme good. Although he was known to G. *Harvey and F. *Bacon, he was not translated into English until *Urquhart’s magisterial version of 1653 (Books I and II) and 1693–4 (Book III together with *Motteux’s translation of Books IV and V). Thereafter his influence on English literature was widespread, though particularly marked on S. *Butler, *Swift, *Sterne, *Peacock, and *Joyce.

Racine, Jean (1639–99), French tragic dramatist. He was informally educated by the Jansenists of Port-Royal, but was estranged from them between 1666 and 1677, during which time he wrote the majority of his plays. His tragedies derive from various sources: from Greek and Roman literature, Andromaque (1667), Iphigénie (1674), and Phèdre (1677); from Roman history, Britannicus (1669), Bérénice (1670), and Mithridate (1673); from recent Turkish history, Bajazet (1672); and from the Bible, Esther (1689) and Athalie (1691). He also wrote one comedy, Les Plaideurs (1668), drawn from *Aristophanes. Central to the majority of the tragedies is a perception of the blind folly of human passion, continually enslaved to the pursuit of its object and destined always to be unsatisfied. The plays were extensively translated into English from the 1670s, but differences in national tastes and dramatic conventions have rendered most English versions wildly unfaithful to their originals. The most famous of these versions was The Distrest Mother, an adaptation of Andromaque by A. *Philips, which ran to many editions between 1712 and the 1820s. There are modern versions of Phèdre by R. *Lowell (1961) and T. *Harrison (1975).

Rackham, Arthur (1867–1939), children’s book illustrator. Amongst his most successful works are Fairy Tales of the Brothers Grimm (1900), Rip Van Winkle (1905), which established him as the fashionable illustrator of his time, and Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens (1906). Rackham’s vein of fantasy is Nordic—he created a sinister world, full of the twisting roots and tendrils of gnarled trees with gnome-like faces, and peopled by goblins, birds, mice, and monsters. Rackham believed passionately in ‘the stimulating and educative power of fantastic and playful pictures and writings for children in their impressionable years'. See also FAIRY STORIES.

RADCLIFFE, Mrs Ann (1764–1823), daughter of a London tradesman, William Ward; she married in 1786 William Radcliffe, manager of the English Chronicle. In the next twelve years she published five novels, The Castles of Athlin and Dunbayne (1789), A Sicilian Romance (1790), The Romance of the Forest (1791), The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794), and The Italian (1797), and a description of journeys to Holland, Germany, and the Lake District. A further romance, Gaston de Blondeville, and her journals of travels in southern England were published after her death. She and her husband led such a retired life that unfounded rumours that she was already dead or insane circulated towards the end of her life. She suffered much from asthma, and died of pneumonia.

She was the leading exponent of the Gothic novel, which relates terrifying adventures in lonely castles. On human relationships she was unconvincing, but her portrayals of the raptures and terrors of her characters' imagination in solitude are compelling, and she was one of the first novelists to include vivid descriptions of landscape, weather, and effects of light. Her plots were wild and improbable, but she was expert at maintaining suspense and devising striking incidents. Her novels were immensely popular throughout Europe, and were much imitated. The £500 advance which she received for Udolpho was then unprecedented for a novel. See Memoir by T. N. Talfourd, in Posthumous Works of Ann Radcliffe (1833); Aline Grant, Ann Radcliffe (1951).

Radigund, in Spenser's Faerie Queene (v. iv–vii), a queen of the Amazons, who subdues Artegall and forces him to spin flax and tow until he is rescued by Britomart.

Ragged Trousered Philanthropists, The, see TRESSELL.

It opens as a family chronicle relating the history of the long-established Brangwen family of Marsh Farm, on the Derbyshire–Nottinghamshire border. Tom Brangwen marries the vicar's housekeeper, a Polish widow who already has a daughter, Anna, by her first marriage. Tom takes the child to his heart. Anna marries Will Brangwen, Tom's nephew, a craftsman and draughtsman at a lace factory; they move into Yew Tree Cottage, Cossethay, and produce over the succeeding years a large family, of which the two eldest are Ursula and Gudrun of Women in Love. Ursula becomes the 'child of her father's heart', and the interest of the novel gradually shifts to her developing consciousness. When she is about 8 her grandfather is drowned one night when the canal embankment bursts, and Ursula grows close to her grandmother Lydia at the Marsh, intrigued by her Polish heritage; her interest is reinforced when she meets Anton, son of a Polish émigré friend of Lydia's, Baron Skrebensky, who had married an English girl late in life. Ursula and Anton fall in love, but he, a subaltern, departs for the Boer War, leaving her to finish school. She has a brief but intense relationship with a schoolmistress (Wini fred, who marries her uncle, colliery manager Tom Brangwen), then matriculates, and resolves to earn her living as a teacher, somewhat against her parents' wishes. Her struggles at a poor school in Ilkeston are based on Lawrence's own teaching experience there (1902–6). Will Brangwen is appointed Art and Hand work Instructor for the county of Nottingham, and the whole family move to Beldover, Ursula embarking on a three-year BA course and Gudrun on studies at the Art School. Anton returns, and they renew their relationship, become engaged, and plan to go out to India together, but Ursula breaks away, and Anton abruptly marries his colonel's daughter. The novel ends with Ursula emerging from a spell of illness and suffering (and an implied miscarriage) to contemplate a rainbow arching symbolically over the ugly industrial landscape. The book is remarkable for its study of the 'recurrence of love and conflict' within the marriages it describes; for its attempt to capture the flux of human personality; and for its sense of a mystic procreative contingency within the 'rhythm of eternity' both of the seasons and the Christian year.

Raine, Craig Anthony (1944–), poet, born in Bishop Auckland, Co. Durham, educated at Barnard Castle School and Exeter College, Oxford, where he became a lecturer. He subsequently lectured at Lincoln College and at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1981 he became poetry editor at Faber & Faber, returning to Oxford in 1991 as a fellow of New College. From 1971 to 1981 he combined his career as a don with journalism, writing and reviewing for the New Review, Quarto, and the New Statesman. A collection of his critical work from this period, together with later pieces, was published as Haydn and the Valve Trumpet (1990). In 1972 he married Ann Pasternak Slater. His first collection of poetry, The Onion, Memory, was published in 1978 and attracted a good deal of critical attention, as did his second volume, A Martian Sends a Postcard Home (1979). In both books he displayed great metaphorical vitality and individuality and as a result of his inventive transformations of the everyday was credited by some critics with having instigated a 'Martian' school of poetry. The same approach continued in A Free Translation (1981) and Rich (1984), in which his father appears in a central prose account of his childhood, 'A Silver Plate'. 1953 (1990) was a version of Racine's Andromaque. History: The Home Movie (1994) is a 'novel' in verse, a chronicle of the Raine and Pasternak families set against the background of 20th-century European history. Clay: Whereabouts Unknown appeared in 1996. He also wrote The Electrification of the Soviet Union, an adaptation of Boris Pasternak's The Last Summer, as a libretto for an opera by Nigel Osborne (1986).

RAINE, Kathleen Jessie (1908– ), poet and critic, the daughter of a Scottish mother and a Northumbrian father, and educated at Girton College, Cambridge. She was formerly married to Charles *Madge. She published many collections of poetry, from her first, Stone and Flower (1943), to her Collected Poems of 1981, and also three volumes of autobiography, Farewell Happy Fields (1973), The Land Unknown (1975), and The Lion's Mouth (1977). Later collections include The Oracle in the Heart (1986), The Presence: Poems 1984–7 (1988), and Living with Mystery: Poems 1987–91 (1992). Much of her poetry is inspired by the landscapes of Scotland, particularly of Wester Ross, and has what she describes as 'a sense of the sacred', an intense and mystic vision of the vitality of the natural world which also informs her critical work on *Blake and the *Neoplatonic tradition. In 1981 she founded the review Temenos.

RAINOLDS, John (1549–1607), an Oxford academic among whose pupils was R. *Hooker. As well as composing Latin lectures on Aristotle which contributed to the development of euphuism (see Euphuism), and controversial works and Protestant apologetics, including his De Romanae Ecclesiae Idolatria (1596), he also took part in a controversy over the lawfulness of acting plays. His contributions to these were published in Th' Overthrow of Stage-Playes (1599).

Rake's Progress, The, a series of engravings by *Hogarth which inspired an opera by *Stravinsky of the same title with a libretto by W. H. *Auden in collaboration with Chester Kallman.

RALEGH, Sir Walter (1554–1618), born at Hayes Barton in south Devon; the sailor Sir Humfrey Gilbert was his half-brother. After little more than a year at Oriel College, Oxford, he spent four years as a volunteer with the Huguenot forces in France, being present at the battle of Montcontour in 1569. After a period in London loosely attached to the Middle Temple, Ralegh began his long career as an explorer and colonizer. In Ireland in 1580 he became acquainted with *Spenser, who approved of Ralegh's commanding role in the massacre of Smerwick, in which 600 Spanish mercenaries were killed. Throughout the 1580s he seems to have enjoyed royal favour, though *Fuller's story of his throwing a plush cloak over a puddle for the queen to tread on is most unlikely to be true. His marriage to Elizabeth Throckmorton, one of the maids of honour, led to a period of imprisonment in the summer of 1592. The journey to Guiana (now Venezuela) in 1595 in search of gold was in part a bid for royal favour; his leadership of the expedition to sack Cadiz harbour in June 1596 was a more successful one, and by adroitly dissociating himself from the earl of *Essex he maintained a strong position until the queen's death.

Ralegh's trial, on largely trumped-up charges of high treason, was one of the first events of James I's reign, and from 1603 to 1616 he was imprisoned in the Tower with his wife and family, a dead man in the eyes of the law. He was released to search out the gold mine he claimed to have discovered in Guiana 20 years before. On returning from this disastrous expedition, in which his eldest son was killed and his chief lieutenant, Keymis, committed suicide, a commission of inquiry set up under Spanish pressure determined that the gold mine was a fabrication, the old charge of treason was renewed, and on 29 Oct. 1618 Ralegh was executed.

His poems are beset by uncertainties as to date and authenticity, though a few of them, including the fragmentary '21th: and last booke of the Ocean to Scinthia', survive in his own handwriting. Two well-known poems formerly attributed to him, 'Walsingham' ('As you came from the holy land') and The Passionate Mans Pilgrimage ('Give me my Scallop shell of quiet'), are now thought to be his work. Among the authentic poems are his 'An Epitaph upon Sir Philip Sidney' and the prefatory sonnet to The Faerie Queene which begins, 'Methought I saw the grave, where Laura lay'. There are numerous prose works. His Report of the Truth of the Fight about the Isles of Acores (1591) was a source of Tennyson's 'The Revenge' (1878). His Discoverie of Guiana (1596) includes a description of 'Eldorado', and describes the plain-lands as a natural Eden:

still as we rowed, the deer came down feeding by the water's side, as if they had been used to a keeper's call.

The History of the World (1614), written during Ralegh's long imprisonment, was originally intended for Henry, prince of Wales (d. 1612). This ambitious book, which Ralegh worked on with the help of several assistants, deals with Greek, Egyptian, and biblical history up to 168 BC. The preface, at the beginning of which he affirms his 'fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust', summarizes modern European history, demonstrating the unchangeableness of God's judgement. The History contains many reflective passages, most characteristically elegiac in tone:

For this tide of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth, with a perpetuali ebbe and falling streame, but never floweth againe: our leafe once fallen, springeth no more, neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne us againe, with the garments of new leaves and flowers.

The best-known such passage comes on the final page:

O eloquent, just and mightie Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuadeth; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and desipshed: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched great-nesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic iacet.
The poems have been edited by A. Latham (1951); Pierre Lefranc’s Sir Walter Raleigh, écrivain (1968) offers detailed theories about the relationship of the poems to the life; C. A. Patrides has edited selections from The History of the World (1971).

RALEIGH, Sir Walter Alexander (1861–1922). After holding chairs at Liverpool and Glasgow, he became in 1904 the first holder of the chair of English literature at Oxford. Among his works are Style (1897), Milton (1900), and Shakespeare (1907), but in his day he was renowned more as a stimulating if informal lecturer than as a critic. He wrote the first volume of the official The War in the Air (1922), and his selected letters were published in 1926.

Ralpho, the squire in Butler’s *Hudibras. (See VAUGHAN, T.)

Ralph Roister Doister, the earliest known English comedy, by *Udall, probably performed about 1552 and printed about 1566, and perhaps played by Westminster boys while Udall was headmaster of that school. The play, in short rhymed doggerel, represents the courting of the widow Christian Custance, who is betrothed to Gawin Goodlucke, an absent merchant, by Roister, a swaggering simpleton, instigated thereto by the mischievous Mathew Merygreeke. Roister is repulsed and beaten by Custance and her maids; and Goodlucke, after being deceived by false reports, is reconciled to her. The play shows similarity to the comedies of *Plautus and *Terence.

Rambler, a twice-weekly periodical in 208 numbers issued by Dr *Johnson from 20 Mar. 1750 to 14 Mar. 1752.

The contents are essays on all kinds of subjects, character studies, allegories, Eastern fables, criticisms, etc., and were, with the exception of five, written by Johnson himself. The moral seriousness of his enterprise is indicated by the fact that he wrote a prayer on beginning the work, and in the last paper he claimed never to have exploited ‘the topic of the day’. The other contributors were *Richardson, E. *Carter, Mrs *Chapone, and Catherine Talbot (1720–70). Despite initial protests against its ‘solemn’ tone, the Rambler was pirated and imitated, and went through ten numbered reprints in Johnson’s lifetime.

RAMSAY, Allan (1686–1758), Scottish poet, born in Lanarkshire, who came to Edinburgh where he spent most of his life. He was a wigmaker, then a bookseller, and an important figure in Edinburgh literary society; he opened the first circulating library in Edinburgh in 1726 (see LIBRARIES, CIRCULATING). In 1718 he brought out anonymously several editions of *Christis Kirk on the Green, with supplementary verses of his own in fake antique *Scots, and also various vernacular mock elegies. A collection of his elegies and satires appeared in 1721. In 1724–37 he issued The Tea-Table Miscellany, one of the more famous 18th-century collections of songs and ballads, and in 1724 The Ever Green, which contained work by the great poets of late medieval Scotland, notably *Dunbar and *Henryson, though with revisions and additions of his own. These contributed much to the revival of vernacular Scottish poetry, and in his preface to the latter Ramsay makes clear his patriotic intentions: ‘When these good old Bards wrote, we had not yet made Use of imported Trimming’. Ramsay’s pastoral comedy The Gentle Shepherd (1725), with its Scots songs, was very successful and much admired by *Boswell among others for its ‘beautiful rural imagery’ and its ‘real picture of manners’. His son, also Allan (1713–84), became a well-known portrait painter; *Hume and *Rousseau were among his subjects.

RAMUS, Petrus (Latin form of Pierre de la Ramée) (1515–72), French philosopher and grammarian. A supporter of the Protestant faith, he perished in the massacre of St *Bartholomew, an event portrayed by Marlowe in *The Massacre at Paris. His Dialectique of 1555, the first work of its kind to be written in French, systematically challenged Aristotelian and *Scholastic logic. It was introduced into England in the late 16th cent. and obtained wide academic currency, especially at Cambridge. His followers were known as Ramists and his anti-Scholastic system of logic as Ramism. Walter J. Ong has written historical studies of Ramus and edited several of his Latin works.

RANDOLPH, Thomas (1605–35), educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became known as a writer in English and Latin verse. He returned to London in 1632. His principal plays are *Amyntas, a pastoral comedy, and *The Muses Looking-Glasse, printed 1638; and *Hey for Honesty, printed 1651. He wrote an eclogue included in *Annalia Dubrensia, verses in celebration of the *Cotswold Games. His plays and poems were edited by W. C. *Hazlitt (1875).

RANDS, William Brighty (1823–82), the ‘laureate of the nursery’, who wrote sometimes under the pseudonyms Henry Holbeach and Matthew Browne. His best-known work was Lilliput Lieve (1864), a book of verse for children with illustrations by *Millais and G. J. Pinwell, which was followed by *Lilliput Lectures (1871, mostly prose), and Lilliput Legends (1872). All three were published anonymously. He was a reporter in the House of Commons, and also wrote a good deal of miscellaneous journalism.

Rankenian Club, one of the most influential 18th-cent. Edinburgh clubs, founded c.1717 by a group of radical divinity students who were admirers of the moral and political writings of the third earl of *Shaftesbury. Its leading members rose to prominence in the universities, the Church, medicine, and the law, and were influential in the improvement of literary style in Edinburgh. Lord Auchinleck, father of *Boswell, was a member.
Ransom, John Crowe (1888–1974), American poet and critic, born in Tennessee, the son of a Methodist minister, and educated there and at Oxford. From 1937 to 1958 he was a professor at Kenyon College, Ohio, where he founded and edited the important Kenyon Review, a scholarly publication committed to the close textual analysis associated with the *New Criticism. His critical works include God without Thunder (1930) and *The New Criticism (1941), the latter an independent survey of the works of I. A. *Richards, Y. *Winters, and others. His period of activity as a poet was relatively brief, but his output, notably in *Chills and Fever (1924) and *Two Gentlemen in Bonds (1927), is impressive, and he is particularly remembered for his formal, subtle, taut ballad-portraits and elegies, which include ‘Captain Carpenter’ and ‘Bells for John Whiteside’s Daughter’.

Ransom, Arthur Michell (1884–1967), journalist and author, born in Leeds, the son of a professor of history, and educated at Rugby. He started work in London as office boy for Grant *Richards, then graduated to ghost-writing, reviewing, and short story writing, and eventually became a reporter, first for the *Daily News, then (in 1919) for the *Manchester Guardian. He went to Russia in 1913 to learn the language, and covered the revolution at first hand for the *Daily News; his collection of Russian legends and fairy stories, Old Peter’s Russian Tales (1916), had a considerable success. In 1924 he married, as his second wife, Evgenia Shelepin, who had been Trotsky’s secretary. He is best remembered for his classic sequence of novels for children, which reflect his keen interest in sailing, fishing, and the countryside: beginning with Swallows and Amazons (1930) and ending with Great Northern? (1947), it describes the adventures of the Walker (Swallow) and Blackett (Amazon) families, and various of their friends, in the Lake District, the Norfolk Broads, and other vividly drawn locations. See The *Autobiography of Arthur Ransome (1976), ed. Rupert Hart-Davis, and a biography by Hugh Brogan (1984).

Ranters, a miscellaneous sect of heretical Puritan extremists whose heresies, which mushroomed in the late 1640s and early 1650s, were founded on the Inner Light and included freedom from the moral law (antinomianism), community of goods and women, abolition of tithes, the futility of the Bible, the non-existence of hell, the excellence of tobacco and alcohol, and mystical Pantheism (Jacob Bauthumley’s ‘God in an ivy-leaf’). Notorious Ranters included L. *Clarkson, A. *Coppe, Richard Coppin, and Joseph Salmon. Hack-writers exploited their reputation for orgiastic sex by inventing sensational reports, leading some modern historians to claim that ‘there was no Ranter movement’ (J. C. Davis, Fear, Myth and History). However, C. *Hill has written persuasively about their revolutionary anarchism in *The World Turned upside down (1972).

Rao, Raja (1909– ), Indian writer, born at Hassan, Karnataka, and educated at Nizam College, Hyderabad, and the universities of Montpellier and the Sorbonne. His first novel, Kanthapura (1938), an account of the Independence movement seen from the perspective of a small south Indian village grandmother, attempts to forging an Indian idiom and tempo through the medium of the English language. This was followed by the more sophisticated *The Serpent and the Rope (1960), the story of a young Indian Brahman intellectual, Rama, and his French wife Madeleine in their search for spiritual truth in India, France, and England. Rao’s stories have been collected in The Cow of the Barricades (1947) and *The Policeman and the Rose (1978) and On the Ganga Ghat (stories, 1989). Later works include The Chessmaker and His Moves (1988). See *ANGLO-INDIAN LITERATURE.

Rape, the performance of a rhythmic monologue over a pre-recorded instrumental backing. Rap was developed in the dance halls and clubs of North America as a way of exciting the crowds and allowing the rappers to show off their ability to rhyme. Rap studio recordings are now recognized as a legitimate branch of popular music. Many of the poets now referred to as rap poets are concerned not only with their rhyming skills but also with lyrical content.

Rape of Lucrece, The, a poem in rhyme-royal by *Shakespeare, published 1594 and dedicated to Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton. It is presumably the ‘graver labour’ which he promised to the earl in the dedication of *Venus and Adonis the previous year. It is a highly rhetorical expansion of the story as told by *Livy. See *LUCRETTA.

Rape of the Lock, The, a poem by *Pope, in two cantos, published in *Lintot’s Miscellany 1712 as ‘The Rape of the Locke’; subsequently enlarged to five cantos and thus published 1714.

When Lord Petre forcibly cut off a lock of Miss Arabella Fermor’s hair, the incident gave rise to a quarrel between the families. With the idea of allaying this, Pope treated the subject in a playful *mock-heroic poem, on the model of *Boileau’s *Le Lutrin. He presents Belinda at her toilet, a game of ombre, the snipping of the lock while Belinda sips her coffee, the wrath of Belinda and her demand that the lock be restored, the final wafting of the lock, as a new star, to adorn the skies. The poem was published in its original form with Miss Fermor’s permission. Pope then expanded the sketch by introducing the machinery of sylphs and gnomes, adapted from a light erotic French work, Le Comte de Gabalis, a series of five discourses by the Abbé de Montfaucon de Villars, which appeared in English in 1680; in his dedication he credits both Gabalis and the *Rosicrucians. (See also PARACELSUS.) One of Pope’s most brilliant performances, it has also been one of his most popular; Dr *Johnson called it ‘the most attractive of all ludicrous compositions’, in which 'New things are made familiar and familiar things are made new'.

Raphael (Raffaello Sanzio) (1483–1520), Italian painter, born in Urbino. He worked in Perugino's studio and then in Florence, and succeeded Bramante as architect of St Peter's. Throughout the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries Raphael was generally revered as the greatest of all artists; his supremacy was challenged by the romantic admirers of Michelangelo, and in the 19th century the *Pre-Raphaelites revolted—somewhat vaguely—against his authority.

Raphael, Frederic (1931– ), novelist, short story writer, and screenwriter, born in Chicago, educated at St John's College, Cambridge, and long resident in England. His novels, many of which deal with the dilemmas of educated middle-class life, include Obbligato (1956), The Limits of Love (1960, set partly in Jewish north London), and The Graduate Wife (1962). Lindmann (1963) is based on the historical incident of the break-up of the illegal immigrant ship, the SS Broda, in 1942, off the Turkish coast: in Raphael's version, the 'courteous and sad and homeless' Austrian Lindmann survives, and the tragedy is re-examined through the device of a screenplay written by London-based writer Dick Milstein. Other novels include Orchestra and Beginners (1967), Heaven and Earth (1985), and Coast to Coast (1998). Raphael's screenplays include Darling (1965, directed by John Schlesinger), a satire of life in the Swinging Sixties, and a six-part TV series, The Glittering Prizes (1976), which follows the careers of a group of artistic and theatrical Cambridge undergraduates from 1952 to the 1970s. Raphael also translated Catullus (1978, with K. McLeish) and Aeschylus (1991).

Rashdall, Hastings (1858–1924), philosopher and theologian, educated at New College, Oxford. His most important work, The Theory of Good and Evil (1907), expounds his own version of what he called 'ideal utilitarianism'. The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages (1895; new edn, ed. Powicke and Emden, 1936) is a standard work.

Raspe, Rudolf Erich, see MUNCHAUSEN.

Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, The History of, a didactic romance by Dr Johnson, published 1759, and composed during the evenings of a week to help his dying mother and eventually to pay for her funeral. It is an essay on the 'choice of life', a phrase repeated throughout the work, usually in italics.

Rasselas, a son of the emperor of Abyssinia, weary of the joys of the 'happy valley' where the inhabitants know only 'the soft vicissitudes of pleasure and repose', escapes to Egypt, accompanied by his sister Nekayah, her attendant Pekuah, and the much-travelled old philosopher Imlac. Here they study the various conditions of men's lives, and after a few incidents of no great importance resolve to return to Abyssinia, in a 'conclusion, in which nothing is concluded'. The charm of the work lies not in its plot, which is minimal, but in its wise and humane melancholy; in many ways it echoes the theme of The Vanity of Human Wishes, stressing that earthly happiness is unobtainable, and demonstrating that philosophers, hermits, and the wealthy all fail to achieve it. 'Harmless pleasures', Imlac concludes, are very rare. Thus, in the concluding chapters of the work, the emphasis shifts from 'the choice of life' to 'the choice of eternity'. Imlac also produces Johnson's celebrated definition of the 'business of a poet', which is to 'examine not the individual, but the species . . . he does not number the streaks of the tulip', and to write 'as the interpreter of nature, and the legislator of mankind . . . presiding over the thoughts and manners of future generations' (ch. X)—a phrase that anticipated Shelley's arguments in his Defence of Poetry. Rasselas, though much milder in tone, bears some resemblance in plan to Voltaire's Candide, published in the same year but not read by Johnson until later, when he himself commented on the similarity.

Rastell, John (c.1475–1536), printer, barrister, playwright, and brother-in-law of Sir T. More. He wrote and published an interlude called Four Elements (c.1520), and two comedies of c.1525, Calisto and Melibea and Gentleness and Nobility. The latter has been attributed to Rastell's son-in-law J. Heywood.

Rat, the Cat, and Lovel the dog, the, in the political rhyme:

> The Rat, the Cat, and Lovel the dog > Rule all England under the Hog, refer to three adherents of Richard III: Sir Richard Ratcliffe (killed at Bosworth, 1485), Sir John Catesby (d. 1486), and Francis, first Viscount Lovell (1454–788; his skeleton was found in a vault, where he had evidently starved to death). The Hog is a reference to the boar that figured as one of the supporters of the royal arms.

Rattigan, Sir Terence Mervyn (1911–77), the son of a diplomat. He was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Oxford, and early embarked on a career as a playwright. His first West End success was a comedy, French without Tears (1936, pub. 1937). This was followed by many other works, including The Winslow Boy (1946), a drama in which a father fights to clear his naval-cadet son of the accusation of petty theft, and The Browning Version (1948), about Crocker-Harris, a repressed and unpopular schoolmaster with a faithless wife: the title refers to Browning's Agamemnon of Aeschylus, presented to Crocker-Harris as a leaving present by his pupil Taplow. The heroine of The Deep Blue Sea (1952) is a judge's wife suffering from passion for a test pilot. Separate Tables (1954, pub. 1955) comprises two one-act plays set in a hotel, both studies of emotional failure and inadequacy; Ross (1960) is based on the life of T. E. Lawrence; and Cause Celebre (1977, pub. 1978) is based on an actual murder trial.
When Rattigan's Collected Works were published in 1953, he wrote a preface to the second volume in which he created the character of 'Aunt Edna', the average middle-brow matinée attender whom playwrights must take into account, and critics were later to use this light-hearted invention as a focus for their complaints about the middle-class, middle-brow nature of his own plays; the so-called kitchen sink dramatists of the 1950s and 1960s reacted against Rattigan (expressly, in the case of S. *Delaney), but his works are still much performed and admired, and Rudkin in a BBC Radio 3 programme in 1976 stressed not his celebrated 'craftsmanship' but his sense of 'existential bleakness and irresolvable carnal solitude'. A biography by M. Darlow and G. Hodson (1979) gives an account of his troubled personal life and successful career.

Rauf Coilyear, a rhymed poem of the Charlemagne cycle, in stanzas of 13 lines, of which a copy survives, printed in Scotland in 1572 (written probably c.1475). This humorous poem tells how Charlemagne loses his way and takes refuge in the hut of Rauf, a plain-spoken and self-willed charcoal-burner who treats him hospitably but with excessive freedom. Ed. S. J. Herrtage (EETS ES 39, 1882).

Raven, The, a poem by E. A. *Poe.

Ravenshoe, a novel by H. *Kingsley.

RAVERAT, Gwen(dolen Mary), née Darwin (1885–1957), wood-engraver and granddaughter of C. *Dar­win, born in Cambridge; her childhood is described in her autobiographical Period Piece (1952). Works illus­trated by her include Spring Morning (1915) by her cousin F. *Cornford, and various anthologies in asso­ciation with K. *Grahame. Her husband Jacques Raverat (d. 1925) was a correspondent of V. *Woolf.

RAWLINSON, Thomas (1681–1725), educated at Eton and St John’s College, Oxford, a book-collector, whose manuscripts are in the Bodleian Library. He was satirized by Addison in the Tatler (No. 158) as ‘Tom Folio’.

RAWLS, John (1921– ), American political philoso­pher, at Harvard since 1962, whose seminal A Theory ofJustice (1971) transformed the discipline by mounting a systematic defence of egalitarian liberalism under the label ‘justice as fairness’. This presents valid principles of social justice as those that would be agreed to by people in the ‘original position’, behind a ‘veil of ignorance’ that deprives them of knowledge about their own particular characteristics and ethical beliefs. His Political Liberalism (1993) develops and qualifies the theory, emphasizing the extent to which it builds upon ideas implicit in the public political cultures of, and is applicable specifically to, liberal democracies.

RAY, John (1627–1705), the son of a blacksmith, who became one of England’s greatest naturalists. He was pre-eminent a botanist (he originated the division of plants into monocotyledons and dicotyledons), but also took up the unfinished zoological work of his friend Francis Willughby. His Historia Plantarum was published 1686–1704, and his Wisdom of God Mani­fested in the Works of Creation (1691) went through many editions. He also published A Collection ofEnglish Proverbs (1670) and was keenly interested in phylology.

READ, Sir Herbert Edward (1893–1968), born in Yorkshire, and educated at Leeds University; he served in France throughout the First World War. He worked in the Victoria and Albert Museum, 1922–31, as professor of fine art in Edinburgh, 1931–3, and as editor of the Burlington Magazine, 1933–9. The first volumes of his spare, taut poems (much influenced by Imagism) were Songs of Chaos (1915) and Naked Warriors (1919), largely based on the war; these were followed by various volumes of collected poems, a long poem, The End of a War (1933), and the final Collected Poems of 1966. His critical work includes studies of Wordsworth, Malory, *Sterne, and others; Form in Modern Poetry (1932), The True Voice of Feeling (1953), and Essays in Literary Criticism (1969) contain much of his most valuable work. Many publications on art include Art and Industry (1934) and Education through Art (1943). His personal prose writing includes two records of trench life, In Retreat (1925) and Ambush (1930); The Innocent Eye (1933), a brief autobiography of his Yorkshire childhood, and a full autobiography in 1963, The Contrary Experience; and his only novel, The Green Child (1935), an allegorical fantasy, based on a folk tale, of the return to innocence. He also edited works by T. E. *Hulme, *Orage, Kropotkin, and *Jung, and various anthologies.

READ, Piers Paul (1941- ), novelist, son of Sir H. *Read, educated at Ampleforth and St John’s College, Cambridge. His novels, which combine the psychological thriller and strong narrative with political questioning, a well-travelled eye, Catholic apologia, and sharp analysis of the English class structure, include *Game in Heaven with Tussy Marx (1966), *The Junkers (1968, set in Germany), *Monk Dawson, (1969, the story of a defecting monk), and *The Professor’s Daughter (1971, set in America, as a wealthy liberal Harvard academic becomes fatally involved in student revolt at the time of Vietnam). *The Upstart (1973) is the story of Hilary Fletcher, son of a parson, who turns to crime and pursues a protracted revenge upon the aristocratic Yorkshire family which had humiliated him socially in his youth. Later works range widely, taking in settings in the Soviet Union (*The Villa Golitsyn) and in post-Soviet Europe (*A Patriot in Berlin, 1995). Read has also written books of reportage, including *Alive: The Story of the Andes Survivors (1974), based on an air crash and the cannibalism of its survivors, and *The Train Robbers (1978).

READE, Charles (1814-84), born at Ipsden, in Oxfordshire, the son of a solidly respectable country squire. In 1831 he won a demyship to Magdalen College, Oxford, beginning a long association which brought him a fellowship and various important college offices over the years. The effects of enforced celibacy (as required by college life) provided an important theme in several of his novels. He travelled abroad, then in 1842 began to study for the bar; in 1846 he tried studying medicine in Edinburgh; and in 1847, the year in which he obtained a DCL, he began to deal in violins, on which he was an expert. He began his literary career publishing a stage version of Smollett’s *Peregrine Pickle in 1851, and in 1852 entered on his long career as theatre manager and dramatist. *Masks and Faces, successfully produced in that year, became a novel, *Peg Woffington, in 1853. In that year he also published *Christie Johnstone, the first of his ‘reforming’ novels, urging the reform of prisons and the treatment of criminals, which was followed in 1856 by *It Is Never Too Late to Mend, a highly successful work in the same genre, which was later dramatized. *Gold!, a play converted in 1869 into the novel *Foul Play, also appeared in this prolific year. At the same time Reade was also writing short stories, working as a journalist, and writing plays. In 1854 he met the actress Mrs Seymour, with whom he lived until her death in 1879. *The Autobiography of a Thief and *Jack of All Trades (both greatly admired by *Orwell) appeared in 1858; *Love Me Little, *Love Me Long in 1859; and in 1861 the work for which he is chiefly remembered, *The Cloister and the Hearth. *Hard Cash, a novel exposing the scandal of lunatic asylums (which Reade considered ‘my best production’), appeared in 1863, and in 1866 *Griffith Gaunt, which some judge superior to *The Cloister and the Hearth. The frankness of its attitude to sexual problems provoked scandal and considerable litigation, in which Reade pugnaciously defended himself against ‘the Prurient Prudes’. For much of the rest of his life he was engaged in various personal and legal controversies. A long collaboration with *Boucicault, a highly successful adapter of plays and novels, began in 1867, and the last of Reade’s major novels, *Put Yourself in His Place, attacking the trade union practice of ‘rattening’ or enforcing membership, appeared in 1870. In 1871 he published another novel, *A Terrible Temptation, and in 1872 quarrelled with *Trollope over the adaptation of one of Trollope’s novels, following this with a libel action in 1873 over his own novel, *The Simpleton. *The Wandering Heir (1873), suggested by the Tichborne trial, was again both novel and play; Reade persuaded Ellen *Terry to emerge from retirement to perform in the stage version. He continued to produce short stories, journalistic work, and plays for his touring company, and to be embroiled in disputes and legal actions. By the time he published *A Woman Hater (1877) he had lost his determination to present honestly the problems of sex in society, and meekly agreed to all *Blackwood’s objections. After the death of Mrs Seymour in 1879 he wrote little, turned to religion, and in 1882 gave up theatrical management. *A Perilous Secret appeared posthumously in 1884.

Reade enjoyed great fame and success, and was accepted by the public as the natural successor of *Dickens (whose novels had considerably influenced him). Among critics, both the young H. *James and *Swinburne regarded him as a novelist of genius, and placed his work above that of G. *Eliot (a view which at the time did not apparently seem eccentric). But his reputation has considerably dimmed, and he is now remembered only for *The Cloister and the Hearth and *Griffith Gaunt. The ‘realism’ of his novels was based on immense research, recorded in intricate detail in his mass of notebooks; for *The Cloister and the Hearth, he read *Erasmus, *Froissart, *Luther, *chronicles, *jest books, and all the records he could find. He wished by this method to impart an authentic reality to his work, and also to discipline the ‘inner consciousness’, which he distrusted; but the detail of information is often thought to overwhelm his considerable narrative power. His expression of sexual frustration and fantasy (celibacy, he wrote, is ‘an invention wholly devilish’), and its place in religious feeling, was much stiled by the proprieties of the time. See M. Elwin, *Charles Reade (1931); W. Burns, *Charles Reade: A Study in Victorian Authorship (1961).

READE, William Winwood (1838-75), explorer, novelist, and nephew of C. *Reade. His explorations in West and South-West Africa are described in *Savage Africa (1863), *The African Sketchbook (1873), and *The Story of the Ashanti Campaign (1874). His other works, which aroused some controversy for their criticism of reader-response theory, a body of literary investigations, chiefly German and American, into the nature of the reader’s activity in the process of understanding literary texts. A major contribution to debates on this topic was made by Wolfgang Iser (1926— ), whose books The Implied Reader (1974) and The Act of Reading (1979) argue that a literary work is incomplete until the reader has ‘actualized’ those elements that are left to her imagination. The American psychologist Norman H. Holland (1927— ) attempted to demonstrate in Five Readers Reading (1975) that individual interpretations of the same text vary according to the reader’s ‘identity theme’. The more controversial arguments of Stanley Fish (1938— ) in his essays Is There a Text in This Class? (1980) include the claim that literary texts are produced by the strategies of interpretation that guide us to seek certain meanings in them; and that the way we read poems is determined by the ‘interpreting community’ in which we are trained. See also Humeanetics.

READING, Peter (1946— ), poet, born in Liverpool. He has published several volumes of poetry: Water and Waste (1970), followed by For the Municipality’s Elderly (1974), which strikes in its title poem a note of subdued, realist resignation as it describes every day scenes in a provincial town: later volumes were increasingly to display inventiveness and aggression in typography, verse form, and subject matter. Titles include Nothing for Anyone (1977), C (1984, a grim meditation on cancer), and Ukulele Music (1985). Reading contrasts a reporter’s unsparing evocation of the underside and underclass of non-metropolitan contemporary Britain—pub life, domestic brutality, street violence—with a mocking command of classical metrics: ‘“Unemployed/Hopeless” doesn’t sufficiently serve to explain Cro Magnon atrocities’ (Stet, 1986). Final Demands (1988) combined prose and verse, past and present, peace and war in an unsettling collage of different typefaces. The gallows-humour assault on decay and self-destruction continued in Perduta Gente (1989), Evagatory (1992), Work in Regress (1997), and other volumes.

Ready-to-halt, Mr, in Bunyan’s *Pilgrim’s Progress, a pilgrim who follows Mr *Great-heart, though upon crutches. When he comes to the land of *Beulah and is about to cross the river, he bequeaths his crutches to his son, for he sees chariots and horses ready to carry him into the City.

Real Charlotte, The, see Somerville and Ross.

Realism, in *Scholastic philosophy, the doctrine that attributes objective or absolute existence to universals, the principal exponent of which was St Thomas *Aquinas. The opposite view is *Nominalism which regards universals simply as words, a *flatus vocis.

realism, a literary term so widely used as to be more or less meaningless except when used in contradiction to some other movement, e.g. *naturalism, *Expressionism, *Surrealism. Sir P. *Harvey’s original definition was ‘a loosely used term meaning truth to the observed facts of life (especially when they are gloomy)’, which would seem to indicate that he had in mind such post-French-realist works as those of *Gissing, A. *Morrisson, G. A. *Moore, *Maugham’s *Liza of Lambeth, etc., most of which have proletarian or lower-middle-class settings. The French realist school of the mid-19th cent. (for which the novelist Champsfleur, 1821–89, produced a manifesto, Le Réalisme, 1857) stressed ‘sincerity’ as opposed to the ‘liberty’ proclaimed by the Romantics; it insisted on accurate documentation, sociological insight, an accumulation of the details of material fact, an avoidance of poetic diction, idealization, exaggeration, melodrama, etc.; and subjects were to be taken from everyday life, preferably from lower-class life. This emphasis clearly reflected the interests of an increasingly positivist and scientific age. *Balzac and *Stendhal were seen as the great precursors of realism; *Flaubert (though he disliked the label, and was also claimed by the naturalists) and the *Goncourts as among its practitioners. French realism developed into naturalism, an associated but more scientifically applied and elaborated doctrine, seen by some later critics (notably *Marxist critics) as degenerate. In England, the French realists were imitated consciously and notably by Moore and Arnold *Bennett, but the English novel from the time of *Defoe had had its own unlabelled strain of realism, and the term is thus applied to English literature in varying senses and contexts, sometimes qualified as ‘social’ or ‘psychological’ realism etc. (See also Socialist Realism.)

Rebecca, (1) the name given (in allusion to Gen. 24: 60) to the leader, in woman’s attire, of the rioters who demolished tollgates in south Wales in 1843–4; (2) a character in Scott’s *Ivanhoe; (3) a novel by D. *du Maurier (see below).

Rebecca, a popular romantic novel by D. *du Maurier, published in 1938. A cinematic adaptation was directed by Alfred Hitchcock in 1940. The unnamed narrator is plucked from obscurity as a lady’s companion to become the second wife of the wealthy widower Maxim de Winter, and mistress of Manderley, his Cornish estate. Insecure in the role created by Maxim’s glamorous first wife, Rebecca, she is tormented for her failure to match her predecessor’s social confidence, especially by the servant Mrs Danvers, who remains obsessively loyal to Rebecca’s... memory. Having assumed that Maxim too adored his first wife, the narrator discovers that in fact he hated and indeed—provoked by her shameless adultery—murdered Rebecca, disguising her death as a boating accident. The belated discovery of Rebecca’s boat threatens to expose Maxim’s guilt, but the coroner is led to record a verdict of suicide. The de Winters go into exile after Mrs Danvers sets fire to Manderley. The novel has echoes of C. *Brontë’s *Jane Eyre and of the wider *Gothic tradition. Although Maxim’s character is weakly drawn, the sinister Mrs Danvers remains a memorable creation.

Rebecca and Rowena, a humorous sequel by Thackeray to Scott’s Ivanhoe, in which Ivanhoe tires of domestic life with Rowena, and after various comic vicissitudes is reunited with Rebecca.

‘Recluse, The’, see Excursion, The.

Recruiting Officer, The, a comedy by Farquhar, produced 1706.

It deals with the humours of recruiting in a country town, with a vividness suggesting that the author drew on his own experience. The plot is slender; it presents Captain Plume making love to the women in order to secure their followers as recruits; Kite, his resourceful sergeant, employing his wiles and assuming the character of an astrologer, for the same purpose; while Sylvia, daughter of Justice Ballance, who is in love with Plume but has promised not to marry him without her father’s consent, runs away from home disguised as a man, gets herself arrested for scandalous conduct, is brought before her father, and delivered over by him to Captain Plume, as a recruit. Captain Brazen, a rival recruiting officer, who boasts of battles and friends in every quarter of the globe, endeavours to marry the rich Melinda, but finds himself foiled off with her maid.

Reclusant, a term used to describe those who from Elizabeth’s reign to about the end of the 18th cent. refused to attend the services of the Church of England. It was especially applied to Roman Catholics.

Red Book of Hergest, see Mabinogion.

Red Cotton Night-Cap Country or Turf and Towers, a poem in blank verse by R. Browning, published 1873. The title refers ironically to the description by Browning’s friend Anne Thackeray (Ritchie) of a district in Normandy as ‘white cotton night-cap country’; Browning undertakes to show that the ‘red’ of passion and violence should replace the ‘white’.

The story is based on a contemporary cause célèbre, involving the wealthy heir to a Paris jewellery business, Antoine Mellerio (in the poem, Léonce Miranda). As Browning tells it, Miranda’s life was dominated by the opposed principles of sensual indulgence and religious fanaticism, symbolized by the ‘turf’ and ‘towers’ of the subtitle. He lived with his mistress Anna (in the poem, Clara) at a luxurious estate in Normandy, to which he had added a grandiose belvedere. His mother’s death in Paris occasioned a fit of violent remorse, in which he renounced Clara and mutilated himself by burning off both his hands. However, he soon resumed his relationship with Clara and, in the period before his death, made extravagant donations to a convent near his estate, which housed a famous statue of the Virgin. He died by a fall from the top of his belvedere, leaving his fortune to the convent, with a life interest for Clara. The will was challenged by his family, but their suit was comprehensively rejected by the courts, who upheld the will and declared Miranda’s death to be due to an accident. Browning, however, maintains that Miranda leapt from the tower in a deliberate test of the power of the Virgin to save him, and thus resolve the struggle in his spirit between idealism and materialism. This struggle is the real topic of the poem: Miranda, weak-headed victim of a self-imposed dualism, is a nightmare parody of the figure of the artist in Browning. The poem has never been popular, because of its sordid plot and harsh, sardonic style; but contains, in Miranda’s long interior monologue before he jumps, one of the most powerful single passages of Browning’s late work.

Redcrosse Knight, the, in Bk I of Spenser’s Faerie Queen, St George, the patron saint of England. He is the ‘patron’ or champion of Holiness, and represents the Anglican Church. He is separated from Una (the true religion) by the wiles of Archimago (hypocrisy), and is led away by Duessa (the Roman Catholic religion) to the House of Pride. He drinks of an enchanted stream, loses his strength, and is made captive by the giant Orgoglio (pride). Orgoglio is slain by Prince Arthur, and Una leads her knight to the House of Holiness, to learn repentance and be healed. The Knight and Una are finally betrothed, after he has killed the dragon which besieged her parents’ castle.

In this novel, Scott returns after several years and with triumphant success to the period and setting in which he was always most happily at home. The plot concerns an apocryphal attempt by Prince Charles Edward to regain the throne, 20 years after 1745. Under the name of Herries of Birrensworth, Hugh Redgauntlet, a fanatical Jacobite, leads the attempt and kidnaps his nephew Darsie Latimer (unknown to himself, Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet and head of the family) in order to strengthen the cause. Darsie has been brought up, in ignorance of his background and of his father’s forfeiture after the 1745 rebellion, in the household of Saunders Fairford, an Edinburgh writer to the signet, and in companionship with his son Alan who, like the young Scott, was studying to become an advocate. Alan, alarmed at the disappearance of his friend, goes in search of him and their joint experiences make up the substance of the novel. The plot collapses with the realization by the conspirators that the Hanoverian government does not take them seriously enough even to arrest them; that, in the words of Redgauntlet, the cause is lost forever. Apart from Darsie and Alan, each of whom portrays different aspects of the young Scott, the novel contains some memorable characters, notably Redgauntlet himself, the Quaker Joshua Geddes, the crazy litigant Peter Peebles (a parody of the situation of the Young Pretender) and particularly Saunders Fairford, an affectionate and probably accurate portrait of Scott’s own father; it also contains, embedded in the centre of the novel and thematically linked to it, one of the finest short stories in the language, ’Wandering Willie’s Tale’.

REDGROVE, Peter William (1932– ), poet and novelist, educated at Taunton School, Somerset, and at Queens’ College, Cambridge, where he read natural sciences. He has worked as a scientific journalist, and has written some science fiction. In 1966 he became resident author at Falmouth School of Art, Cornwall, a county that appears in many of his landscapes and seascapes. A founder member of the *Group, his first volume of poetry, The Collector and Other Poems (1960), was followed by many others, including The Force and Other Poems (1966), Sons of My Skin: Selected Poems 1954–74 (1975), The Weddings at Nether Powers (1979), and The Moon Disposes: Poems 1954–1987 (1987, enlarged 1989), and My Father’s Trapdoor (1994). His poetry is marked by a richness of visual imagery, a sense of physical immediacy, and a deep preoccupation with religious and sexual mysteries. His novels, which include In the Country of the Skin (1973) and The Beekeepers (1980), are also rich in imagery, written in a highly poetic prose. He has written several works in collaboration with Penelope *Shuttle; these include The Terrors of Dr Treviles (1974), a novel of the occult and the psychic, of dream and identity, based on the relationship of psychologist Gregory Treviles and his witch-wife Robyn; and The Wise Wound (1978), a study of the mythology and reality of menstruation. Although Redgrove’s work has some affinity with that of the *magic realists, it appears to spring from a different, possibly less cerebral source; with him, the artist as magician is less of a conjurer, more of a mystic.

REDI, Francesco (1626–98), physician to the grand duke of Tuscany and author of a spirited dithyrambic poem, Bacco in Toscana (Bacchus in Tuscany, 1685), which Leigh *Hunt translated. It may have helped to inspire *Dryden’s Alexander’s Feast.

REED, Henry (1914–86), poet, translator, and radio dramatist, educated at the University of Birmingham. He is best known for his book of verse A Map of Verona (1946), which contained his much-anthologized poem, inspired by his wartime experiences, ’Naming of Parts’. His plays made a notable contribution to *BBC radio drama in the 1950s, and two collections have been published: The Streets of Pompeii (1971), which contains five verse plays, and Hilda Tablet and Others (1971), which contains his four prose comedies of contemporary cultural life, based on the central character of composer Hilda Tablet.

REED, Isaac (1742–1807), biographer, editor, and bibliophile. He was born in London, the son of a baker, and practised, reluctantly, as a conveyancer, devoting the greatest part of his energy to literature: his works include a new edition of *Dodsley’s Select Collection of Old Plays (1780); Biographica Dramatica (2 vols, 1782, biographies of English dramatists); contributions to Dr Johnson’s *The Lives of the English Poets; and a ’first variorum’ edition of Shakespeare (21 vols, 1803). He was a modest and good-natured man, generous with his large library and much liked by his contemporaries; the only scholar to find fault with him was the irritable *Ritson. See The Reed Diaries 1762–1804, ed. C. E. Jones (1946), and Arthur Sherbo, Isaac Reed: Editorial Factotum (1989).

REEVE, Clara (1729–1807), novelist, who was born and died in Ipswich. The Champion of Virtue: A Gothic Story, published 1777, was reprinted in 1778 as The Old English Baron, and met with tremendous success. The author acknowledged her debt to Walpole’s *The Castle of Otranto, but found its machinery so violent that it destroyed its own effect; to which Walpole replied that he found her novel ’insipid’. Her hero, the virtuous and noble Edmund, moves resolutely through many adventures of romantic horror in order to obtain his rightful heritage, but the ghost of the murdered baron provides the only element of the supernatural. The story concludes with a dramatic day of retribution. Clara Reeve wrote several other novels, and a critical dialogue on The Progress of Romance (1785). See ROMANTIC FICTION.

Refectory (1810–11), founded and edited by Leigh *Hunt, a literary and political quarterly consisting of a collection of essays. Hunt and *Lamb were the principal contributors, and in its pages Lamb’s essays on *Hogarth and on the plays of Shakespeare first appeared.

Reformation, the, the great religious movement of the 16th cent., aiming to reform the doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome, and ending in the establishment of the various Reformed or Protestant churches of central and north-western Europe. Its principal leaders were *Luther in Germany, *Calvin in Geneva, *Zwingli in Zurich, and J. *Knox in Scotland. The principal points contended for by the reformers were the general use and authority of the Scriptures and the need of justification by faith; they repudiated the doctrine of transubstantiation, the veneration of the Virgin Mary, and the supremacy of the pope.

Reformation, History of the, see Knox, J.
Reform Bills. The Reform Bill of 1832 widened the parliamentary franchise by extending the vote to include the rich middle classes, and removed some of the inequalities in the system of representation by redistributing members of Parliament to correspond with the great centres of population. The Bill was introduced by Lord John Russell (1792–1878) in 1831, and carried in 1832. The Reform Bill of 1867, which more than doubled the electorate, extended the franchise to include many male members of the industrial working class, and the Bill of 1884 took in (with the exception of certain categories, i.e. lunatics, convicted criminals, and peers) all males over 21. In 1872 voting by ballot was introduced. Women over 30 were enfranchised in 1918; and women over 21 received the vote in 1928. (See also women’s suffrage.) In 1969 an Act was passed which lowered the age of all voters to 18. The question of reform is a principal theme in many Victorian novels, notably in G. Eliot’s Middlemarch and Felix Holt. Regan, in Shakespeare’s King Lear, the second of Lear’s daughters, who is married to Cornwall.

Regicide Peace, Letters on a, by E. Burke, the first two published 1796, the third 1797, the fourth posthumously in the collected works.

The theme of these letters, which purport to be addressed to a member of Parliament, is the necessity for stamping out the Jacobin government of France, that ‘vast tremendous unformed spectre’; and the ability of England from an economic standpoint to carry on the struggle. Burke describes Jacobinism as ‘the spirit of ambition’ which had overtaken the swelling middle classes, and which caused them to assert their pretensions against the propertied classes, impatient of ‘the places which settled society prescribes to them’, in an attempt to destroy pre-existing laws and institutions.

Regional novel, a novel describing people and landscape of an actual locality outside the metropolis. Early examples are set in Ireland (M. Edgeworth, Castle Rackrent) and Scotland (J. Galt, The Provost) and are primarily studies of individual societies and characters. The regional novels of Sir W. Scott however combine a historically informed feeling for local customs with an aesthetic appreciation of natural scenery. By the mid-19th cent. the localities described are often smaller and more exact, the focus being partly sociological, as in C. Bronté’s Shirley, and in the rural fiction of Mrs Gaskell (Cheshire) and G. Eliot (the Midlands). The genre achieved maturity in the works of Hardy, set in a fictive Wessex where an appreciation of both aesthetic and geological aspects of landscape complements a concern with agricultural and economic issues. Thenceforward these two approaches tend to diverge. In the mid-19th cent., industrial or urban novels set in a specific town or city included Gaskell’s Mary Barton, Dickens’s Hard Times, and Eliot’s Middlemarch, and the tradition continued in the 20th cent. in the work of Joyce, following E. Bronté’s Wuthering Heights and R. D. Blackmore’s portrayal of Exmoor in Lorna Doone, other novelists adopted remote locations as settings for romantic dramas (S. R. Crockett’s Galloway, Eden Phillpotts’s Dartmoor, Sir H. Walpole’s Cumberland). The popularity of regional novels is reflected in the invention of fictional counties (A. Trollope’s Barset, W. Holtby’s South Riding) or towns (M. Oliphant’s Carlingford). The genuinely regional work of R. Jefferies (Wiltshire), C. Holme (Westmorland), and F. Brett Young (Worcestershire) combines social analysis with a celebration of domestic allegiances, as do the domestic novels set in Radstone (Bristol) of E. H. Young (1880–1947). More didactically slanted accounts of particular regions are found in the Shropshire romances of Mary Webb and the early work of H. Williamson (Devon) in which country life is contrasted favourably with that of towns. The continued oscillation between romantic and realistic handling of regionalism in the 20th cent. is reflected in the enormous popularity enjoyed by the Cornish novels of D. du Maurier and the Tyneside ones of Catherine Cookson (1906–98): Winston Graham (1909– ) gained a considerable following for his historical Cornish novels, the Poldark series, of which the first (Ross Poldark) appeared in 1945. Examples of regionalism of an exclusively naturalistic kind are A. Bennett’s tales of the Staffordshire ‘Five Towns’ and the accounts of farming life of S. Kaye-Smith (Kent and Sussex) and Adrian Bell (1901–80, Suffolk). Emphasis on social realism becomes more pronounced in the 1920s in the work of Phyllis Bentley (1894–1977), born in Halifax, who wrote of the textile industry in the West Riding of Yorkshire in many works including Inheritance (1932), a family saga; and H. E. Bates (Northamptonshire). In D. H. Lawrence’s The Rainbow (Nottinghamshire) and A Glastonbury Romance by J. C. Powys the potential limitations of the genre are surmounted through the integration of particular landscapes and places with individual psychological, religious, and emotional experience. In the second half of the 20th cent. regional writers continued to favour a realist approach, as in the work of Leo Walsmsley (1892–1966), Yorkshire novelist born at Robin Hood’s Bay, whose works include the saga Three Fivers (1932), Phantom Lobster (1933), and Sally Lunn (1937), a trilogy set on the north Yorkshire coast dealing with the lives of fishermen and their families; John Moore (1907–67) with works based in Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury, and the surrounding villages (see the ‘Brensham trilogy’, 1946–8, and others); and John Toft (1933– ), Staffordshire. In particular the regional novel has become a sociologically attuned vehicle for working-class concerns, A Scots Quair by Lewis Grassic Gibbon anticipating the novels of Durham-born ex-miner Sid Chaplin (1916–86: see his The Day of the Sardine, ...

Rehearsal, The, a farcical comedy attributed to George Villiers, second duke of *Buckingham, but probably written by him in collaboration with others, among whom are mentioned S. *Butler and Martin Clifford, master of the Charterhouse; printed 1672.

The play satirizes the heroic tragedies of the day, and consists of a series of parodies of passages from these, strung together in an absurd heroic plot. The author of the mock play is evidently a laureate (hence his name 'Bayes'), and *D'Avenant was probably intended; but there are also hits at *Dryden (particularly his Conquest of Granada) and his brothers-in-law, Edward and Robert Howard. Bayes takes two friends, Smith and Johnson, to see the rehearsal of his play, and the absurdity of this work (which includes the two kings of Brentford, entering hand in hand), coupled with the comments of Bayes, his instructions to the actors, and the remarks of Smith and Johnson, remains highly entertaining. Prince Pretty-man, Prince Volscius, and *Drawcansir are among the characters. It was one of the earliest of English dramatic *burlesques, and was much performed during the 18th cent., during which period the genre developed to one of its highest points in Sheridan's *The Critic. The work helped to inspire *Marvell's The Rehearsal Transpro's'd (1672; Pt II, 1673).

REID, Forrest (1875–1947), Ulster novelist, whose uneventful life was spent in and near Belfast. His fiction includes The Kingdom of Twilight (1904), The Garden God: A Tale of Two Boys (1905), Following Darkness (1912), and a trilogy, Uncle Stephen (1931), The Retreat (1934), and Young Tom (1944); the last three were published in one volume in 1955 as Tom Barber, with an introduction by Reid's friend E. M. *Forster. Reid's dominant subject is boyhood and the longing for an ideal dream playmate; he evokes a pagan, lyrical world of 'lonely garden and sombre grove', in which hints of the supernatural are contrasted with the realities of everyday. His autobiographies, Apostate (1926) and Private Road (1940), vividly describe his sense of the numinous in nature. See The Green Avenue (1980), a critical biography by B. Taylor.

REID, Thomas (1710–96), philosopher, who graduated from Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1726. He was elected regent in philosophy at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1751, and he succeeded Adam *Smith as professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow in 1764, largely through the influence of his patron Henry *Home, Lord Kames. While at King's he composed his first major work, An Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense (1764), and after retiring from active teaching at Glasgow in 1780 he published his Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man (1785) and Essays on the Active Powers of Man (1788).

His lectures on the fine arts were first published in 1793. Reid was perhaps the most notable 18th-cent. exponent of the philosophy of common sense, by which phrase he meant both a faculty of the mind, and a set of incontrovertible beliefs implanted in the human mind by God. He also questioned the widely held theory that the immediate objects of perception are 'ideas', arguing that we directly perceive external objects rather than mental representations of them. Aesthetic qualities he conceived either as intrinsic qualities of mind, or, derivatively, as the qualities of objects of design. He was a vigorous critic of the writings of *Hume, and, later in life, J. *Priestley, and he championed the inductive methods of E. Bacon and I.*Newton. Reid was an accomplished mathematician and scientist as well as a philosopher, contributing 'An Essay on Quantity' to the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society of London in 1748. The Scottish poet Thomas *Campbell was named after him.

Rejected Addresses, by James and Horatio *Smith, published 1812.

A competition was held to find a suitable address to celebrate the opening of the new *Drury Lane Theatre in 1812. James and Horatio Smith produced a large batch of bogus entries, purporting to be by *Wordsworth, *Byron, T. *Moore, *Southey, *Coleridge, *Crabbe, Sir W. *Scott, *Cobbett, and others. The parodies are mixed in quality, but the brilliance of some made the Smiths famous, and caused T. *Campbell to feel annoyed that he had been left out.

Relapse, The, or Virtue in Danger, the highly successful first play of *Vanbrugh, produced 1696. It is an avowed continuation of Love's Last Shift by C. *Cibber, some of the characters being retained, though more effectively presented. It contains two plots, very slenderly related to each other. Loveless, a reformed libertine, living happily in the country with his wife Amanda, is obliged to go with her to London, where he suffers a relapse under the temptation of Berinithia, an unscrupulous young widow. Worthy, a former lover of Berinithia, prevails on her to favour Loveless's suit and to persuade Amanda of the infidelity of her husband, in order to promote his own chances of seducing Amanda. But Amanda, though bitterly resenting her husband's faithlessness, remains firm in her virtue.

The second plot is more entertaining. Sir Novelty Fashion, the perfect beau, who has just become (by purchase) Lord Foppington, is about to marry Miss Hoyden, daughter of Sir Tunbelly Clumsey, a country squire, neither father nor daughter having yet seen him. Foppington's younger brother, Young Fashion, having overspent his allowance, vainly appeals to Foppington for help. To revenge himself and rehabilitate his fortunes, he decides to go down to Sir Tunbelly's house, impersonate his brother, and marry the heiress. The plot is at first successful. Sir Tunbelly welcomes him unsuspectingly, and Miss Hoyden is only too ready to marry him next morning; but Sir Tunbelly will not hear of the marriage for a week, so Fashion bribes the nurse and parson, and a secret marriage is at once celebrated. Foppington arrives, is treated as an impostor, and subjected to indignities, until a neighbour vouches for his identity. Meanwhile young Fashion escapes. Hoyden, the parson, and the nurse decide to say nothing of the former marriage, and Hoyden is married to Foppington, who immediately brings his wife to London. Here young Fashion claims his bride, the nurse and parson are bullied and cajoled into admitting the earlier marriage, and Hoyden is reconciled to her lot on learning that Fashion is Lord Foppington’s brother.

The play was adapted by Sheridan as *A Trip to Scarborough.

Religio Laici, a poem by *Dryden, published 1682.

Written in defence of Anglicanism against Deist, Catholic, and Dissenting arguments, *Religio Laici combines an exalted recognition of religious sublimity with a defence of a ‘layman’s’ reasonable and straightforward religious attitudes. The poem’s opening lines, beginning ‘Dim as the borrow’d Beams of Moon and Stars’, are among the finest Dryden wrote.

Religio Medici, a self-directed stocktaking by Sir T. *Browne of his attitudes as a Christian and a doctor towards God and the Church, faith and reason, the classical tradition, private friendship, and national prejudice, first published in an unauthorized edition 1642, reprinted 1643 with some authorial corrections, revisions, and additions.

Written in about 1635, after experience of life in Ireland, France, Italy, and Holland, the work is divided into two parts, relating broadly to God and to man. The first treats of matters of faith, the hostilities among rival sects and religions, and man as microcosm. Its breadth of vision and tolerance are matched in the second part, where he expresses love for all sorts and conditions of men, English or foreign, rich or poor, learned or ignorant, friend or foe, good or bad. While based on biblical teaching, the arguments are reinforced and widened with citations of classical philosophers, historians, and poets. Often reprinted, and translated into many languages, *Religio Medici quickly made the author famous as much by its wit and style as by its piety.

Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, a collection of ballads, sonnets, historical songs, and metrical romances published in 1765 by T. *Percy. The majority of them were extracted from the *Percy Folio and edited and ‘restored’ by Percy. They were of very different periods, some of great antiquity, some as recent as the reign of Charles I. Ancient poems drawn from other sources and a few of more modern date (including works by *Wither, *Dryden, *Lovelace, *Shenstone, and *Glover) were added by the editor. The antiquary J. *Ritson was sharply critical of Percy’s editorial method. The editions of 1767, 1775, and 1794 each contained new matter. See the facsimile edition of the Reliques, introd. N. M. Groom (1996).

REMARQUE, Erich Maria (1898–1970), German novelist, author of *Im Westen nichts Neues (All Quiet on the Western Front, 1929), a fictionalized account of his experiences in the First World War which was translated into many languages, but in Germany was denounced for its pacifism and burnt publicly (1933) by the Nazis. Remarque left Germany in 1938, and in 1939 moved permanently to the United States; many of his later novels centre on the theme of exile.

Remorse, a tragedy by S. T. *Coleridge, written in 1797 as *Osorio, produced at Drury Lane 1813.

The story, set in Granada at the time of the Spanish Inquisition, tells of the slow corruption of the character of Osorio, a man who supposed himself strong but who is gradually led by temptations and events into guilt and evil.

Renaissance, the great flowering of art, architecture, politics, and the study of literature, usually seen as the end of the Middle Ages and the beginning of the modern world, which came about under the influence of Greek and Roman models. It began in Italy in the late 14th cent., culminated in the High Renaissance in the early 16th cent. (the period of *Michelangelo and *Machiavelli), and spread to the rest of Europe in the 15th cent. and afterwards. Its emphasis was humanist: that is, on regarding the human figure and reason without a necessary relating of it to the superhuman; but much of its energy also came from the *Neoplatonic tradition in writers such as *Pico della Mirandola. The word Renaissance has been applied in the 20th cent. to earlier periods which manifested a new interest in and study of the classics, such as the 12th cent. and the period of Charlemagne. But the Italian Renaissance is still seen as a watershed in the development of civilization, both because of its extent and because of its emphasis on the human, whether independent of or in association with the divine. See J. A. *Symonds, History of the Renaissance in Italy (1875–86); W. *Pater, Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873); J. *Burckhardt, The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy (English trans., S. G. C. Middlemore, 1929).

RENAAN, Ernest (1823–92), French Hebraist, historian, and archaeologist. After a childhood spent in his native Brittany he studied for the priesthood in Paris, but withdrew because of doubts about the divinity of Jesus and the divine inspiration of the Bible. His eccentric sexuality, which was aroused by the veiled and the inaccessible, seems eventually to have focused on his sister Henriette, about whom he was to write rhapsodically years after her death in Ma Sœur Henriette (1895), not least for her role in the preparation of his masterpiece, Vie de Jésus (1863), the first of a seven-volume account of the historical origins of Christianity.
Jesus was a fusion of Renan’s romantic Christianity, which centred on its aesthetic and emotional significance, and his solid historical scholarship, which led him to subject the biblical accounts of the life of Jesus to sceptical scrutiny. It earned him both fame and persecution.

Besides his historical and philological works, Renan published a number of critical, reflective, and prophetic essays, among them: Essais de morale et de critique (1859), La Réforme intellectuelle et morale (1871), Examen de conscience philosophique (1888), L’Avenir de la science (written 1848–9, pub. 1890). His early years are recalled in Souvenirs d’enfance et de jeunesse (1883).

Renaud, in the chansons de geste a rebel against Charlemagne, better known under the Italian name of Rinaldo.

RENAULT, Mary, pseudonym of Mary Challans (1905–83), novelist, known principally for her historical novels, most of which are lively first-person narratives set in Ancient Greece or Asia Minor, incorporating the new anthropological and historical insights of the 20th cent. They include The King Must Die (1958) and The Bull from the Sea (1962), both retelling the legend of Theseus, and The Persian Boy (1972), set in the time of Alexander the Great.

RENÉ OF PROVENCE, duc d’Anjou and comte de Provence (1408–80), known as ‘le bon Roi René,’ son of Louis II, duke of Anjou, who was titular king of Naples, the two Sicilies, and Jerusalem, whose large style agrees not with the leanness of his purse (Shakespeare, 2 Henry VI, i. i). His daughter Margaret of Anjou was wife of Henry VI. As count of Provence, he gave free play to his love of music and poetry, tilting and hunting, minstrels and knight-errants, and showed indifference to political affairs. There is a picture of his court in Scott’s Anne of Geierstein. He figures in Henry VI as ‘Reignier.’ He left some prose and verse romances, pastorals, and allegories.

RENI, Guido (1575–1642), Bolognese painter much admired in England in the 18th and early 19th cents, when he was ranked second only to Raphael; Horace Walpole’s comment in Aedes Walpolianae (1747)—‘all the qualities of a perfect painter never met but in Raphael, Guido and Carracci’—typifies the response of this period. Shelley, in Bologna in 1818, wrote rapturously to Peacock of the Guidos in the Pinacoteca, and from Rome (1819) exclaimed that only Raphael, Guido, and Rosa could sustain comparison with antiquity. A painting traditionally described as a portrait of Beatrice Cenci, almost certainly not by Reni himself but loosely derived from his St Andrew Led to Martyrdom (1608), cast a spell over the Romantics: Shelley describes it in his preface to The Cenci, and later it fascinated De Quincey, Dickens, Swinburne, Melville, and many others: Hawthorne uses it and Reni’s Archangel Michael in The Marble Faun to symbolize various aspects of his central characters. But *Keats disliked his ‘melodramatic mawkishness’ and his reputation plunged with Ruskin: only recently has the true stature of his work again been recognized.

REPTON, Humphry, see PICTURESQUE.

Republic, The, one of the dialogues of Plato, in which Socrates is represented as eliciting, in the course of a discussion on justice, the ideal type of state. In this the perfect forms of goodness, truth, and beauty are cultivated, and everything repugnant to them excluded. The famous fable of the men who live bound in a cavern, so that they can see only the shadows of real objects projected by a bright fire on its inner wall, occurs in Book 7.

Republic of Letters, the, the collective body of those engaged in literary pursuits. The expression occurs first in Addison’s Dialogues upon Ancient Medals (i. 19).

‘Resolution and Independence’, a poem by Wordsworth, written 1802, published 1807, sometimes known as ‘The Leech Gatherer’.

The poet describes his own elation as he walks over the moors on a fine spring morning after a storm, and his sudden descent into apprehension and dejection, as he ponders the fate of earlier poets, such as *Chaterton: 'We Poets in our youth begin in gladness, | But thereof come in the end despondency and Madness.' At this stage he comes upon the aged leech gatherer, whom he cross-questions in characteristically Wordsworthian manner about his way of life: the old man responds with cheerful dignity, and the poet resolves to remember him as an admonishment. The poem was based on a meeting recorded in Dorothy *Wordsworth's *Journal, 3 Oct. 1800, with an 'old man almost double', whose trade was to gather leeches. Its mixture of elevated language and sentiment with prosaic detail is peculiarly Wordsworthian, and led *Coleridge to comment on its 'inconstancy of style'. Wordsworth's own comments on his use of imagery in the poem and 'the conferring, the abstracting, and the modifying powers of the Imagination' in his 1815 preface are of great interest.

RESTIF DE LA BRETONNE, Nicolas (1734–1806), French novelist. His vast, rambling output reflects the disquisitions of his life as a peasant adrift in Paris. Long forgotten, he has recently been restored to critical favour for his knowledge of the life of the humble classes (Le Paysan perverti, 1775, and Monsieur Nicho-las, 1794), and by his understanding of rural values (La Vie de mon père, 1779).

Restoration, the re-establishment of monarchy in England, with the return of Charles II (1660); also the period marked by this event of which the chief literary figures are *Dryden, *Rochester, *Bunyan, *Pepys, *Locke, and the Restoration dramatists. One of the characteristic genres of the period is Restoration comedy, or the comedy of manners, which developed upon the reopening of the theatres. Its principal writers were *Congreve, *Etherege, *Farquhar, *Vanbrugh, and *Wycherley, and its predominant tone was witty, bawdy, cynical, and amoral. The plays were mainly in prose, with passages of verse for the more romantic moments; the plots were complex and usually double, sometimes triple, though repartee and discussions of marital behaviour provide much of the interest, reflecting the fashionable manners of the day. Standard characters include fops, bawds, scheming valets, country squires, and sexually voracious young widows and older women; the principal theme is sexual intrigue, either for its own sake or for money. Playwrights came under heavy attack for frivolity, blasphemy, and immorality (see COLLIER, JEREMY): they and their subsequent admirers defended their works as serious social criticism, and mirrors to the age. During the 18th cent. the plays were presented in more 'genteel' versions, and in the 19th cent. hardly at all: the 20th cent. saw a considerable revival of interest, with such notable productions as *The Way of the World, one of the masterpieces of the period, in 1924 with Edith Evans as Millamant.

Retaliation, an unfinished poem by *Goldsmith, published 1774, consisting of a string of humorous and critical epitaphs on *Garrick, Sir J. *Reynolds, *Burke, and other friends, in reply to their similar efforts directed against himself. Of the latter Garrick's is the best known:

Here lies Nolly Goldsmith, for shortness called Noll,
Who wrote like an angel, but talked like poor Poll.

Retrospective Review (1820–8), founded by Henry Southern (1799–1853), its first editor, as a 'Review of past literature', the object of which was 'to exhibit a bird's-eye view of the rise and progress of our literature' and to rouse interest 'in the old and venerable literature of the country'. Extracts from poetry, essays, drama, and other prose, chiefly drawn from the 16th and 17th cents, included the work of F. *Bacon, Sir T. *Browne, G. *Chapman, G. *Herbert, *Jonson, *Vaughan, and many others. Some three-quarters of the work was English; the rest consisted of translations from past European literature. Another of the founder's objects was to question the deference accorded to contemporary critics, such as those of the *Quarterly and the *Edinburgh, and to expose their substitution of prejudice for true critical principles. The method of the Review was to consider each piece or extract as if it were just from the press, and sometimes to compare the quality of the old with some work of the 'moderns'. The Review was briefly revived in 1853–4.

Return of the Druses, The, a tragedy in blank verse by R. *Browning, published 1843 as No. IV of *Bells and Pomegranates. It was written for the stage, but was rejected by *Macready, although Browning had created the role of Djabal with him in mind.

The action of the play is unhistorical. Browning places the religious sect of the Druses in exile and subjection on a small Aegean island, and the plot concerns the downfall of the impostor Djabal, who claims to be the incarnation of Hakeem, divine founder of the sect, in order both to liberate his people from their oppressors and to gain the love of Anael. Djabal and Anael both perish in the end, but the 'return of the Druses' to their homeland, the Lebanon, is assured.

Return of the Native, The, a novel by T. *Hardy, published 1878.

The scene is the sombre Egdon Heath, powerfully and symbolically present throughout the novel. Damon Wildeve, once an engineer but now a publican, dallyes between the two women by whom he is loved—the gentle Thomasin Yeobright and the wild, capricious Eustacia Vye. Thomasin rejects her humble suitor Diggory Venn, a reddleman, and is eventually married to Wildeve, who takes her less for love than from a wish to hurt Eustacia. Thomasin's cousin Clym Yeobright, a diamond merchant in Paris, disgusted with the worthlessness of his occupation, returns to Egdon intending to become a schoolmaster in his native heath. He falls in love with Eustacia, and she in a brief infatuation marries him, hoping to induce him to return to Paris, thus escaping from Egdon, which she detests. But to her despair he will not return; his sight fails and he becomes a furze-cutter on the heath. She becomes the cause of estrangement between Clym and his beloved mother, and unintentionally causes the mother's death. This, together with the discovery that Eustacia's relationship with Wildeve has not ceased, leads to a violent scene between Clym and his wife, and ultimately to Eustacia's flight, in the course of which both she and Wildeve are drowned. Clym, blaming himself for the death of his mother and his wife, becomes an itinerant preacher, and the widowed Thomasin marries Diggory Venn.

Reuchlin, Johann (1455–1522), born at Pforzheim, a celebrated humanist and the foremost Hebraist of his day. Braving the powerful Dominicans, he published in 1494 his De Verbo Mirifico, defending Jewish literature and philosophy, and became the centre of an acute controversy in which he was opposed by *Pfefferkorn and which was the occasion of the publication of the *Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum. Reuchlin was author of the first Hebrew grammar.

Revelation, Book of, see Apocalypse.

Revels, master of the, an officer appointed to superintend *masques and other entertainments at court. He is first mentioned in the reign of Henry VII. The first permanent master of the revels was Sir Thomas Cawarden, appointed in 1545. Holders of the office in Shakespeare's day were Edmund Tilney, 1579–1610, and Sir George Buc, 1610–22 (he had been deputy master since 1603).

Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois, The, a tragedy by G. Chapman, written 1610/11, printed 1613, a sequel to *Bussy D'Ambois.

Clermont D'Ambois, brother of Bussy, described by his close friend the duc de Guise as the ideal 'Senecal [i.e. Stoical] man', gentle, noble, generous, and 'fix'd in himself', is urged by his brother's ghost to avenge his murder, but will only do so by the honourable method of a duel. He sends a challenge to Montsurry, who evades it; urged again by the ghost, he introduces himself to Montsurry's house, forces him to fight, and kills him. He then learns of the assassination of the Guise, and, refusing to live amid 'all the horrors of the vicious time' as 'the slave of power', he kills himself. The hero's reluctance to exact revenge recalls certain aspects of *Hamlet. (See also Revenge Tragedy.)

Reveler's Tragedy, The, a tragedy published anonymously in 1607, and from 1656 ascribed to *Tourneur; its authorship has been disputed since 1891, with some scholars defending the traditional attribution and others championing the rival claims of *Middleton and others.

The central character is Vendice (or Vindice), intent on revenging the death of his mistress, poisoned by the lecherous old duke. The court is a centre of vice and intrigue; the duchess's youngest son is convicted of rape, she herself seduces Spurio, the duke's bastard, and her two older sons, the duke's stepsons, plot against each other and against Lussurioso, the duke's heir. Vendice, disguised as Piato, appears to attempt to procure his own sister Castiza for Lussurioso; she resists, but their mother Gratiana temporarily succumbs to his bribes and agrees to play the bawd. Vendice murders the duke by tricking him into kissing the poisoned skull of his mistress, and most of the remaining characters kill one another or are killed in a final masque of revengers and murderers; Vendice, who survives the bloodbath, owns up to the murder of the duke, and is promptly condemned to death with his brother and accomplice Hippolite by the duke's successor, old Antonio. He is led off to execution, content to 'die after a nest of dukes'. The play is marked by a tragic intensity of feeling, a powerfully satiric wit, and passages of great poetic richness, all combined, for example, in Vendice's address to 'the bony lady', his dead mistress: 'Does the silkworm expend her yellow labours for thee?' (iii. v. 71 ff.). (See also Revenge Tragedy.)

Revesby play, the, a folk drama acted by morris dancers at Revesby in Lincolnshire at the end of the 18th cent. The characters are the Fool and his sons—Pickle Herring, Blue Breeches, Pepper Breeches, Ginger Breeches—and Mr Allspice and Cicely. The Fool fights with a hobby-horse and a dragon. The sons decide to kill the Fool; he kneels down, the swords of the dancers are locked around his neck, and he is slain. He revives when Pickle Herring stamps his foot. Sword-dances and the wooing of Cicely by the Fool and his sons conclude the play. The central incident no doubt symbolizes the death of the year and its resuscitation in the spring. The text is given by T. F. Ordish in the Folk-Lore Journal, 7, 338. See also E. K. Chambers, The Mediaeval Stage (2 vols., 1903).

Review, (1) a periodical started by *Defoe in 1704, under the title of A Weekly Review of the Affairs of France, which after various transformations became A Review of the State of the British Nation in 1707; it lasted until 1713. It was a non-partisan paper, an organ of the commercial interests of the nation; it appeared thrice weekly and was written, practically in its entirety, by Defoe himself, who expressed in it his opinions on all current political topics, thus initiating the political leading article. It also had lighter articles on love, marriage, gambling, etc.; Defoe’s attitude to his readers was that he strove to ‘wheedle them in’ (if it may be allowed that expression) to the knowledge of the world; who, rather than take more pains, would be content with their ignorance, and search into nothing’. (2) A quarterly magazine of poetry and criticism, founded in 1962 and edited by Ian *Hamilton. It ran for 30 issues, and was succeeded by the New Review, also edited by Hamilton, which ran from 1974 to 1979.

The poem is Shelley’s idealized and highly idiosyncratic version of the French Revolution, transposed to an Oriental setting. It is composed in Spenserian stanzas (too ornate for effective narrative), forming twelve cantos. The revolt is organized by a brother and sister, Laon and Cythna, whose temporary success is celebrated in incestuous love-making (Canto VI). But the tyrants recover power, and Islam is subject to plague and famine, vividly described (Canto X). The well-known eloquent passage on the downfall of Marie Antoinette leads to the lament that ‘the age of chivalry is gone . . . All the decent drapery of life is to be rudely torn off’ in deference to ‘the new conquering empire of light and reason’. His general conclusion is that the defective institutions of the old regime should have been reformed, not destroyed.

Revue des deux mondes, La, a celebrated French monthly review which first appeared in 1829 and which continues to be published today. Under the editorship (1831–77) of François Bulot it became one of the leading periodicals of its kind in Europe, dealing with foreign and domestic politics as well as literature, philosophy, and the fine arts, and attracting contributions from such writers as Balzac, Sainte-Beuve, Dumas père, Hugo, Vigny, and G. Sand.

Rex Roth, Kenneth, see performance poetry.

Reynard the Fox, the central character in the Roman de Renart, a series of popular satirical fables, related to the bestiaries and the tradition from Aesop’s Fables, written in France at various times c.1175–1250. The first known cycle is the Latin one by Nivard of Ghent, Ysengrimus (c.1148), and this was followed by the Middle High German Reinhard Fuchs (c.1180). There is a Flemish version from c.1250; another Flemish version (now lost) was translated into English and printed by *Caxton in 1481. In these anthropomorphic stories, the fox is the man who preys on society, is brought to justice, but escapes by his cunning. The popularity of the series was most marked in French (which took from it the German word Regin-hart, ‘strong in counsel’, for ‘fox’ in place of its etymological *goupi/, which is found in some of the earlier stories), but there are some derived and related English works. The most important of these is the Middle English ‘The Fox and the Wolf’ (in Early Middle English Verse and Prose, ed. J. A. W. Bennett and G. V. Smithers, 2nd edn 1968, 67–76). Other related works in English are Chaucer’s ‘The Nun’s Priest’s Tale’ (see Canterbury Tales, 20), some of Henryson’s ‘Morall Fabilia of Espe’ (where the fox is called Lowrence), and J. C. Harris’s Uncle Remus stories (where the role of the fox is taken by Brer Rabbit). The principal characters in Caxton’s version are: Reynard the Fox, King Noble the Lion, French Revolution and asserted that the king of England owes his throne to the choice of the people, who are at liberty to cashier him for misconduct. Burke repudiates this constitutional doctrine, and contrasts the inherited rights of which the English are tenacious with the ‘rights of man’ of the French revolutionaries, based on ‘extravagant and presumptuous speculations’, inconsistent with an ordered society and leading to poverty and chaos. He examines the character of the men who made the French Revolution, and the proceedings of their National Assembly, a ‘profane burlesque of that sacred institute’. The well-known eloquent passage on the downfall of Marie Antoinette leads to the lament that ‘the age of chivalry is gone . . . All the decent drapery of life is to be rudely torn off’ in deference to ‘the new conquering empire of light and reason’. His general conclusion is that the defective institutions of the old regime should have been reformed, not destroyed.
Isengrym the Wolf, Courtoys the Hound, Bruin the Bear, Tybert the Cat, Grymbert the Badger, Coart (or Cuwaert) the Hare, Belyn the Ram, Martin and Dame Rukenawe the Apes, Chanticleer the Cock, Partlet the Hen. Ermeline is Reynard’s wife and Malperdy (Maltpertuis) his castle.

REYNOLDS, John Hamilton (1796–1852), poet, and a close friend and correspondent of Keats. (Keats’s letter to Reynolds of May 1818 on The Fall of Hyperion is particularly important.) In 1814 Reynolds published Safe, an *Oriental novel reminiscent of Byron, and The Eden of the Imagination, which echoes late 18th-cent. verse. The Garden of Florence (1821) contains his most effective serious work, and includes two verse tales from Boccaccio, as part of a Boccaccio volume he and Keats intended to write together, and for which Keats originally produced Isabella. He had great skill in parody and comic verse; his parody of Wordsworth’s Peter Bell appeared in 1819, The Fancy in 1820, and Odes and Addresses (with T. Hood) in 1825.

REYNOLDS, Sir Joshua (1723–92), painter, born in Devon. He was apprenticed in London (1740–4) and studied in Italy (1750–2); on his return to London (1753) he swiftly became the most successful portrait painter of his age. Reynolds sought to give new dignity to British portraiture by relating it to the Grand Style of European art. His portraits are immensely varied and enriched by allusions to the antique and to Renaissance and 17th-cent. Italian art. He was a distinguished man of letters; it was he who suggested the idea of the Club to his friend Dr Johnson. He painted Johnson at least five times and wrote a memoir of him and two Johnsonian dialogues; Boswell dedicated his Life of Johnson to the painter. Goldsmith dedicated The Deserted Village to him. Reynolds’s first literary works were three essays published in the Idler (1759). In 1768 he was made first president of the Royal Academy and his Discourses, delivered to the students (1769–90), are his most significant achievement as a writer. He supported the values of academic art, and stressed the importance of study of the great masters of the past. Yet the Discourses reveal that he was sensitive to the new ideals of Romantic art; the last is a tribute to Michelangelo, whose sublimity Reynolds had come to value above the perfection of Raphael. Hazlitt pointed out the contradictions in the Discourses and Blake, in a series of annotations to his copy of the Works, attacked Reynolds for his lack of faith in the inspiration of genius—on the title page he wrote, ‘This man was hired to depress art.’ Yet he was admired by Constable, Turner, and Ruskin, and Wordsworth paid tribute to him in lines on Sir G. Beaumont’s cenotaph to his memory at Coleorton. See Discourses on Art, ed. Robert R. Wark (1975; repr. 1997); Nicholas Penny, Reynolds (1986); and Richard Wendorf, Sir Joshua Reynolds: The Painter in Society (1996).

rhetoric, in Greek, the art of speaking so as to persuade, was from the first tied up with ethics (persuasion of what is true) and literature (use of language in order to please). It was a branch of the medieval Trivium and therefore an important part of the school syllabus up to the 17th cent. Literary rhetoric is concerned with the organization (inventio and dispositio) and embellishment (elocutio) of works. The first of these is prominent in many 18th-cent. works (‘Tristram Shandy and A Tale of a Tub, for instance), and the second is important in its provision of poetic ‘devices’ (figures and tropes) in poets from Chaucer to the present day. The study of rhetoric—encompassing Plato and Aristotle, Cicero and Quintillian, Boethius and Bede, Erasmus and Ramus, Bacon and Locke, Burke and Blair, Joyce and Golding—is an increasingly vital and important area in literary studies. See B. Vickers, Classical Rhetoric in English (1970) and In Defence of Rhetoric (1988); G. A. Kennedy, Classical Rhetoric and Its Christian and Secular Tradition (1980) and A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994); and T. M. Conley, Rhetoric and the European Tradition (1990).

RHODES, Cecil John (1853–1902), born in Bishop’s Stortford. He gained a degree at Oriel College, Oxford, after some delay, and made a fortune at the diamond fields of Kimberley. He became a statesman of South Africa and was instrumental in securing part of Bechuanaland for the Cape government (1884) and later (1887) the charter for the British South Africa Co. whose territory became known as Rhodesia. He was prime minister of Cape Colony from 1890, but was forced to resign in 1896 because of an unauthorized raid into the Transvaal (the ‘Jameson raid’). In his will he endowed 170 scholarships at Oxford, for students from the British Empire, America, and Germany.

RHODES, William Barnes (1772–1826), a bank teller, who translated the Satires of Juvenal in 1801 and the Epigrams in 1803. He did not acknowledge his authorship of his highly successful farce Bombastes Furioso (1810) until 1822. Rhodes collected volumes of plays, old and new, and bought heavily at the Roxburghe sale in 1812.

Rhododaphne, a narrative poem in octosyllabics by Peacock, published 1818.

In ancient Thessaly, the shepherd boy Anthemion is torn between the mortal girl Calliroë and the nymph Rhododaphne. Calliroë appears to die, and Rhododaphne takes Anthemion to an enchanted palace (anticipating the one built by Keats’s Lamia), but Rhododaphne is struck down by the spirit of Heavenly Love, and Calliroë is restored.
rhyme. ‘Male’ or ‘masculine’ rhymes or endings are those having a final accented syllable, as distinguished from ‘female’ or ‘feminine’ rhymes or endings in which the last syllable is unaccented.

rhyme-royal, or rime royal, a seven-line stanza form of iambic pentameter, rhyming a b a b c c, used for narrative poetry from Chaucer (*Trovilus and Criseyde) to William *Morris.

Rhymer, see RHYMERS CLUB and EVERYMAN’S LIBRARY.

RHYMERS CLUB, a group of poets that met at the *Cheshire Cheese in Fleet Street for two or three years, from 1891, to read poetry. Members and associates included *Yeats, Ernest Rhys (1859–1946, poet and editor of the *Everyman’s Library), *Le Gallienne, *Dowson, L. *Johnson, Arthur *Symons, and J. *Davidson. It published two collections of verse, 1892 and 1894.

Rhyming Poem, The, an Old English poem from the *Exeter Book and therefore not later than the 10th cent., striking for the fact that the two halves of its alliterating lines rhyme (as happens sporadically in later Old English poetry). It is a loose discussion of the vicissitudes of life, contrasting the misfortunes of a fallen king with his past glory, a common Boethian, elegiac theme in Old English. The form is autobiographical but the speaker is not individuated to any extent; it has been suggested that the poem is a paraphrase of Job 29 and 30. See ASPR 4.

RHYS, Ernest, see RHYMERS CLUB and EVERYMAN’S LIBRARY.

RHYS, Jean (Ella Gwendolen Rees Williams) (1890–1979), novelist, born in Dominica, the daughter of a Welsh doctor; she came to England in 1907. She briefly attended the Perse School, Cambridge, and the Academy of Dramatic Art, then worked as chorus girl and film extra, and, during the First World War, as volunteer cook. In 1919 she left England to marry the first of three husbands, Jean Lenglet, and remained abroad for many years, living mainly in Paris, where she began to write and where much of her early work is set. *The Left Bank: Sketches and Studies of Present-Day Bohemian Paris appeared in 1927 with an introduction by F. M. *Ford, followed by *Postures (1928, reprinted 1969 as *Quartet) and *After Leaving Mr Mackenzie (1930). *Voyage in the Dark (1934) is a first-person account of 19-year-old Anna Morgan’s experiences as a chorus girl in London and on tour, and *Good Morning, Midnight (1939) is the story, also told in the first person, of middle-aged Sasha Jensen, lonely and adrift in Paris, with a dead marriage and a dead baby behind her, seeking ambiguous consolation in a relationship with a gigolo. A long silence followed, during which Jean Rhys returned to England, living quietly in the West Country, until a radio adaptation of *Good Morning, Midnight in 1958 brought her back to public attention. *Wide Sargasso Sea (1966), set in Dominica and Jamaica during the 1830s, presents the life of the mad Mrs Rochester from *Jane Eyre, a Creole heiress here called Antoinette Cosway; in the brief last section she is imprisoned in the attic in Thornfield Hall. This book was very well received and reprints of earlier novels were issued, to much praise of their ‘bitter poetry’, and were followed by two collections of short stories, *Tigers Are Better Looking (1968) and *Sleep It Off, Lady (1976), and an unfinished autobiography, *Smile Please (1979). Her Letters 1931–66, ed. F. Wyndham and D. Melly, were published in 1984, and a biography, *Jean Rhys Life and Work, by Carole Angier in 1990.

RHYS, John Llewellyn (1910–40), killed in action with the RAF, author of three books, all reflecting his passion for flying and his life as a pilot: they are *The Flying Shadow (1936), *The World Owes Me a Living (1939), and *England Is My Village, a volume of short stories, for which he was posthumously awarded the Hawthornden Prize. His widow established in 1942 the prize that bears his name. Originally awarded to writers under 30, it is now available to writers under 35. Winners include Alun *Lewis (1944), V. S. *Naipaul (1958), Dan *Jacobson (1959), David *Storey (1961), Nell *Dunn (1964), Angela *Carter (1968), Andrew *Motion (1984), and Jonathan *Coe (1994).

RHYTHM (111–13, superseded 1913 by the *Blue Review), a periodical edited by J. *Murry, with M. *Sadleir and K. *Mansfield, Murry conceived it as *The Yellow Book of the modern movement, and in it appeared work by D. H. *Lawrence, Mansfield, F. M. *Ford, *Picasso, *Gaudier-Brzeska, and others.

Riah, the Jew in Dickens’s *Our Mutual Friend.

RICARDO, David (1772–1823), English economist, of Dutch–Jewish family, who made a fortune on the London stock exchange, and then, under the influence of Adam *Smith, devoted himself to the study of political economy. In 1811 he met James *Mill, who became a close friend, and encouraged him in the composition and publication of his chief work, *On the Principles of Political Economy and Taxation (1817), in which he sets forward his views on prices, wages, and profits, and his theory of rent. Again with Mill’s encouragement, he became a member of Parliament for Pontarlington in 1819. J. S. *Mill, who was as a boy obliged by his father to learn the rudiments of political economy from Ricardo’s works, described him as ‘the most modest of men’ (*Autobiography, ch. 1), but his personal and social interests and sympathies appear to have been narrow, and in many ways he represents the archetypal ‘Dryasdust’ economist, concerned only with facts and statistics, of *Carlyle’s diatribes.

RICE, Anne, see GOTHIC FICTION.

RICE, Elmer (1892–1967), American dramatist, born Elmer Reizenstein in New York. His first major play was the expressionist drama *The Adding Machine (1923), which satirized increasing regimentation and mechanization through the posthumous adventures of Mr Zero, a bookkeeper. His plays of the 1930s (We, the People, 1933; Judgment Day, 1934; Between Two Worlds, 1934) are a response to the Depression and international ideological conflict. Rice was a campaigner for social justice and an outspoken critic of censorship. He wrote many other plays, some of them farces and melodramas, four novels, and a memoir, Minority Report (1963).

RICE, James (1843–82), novelist and journalist, educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. While editing the failing periodical Once a Week he made the acquaintance of Walter *Besant, and proposed to him that they should collaborate in writing a novel: the result was Ready-Money Mortiboy (1872), the tale of a Prodigal Son who returns home 'ten times worse than when he went away' and proceeds to ruin his father. Their successful association produced several novels and volumes of short stories.

RICH, Adrienne Cecile (1929– ), American poet, essayist, and critic, born in 1929; she graduated from Radcliffe College in 1951. She has held a variety of academic posts, most recently professor in Stanford, California. Rich has published steadily since A Change of World (1951), though it was only with her third collection, Snapshots of a Daughter in Law (1956), that her characteristic, fractured, free verse, frequently in lengthy sequences, began to emerge. Rich's volumes through the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s keep pace with her own increasing politicization and involvement with first the anti-war movement, and then lesbian/feminist politics, making them valuable representative documents of their times. Her poetry allies the personal ever more closely with the political, typically juxtaposing scenes of domestic life with reminders of horrifying instances of history. Diving into the Wreck (1971) and The Dream of a Common Language (1978) are outstanding collections, while The Fact of a Doorframe: Poems Selected and New, 1950–1984 presents much of her most achieved work. Rich's essays, particularly Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence (1981), have been seminal for her generation of feminists. Some of her prose work is published in Lies, Secrets and Silence (1978) and in Bread, Blood, and Poetry (1984).

RICH, Barnaby (1542–1617). He fought at Le Havre, in Ireland, and in the Netherlands, rising to the rank of captain; from 1574 he turned to literature, writing romances in the style of Lyly's *Euphues, pamphlets, and reminiscences. From 1587 he received a pension. His best-known romance is Riche His Farewell to Militarie Profession (1581), which includes Apolonius and Silla, the source of Shakespeare's Twelfth Night. It was edited by T. M. Cranfill (1959).

RICH, John (17692–1761), theatrical producer, and son of the notoriously mean manager of Drury Lane, Christopher Rich (d. 1714). John opened the New Theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1714, where he had much success with pantomime. In 1728 he produced Gay's Beggar's Opera which was popularly said to have 'made Gay rich and Rich gay'. He became manager of Covent Garden in 1732, and in 1735 founded the Sublime Society of Beef Steaks, a club with many eminent members which met and dined in a room at the theatre.

RICH, Penelope (c.1562–1607), the sister of Robert Devereux, earl of *Essex, *Elizabeth I's last favourite. Her father's dying wish, when she was only 13 or 14, that she should marry *Sidney, came to nothing; in 1581 she was unhappily married to Lord Rich, and soon after provided the model for Sidney's Stella. The exact nature of their relationship can never be known, but details in some sonnets, e.g. the comment that Stella 'Hath no misfortune, but that Rich she is', make it clear that she is the lady in question. After bearing Lord Rich seven children she became the mistress of Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy (later earl of Devonshire), bearing him five or six children: they were married, after she had been legally separated from Lord Rich, by *Laud, but the legality of the match was not accepted, and both died soon after. She was a famous beauty and a good linguist, especially in Spanish; took part in masques by *Jonson and *Daniel; and was addressed by other poets besides Sidney, e.g. *Constable. According to Fr John Gerrard, she died in the Roman Catholic faith.

RICHARD I (1157–99), Cœur de Lion, king of England 1189–99, was one of the leaders of the Third Crusade and became a figure of romantic admiration in England (in the *Robin Hood legends, for instance, and in Scott's *The Talisman and *Ivanhoe), in spite of the fact that only six months of his ten-year reign were spent in England. For the Middle English verse romance see Richard Cœur de Lion.

Richard II, King, a historical tragedy by *Shakespeare, probably written and acted 1595. It was an immediate success and the first quarto of 1597 was followed by two more in 1598. After the death of *Elizabeth I a fourth quarto was issued in 1608, which contained the first appearance in print of the deposition scene (iv. i. 154–318), probably previously suppressed because of the politically contentious subject of the queen's succession, upon which it could be taken to reflect. The scene was included in the text of the play printed in the First *Folio of 1623. Shakespeare's main source was the Chronicles of *Holinshed, but he appears possibly to have known the anonymous play about Richard II called Woodstock, and to have drawn on S. Daniel's narrative poem *The Civil Wars. The play begins with the quarrel between Henry Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt, and Thomas Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, which King Richard resolves arbitrarily by exiling Mowbray for life and Bolingbroke for ten years. When 'time-honoured' John of Gaunt dies Richard confiscates his property to pay... for his Irish wars, for which he leaves the country. Bolingbroke returns to claim his inheritance and takes Berkeley Castle, which the duke of York has as regent to yield him. The king returns to Wales, hears that his Welsh supporters have deserted him and that Bolingbroke has executed the king’s favourites Bushy and Green; accompanied by York’s son Aumerle, he withdraws to Flint Castle, where Bolingbroke accepts his surrender. The first half of the play ends with a discussion between a gardener and Richard’s Queen Isabel about the government of the garden-state and the possibility of the king’s deposition (III. iv).

In London Richard relinquishes his crown to Bolingbroke, who sends him to the Tower. The earl of Carlisle’s and Aumerle’s plot to kill Bolingbroke, who has now proclaimed himself Henry IV, is foiled by York. Richard is transferred to Pomfret Castle, where he hears of Henry’s coronation and is murdered by Sir Pierce of Exton.

Richard II, like Henry VI and King John, is written entirely in verse and it contains some of Shakespeare’s most famous speeches, including John of Gaunt’s evocation of England as ‘This royal throne of kings, this scept’rd isle’. Its telling ‘sad stories of the death of kings’ contributed to its potent appeal. On the day before the earl of Essex’s planned revolt in 1601 his supporters paid for a performance of a play about Richard II, which was almost certainly Shakespeare’s.

Richard III, King, a historical tragedy by Shakespeare, probably written and performed 1591. It was first published in a quarto in 1597, which was reprinted five times before it appeared again, in a fuller and more reliable text in the First Folio of 1623. The play’s chief sources are the chronicles of R. Holinshed and E. Hall which contained material from *Vergil’s Aeneid and Sir T. More’s *The History of King Richard the Thirde.

The play completes the tetralogy whose first three parts are the Henry VI plays. It centres on the character of Richard of Gloucester, afterwards King Richard III, ambitious and bloody, bold and subtle, treacherous, yet brave in battle, a murderer, and usurper of the crown. The play begins with the deformed Richard’s announcement: ‘Now is the winter of our discontent / Made glorious summer by this sun of York’, that is the king, Edward IV, who is dying. Richard is determined that he shall succeed to the crown and sets out to eliminate any opposition to this and to secure his position. He has his brother the duke of Clarence, who has been imprisoned in the Tower, murdered. As she accompanies the corpse of her dead father-in-law Henry VI, Anne, the widow of Edward, prince of Wales, is wooed by Richard, and they are later married. When the king dies Richard begins his attack on Queen Elizabeth’s family and supporters, with the help of the duke of Buckingham. Hastings, Rivers, and Grey are all executed, and Buckingham persuades the citizens of London to proclaim Richard king. After his coronation he murders his nephews, the princes in the Tower, and following the death of his wife Anne, which he encourages, tries to marry his niece, Elizabeth of York. However, Buckingham rebels and goes to join Henry Tudor, earl of Richmond, who has landed in Wales at Milford Haven to claim the crown. Buckingham is captured and Richard has him executed, but he now has to face Richmond’s army at Bosworth. On the night before the battle the ghosts of those whom Richard has killed appear to him and foretell his defeat. In the battle the next day he loses his horse and is killed by Richmond, who is then proclaimed Henry VII, the first of the Tudor monarchs.

Richard Cœur de Lion, a verse romance in 7,136 lines of short couplets dating from the early 14th cent., which some scholars suggest may be by the same writer as two other long romances of the same period, *Of Arthour and of Merlin and King Alisauder (see introduction to the latter by G. V. Smithers for discussion of authorship). The writer says he is taking his poem from a French source, but it is marked by spirited English patriotism and contempt for the French King Philip. It is assumed that the source is Anglo-Norman, dating from about 1230–50. The poem describes the discomfiture of the Saracens in the course of the Third Crusade and breaks off, unfinished, when a three-year truce is arranged. There are several manuscripts and fragments. Quotations from it are found in the notes to Scott’s The Talisman, referring to the cooking and eating of the Saracen’s head, and of the heads served to the Paynim ambassadors. The edition by K. Brunner (Vienna, 1913) is a critical edition of the seven manuscripts then known.

RICHARDS, Frank, see HAMILTON, CHARLES.

RICHARDS, (Thomas Franklin) Grant (1872–1948), publisher and author, son of an Oxford don; he worked for W. T. Stead on the Review of Reviews before setting up as a publisher himself. His Memories of a Misspent Youth (1932) and Author Hunting (1934) describe a life devoted to literature, and to the support of authors as diverse as A. E. *Housman, *Firbank, Tressell, and *Dreiser; he was more adventurous and enthusiastic than financially prudent, and *Shaw wrote to him (23 May 1934), 'You should call your book The Tragedy of a Publisher who Allowed Himself to Fall in Love with Literature.' He was the founder, in 1901, of the *World's Classics series.

RICHARDS, I(vor) A(rmstrong) (1893–1979), critic and poet, educated at Clifton and Magdalene College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow; in 1929 he travelled to China, then in 1939 moved to Harvard, where he devoted many years to the study of linguistics conducted by Richards in Cambridge in which he travelled to China, then in 1939 moved to Harvard, and where he devoted many years to the study of linguistics and education. He was the founder, with Charles Kay Ogden (1889–1957), of Basic English, 'an auxiliary international language comprising 850 words arranged in a system in which everything may be said for all the purposes of everyday language'; Richards and Ogden published two works together, The Foundations of Aesthetics (1922, with J. Wood) and The Meaning of Meaning (1923). In a literary context Richards is best known for his Principles of Literary Criticism (1924), Science and Poetry (1926), and above all Practical Criticism: A Study of Literary Judgement (1929), a work which revolutionized the teaching and study of English. It was based on an experiment conducted by Richards in Cambridge in which he issued unsigned poems to students and asked for their written comments; the results were both entertaining and alarming, revealing that a majority of readers condemned poems by *Donne, D. H. *Lawrence, and G. M. *Hopkins, while praising highly the work of G. A. Studdert Kennedy ('Woodbine Willie') and J. D. C. Fellow. In his commentary, Richards analyses the stock responses, preconceptions, metrical insensitivities, lack of attentive reading, etc., of his guinea-pigs, and, while he refrains from concluding that 'a man who is stupid with poetry must be stupid with life', he does assert that 'a general insensitivity to poetry does witness a low level of general imaginative life.' Richards's attacks on vagueness, sentimentality, and laziness in poets and readers, his praise of irony ('a characteristic of poetry of the highest order'), ambiguity, complexity, and allusiveness, did much to create the climate which accepted *Modernism, and greatly influenced *Empson (his student from 1928 to 1929) and *Leavis; but perhaps his greatest contribution lay in his emphasis on the importance of close textual study and the danger of random generalization. His methods have now become standard classroom procedure in many schools and universities (see New Criticism and Practical Criticism). Richards's views on scientific and emotive language, and on the nature of the status of statements (or pseudo-statements) in poetry have been less widely accepted. Richards also published several volumes of poetry; a collection, Internal Colloquies: Poems and Plays, appeared in 1972.

RICHARDSON, Dorothy Miller (1873–1957), novelist, the third of four daughters of an impoverished gentleman. She was obliged to earn her living from an early age, first as governess, then as secretary, translator, and journalist. She became an intimate friend of H. G. *Wells and other avant-garde thinkers of the day who encouraged her to write. In 1915 appeared Pointed Roofs, the first of a sequence of highly autobiographical novels entitled Pilgrimage, of which the last volume, March Moonlight, first appeared posthumously in 1967. She was a pioneer of the *stream-of-consciousness technique, narrating the action through the mind of her heroine Miriam. She believed in 'unpunctuated' female prose (citing *Joyce in support), and V. *Woolf credited her with inventing 'the psychological sentence of the feminine gender'.

The formidable length of her great work deterred many readers, but interest revived in the 1960s and 1970s with the growth of *feminist criticism. Angus *Wilson ('Sexual Revolution', Listener, Oct. 1968) acclaimed her as a defiant writer who 'enters more fully than any novelist I know into the material and spiritual struggles of a young, very gifted, but at the same time utterly underprivileged woman in a world made by men for men'. Pilgrimage was reissued in 1979 in four volumes by the Virago Press, and a critical biography by John Rosenberg appeared in 1973.

RICHARDSON, Henry Handel, the pen-name of Ethel Florence Lindsay Richardson (1870–1946), novelist, born in Melbourne, Australia; her father, an Edinburgh-educated Irish doctor, and her English mother married after emigrating during the gold rushes. Her mother worked as postmistress after her father's death in 1879. Ethel was educated at the Presbyterian Ladies College in Melbourne, then, from 1888, in Leipzig, where she studied music. In 1895 she married John George Robertson, a philologist, and from 1904 (with one brief return visit to Australia in 1912) she lived in England. Her first novel, Maurice Guest (1908), is a tale of grande passion set in Leipzig, with an English provincial schoolmaster, studying music, as protagonist. Her second, and most economical, The Getting of Wisdom (1910), describes her Australian schooldays in the person of Laura Rambotham, an intelligent child caught between rebellion and the desire to please, between ambition and reality, who makes the discovery that the art of fiction is the art of lying plausibly. Her most ambitious work, the trilogy The Fortunes of Richard Mahony, consists of Australia Felix (1917), The Way Home (1925), and Ultima Thule (1929), of which the last was the most successful. Clearly rooted in the biography of her own parents, it traces the fluctuating progress of Mahony, from storekeeper in a rough mining settlement, through a prosperous medical career and even more prosperous financial speculation, to bankruptcy, madness, and death; throughout he is loyally supported by his wife Mary, who is finally obliged to work as a postmistress to support her small children. In its epic sweep it is at once the history of a man, a marriage, and a continent, capturing with imaginative recollection the landscapes, developing social attitudes, and growing prosperity and respectability of Australia. Her last novel, The Young Cosima (1939), returns to a musical theme, and is based on a life of Cosima Wagner; her autobiography, Myself when Young (1948), was unfinished at her death.

RICHARDSON, Jonathan, the elder (1665–1745), British portrait painter, who was highly successful in his own day. Yet his portraits are less interesting than his writings on art, and on the science of connoisseurship. His Theory of Painting (1715) was the first significant work on aesthetic theory by an English author; in the second edition, 1725, he added an influential essay on the sublime. He was himself a discriminating connoisseur with a superlative collection of drawings; he had a wide circle of literary friends, amongst them Pope, Gay, and Prior, and with his son wrote a book Explanatory Notes on Paradise Lost (1734). He drew and painted Pope and his family many times. His son did the research for a guidebook to Italy which was a popular companion on the Grand Tour.

RICHARDSON, Samuel (1689–1761), the son of a joiner, born near Derby, where his parents lived briefly before returning to London. Little is known of his boyhood, but because of his father’s comparative poverty he appears to have received (in his own words) ‘only common School-learning’. The tradition that he attended either Merchant Taylors’ or ‘Christ’s Hospital cannot be substantiated. As a boy he read widely, told stories to his friends, and by the age of 13 was employed writing letters for young lovers. In 1706 he was apprenticed to a printer (as his father could not afford to enter him for the Church), and in 1715 he was admitted a Freeman of the Stationers’ Company. He set up in business on his own in 1721, in which year he married Martha Wilde, the daughter of his former master. All his working life he was extremely industrious, and his business prospered and expanded steadily. Like all printers of his time, he combined printing and publishing, producing books, journals, advertisement posters, and much miscellaneous work. In 1723 he took over the printing of an influential Tory journal, the True Briton, and by 1727 was sufficiently established in his profession to be appointed renter warden of the Stationers’ Company. In the 1720s and early 1730s he suffered the early deaths of all his six children, and in 1731 that of his wife. He attributed the nervous disorders of his later life to the shock of these deaths. In 1733 he married Elizabeth Leake, the daughter of a fellow printer, and four of the daughters of their marriage survived. In the same year he published his The Apprentice’s Vade Mecum, a book of advice on morals and conduct. In 1738 he purchased in Fulham a weekend ‘country’ house, which he always referred to as ‘North End’, and which later became famous for his readings and literary parties. He published in 1739 his own version, pointedly moral, of Aesop’s Fables, and, more importantly, he began Pamela.

Inspiration for the novel initially came from a series of ‘familiar letters’ which fellow printers had encouraged him to write on the problems and concerns of everyday life. While these eventually grew into Pamela, they were also published separately as Letters . . . to and for Particular Friends (1741). Pamela was written in two months, between November 1739 and January 1740, and was published later in that year, to very considerable acclaim. The morality and realism of the work were particularly praised, as Richardson had hoped. However, complaints of its impropriety persuaded him to revise his second edition considerably. The work had a great vogue abroad, and was soon adapted for the stage in France. Imitations and forgeries ‘continuations’ persuaded Richardson to go on with the story, and volumes iii and iv (Pamela II) were published in 1741. In that year there appeared a stinging parody called An Apology for the Life of Mrs Shamela Andrews, which Richardson believed to be by Fielding (as it almost certainly was) and which he never forgave. Fielding’s Joseph Andrews, which begins as a parody of Pamela, was published in 1742 but did not affect the popularity of Pamela II.

Richardson’s business continued to prosper, although his health was beginning to cause him great concern, and he extended his publications in religion, history, biography, and literature. In 1733 he had begun printing for the House of Commons and in 1742 he secured the lucrative post of printer of its journals. His circle of friends had by now vastly increased, and included many admiring young ladies, known as his ‘songbirds’ or ‘honyary daughters’.

During the writing of Clarissa, which was probably begun in 1744, he endlessly asked his friends for comments and advice, and read passages aloud to them in his ‘grotto’ (or summer house) at North End. The first two volumes of Clarissa appeared in 1747 and were very favourably received. After heavy revision, and determined efforts to prune, a further five volumes appeared in 1748. Correspondents and the circle of friends continued to grow and now included the Bluestocking ladies Mrs Delany, Mrs Carter, and later Mrs Chapone. Clarissa was an undoubted success but there were complaints about both its length and its indecency, and it was not reprinted as often as Pamela. However, it also became very popular abroad and was translated into French, Dutch, and German.

Urged by friends, Richardson began thinking, in about 1750, of the portrayal of a ‘Good Man’. He asked for the views of his extensive acquaintance and began experimenting with the ‘letters’ of Harriet, who was to become one of the heroines of his next novel. His illnesses and general malaise, which appear to have included a form of Parkinson’s disease, increased steadily but he persevered strenuously both with his business and his writing. His authors in the 1750s included C. Lennox, S. Fielding, E. Young, and G. Lyttelton. He had by now become friendly with Dr Johnson, to whose Rambler he contributed in 1750 and whom he helped with money in 1751. In 1752 Johnson (together with many of Richardson's other friends) read the draft of Sir Charles Grandison, and Richardson printed the fourth volume of the Rambler.
In 1753 he travelled to Bath and Cheltenham, which was as far as he had ever gone, and in 1753–4 he published the seven volumes of Sir Charles Grandison.
The book sold well and rapidly became fashionable, but was assailed in various critical pamphlets for length, tedium, and doubtful morality.

In 1754–5 Richardson was master of the Stationers' Company. He published in 1755 A Collection of the Moral and Instructive Sentiments... in the Histories of Pamela, Clarissa, and Sir Charles Grandison, a book which he considered contained the pith of all his work.
In the same year Dr Johnson published the Dictionary, which contained 97 citations from Clarissa. In 1756 Richardson was asked by *Blackstone for advice on the reform of the *Oxford University Press. Towards the end of his life Richardson wrote a few 'letters' to, from, and about Mrs Beaumont, a minor character from Sir Charles Grandison, who had been someone of mysterious importance in his early life. He continued to revise his novels heavily, and remained active in his business until his death.

Richardson is generally agreed to be one of the chief founders of the modern novel. All his novels were *epistolary, a form he took from earlier works in English and French, which he appreciated for its immediacy ('writing to the moment' as he called it), and which he raised to a level not attained by any of his predecessors. The 'letters', of which his novels consist, contain many long transcriptions of conversations, and the kinship with drama seems very strong. He was acutely aware of the problems of prolixity ('Length, is my principle Disgust') and worked hard to prune his original drafts, but his interest in minute analysis led inevitably to an expansive style.

A selection of his letters (6 vols, 1804) was edited by Mrs *Barbauld: see also Selected Letters of Samuel Richardson, ed. J. Carroll (1964). There is a life by T. C. D.
Eaves and B. D. Kimpel (1971); see also M. Kinkead-
Weekes, Samuel Richardson, Dramatic Novelist (1973);

Richard the Thirde, The History of King, by Sir T.
*More, written in English and Latin and included in his Workes (1557) and the Latina Opera (1565). It is distinguished from earlier English chronicles by its unity of scheme and dramatic effectiveness. Shakespeare probably used More's work only as filtered through *Hall and *Holinshead; it was More, however, who was ultimately responsible for the image of Richard as a *Machiavellian tyrant which Shakespeare transmits in *Richard III. (See also BIOGRAPHY.)

Richelelue, Armand Jean du Plessis, Cardinal and duc de (1585–1642), one of the greatest of French statesmen, who first came into prominence as bishop of Luçon, and became prime minister of Louis XIII in 1624. He disciplined the nobles by a series of executions, destroyed the political importance of the Protestants by the siege and capture of La Rochelle (1628), and intervened successfully in the Thirty Years War.
He was the founder of the *Académie française. He figures in The Three Musketeers of *Dumas, and is the anti-hero of a blank verse drama by *BuRower-Lytton and a novel by Vigny.

Richter, Mordecai (1931– ), Canadian novelist and screenwriter, born in Montreal, who from 1959 spent some years working in England, returning to Canada in 1972. His first novel, The Acrobat (1954), was followed by others, including, notably, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz (1959) which describes a Jewish boy-hood in Montreal. The Incomparable Atuk (1963) is an extravaganza set in theatrical London of the Swinging Sixties, in which English gentleman publisher Morti-mer Griffin confronts multiculturalism, cinema star-lets, and pornography: this was followed by St Urbain's Horseman (1971) also set in London, in which Jake Hersh, Jewish-Canadian film director, is acquitted from a rape charge. His many other exuberant, witty, and irreverent novels include Solomon Gursky Was Here (1989), which many consider his masterpiece: this is an ambitious and epic work which interweaves Jewish themes and Inuit folklore in an extraordinary and gripping exploration of Canada's historic multicultural roots, by means of the mysterious family saga of the wealthy Gurskys. Barney's Version (1997) recounts the unreliable and outrageous memories of Barney Panofsky in Montreal, London, and Paris.

Richmond, Sir Bruce (1871–1964), educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford; he joined the Times in 1899, and for 35 years was editor of the Times Literary Supplement from its first production in 1902.

Richmond, Legh (1772–1827), an evangelical divine who lived in the Isle of Wight, where he collected the material for his immensely successful pious tales of country life, published between 1809 and 1814, The Dairyman's Daughter, The Young Cottager, and The Negro Slave. He gave money for the establishment of a library, which still exists, on the island of Iona.

Richter, Johann Paul Friedrich (1763–1825), German
Romantic novelist, who wrote under the name 'Jean Paul'. Reared in humble village surroundings, he was at his best in idyllic representations of the life he knew.
His combination of humour with mystic idealism appealed to *Carlyle and *De Quincey, both of whom translated stories by 'Jean Paul' and wrote appreci-tions of his works. His best-known works are:
Hesperus (1795), Quintus Fixelin (1796), Siebenkäs (1796–7), *Vorschule der Ästhetik (Introduction to Aesthetics, 1804), and the unfinished Flegeljahre (1804–5).
RICKETTS, Charles (1866–1931), English aesthetic, illustrator, designer, and painter. His brilliant conversation and rarefied tastes attracted many writers to his house in the Vale, Chelsea, and later to Townshend House; among his friends were *Wilde, J. H. *Gray, *Yeats, G. B. *Shaw, *Michael Field (Edith Cooper and Katherine Bradley), and *Binyon. Ricketts illustrated and designed many of Wilde’s books; most beautiful are A House of Pomegranates (1891) and The Sphinx (1894). After Wilde’s death he wrote a memoir of him, Recollections of Oscar Wilde (1932). With Charles Shannon, Ricketts edited the *Dial (1889–97), a lavishly illustrated literary magazine deeply influenced by the then little-known works of French and Belgian symbolists. His Vale Press, founded in 1896, was one of the most important of the *private presses. Later Ricketts worked as a stage designer; Shaw’s Saint Joan (1924) was his most successful production. Ricketts was a distinguished collector, connoisseur, and writer on art, and in his last years designed and illustrated two of his own prose works, Beyond the Threshold (1929) and Unrecorded Histories (1933).

RICKWORD, Edgell (1898–1982), poet, critic, and radical, who edited from 1925 to 1927 the *Calendar of Modern Letters, an influential literary periodical which helped to form the critical attitudes of *Leavis. He also edited two volumes of *Scrutiny (1928–32), the Left Review (1936–8), and Our Time (1944–7), and edited the essays of *Caudwell (1949). Essays and Opinions (1921–51), edited by A. Young, appeared in 1974, and Collected Poems in 1976.

Riddle of the Sands, The, see Childers.

Riderhood, Rogue, a character in Dickens’s *Our Mutual Friend.

RIDING, Laura (1901–91), American poet and critic, who lived and worked with Robert *Graves from 1927 until 1939. She was well represented in the *Faber Book of Modern Verse (1936) and her elliptical verses were brought together in Collected Poems (1938). Critical works include (with Graves) A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1927) and Contemporaries and Snobs (1928). A novel, A Trojan Ending, appeared in 1937, and Lives of Wives, on various marriages in history, in 1939.

RIDLER, Anne, née Bradby (1912– ), lyric and religious poet and verse dramatist, born in Rugby, the daughter of a housemaster at Rugby School, educated at King’s College, London. She worked for a time at Faber and Faber, at one point as assistant to T. S. *Eliot, whose Anglican faith she shared. Her volumes include Poems (1939), The Nine Bright Shiners (1943), The Golden Bird (1951, which contains her poem on the theme of ‘Deus Absconditus’) and Some Time After (1972). Her poetic dramas include The Mask (1950) and The Trial of Thomas Cranmer (1956). Her Collected Poems, published in 1994, shows the range of her devotional verse, ballads, and lyrics, and contains some of her later libretti or ‘Words for Music’.

RIDLEY, James (1736–65), a cleric, remembered for his Tales of the Genii, published in 1764. As often with *Oriental novels, the author purports to be merely the discoverer and translator, in this case ‘Sir Charles Morell’, ambassador to the great mogul. Many of these curious and exotic tales are modelled on those of the *Arabian Nights. The book enjoyed a great and abiding success; it was later bowdlerized, and read by several generations of children, including the young *Dickens, who founded his youthful tragedy Misnart on one of the tales.

RIDLEY, Nicholas (?1500–55), bishop successively of Rochester and London, and a fellow of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He became one of *Cranmer’s chaplains and began gradually to reject many Roman doctrines. If any hand beside that of Cranmer can be detected in the two Prayer Books of Edward VI, it is believed to be Ridley’s. As bishop of London he exerted himself to propagate reformed opinions. On Edward VI’s death he denounced Queen Mary and Elizabeth as illegitimate at St Paul’s Cross, London. He was sent to the Tower in June 1553 and deprived of his bishopric. In September 1555 he was condemned on the charge of heresy and burnt alive with *Latimer at Oxford, 16 Oct. He wrote several theological treatises, which appeared after his death. In 1841 the Works of Nicholas Ridley were edited for the Parker Society by Henry Christmas.

Rights of Man, The, a political treatise by T. *Paine in two parts, published 1791 and 1792.

Pt I is in the main a reply to Burke’s Reflections on the *Revolution in France. Paine accuses *Burke of ‘rancour, prejudice and ignorance’, of seeking theatrical effects at the expense of truth, and of disorderly arguments: ‘Mr Burke should recollect that he is writing history, and not plays.’ He denies that one generation can bind another as regards the form of government, and argues that the constitution of a country is an act of the people constituting the government. He traces the incidents of the French Revolution up to the adoption of the Declaration of the Rights of Man by the National Assembly, and criticizes Burke’s account of these incidents as over-emotional and inaccurate; he alleges that Burke cares only for the forms of chivalry, and not for the nation. ‘He pities the plumage, and forgets the dying bird.’

Pt II touches on Burke’s Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs, then passes to a comparison of the new French and American constitutions with those of British institutions, to the disadvantage of the latter. The work also contains Paine’s far-sighted proposals.

RILKE, Rainer Maria (1875-1926), German lyric poet, a member of the German-speaking minority in Prague. Of decisive importance were his two visits to Russia which, deepening his religious experience, led to Das Stunden-buch (The Book of Hours, 1905), in which death is the central theme, handled in a highly individual way. The subjective emotionalism of the early work began to give way to poetry of a more objective type, the transition to which is seen in Das Buch der Bilder (Sketches of Malte Laurids Brigge, 1902) and which finds its mature expression in the Neue Gedichte (New Poems, 1907-8). The latter was greatly influenced by the French sculptor Rodin, whose secretary Rilke was for a time. In 1910 appeared a full-scale prose work, Die Aufzeichnungen des Malte Laurids Brigge (Sketches of Malte Laurids Brigge), in which Rilke explored the relationship between a sensitive poet and a threatening environment. The Duineser Elegien (1923; Duino Elegies), begun shortly before the First World War and completed not long afterwards, arose from Rilke's endeavour to discover for himself as a poet a satisfactory spiritual position amid the decay of reality; and the Die Sonette an Orpheus (Sonnets to Orpheus, 1923), written in a sudden frenzy of inspiration, are the jubilant outcome of that endeavour. His extensive correspondence is of great literary interest. He is one of the most important lyric poets of the 20th cent., and his poetry has been translated into many languages—various collections have appeared in English translated by J. B. Leishman, sometimes in collaboration with *Spender.

RIMBAUD, Arthur (1854-91), French poet. One of the most revolutionary figures in 19th-cent. literature, he was by the age of 16 in full revolt against every form of authority. Expressing the exhilaration of his regular escape from maternal discipline and his fascination with cabbalistic and alchemical imagery, his verse was already fiercely independent of religious, political, and literary orthodoxy. By the age of 17 he had written his most famous poem, 'Le Bateau ivre', a hymn to the quest of unknown realities, which became a sacred text for the next two generations of writers. Between 1871 and 1873—the period of his association with *Verlaine and his sojourns in England—he undertook a programme of 'disorientation of the senses' in order to try to turn himself into a voyant or seer. This resulted in his most original work, two collections of prose poems, Les Illuminations, which explored the visionary possibilities of this experiment, and Une saison en enfer, recording its moral and psychological failure. By the time he was 19, his poetic career was over. The remainder of his life has been described as a prolonged act of passive resistance. Having repudiated poetry, he gave himself up to vagabondage, first in Europe, and later in Aden and north-east Africa. His poems have been translated into prose versions by poet Oliver Bernard (1962).

Rinaldo, or Renaud, first figures under the latter name in the *Charlemagne cycle of legends as the eldest of the Four Sons of *Aymon, who were first the enemies of Charlemagne but later pardoned on condition that Renaud goes to Palestine to fight the Saracens and surrenders his horse Bayard. Renaud complies and becomes a hermit in Palestine; but Bayard will allow no one else to mount him. As Rinaldo, he figures in Boiardo's *Orlando innamorato, Ariosto's *Orlando furioso, and Tasso's *Gerusalemme liberata: in the first two as the cousin of Orlando and the suitor of Angelica; in the third as a prince of Este, the lover of Armida and the victor in the battle for Jerusalem.

Ring and the Book, The, a poem in blank verse, in 12 books, totalling over 21,000 lines, by R. *Browning, published in four monthly installments Nov. 1868-Feb. 1869. The poem was a critical and popular success, and established Browning’s contemporary reputation.

The 'Ring' of the title is a figure for the process by which the artist transmutes the 'pure crude fact' of historical events into living forms; the 'Book' is a collection of documents relating to the Italian murder trial of the late 17th cent. on which the poem is based. Browning found the volume on a market stall in Florence, and offered it to several of his acquaintances (including *Tennyson and *Trollope) before finally deciding to use it himself.

The story in bare outline is as follows. Pietro and Violante Comparini were a middle-aged childless couple living in Rome. Their income could only be secured after Pietro's death if they had a child; so Violante bought the child of a prostitute and passed it off as her own. This child, Pompilia, was eventually married to Count Guido Franceschini, an impoverished nobleman from Arezzo. The marriage was unhappy, and the Comparini, disappointed by life in Arezzo, returned to Rome, where they sued Guido for the restoration of Pompilia's dowry on the grounds of her illegitimacy, which Violante now revealed. Pompilia was eventually fled from Arezzo in the company of a young priest, Giuseppe Caponsacchi. Guido pursued them and had them arrested on the outskirts of Rome; as a result, Caponsacchi was exiled to Civita Vecchia for three years, and Pompilia was sent to a convent while the lawsuits were decided. But then, because she was pregnant, she was released into the custody of the Comparini. A fortnight after the birth of her child, Guido and four accomplices murdered her and her putative parents. They were arrested and tried for the murder, Guido claiming justification on the grounds of his wife’s adultery with Caponsacchi; nevertheless he and his accomplices were convicted and sentenced to death. Guido then pleaded exemption for himself, but his appeal was rejected and the five were executed.

In Browning’s poem, the story is told by a succession of speakers—citizens of Rome, the participants themselves, the lawyers, and the pope—each of whose single, insufficient perceptions combines with the others to form the ‘ring’ of the truth. This design represents Browning’s response to a number of pressing concerns in his own creative life and in contemporary philosophies of art and religion. He saw ‘truth’ as both absolute (in its divine essence) and relative (in its human manifestation); the artist partakes of either quality, all means of expression (such as language) being an inadequate ‘witness’ to the true life of the imagination, just as historical witnesses give a partial and inadequate account of ‘real’ events.

In its immense but ordered size and scope; in the vitality of its characters and the rich evocation of time and place; and in its magnificently troubled exposition of the relation between sign and significance, the poem stands at the centre of Browning’s achievement.

Ring des Nibelungen, Der, a series of four music dramas by *Wagner, based indirectly on the *Nibelungenlied, composed 1853–70, produced 1869–76. Das Rheingold tells the story of the stealing of the gold of the Rhine maidens by Alberich, king of the Nibelungen, and the forging and theft (by Wotan) of the magic ring. Die Walküre (The Valkyrie) deals with the love of Sieglinde and Siegmund, and of the laying to sleep of Brünnhilde the Valkyrie by Wotan, who surrounds her with a ring of fire. In Siegfried the son of Siegmund and Sieglinde obtains the magic ring and passes through the flames to awaken Brünnhilde. In Göttterdammerung (The Twilight of the Gods) Siegfried betrays Brünnhilde for Gutrune, under the influence of a magic potion, and is slain: Brünnhilde places the ring on her finger and throws herself on Siegfried’s pyre, whereupon the ring is recovered by the Rhine maidens.

Rip Van Winkle, taking refuge from a termagant wife in a solitary ramble in the Catskill mountains, falls asleep, and awakens after 20 years, to find his wife dead, his house in ruins, and the world completely changed.

RITCHIE, Anne Isabella Thackeray, Lady (1837–1919), elder daughter of *Thackeray. She wrote novels of an impressionistic kind which influenced her step-niece V. *Woolf, who drew a portrait of her in *Night and Day as ‘Mrs Hilbery’. Old Kensington (1873) and Mrs Dymond (1885) are probably the best remembered of her novels today. She also wrote reminiscences of the literary figures she had known in her youth: Records of Tennyson, Ruskin and Robert and Elizabeth Browning (1892) and Chapters from Some Memoirs (1894), among others. A biography of her by Winifred Gérin was published in 1981.

RITSON, Joseph (1752–1803), literary antiquary, vegetarian, republican, and eccentric, and a friend of Sir W. *Scott, who consulted him while working on his Border Minstrelsy. Ritson was a man of an irritable and bitter nature, exacerbated by ill health, which expressed itself in his attacks (often justified) on the works of fellow scholars: he challenged T. *Warton’s History of English Poetry (1782) and also Dr *Johnson’s and *Steevens’s edition of Shakespeare. In 1783 he published A Select Collection of English Songs containing strictures on Percy’s *Reliques, accusing *Percy of corrupting texts ‘to give the quotations an air of antiquity, which it was not intitl’d to’, and of other ‘monstrous lies’ and misrepresentations. In 1795 he published Robin Hood: A Collection of All the Ancient Poems, Songs and Ballads Now Extant Relative to That Outlaw, with illustrations by *Bewick: Scott attributed a ‘superstitious scrupulosity’ to this work, which he thought excessively comprehensive. His Ancient English Metrical Romances appeared in 1802. Ritson also published several popular collections and anthologies of songs, children’s verses, fairy stories, etc. He became increasingly odd in later life, more and more fanatically vegetarian (his diet was originally inspired by reading *Mandeville), and finally insane. (See also PRIMITIVISM and BALLAD.)

Rival Queens, The, or The Death of Alexander the Great, a tragedy by N. *Lee, founded on the Cassandre of *La Calprenède, produced 1677. C. *Gibber attributed its success to the performance of *Betterton, but it held the stage for 100 years.

Statira, daughter of Darius and wife of Alexander, learning that Alexander has again fallen a victim to the charms of his first wife Roxana, whom he had promised to discard, vows never to see him again. Alexander, returning from his campaign and passionately loving Statira, is deeply distressed. Roxana goads Statira to fury, Statira revokes her vow, and Alexander banishes Roxana, who later stabs her rival to death. Alexander is poisoned by the conspirator Cassander.

Rivals, The, a comedy by R. B. *Sheridan, produced 1775. This was Sheridan’s first play, written rapidly when he was only 23, yet it is generally agreed to be one of the most engaging and accomplished of English comedies. It is set in Bath, where Sheridan lived from 1770 to 1772. Captain Absolute, son of Sir Anthony Absolute, a warm-hearted but demanding old gentleman who... requires absolute obedience from his son, is in love with Lydia Languish, the niece of Mrs Malaprop. As he knows the romantic Lydia prefers a poor half-pay lieutenant to the heir of a baronet with £3,000 a year, he has assumed for the purposes of courtship the character of Ensign Beverley, and in this guise he is favourably received. But Lydia will lose half her fortune if she marries without her aunt’s consent, and Mrs Malaprop will not approve of an indigent ensign. Sir Anthony arrives in Bath to propose a match between his son and Lydia Languish, a proposal welcomed by Mrs Malaprop. Captain Absolute is now afraid of revealing his deception to Lydia in case he loses her; while Bob Acres, who is also Lydia’s suitor and has heard of Beverley’s courtship, is provoked by the fiery Irishman Sir Lucius O’Trigger to ask Captain Absolute to carry a challenge to Beverley. Sir Lucius himself, who has been deluded into thinking that some love letters received by him from Mrs Malaprop are really from Lydia, likewise finds Captain Absolute in his path, and challenges him. But when Acres finds that Beverley is in fact his friend Absolute, he declines his duel with relief and resigns all claim to Lydia. Sir Lucius’s misapprehension is removed by the arrival of Mrs Malaprop, and Lydia, after a pretty quarrel with her lover for shattering her hopes of a romantic elopement, finally forgives him. Another plot, neatly interwoven with the rest, concerns the love affair of the perverse and jealous Faulkland with Lydia’s friend Julia Melville.

‘Rizpah’, a poem by *Tennyson, published in *Ballads and Other Poems (1880), the monologue of a mother who collects the unhallowed bones of her son night by night from the foot of the gallows and buries them secretly in the churchyard. Her claim that the bones are hers because ‘they had moved in my side’ gave to *Swinburne ‘perfect proof once more of the deep truth that great poets are bisexual’.

In this play Moll Cutpurse, a notorious thief in real life, is portrayed as an honest girl, who helps lovers in distress and defends her virtue with her sword. Sebastian Wentgrave is in love with and betrothed to Mary Fitzallard, but his covetous father forbids the match. Sebastian pretends he has fallen desperately in love with Moll Cutpurse and is about to marry her; and Moll good-naturedly lends herself to the deception. Old Wentgrave, distracted at the prospect, is only too glad to give his blessing when the real bride turns out to be Mary Fitzallard. There are some pleasant bustling scenes in which the life of the London streets is vividly presented, shopkeepers selling tobacco and feathers, their wives intriguing with gallants, and Moll talking thieves’ cant and discomfiting overbold admirers. The play was highly praised by T. S. *Eliot.

ROBBE-GRILLET, Alain (1922– ), French novelist and leading proponent of the *nouveau roman, also a screenwriter and film-maker, born in Brest. In *Les Gommes (1953), the erasers of the title represent the erasure of one version of events and its replacement by another. The title of *Le Voyeur (1955) refers equally to author, narrator, and reader. In *La Jalousie (1957) the narrator allows his presence to be inferred only from significant details in the descriptive passages. *L’Année dernière à Marienbad (1961), a ciné-roman, is the screenplay for Alain Resnais’s landmark film. Robbe-Grillet’s first novel, *Un récidive, written in 1949 but not published until 1978, has yet to appear in English; it is one of his most accessible and enjoyable books, while no less ‘important’ than the more challenging novels of the 1970s, including *Topologie d’une cité fantôme (1976) and *Souvenirs du triangle d’or (1978). In the 1980s he produced three volumes of novelistic memoirs, including, most recently, *Les Dernier Jours de Corinthe (1994).

Robene and Makyne, a pastoral by *Henryson, on the model of the French *pastourelle rather than the classical *eclogue, included in Percy’s *Reliques. Robene is a shepherd, and Makyne (a form of Malkin, a diminutive of Matilda which seems to have been a stereotypical name for an unattractive woman: see *Piers Plowman B l. 184) loves him. He rejects her advances and she goes away. Robene changes his mind and appeals to her, whereupon she delivers the Henrysonian moral:

Robene, thow hes hard soung and say
In gestis and storeis auld:
The man that will noch quhen he may Sall half noch quhen he wald (ll. 89–92).

ROBERT, earl of Gloucester (d. 1147), a natural son of Henry I, and the chief supporter of Matilda against Stephen. He was a patron of literature, in particular of *William of Malmesbury, *Henry of Huntingdon, and *Geoffrey of Monmouth. Geoffrey’s *History is dedicated to him.

Robert the Devil, sixth duke of Normandy and father of William the Conqueror, a personage about whom many legends gathered in consequence of his violence and cruelty. In *The Life of Robert the Devil, Robert is represented as having been devoted soul and body to Satan by his mother, who had long been childless and prayed to the devil to give her a son; but as finally repenting of his misdeeds and marrying the emperor’s daughter (he in fact died on a pilgrimage to Palestine). This verse tale is a translation from the French and was... printed in about 1500 by Wynkyn de *Worde. T. *Lodge wrote a prose account of the same subject.

ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER (fl.1260–1300), the reputed author of a metrical Chronicle of England from Brutus to Henry III, for much of which he drew upon *Lajamon. It is written in long lines, running to 14 syllables and more, and is not the work of a single hand, though probably the whole was composed in the abbey of Gloucester. It contains among passages of special interest a famous description of the death of Simon de Montfort at the battle of Evesham and a section in praise of England beginning: ‘Engelond his a wel god lond.’ Ed. W. A. Wright, Rolls Series 86 (1887).

ROBERTS, Michèle (1949– ), novelist and poet, who became one of the leading literary writers of the women’s liberation movement of the 1970s: from 1975 to 1977 she was poetry editor of the feminist magazine Spare Rib, and her first novel, A Piece of the Night (1978), was the first original fiction published by the Women’s Press. This introduced several of the themes that were to inform her later work: its heroine, Julie Fanchot, is French born but English convent educated, and the story takes her back to Normandy to care for her mother, and to meditate on her French childhood, female friendship, and her struggle to emerge as an independent woman. This was followed by The Visitation (1983), with a theme of gender and twinning; and The Wild Girl (1984). The Book of Mrs Noah (1987) is set partly in Venice and partly on a surreal voyage in a Women’s Ark, where various women writers gather to create their own dream environment: the narrator, like the author, had trained as a librarian, which lends the fantasy a Borgesian bibliographical touch. In the Red Kitchen (1990) was followed by Daughters of the House (1992), a family drama set in France. Flesh and Blood (1994) is a series of parodic highly coloured erotic-historical stories, linked in Scheherazade style, beginning and ending in London of the 1960s, and Impossible Saints (1997) explores female religious faith and ritual and was inspired in part by the life of St Teresa of Ávila. During Mother’s Absence (1993) is a collection of short stories. Her poetry includes The Mirror of the Mother: Selected Poems 1975–1985 (1986), Psyche and the Hurricane (1991) and All the Selves I Was: New and Selected Poems (1995). Both her poetry and her prose are distinguished by a warm, sensuous richness, whether she is writing about sex, food, or motherhood, and she draws with equal ease on classical and biblical legend. Her work offers on the whole a positive, optimistic, yet sharply observant version of women’s experience at the end of the 20th cent.

ROBERTSON, Thomas William Edward (1829–71). He began life as an actor, but retired from the stage and became a dramatist. His plays Society (1865), Ours (1866), Caste (1867), Play (1868), School (1869), and M.P. (1870) introduced a new and more natural type of comedy to the English stage than had been seen during the first half of the century. His earlier drama David Garrick (1864) was also well received. Marie Wilton (Lady Bancroft) was the great exponent of Robertson’s best female characters.

ROBERTSON, William (1721–93), educated at Edin­burgh University, of which, after some time as a Presbyterian parish minister, he became principal in 1762. He achieved fame on the publication of his History of Scotland during the Reign of Queen Mary and of King James VI (1759), which was followed by his history of the reign of Charles V (1769), The History of America (1777), and A Disquisition Concerning the Knowledge which the Ancients Had of India (1791). Both in style and in scholarship his work is comparable with that of *Hume. (Dr *Johnson found it had too much ‘painting’ and verbiage.) Robertson was a member of the *Select Society, and an account of his life and writings was published in 1861 by D. *Stewart.

Robin Hood, a legendary outlaw. The name is part of the designation of places and plants in every part of England. The facts behind the legend are uncertain. In the portion of the Pipe *Roll of 1230 relating to Yorkshire there is mention of a ’Roberts Hoo fugitivus’. Robin Hood is referred to in Piers Plowman. As a historical character he appears in Wyntoun’s The Orygynale Cronykil (c.1420), and is referred to as a ballad hero by Abbot Bower (d. 1449). Major, and *Stow. The first detailed history, Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (printed c.1500), locates him in south-west Yorkshire; later writers place him in Sherwood and Plumpton Park (Cumberland), and finally make him earl of Huntington. *Ritson, who collected all the ancient songs and ballads about Robin Hood, says definitely that he was born at Locksley in Nottinghamshire about 1160, that his true name was Robert Fitz-Oooth, and that he was commonly reputed to have been earl of Huntington. There is a pleasant account of the activities of his band in Drayton’s Poly-Olbion, song 26. According to Stow, there were about the year 1190 many robbers and outlaws, among whom were Robin...
Hood and Little John, who lived in the woods, robbing the rich, but killing only in self-defence, allowing no woman to be molested, and sparing poor men's goods. A date for his death (18 Nov. 1247) was given by Martin Parker (True Tale, c.1632) and by the antiquary Ralph Thoresby (1658–1725), and his pedigree was supplied by *Stukeley. Legend says that he was bled to death by a treacherous nun at Kirklees in Yorkshire. According to Joseph Hunter (antiquary, 1783–1861), with support from the court rolls of the manor of Wakefield in Yorkshire, he was a contemporary of Edward II (1307–27) and adherent of Thomas of Lancaster. He is the centre of a whole cycle of ballads, one of the best of which is *Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne, printed in Percy's *Reliques, and his legend shows affinity with Chaucer's 'Cook's Tale of Gamelyn' (see GAMELYN) and with the tales of other legendary outlaws such as Cym of the Clough and *Adam Bell. Popular plays embodying the legend appear to have been developed out of the village *May Day game, the king and queen of May giving place to Robin and Maid Marian. Works dealing with the same theme were written by *Munday, *Chettle, *Tennyson, and others. The True Tale of Robin Hood was published c.1632, Robin Hood's Garland in 1670, and a prose narrative in 1678. He figures in Peacock's *Maid Marian, and Scott's *Ivanhoe as Locksley.

Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne, one of the best known of the ballads of the *Robin Hood cycle. Robin Hood and Little John having gone on their separate ways in the forest, the latter is arrested by the sheriff of Nottingham and tied to a tree. Meanwhile Robin Hood meets with Guy of Gisborne, who has sworn to take Robin; they fight and Guy is slain. Robin puts on the horse-hide with which Guy was clad, takes his arms, and blows a blast on his horn. The sheriff mistakes him for Guy, thinks he has killed Robin, and gives him permission, as a reward, to kill Little John. Robin releases Little John, gives him Guy's bow, and the sheriff and his company take to their heels.

ROBINSON, Elizabeth, see WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

ROBINSON, A. Mary F. (later Darmesteter, later Ducaux) (1857–1944), poet, born at Leamington Spa and educated at University College London. Her first husband was professor of Persian in Paris, where she lived until his death in 1894: she remarried in 1904 and moved to Olmet. She published several collections of poetry, reflective and lyrical, including Songs, Ballads, and a Garden Play (1889) and Retrospect and Other Poems (1893).

ROBINSON, E(dwin) A(rlington) (1869–1935), American poet, born at Head Tide, Maine, the son of a general merchant and lumber dealer. He records that at the age of 17 he became 'violently excited over the structure and music of English blank verse', and his ambition for *Hardy, *Crabbe, and R. *Browning is manifest in his many volumes of poetry about New England life, beginning with The Torrent and the Night Before (1896) and The Children of the Night (1897), which introduce, often through dramatic monologues, the population of his fictitious and representative Tilbury Town. His predominantly dry, restrained, ironic tone continues through most of his prolific output, in which he employs traditional forms with a delicate and original skill. As well as the New England character sketches for which he is best remembered in Britain, he also wrote several long blank-verse narratives, including an Arthurian trilogy (Merlin, 1917; Lancelot, 1920; Tristan, 1927) and The Man Who Died Twice (1924), a tale of genius destroyed. He was introduced in England by a Collected Poems (1922) with an introduction by *Drinkwater.

ROBINSON, Henry Crabb (1775–1867), a solicitor and later a barrister, but chiefly remembered for his diaries, reading-lists, and letters, first collected in 1869, which provide valuable information about the writers and events of his time. He was the friend of *Wordsworth, *Coleridge, *Lamb, *Hazlitt, and later *Carlyle, and because of his indefatigable attendance at public lectures was able to provide useful descriptions of the lecturing of Coleridge (with his 'immethodical rhapsody'), Hazlitt, and others. He was an admirer of the German writers, of *Goethe in particular, travelled in Germany, and did much to popularize German culture in England. For many years he wrote for *The Times, at home and abroad, and he was one of the founders of both University College London, and the Athenaeum Club.

ROBINSON, (Esme Stuart) Lennox (1886–1958), prolific Irish dramatist, who was also manager of the *Abbey Theatre, 1910–14 and 1919–23, when he became the director until his death. Among his best-known plays are The Clancy Name (1911); the patriotic Harvest (1911) and Patriots (1912); The Whiteheaded Boy, a comedy (1920); Crabbled Youth and Age (1924); the ambitious The Big House (1928), on the changing state of Ireland; and two successful later comedies, The Far-off Hills (1931) and Church Street (1955). He also edited the Oxford Book of Irish Verse (with D. MacDonagh, 1958) and other anthologies; and wrote The Irish Theatre (1939) and Ireland's Abbey Theatre. A History (1951).

ROBINSON, Mary, née Darby (1758–1800), writer and actress, educated in Bristol, Chelsea and lastly Marylebone. In 1774 she married Thomas Robinson, who incurred debts. She published Poems (1775) and became mistress of the prince of Wales (George IV) in 1779. Poverty provoked a large number of publications in the 1790s, among them Sappho and Phaon (1796), a collection of sonnets, and several novels, including the popular Vancenza (1792) and The Natural Daughter (1799). Her poetry was admired by *Coleridge and her Lyrical Tales (1800) were influenced by the *Lyrical Ballads. Her daughter edited her Robinson Crusoe, The Life and Strange and Surprising Adventures of, a romance by *Defoe, published 1719.

In 1704 Alexander *Selkirk, who had run away to sea and joined a privateering expedition under *Dampier, after a quarrel with his captain was put ashore on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernández. He was rescued in 1709 by Woodes *Rogers. Defoe was probably familiar with several versions of this tale, and added many incidents from his own imagination to his account of Crusoe, presenting it as a true story. The extraordinarily convincing account of the shipwrecked Crusoe’s successful efforts to make himself a tolerable existence in his solitude first revealed Defoe’s genius for vivid fiction; it has a claim to be the first English novel. Defoe was nearly 60 when he wrote it.

The author tells how, with the help of a few stores and utensils saved from the wreck and the exercise of infinite ingenuity, Crusoe built himself a house, domesticated goats, and made himself a boat. He describes his struggle to accept the workings of Providence, the perturbation of his mind caused by a visit of cannibals, his rescue from death of an indigenous native he later names Friday, and finally the coming of an English ship whose crew are in a state of mutiny, the subduing of the mutineers, and Crusoe’s rescue.

The book had immediate and permanent success, was translated into many languages, and inspired many imitations, known generically as ‘Robinson-Adventures of, which is more familiar with several versions of this tale, and added many incidents from his own imagination to his account of Crusoe, presenting it as a true story. Defoe followed it with The Farther Adventures of Robinson Crusoe (1719), in which with Friday he revisits his island, is attacked by a fleet of canoes on his departure, and loses Friday in the encounter. Serious Reflections . . . of Robinson Crusoe . . . with His Vision of the Angelick World, which is more a manual of piety than a work of fiction, appeared in 1720, and was never as popular. The influence of Robinson Crusoe has been very great. *Rousseau in Emile recommended it as the first book that should be studied by a growing boy. *Coleridge praised its evocation of ‘the universal man’, and *Marx in Das Kapital used it to illustrate economic theory in action.

In recent years ‘Man (later Girl) Friday’ came to describe a lowly assistant performing a multiplicity of tasks.

In The Rise of the Novel (1957) and other essays Ian Watt provides one of the most controversial modern interpretations, relating Crusoe’s predicament to the rise of bourgeois individualism, division of labour, and social and spiritual alienation. See David Blewett, The Illustration of Robinson Crusoe, 1719–1920 (1995).

Rob Roy, a novel by Sir W. *Scott, published 1817.

The novel, set in the period preceding the Jacobite rebellion of 1715, celebrates the new predominance of a prosperous Whig mercantile class, personified here by Francis Osbaldistone and Bailie Nicol Jarvie, over the fox-hunting, Tory world of Osbaldistone Hall, ruled by Francis’s elder brother Sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone. Francis’s son Frank, on refusing to enter his father’s business, Osbaldistone and Tresham, is exiled to Osbaldistone Hall; in exchange, his father decides to give his youngest nephew, Rashleigh, the place designed for his son. The plot is complicated by Frank’s and Rashleigh’s rival interest in their cousin Diana Vernon, one of Scott’s most successful and delightful heroines. Rashleigh, unknown to his uncle, is deeply embroiled in plans for the forthcoming rebellion and uses his place in the firm to rob and ruin Francis Osbaldistone. Frank, in an attempt to save his father’s credit, goes to Scotland to seek the help of the firm’s Scottish correspondent, Bailie Nicol Jarvie, the real hero of the novel, and, with him, ventures into the Highlands in search of Rob Roy. Jarvie’s defence of the practical benefits to Scotland of the Union is set against a striking picture of the ignorance, brutality, and squalor of the Highlands which Scott is too often accused of romanticizing. The titular hero does not appear in propria persona to take a prominent part in the action until late in the novel, though he appears in disguise earlier. Rob Roy Macgregor, a historical figure and member of a proscribed clan, has been driven by injustice to outlawry but is still capable of generosity. A Jacobite, he is involved in Rashleigh’s plans for the rebellion, but Frank needs his help to frustrate his cousin’s designs. In the end the rebellion fails, Rashleigh is killed by Rob Roy, and Frank inherits Osbaldistone Hall and marries Diana. His incorrigible manservant Andrew Fairservice is one of Scott’s great characters.

ROBART, Amy, daughter of Sir John Robsart, married to Sir R. *Dudley, afterwards earl of Leicester, in 1549; she figures in Scott’s *Kenilworth.

Rochester, Edward Fairfax, the hero of C. Brontë’s *Jane Eyre.

ROCHESTER, John Wilmot, second earl of (1647–80), lyric poet, satirist, and a leading member of the group of ‘court wits’ surrounding Charles II. He was born at Ditchley in Oxfordshire, his father a Cavalier hero and his mother a deeply religious woman related to many.
prominent Puritans. In his early teens he was sent to Wadham College, Oxford, the home of the *Royal Society, and then went on a European tour, returning to the court late in 1664. At the age of 18 he romantically abducted the sought-after heiress Elizabeth Malet in a coach-and-six. Despite the resistance of her family, and after a delay of 18 months (during which Rochester fought with conspicuous gallantry in the naval wars against the Dutch), she married him. Subsequently his time was divided between periods of domesticity with Elizabeth at his mother’s home in the country (the couple had four children), and fashionable life in London with, among several mistresses, the brilliant actress Elizabeth *Barry, and his riotous male friends, who included the earl of Dorset (C.*Sackville) and the duke of *Buckingham. Wherever he was staying he tried to keep up the other side of his life through letters, many of which survive.

Although Dr *Johnson dismissed Rochester’s lyrics, their wit and emotional complexity give him some claim to be considered one of the last important *Metaphysical poets of the 17th cent., and he was one of the first of the *Augustans, with his social and literary verse satires. He wrote scurrilous lampoons—some of them impromptu—dramatic prologues and epilogues, ‘imitations’ and translations of classical authors, and several other brilliant poems which are hard to categorize, such as his tough self-dramatization ‘The Maimed Debauchee’ and the grimly funny ‘Upon Nothing’. He wrote more frankly about sex than anyone in English before the 20th cent., and is one of the most witty poets in the language. Although his output was small (he died young), it was very varied. *Marvell admired him, *Dryden, *Swift, and *Pope were all influenced by him (he was Dryden’s patron for output was small (he died young), it was very varied. *Marvell admired him, *Dryden, *Swift, and *Pope were all influenced by him (he was Dryden’s patron for)

Although his output was small (he died young), it was very varied. *Marvell admired him, *Dryden, *Swift, and *Pope were all influenced by him (he was Dryden’s patron for a time), and he has made an impression on many subsequent poets—*Goethe and *Tennyson, for example, and in modern Britain, *Empson and P.*Porter.

Rochester is famous for having, in Johnson’s words, ‘blazed out his youth and health in lavish voluptuousness’. He became very ill in his early thirties and engaged in discussions and correspondence with a number of theologians, particularly the deist Charles Blount and the rising Anglican churchman G.*Burnet, an outspoken royal chaplain who superintended and neglected grandfather. Roderick is befriended and rescued by his uncle, Lieutenant Tom Bowling of the navy. After a brief apprenticeship to a surgeon, and accompanied by an old schoolfellow, Strap, the innocent Roderick travels to London, where he encounters various rogues. Eventually, after struggling against assault, deception, and other tribulations, he qualifies as a surgeon’s mate. He is then pressed as a common sailor aboard a man-of-war, the *Thunderer, where he eventually becomes mate to the ebullient Welsh surgeon Morgan. They are present at the siege of Cartagena, and after much suffering and ill-treatment (which he does not accept supinely) Roderick returns to England. Here he lives under a false name as a footman, falls in love with Narcissa, and is once again kidnapped, this time by smugglers, who bear him off to France. He finds and helps his uncle, Tom Bowling, joins the French army, and fights at Dettingen. He again encounters his generous friend Strap, who arranges his release from the army and undertakes to serve Roderick as his valet. The two return to England, where Roderick intends to marry a lady of fortune. Again in London, he becomes embroiled in riotous life, amatory adventures, and fiery debates on a great range of subjects. He courts, among others, Miss Melinda Goosetrap, but does not succeed in deceiving her mother; other matrimonial enterprises are no more successful. Again he meets Narcissa, but he is shortly in prison for debt, and on his release, when he cannot find her, he sinks into despair. He is rescued by Tom Bowling, and embarks as surgeon on a ship under Bowling’s command; in the course of the voyage he meets Don Roderigo, who turns out to be his long-lost father, now a wealthy merchant. When they return to England Roderick marries Narcissa, and Strap marries her maid, Miss Williams. Two long digressive stories are inserted into the narrative, the history of Miss Williams, who had earlier been a prostitute; and the story of Melopoyn, based on Smollett’s own experience in trying to get his The Regicide accepted for the stage.

Roderigo, *Iago’s gull in Shakespeare’s *Othello.

Rodomont, in *Orlando innamorato and *Orlando furioso, the king of Sarza, arrogant and valiant, the doughtiest of the followers of *Agramant. He leads the first Saracen invasion into France. Doralis, princess of Granada, is betrothed to him, but falls into the power of *Mandricardo. After an indecisive duel between the two Saracen heroes, the conflict is referred to the princess herself, who, to Rodomont's surprise, expresses her preference for Mandricardo. Rodomont retires in disgust to the south of France. Here *Isabella falls into his power and, preferring death, by guile causes him to slay her. In remorse, in order to commemorate her, he builds a bridge and takes toll of all who pass that way. Orlando, coming in his madness to the bridge, throws Rodomont into the river. Rodomont is also defeated by *Bradamante. Thus humiliated he temporarily retires from arms, emerges once more, and is finally killed by *Rogero.

ROETHKE, Theodore (1908–63), American poet born in Michigan, who taught from 1947 at the University of Washington. His first book of poems, _Open House_ (1941), already displays characteristic imagery of vegetable growth and decay, rooted in childhood memories of the greenhouses of his father, who was a keen horticulturalist. It was followed by various volumes including _The Lost Son_ (1948), _Praise to the End_ (1951), a book of light verse (divided into 'Nonsense' and 'Greenhouse' poems) called _I Am! Says the Lamb_ (1961), and a posthumous collection, _The Far Field_ (1964). His work has affinity with both *Yeats and *Blake, and influenced the early poetry of S. *Plath.

Roger, the name of the London cook (from Ware) in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. His name may have been Roger Knight; see note ix, 50 in Robinson's edition, 763–4.

Roger de Coverley, Sir, see Coverley.

ROGEROFWENDOVER (d. 1236), monk and chronicler at St Albans; his _Flores Historiarum_ was a history of the world from the Creation to AD 1235, compiled from many different sources. He was succeeded as chronicler by M. *Paris.

Rogero, or Ruggiero, the legendary ancestor of the house of Este, extolled in Orlando furioso. He is the son of a Christian knight and a Saracen lady of royal birth, brought up in Africa, and taken by *Agramant on the expedition against Charlemagne, where he falls in love with the warrior maiden *Bradamante and she with him. He falls into the power of *Alcina and is released by *Melissa. He then, mounted on the hippogripp, rescues *Angelica from the Orc. Bradamante has also an active rival in *Marfisa, a lady fighting on the Moorish side, who is smitten with love for Rogero, but eventually turns out to be his sister. Finally, after the retreat of Agramant, Rogero joins Charlemagne and is baptized. He now hopes to marry Bradamante, but her ambitious parents vigorously oppose the match. Bradamante, to secure her lover without openly opposing her parents, declares, with Charlemagne's approval, that she will marry no one who has not withstood her in battle for a whole day. This Rogero alone does, and after many vicissitudes the lovers are united. In a final duel Rogero slays *Rodomont. Some elements of the Bradamante/Rogero romance can be discerned in the relationship between *Spenser's Britomart and Argeall.

ROGERS, James Edwin Thorold (1825–90), educated at King's College, London, and Oxford, professor of political economy at Oxford in 1862–7 and again in 1888. He had been a strong *Tractarian until about 1860, but put off his orders and swung right round, being the first clergyman to take advantage of the Clerical Disabilities Relief Act of 1870. He was Radical MP for Southwark, 1880–6, and a father figure of economic history; all subsequent studies of inflation rest on his _A History of Agriculture and Prices in England . . . from 1259–1793_ (1866–87).

ROGERS, Jane, (1952– ), novelist, born in London. She read English at Cambridge and took a postgraduate teaching certificate at Leicester University. She has worked in secondary education and in the tertiary sector at Cambridge and Sheffield. Her novels include _Her Living Image_ (1984), an account of Carolyn, a wife and mother, and her feminist alter ego Caro, 'transparent but unpredictable', who lives in a women's refuge with her friend Clare. Clare enables Carolyn to escape from the tedium and pettiness of her home; their relationship becomes the forum for a humane and thoughtful engagement with feminist arguments and concerns. Rogers's other publications include _Separate Tracks_ (1983), _The Ice is Singing_ (1987), and _Mr Wroe's Virgins_ (1991) which has been adapted for television. Her 1995 novel _Promised Lands_ interweaves contemporary lives and the first year of settlement in a nineteenth-century convict colony to produce a powerful and intricately plotted work on an epic scale.

ROGERS, Samuel (1763–1855), the son of a banker and himself a banker for some years, in his lifetime a highly successful poet, and well known as an art collector and for the celebrated 'breakfasts' which he held for over 40 years. In 1792 he published _The Pleasures of Memory_, in which the author wanders reflectively round the villages of his childhood. The work went into four editions in its first year, and by 1816 over 23,000 copies had been sold. In 1810 he published a fragmentary epic, _Columbus_; in 1814 _Jacqueline_; in 1822–8 _Italy_, a collection of verse tales; and in 1832 _Poems_. His work was praised by *Jeffrey and admired by *Byron, who came to believe that only Rogers and *Crabbe were free from 'a wrong revolutionary system'. But *Hazlitt spoke for many younger writers when he declared in a lecture in 1818 that in Rogers's work 'the decomposition of prose is substituted for the composition of poetry'.
ROGERS, Woodes (d. 1732), commander of a privateering expedition (1708–11) in which *Dampier was pilot, and in the course of which *Selkirk was discovered on the island of Juan Fernandez and rescued, the town of Guayaquil was taken and held to ransom, and a Manila ship captured. These incidents are described in Rogers's entertaining journal, A Cruising Voyage round the World (1712).

Rogers's Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, by Dr Peter Mark Rogers (1779–1879), English physician and scholar, is a compilation of words classified in groups according to the ideas they express, the purpose of which is to supply a word, or words, which most aptly express a given idea; conversely, a dictionary explains the meaning of words by supplying the ideas they are meant to convey. The volume, first published in 1852, has been followed by many successive revised editions: by Rogers's son John Lewis Rogers (from 1879), and his grandson Samuel Romilly Rogers (from 1933). The family connection came to an end with the death of Samuel Rogers in 1953.

Rogue literature, a very popular type of underworld writing in the 16th and 17th centuries. Its practitioners include the Kentish magistrate Thomas Harman, whose A Caveat for Common Cursetors appeared in 1567; R. Copeland (see under Hye Way to the Spytell House, The); R. Grene, whose pamphlets describe 'coneycatching', that is, the deception of innocents; and T. Dekker. Rogue literature is generally vividly descriptive and often confessional, providing an important source for our knowledge of everyday common life and its language, as well as for the canting terms of thieves and beggars. It can be related to stories about Robin Hood, jest book literature, and early attempts at writing fiction and autobiography. A large collection of such tracts was edited by A. V. Judges in 1930.

ROJAS, Fernando de (c.1465–1541), a Spanish author born at Puebla de Montalbán, near Toledo, his family being conversos, or Jews converted to Christianity. He studied law at the University of Salamanca and, in spite of difficulties owing to his racial origin, rose to the position of alcalde (mayor) of Talavera. He is remembered for his masterpiece Celestina, but there is no record of any other work by his hand.

Rokeby, a poem in six cantos by Sir W. Scott, published 1813. The scene is laid chiefly at Rokeby near Greta Bridge in Yorkshire, and the time is immediately after the battle of Marston Moor (1644). The complicated plot involves conspiracy, attempted murder, and disguise: young Redmond O'Neale, who has helped to frustrate an attack on Rokeby Castle, is finally revealed as the lost son of Philip of Mortham, and marries Matilda, daughter of Lord Rokeby. The poem contains (Canto III) the songs 'A weary lot is thine, fair maid', 'Allan-a-Dale', and 'Brignal Banks'—

O, Brignal banks are fresh and fair,
And Greta woods are green,
I'd rather rove with Edmund there,
Than reign our English queen.

Roland, the most famous of the Paladins of Charlemagne. According to the chronicler Einhard, his legend has the following basis of fact. In August 778 the rearguard of the French army of Charlemagne was returning through the Pyrenees from a successful expedition in the north of Spain, when it was surprised in the valley of Roncevaux by the Basque inhabitants of the mountains; the baggage was looted and all the rearguard killed, including Hrodland, count of the Breton marches. The story of this disaster was developed by the imagination of numerous poets. For the Basques were substituted the Saracens. Roland becomes the commander of the rearguard, appointed to the post at the instance of the traitor Ganelon, who is in league with the Saracen king Marsile. Oliver is introduced, Roland's companion in arms and the brother of Aude. Roland's betrothed. Oliver thrice urges Roland to summon aid by sounding his horn, but Roland from excess of pride defers doing so until too late. Charlemagne returns and destroys the pagan army. Ganelon is tried and executed. The legend has been handed down in three principal forms: in the fabricated Latin chronicle of the 12th cent., erroneously attributed to Archbishop Turpin (d. c.800); in the Carmen de Prodigione Guenonis of the same epoch; and in the Chanson de Roland, in medieval French, also of the early 12th cent. It is a well-known tradition that Taillefer, a jongleur in the army of William the Conqueror, sang a poem on Roncevalles at the battle of Hastings (1066), possibly an earlier version of the extant Chanson. Roland, as Orlando, is the hero of Boiardo's Orlando innamorato and Ariosto's Orlando furioso. Roland's sword was called 'Durandal' or 'Durindana', and his horn 'Olivant'. (See also Oliver.)

Roland, Childe, see CHILDE ROLAND.

Roland de Vaux, (1) the baron of Triermain, in Scott's The Bridal of Triermain; (2) in Coleridge's Christabel, the estranged friend of Christabel's father.

ROLFE, Frederick William (1860–1913), who liked to call himself 'Baron Corvo', or, equally misleadingly, Fr Rolfe, by turns schoolmaster, painter, and writer. From a Dissenting background, he was a convert to Roman Catholicism and an unsuccessful candidate for the priesthood; his most outstanding novel, Hadrian the Seventh (1904), appears to be a dramatized autobiography—a self-justification and a dream of wish-fulfilment, in which Rolfe's protagonist, George Arthur Rose, is rescued from a life of literary poverty and elected pope. His other writings include Stories Toto Told Me (published in 1898, after first appearing in the...
Yellow Book), Chronicles of the House of Borgia (1901, an eccentric historical study), Don Tarquinio: A Katal­lectic Phantasmatic Romance (1905, a novel relating 24 hours in the life of a young nobleman in the company of the Borgia in 1495), and The Desire and Pursuit of the Whole: A Romance of Modern Venice (1934). This last work was written largely in 1909; Rolfe moved to Venice (where he died) in 1908, and he here describes his own poverty, his homosexual fantasies, and the beauties of Venice, as well as abusing in characteristic vein many of those who had previously befriended him, including R. H. *Benson; *Auden in a 1961 foreword describes him as 'one of the great masters of vituperation'. Two other novels (Nicholas Crabbe; or The One and the Many, 1958; Don Renato: An Ideal Content, 1963) and several fragments were published posthumously. Rolfe's style is highly ornate and idio­syncratic; his vocabulary is arcane, his allusions erudite, and although he had admirers during his lifetime, he alienated most of them by his persistent paranoia and requests for financial support. The story of his unhappy life is told by A. J. A. Symons in The Quest for Corvo: An Experiment in Biography (1934). See also D. Weeks, Corvo (1971).

Roll, Ragman, a set of rolls in the Public Record Office, in which are recorded the instruments of homage made to Edward I by the Scottish king (Balliol), nobles, etc., at the Parliament of Berwick in 1296; so called apparently from the pendent seals attached.

ROLLAND, Romain, see ROMAN FLEUVE.

Rolle, Richard, of Hampole (c.1300–49), one of the principal 14th-cent. English mystical writers, in prose and poetry. He was born at Thornton in north Yorkshire and is said to have left Oxford in his 19th year to become a hermit. He lived at various places in Yorkshire, finally at Hampole where he died, near a Cistercian nunnery where he had disciples. Among these was Margaret Kirkeby who became an anchoress in his neighbourhood and to whom a number of his major English works (notably The Forme of Perfect Living) are addressed. He wrote in the Yorkshire dialect, in a somewhat mannered, rhetorical language which makes much use of alliteration. The essential element in his mysticism is personal enthu­siasm, rather than the rationalism of the more classical mystical writings; the echoing words he returns to are calor, canor, dulcor: warmth, melodiousness, sweet­ness. One of his earliest English writings is the Meditations on the Passion, and among the most familiar, later works are Ego Dormio and The Com­mandment of Love. The canon of his works, in Latin as well as English, is very large. (See also ANGLO-LATIN LITERATURE.) See H. E. Allen, Writings Ascribed to Richard Rolle (1927); The English Writings of Richard Rolle, ed. H. E. Allen (1931); Yorkshire Writers: Rolle and His Followers, C. T. Horstman (2 vols, 1895–6).

Rolliad, Criticism on the, a collection of Whig political satires directed against the younger *Pitt and his followers after their success at the election of 1784, first published in the Morning Herald and Daily Advertiser during that year. The authors, members of the ‘Esto Perpetua’ club, are not known with certainty, but among them were Dr French Laurence, who became Regius professor of civil law at Oxford; G. *Ellis; General Richard Fitzpatrick; and Lord John Town­shend. The satires originally took the form of reviews of an imaginary epic, ‘The Rolliad’, which took its name from John Rolle, MP, one of Pitt’s supporters, and dealt with the adventures of a mythical Norman duke, Rollo, his ancestor. These were followed by ‘Political Ec­logues’, ‘Probationary Odes’ for the vacant laureate­ship, and ‘Political Miscellanies’, all directed to the same purpose, the ridicule of the Tories. A complete collection was published in 1791.

Rollo Duke of Normandy, see BLOODY BROTHER, THE.

Rolls, Pipe, the great rolls of the exchequer, comprising the various ‘pipes’, or enrolled accounts, of sheriffs and others for a financial year. The complete series of Pipe Rolls dates from the reign of Henry II (1155–89), but there is an isolated one (of the highest importance) of the year 1130.

Rolls Series, otherwise Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland from the Invasion of the Romans to the Reign of Henry VIII. Their publication was authorized by governments in 1847 on the suggestion of Joseph Stevenson, the archivist, and the recommendation of Sir John Romilly, master of the rolls, and it produced texts of many of the most important literary and historical writings of the Middle Ages and Renaissance. Among its most celebrated editors were the historians James Gairdner (1828–1912) and J. H. Round (1854–1928).

ROMAINS, Jules, see ROMAN FLEUVE.

roman à clef, i.e. a ‘novel with a key’, in which the reader (or some readers) is intended to identify real characters under fictitious names. The key is sometimes literal, sometimes figurative, and sometimes provided by the author, as in the case of Mrs *Manley’s The New Atalantis, sometimes published separately by others, as in the case of Disraeli’s Coningsby.

Roman Actor, The, a tragedy by *Massinger, acted 1626, printed 1629. The play is based on the life of the Emperor Domitian as told by *Suetonius and Dio Cassius. The cruel and licentious Domitian forcibly takes from Aelius Lamia, a Roman senator, his wife Domitia. He executes Lamia and makes her his empress. He dotes on her, but she falls in love with the actor Paris. So well does he act before her a scene in which, as Iphasis scorned by Anaxarete, he threatens to take his life, that she betrays her feelings to her enemies, who warn Domitian. The emperor finds her wooing Paris, and kils the actor with his own hand in the course of a play in which he takes the part of an injured husband and Paris the part of a false servant. Domitia escapes punishment but, incensed at the death of Paris and presuming on her power over the emperor, she sails at and taunts him. At last he writes down her name in a list of those marked for death. Domitia finds the list while he sleeps, and joins others whose names are there in a conspiracy. Domitian is lured from the protection of his guards and assassinated.

romance, derived from the medieval Latin word romanicus, ‘in the Roman language’. The word roman in Old French was applied to the popular courtly stories in verse which dealt with three traditional subjects: the legends about Arthur; Charlemagne and his knights; and stories of classical heroes especially Alexander (see matter). English correspondents, almost always translations, are found from the 13th cent. onwards. Some of the most distinguished include King Horn, Havelok, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, and Orfeo (see also Breton lays). Defining them by theme is very difficult; they usually involve the suspension of the restrictions normally attendant on human actions (often through magic) in order to illustrate a moral point. From the 15th cent. onwards English romances are mostly in prose, and some 16th-cent. examples were the inspiration for Spenser and Shakespeare (as, for instance, Pandosto by R. Greene was used by Shakespeare in The Winter’s Tale). A new interest in the medieval romance (in writers such as Sir W. Scott and Keats) contributed to the naming of 19th-cent. Romanticism, though the term was also used to embrace some sentimental novels from the 18th cent. onwards, as in the Mills and Boon romances of the modern era.

Romance languages, the group of modern languages descended from Latin (which itself joins with them to form the branch of Indo-European known as Italic), the chief of which are French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and Romanian (and, of literary-historical importance, Provençal).

Roman d’Alexandre, see Alexander the Great.

Roman de la rose. The first 4,058 lines of this allegorical romance were written c. 1230 by Guillaume de Lorris (d. 1237) to expound ‘the whole art of love’; the remaining 17,622 lines were composed c. 1275 by Jean de Meun as a more wide-ranging anatomy of love within a social and philosophical framework. The story in de Lorris’s part of the poem is an allegorical presentation of courtly love; the allegorical figures mostly embody various aspects of the lady whom the lover-narrator meets in his endeavours to reach the rose which symbolizes the lady’s love. The story is set in the walled garden of the god of love, the unpleasant realities of life being depicted on the walls outside. In the second part Jean de Meun shows love in a wider context of scholarship, philosophy, and morals, shifting the work from the courtly to the encyclopaedic literary tradition, in line with the rationalist and compendious spirit of the 13th cent. The poem, in its allegorical dream form and in its presentation of both the courtly and the philosophical discussions of love, remained an immense literary influence all through the later Middle Ages, both inside and outside France. About one-third of the whole (ll. 1–5,154 and 10,679–12,360) is translated in the Middle English The Romaut of the Rose, the first part of which may be by Chaucer. The Romaut was much the most important literary influence on writings in English in the 14th cent.

Romaut de Renart, see Reynard the Fox.

romaut fleue, the French term for a novel sequence. The practice of pursuing a family story through a number of related novels in order to render a comprehensive account of a social period ultimately derives from Balzac and Zola, but it reached its culmination between 1900 and 1940. Its major exemplars were: Romain Rolland (1866–1944), whose Jean christophe (10 vols, 1905–12) describes the career of a musical genius; Roger Martin du Gard (1881–1958), whose Chronique des Pasquiers (10 vols, 1933–41) traces the moral and cultural development of a Parisian family; and Jules Romains (1885–1972), whose Les Hommes de bonne volonté (27 vols, 1932–47) offers a panorama of French society between 1910 and 1940. Translations of these works have been popular in England, but the English version of the phenomenon, descending from Trollope and including such novelists as Galsworthy and C. P. Snow, did not have the same conviction and consistency.

romantic fiction, see p.870.

Romanticism, see p.872.

Romauty Rye, The, a novel by Borrow, published 1857. ‘Romaut Rye’ in Romaut language means ‘Gypsy Gentleman’, a name applied to Borrow from his youth by Ambrose Smith, the Norfolk gypsy. This book is a sequel to Lavengro, and continues in a less accomplished style the story of the author’s wanderings and adventures.

Romaut of the Rose, The, a translation into Middle English octosyllabics of about one-third of the Roman de la rose, lines 1–5,154 and 10,679–12,360, made in the time of Chaucer and usually included in editions of his Works (such as the Riverside) because previously (cont. on p.874)
A capacious and much-contested category, romantic fiction could be said to pre-date the novel—as in the medieval verses of courtly love written in the vernacular, the ‘popular’ languages derived from Latin—or to coincide with its origins in the 17th cent., when the first novels are romances of illicit love. If the English novel’s literary canon begins in the 18th cent. with Samuel Richardson’s Pamela and Clarissa, these, too, are classic romantic fictions: the first, a story in which our heroine tames the rapacious rake through her intelligence and virtue; the latter, one in which she fails to do so and must, tragically, pay with her life. In the same way that Richardson’s Pamela becomes, in the hands of the inventor of the modern novel Henry Fielding, the satire Shamela Andrews, the novel emerges as a literary form only in its constantly renewed attempt to distinguish itself from romantic fiction—an increasingly scapegoated genre, soon irrevocably gendered female.

As literary generations succeed one another, there is a tendency for the realism of one epoch to look like romance to the readers and writers of the next. Currencies or novelties grow remote, past social forms seem exotic or idealized, language overblown. Remoteness, exoticism, idealization, excess in language or emotion are all characteristics which render fiction romantic. In her literary history of 1785, The Progress of Romance, Clara Reeve already makes a distinction between the ‘novel’ which deals with everyday life and the ‘romance’, a more elevated form concerned with high emotion, high life, and past times.

Nonetheless, the term romantic fiction remains slippery and its use through time replete with ironies. The venerable Sir Walter Scott, who self-consciously wrote romances, criticized Jane Austen for not being romantic enough. Cupid, he complained in a review of Emma, was unfairly left out of popular novels. Romance can render young men’s characters ‘honourable, dignified and disinterested’. This latter thought would surely startle today’s male critics, as much as the former would surprise all viewers and readers of Jane Austen who consider her period pieces the very stuff of romance for all her witty balancing act between love and property. Then, too, it is from Austen’s work that contemporary popular romance of the Harlequin Mills & Boon, happy-ever-after variety derives its key storylines.

One of the problems which haunts both the critics and writers of romantic fiction is its enduring popularity as a genre: as the size of the reading public grew from the 18th cent. onwards and spread down the ladder of class, so too did the size of the public for romance, particularly the female public. Because of the gender and mass of its readers, critics are quick to lash out at the form and accuse it of corruption. ‘He who burns a romance purifies the human mind’, wrote Richard Carlisle, the radical 19th-cent. publisher, capturing the typical tone of puritan revulsion that the form elicits in the public sphere. ‘Those damned romantic novels of romantically damned love!’ echoes a Guardian review of 1967, guarding our public morals against the possibility of female transgression. It is as if women readers—wives and daughters and servants—will be led forever astray once their imaginations have been fired by the likes of Ouida’s capricious heroine Cigarette in Under Two Flags, or, indeed, the passionate Anna Karenina (Tolstoy), or the audacious Scarlett O’Hara (M. Mitchell).

Women writers, who, like their male counterparts, are hardly averse to a little critical acclaim, have often been equally scathing about romantic fiction, much of it written by women. The didactic anti-Jacobin writers of the late 18th cent.—for example Mary Ann Hanway and Jane West—in their attempt to consolidate ideals of bourgeois domesticity, inveighed against the passions and romance, only now and again to find themselves writing what everyone else called passionate romances. In Northanger Abbey Jane Austen parodied the excesses of the Gothic romance. George Eliot—whose Daniel Deronda, with its mysterious secrets and spirited, rather Gothic, heroine Gwendolen Harleth, borders on romance—in an exercise of distancing herself from lesser writers, wrote a scathing attack on ‘Silly Novels by Lady Novelists’, pointing out their absurdities, the particular quality of silliness that predominates in them—the frothy, the prosy, the pious or the pedantic. Like the great mass of fiction, romance is not always well written, but unlike the great mass of what could be called male romance—stories of pistols and pirates and wild beasts, of criminal life, of spies in exotic locations and hard-boiled detectives—it has had more than its share of opprobrium. In part this is undoubtedly due to cultural fears about and for women, both as readers and writers.

Since an exploration of the life of the emotions is romantic fiction’s predominant theme, any map of the genre must be a large one. Innumerable pseudonymous, anonymous, and forgotten novels as well as more famous ones find a place there. A quick historical charting of peaks and fertile valleys would have to begin with Richardson, who set out a psychological style plus the two storylines and two central characters which became archetypal.

Through her sensitive, young, middle-class heroines with their sharp eye for the mores of the world in which they will meet their match, Fanny Burney introduced a new note and combined romance with the novel of manners. Jane Austen perfected the form and made the story of the young woman’s courtship, the misunderstandings during it, and the growth in self-knowledge which attends the process a model for English fiction.

All of Austen’s fictions end with the desired goal of marriage. In one sense the Gothic romances, which were the great vogue of her day, provide the dark side of the post-marital coin. The strange, ghostly landscapes and frightening, claustrophobic castles of Ann Radcliffe, or her even more sensational and lower-brow kin Charlotte Dacre (1782–c. 1841), are settings where the innocent bride’s fears and fantasies about terrifying husbands and fathers can be acted out. Amongst many other fictions, Daphne du Maurier’s famous Rebecca (1938) owes not a little to the Gothic romance: a pure young heroine, swept off her feet by a rake, is locked into the castle of marriage and made dependent on a man who turns out to have murdered his first wife because she was grand and promiscuous rather than docile and domestic. The more pedestrian side of post-marital relations is explored in an abundant list of domestic romances which sentimentalize the duties of the good wife and faithful daughter, but not without underlining problems and the occasional tug of a would-be seducer. The prolific Margaret Oliphant, and E. D. E. N. Southworth are two in a long line which leads to the contemporary Aga saga of Joanna Trollope.

Towering over the romantic fiction of the mid-19th cent. are the Brontë sisters, in particular Emily and Charlotte, who with Wuthering Heights and Jane Eyre set a standard, the first for the novel of doomed love, the second for the novel of the young woman’s climb towards moral independence and a passion underscored by equality. The much-read and much-castigated sensation novelists of the end of the century, Wilkie Collins and Mary Braddon amongst them, are indebted to these, and not only for the secrets found in the attic or the family tree.

At the turn of the century, Henry James hijacked romantic fiction and transformed it into the art of the novel of high consciousness. Meanwhile, scores of women wrote and read variations on the old themes. The romantic fiction of the 20th cent. may be pure exotic escapism, like Ethel M. Dell’s The Way of an Eagle (1912), E. M. Hull’s The Sheik (1919), or the many novels of Danielle Steel and Catherine Cookson; or historical escapism, at its best in Georgette Heyer’s Regency romances; or the simplest but phenomenally successful Mills & Boon brand of romance, which sells 13 million books a year in the UK alone. Or it may—with more or less sensationalism or refinement, and marriages with the novel of manners, domestic life, or thriller—chart shifts in the place of women and the relations between the sexes. This is the terrain of the best-selling blockbusters of the 1980s and 1990s, written by Jackie Collins, Judith Krantz, Barbara Taylor Bradford, Jilly Cooper, Rosie Thomas, and Sally Beauman, or, in a more psychological vein, by Lisa Appignanesi and Susan Gee. One could say that it is also the terrain of Anita Brookner, Mary Wesley, and the Margaret Drabble of The Millstone or The Waterfall. Whatever its critical reception or height of brow, whatever the recurrent accusations of corrupting women and imprisoning them in masochistic longing, it is clear that, by focusing on women and giving them the power to adventure or to tame the threatening male, romantic fiction is a form readers enjoy. In the hands of playful postmodernists, such as David Lodge in Small World: An Academic Romance or A. S. Byatt in Possession, it has even, once again, been turned into literary fiction.
A profound and irreversible transformation in artistic styles, in cultural attitudes, and in the relations between artist and society is evident in Western literature and other arts in the first half of the 19th cent. In Britain, a stark contrast appears between representative works of the preceding *Augustan age and those of leading figures in what became known as the Romantic movement or 'Romantic Revival' in the period from about 1780 to about 1848 (the 'Romantic period'): *Blake, *Burns, *Wordsworth, *Coleridge, *Southey, *Scott, *Byron, *Shelley, *Keats, *Hazlitt, *De Quincey, *Carlyle, Emily *Brontë and Charlotte *Brontë. To define the general character or basic principle of this momentous shift, which later historians have called Romanticism, though, is notoriously difficult, partly because the Romantic temperament itself resisted the very impulse of definition, favouring the indefinite and the boundless.

In the most abstract terms, Romanticism may be regarded as the triumph of the values of imaginative spontaneity, visionary originality, wonder, and emotional self-expression over the classical standards of balance, order, restraint, proportion, and objectivity. Its name derives from *romance, the literary form in which desires and dreams prevail over everyday realities.

Romanticism arose from a period of wider turbulence, euphoria, and uncertainty. Political and intellectual movements of the late 18th cent. encouraged the assertion of individual and national rights, denying legitimacy (forcibly in the American and French revolutions) to kings and courtiers. In Britain, the expansions of commerce, journalism, and literacy had loosened the dependency of artists and writers upon noble patrons, releasing them to discover their own audiences in an open cultural market place—as Scott and Byron did most successfully—or to toil in unrewarded obscurity, like Blake. Nourished by Protestant conceptions of intellectual liberty, the Romantic writers tended to cast themselves as prophetic voices crying in the wilderness, dislocated from the social hierarchy. The Romantic author, unlike the more socially integrated Augustan writers, was a sort of modern hermit or exile, who usually granted a special moral value to similar outcast figures in his or her own writing: the pedlars and vagrants in Wordsworth's poems, Coleridge's *Ancient Mariner, Mary *Shelley's man-made monster, and the many tormented pariahs in the works of Byron and P. B. Shelley—who were themselves wandering outcasts from respectable English society.

From this marginal position, the Romantic author wrote no longer to or on behalf of a special caste but, in Wordsworth's phrase, as 'a man speaking to men', his utterance grounded in the sincerity of his personal vision and experience. To most of the Romantics, the polished wit of the Augustans seemed shallow, heartless, and mechanically bound by artificial 'rules' of *neo-classical taste. Although some (notably Keats and Shelley) continued to employ elements of Greek mythology and to adapt the classical form of the *ode, they scorned the imitation of classical models as an affront to the autonomy of the all-important creative imagination. Well above *Horace or *Juvenal they revered Shakespeare and *Milton as their principal models of the *sublime embodied in the poet's boundless imaginative genius. In this, they took the partly nationalistic direction followed by Romantic poets and composers in other countries, who likewise rediscovered and revalued their local vernacular traditions.

Although inheriting much of the humane and politically liberal spirit of the *Enlightenment, the Romantics largely rejected its analytic rationalism, associating it with the coldly calculating mentality of contemporary commerce, politics, and moral philosophy (as for example in the work of *Bentham). Wordsworth warned against the destructive tendency of the 'meddling intellect' to intrude upon the sanctities of the human heart, and he argued that the opposite of poetry was not prose but science. The Romantic revolt against scientific empiricism is compatible with the prevailing trend of German philosophy, notably *Kant's 'transcendental' idealism, of which Coleridge and Carlyle were dedicated students. This new philosophical idealism endorsed the Romantics' view of the human mind as organically creative, and encouraged most of them to regard the natural world as a living mirror to the soul, not as dead matter for scientific dissection.

In reaction against the spiritual emptiness of the modern calculating age, Romanticism cultivated various forms of nostalgia and of *primitivism, following *Rousseau in contrasting the 'natural' man (or child) with the hypocrisies and corruptions of modern society. The imaginative sovereignty of the child, in the works of Blake and Wordsworth, implicitly shames the inauthenticity of adulthood, while the dignified simplicity of rural life is more generally invoked in condemnation of urban civilization. The superior nobility of the past tends also to be, as we now say, 'romanticized', although less for its actual social forms than for its... imaginative conceptions of the ideal and the heroic, as reflected in Shakespeare, in chivalric romance, and in balladry. Antiquaries of the 18th cent., notably *Percy in his *Reliques and *Macpherson in his Ossianic poems, had won a new respect for the older forms of popular or ‘folk’ poetry and legend, upon which Southey, Scott, and several other Romantic writers drew for materials and forms, notably in the *Lyrical Ballads (1798) of Wordsworth and Coleridge.

These kinds of change manifest themselves in the literary productions of the Romantic writers in widely varied ways, as may be expected in a movement that unleashed individualism and that privileged the particular experience over the general rule. In general, though, Romantic writing exhibits a new emotional intensity taken to unprecedented extremes of joy or dejection, rapture or horror, and an extravagance of apparently egotistic self-projection. As a whole, it is usually taken to represent a second renaissance of literature in Britain, especially in lyric and narrative poetry, which displaced the Augustan cultivation of satiric and didactic modes. The prose styles of Hazlitt, De Quincey, Charles *Lamb, and Carlyle also show a marked renewal of vitality, flexibility, subjective tone, and what Hazlitt called ‘gusto’. The arts of prose fiction were extended by Scott’s historical novels, by the sensational effects of *Gothic fiction, and by the emergence of the short story form in the Edinburgh and London magazines. Although Byron, Shelley, and others wrote important dramatic poems, drama written for the theatres is generally agreed to be by far the weakest side of Romantic literature. On the other hand, despite the often vituperative and partisan conduct of reviewing in *Blackwood’s Magazine and other periodicals, this was a great age of literary criticism and theory, most notably in the writings of Coleridge and Hazlitt, and in major essays by Wordsworth and Shelley.

Simplified accounts of Romanticism in Britain date its arrival from the appearance in 1798 of the Lyrical Ballads or in 1800 of Wordsworth’s preface (effectively a manifesto) to that collection. Several important tendencies in the latter part of the 18th cent., however, have been recognized as ‘pre-Romantic’ currents, suggesting a more gradual evolution. Among these should be mentioned *graveyard poetry’, the novel of *sentiment, the cult of the sublime, and the *Sturm und Drang phase of German literature in the 1770s led by *Schiller and the young *Goethe; all of these influences encouraged a deeper emotional emphasis than Augustan or neo-classical convention allowed.

As for the point at which Romanticism ends, it would be safer to say, especially after the largely neo-Romantic cultural ferment of the 1960s, that this end still shows little sign of arriving. The convenient and conventional divisions of literary history into distinct ‘periods’ are particularly misleading if they obscure the extent to which the Romantic tradition remains unbroken in the later 19th cent. and through the 20th. The associated work of *Ruskin, the *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, and the Victorian advocates of the *Gothic Revival, indeed displays a hardening of Romantic attitudes in its nostalgia and its opposition to an unpoetical modern civilization; and the same might be said of W. B. *Yeats and D. H. *Lawrence in the early 20th cent. Late 20th-cent. culture displays a spectrum of latter-day Romantic features, ranging from the rebelliousness of rock lyrics and other forms of songwriting, to the anti-Enlightenment themes of post-*structuralist literary theory.

Critical opposition to the Romantic inheritance, in the name of *‘classical’ ideals, was advanced by Matthew *Arnold in the 1850s, and by some later critics under his influence, including the American scholar Irving *Babbitt, whose book Rousseau and Romanticism (1919) condemned the Romantic movement as an irresponsible ‘pilgrimage in the void’ that had licensed self-indulgent escapism and nationalist aggression. His student T. S. *Eliot continued the anti-Romantic campaign, although Eliot’s own poetry, like Arnold’s, was nonetheless inescapably ‘romantic’ in its nostalgia and sense of alienation. Some damage was done by Eliot’s disciples to the reputations of Shelley and other Romantic writers, from which they have since at least partially recovered.

attributed to him. *Skewt (in The Chaucer Canon, 1900) argued that only Part A (1–1,705, corresponding to 1–1,672 in de Lorris's French) is by Chaucer, and that B (1,706–5,810, being the remainder of de Lorris, up to 4,432, and Jean de Meun as far as 5,154 of the French) and C (5,811–7,696, corresponding to de Meun 10,679–12,360) are not his. A. Brusendorff in *The Chaucer Tradition (1925) argued against Skewt that all the parts were by Chaucer, but almost all modern authorities follow Skewt; his findings were strongly corroborated in 1967 by Ronald Sutherland who showed that A is descended from a different manuscript tradition from B and C.

In this dream poem the narrator enters the Garden of Mirth where he sees various allegorized figures and falls in love with a rosebud. Parts A and B describe the dreamer's instructions by the god of love, his being befriended by Bialacoil who is imprisoned, who is infuriated by his discovery of Romeo's presence wins her consent to a secret marriage. With the help of women, and the social order. Part A is a closer translation than the other sections. See The Romance of the Rose and Le Roman de la Rose: A Parallel-Text Edition, ed. R. A. Sutherland (1967).

Romeo and Juliet, *Shakespeare's first romantic tragedy, based on Arthur Brooke's poem The Tragical Historye of Romeus and Juliet (1562), a translation from the French of Boaistuau of one of *Bandello's Novelle. Shakespeare's play was probably written about 1595 and first printed in a 'bad' quarto in 1597; a good quarto published in 1599 and reprinted in 1609 served as the copy for the play's text in the First *Folio of 1623.

The Montagues and Capulets, the two chief families of Verona, are bitter enemies; Escalus, the prince, threatens anyone who disturbs the peace with death. Romeo, son of old Lord Montague, is in love with Lord Capulet's niece Rosaline. But at a feast given by Capulet, which Romeo attends disguised by a mask, he sees and falls in love with Juliet, Capulet's daughter, and she with him. After the feast he overhears, under her window, Juliet's confession of her love for him, and wins her consent to a secret marriage. With the help of Friar Laurence, they are wedded next day. Mercutio, a friend of Romeo, meets Tybalt, of the Capulet family, who is infuriated by his discovery of Romeo's presence at the feast, and they quarrel. Romeo comes on the scene, and attempts to reason with Tybalt, but Tybalt and Mercutio fight, and Mercutio falls. Then Romeo draws and Tybalt is killed. The prince, Montague, and Capulet come up, and Romeo is sentenced to banishment. Early next day, after spending the night with Juliet, he leaves Verona for Mantua, counselled by the friar, who intends to reveal Romeo's marriage at an opportune moment. Capulet proposes to marry Juliet to Count Paris, and when she seeks excuses to avoid this, peremptorily insists. Juliet consults the friar, who bids her consent to the match, but on the night before the wedding drink a potion which will render her apparently lifeless for 42 hours. He will warn Romeo, who will rescue her from the vault on her awakening and carry her to Mantua. The friar's message to Romeo miscarries, and Romeo hears that Juliet is dead. Buying poison, he comes to the vault to have a last sight of Juliet. He chances upon Count Paris outside the vault; they fight and Paris is killed. Then Romeo, after a last kiss on Juliet's lips, drinks the poison and dies. Juliet awakes and finds Romeo dead by her side, and the cup still in his hand. Guessing what has happened, she stabs herself and dies. The story is unfolded by the friar and Count Paris's page, and Montague and Capulet, faced by the tragic results of their enmity, are reconciled. The play begins with a sonnet spoken by the chorus and in its poetry, language, and plot reflects the sonnet craze of the 1590s, from which period Shakespeare's own sequence dates.

ROMNEY, George (1734–1802), portrait painter, born in Dalton-in-Furness, the son of a builder. He spent two years in Italy (1773–5) and the poise and graceful rhythms of his most distinguished works suggest his love of *Raphael and the antique. Yet Romney (who was a friend of *Hayley, who later wrote Romney's life, and of *Flaxman) felt trapped by the demands of portraiture. His many drawings of literary and historical subjects develop from a neo-classical treatment towards a wilder, more violent style; and his increasing obsession with *sublime and horrific subject matter from *Aeschylus, *Milton, and Shakespeare links him to *Fuseli and J. H. Mortimer (c.1741–79). Romney, after 1781, became obsessed with Emma Hart, later Lady Hamilton, whom he painted many times.

Romola, a novel by G. *Eliot, published 1863. The background of the novel is Florence at the end of the 15th cent., the troubled period, following the expulsion of the Medici, of the expedition of Charles VIII, distracted counsels in the city, the excitement caused by the preaching of *Savonarola, and acute division between the popular party and the supporters of the Medici. The various historical figures, including Charles VIII, Machiavelli, and Savonarola himself, are drawn with great care, as well as the whole picturesque complexion of the city, though the novel is generally held to be overloaded with detail, and has never been one of her most admired. The story is that of the purification by trials of the noble-natured Romola, devoted daughter of an old blind scholar. Into their lives comes a clever, adaptable young Greek, Tito Melema, whose self-indulgence develops into utter perfidy. He robs, and abandons in imprisonment, the benefactor of his childhood, Baldassare. He cruelly goes through a mock marriage ceremony with the innocent little contadina Tessa. After marrying Romola he wounds her deepest feelings by betraying her father's solemn trust. He plays a double game in the political intrigues of the day. Nemesis pursues and at last overtakes him in the person of old Baldassare, who escapes from imprisonment crazed with sorrow and suffering. Romola, with her love for her husband turned to contempt, and her trust in Savonarola destroyed by his falling away from his high prophetic mission, is left in isolation, from which she is rescued by the discovery of her duty in self-sacrifice. The novel was illustrated by *Leighton, much to George Eliot's satisfaction.

rondeau, a French verse form consisting of ten (or, in stricter sense, 13) lines, having only two rhymes throughout, and with the opening words used twice as a refrain. It became popular in England in the late 19th cent. and was much used by *Dobson, *Swinburne, and others. The rondeau is a form of rondeau, again using two rhymes and a refrain, usually of three stanzas.

RONSARD, Pierre de (1524–85), French poet, leader of the *Pléiade. He won early success with the publication of the *Odes of 1550, and the first of a series of love sequences, *Les Amours of 1552–3. The latter collection (the 'Cassandre' cycle) contains the famous 'Mignonne, allons voir si la rose'; there followed the *Continuation des Amours of 1555 and the *Nouvelle Continuation des Amours of 1556, forming the basis of the 'Marie' cycle. His last important love sequence, the *Sonets pour Hélène of 1578, contains the sonnet 'Quand vous serez bien vieille, au soir à la chandelle'. Besides the collections of love poetry, Ronsard wrote on a wide variety of themes, political, philosophical, pastoral, and religious, his works including *Les Hymnes (1555–6), the *Discours des misères de ce temps (1562), written at the beginning of the religious wars, and the unfinished epic *La Franciade (1572). He exercised considerable influence on the English sonnet writers of the 16th cent.

Room at the Top, see Braine.

Room of One's Own, A, a feminist essay by V. *Woolf, published 1929 and based on two lectures on 'Women and Fiction' delivered in Oct. 1928 to Newnham College and Girton College, Cambridge.

The author describes the educational, social, and financial disadvantages and prejudices against which women have struggled throughout history (using the fate of a hypothetical talented sister of Shakespeare as an illustration; her literary aspirations end in suicide), arguing that women will not be able to write well and freely until they have the privacy and independence implied by 'a room of one's own' and 'five hundred a year'. She pays tribute to women writers of the past (including A. *Behn, D. *Osborne and J. *Austen, the *Brontës); to women's achievements in the form of the novel, which suited her because, unlike older forms of literature, it was 'young enough to be soft in her hands'; and projects a future in which increasing equality would enable women to become not only novelists but poets. In the last chapter she discusses the concept of 'androgyeny', pleading for unity and harmony rather than a rigid separation into 'male' and 'female' qualities: 'Perhaps a mind that is purely masculine cannot create, any more than a mind that is purely feminine'.

It opens in an English pensione in Florence with a confrontation between Lucy Honeychurch's chaperone Miss Bartlett and the upstart Mr Emerson and his son George; the two men offer to exchange rooms, in order to give the ladies the benefit of a room with a view, a favour which they reluctantly accept. The novel describes the inmates of the Pensione Bertolini, among them the clergyman Mr Beebe and the 'original' lady novelist Miss Lavish, and their reactions to Italy and to one another. Lucy, an artistic but immature girl, is disturbed first by witnessing a street murder, and then by an impulsive embrace from George Emerson during an excursion to Fiesole. Miss Bartlett removes her charge from these dangers, and the two return to Summer Street, in Surrey, where Lucy becomes engaged to a cultured dilettante, Cecil Vyse, whom Mr Beebe, who has reappeared as the local vicar, ominously describes as 'an ideal bachelor'. The Bertolini cast continues to reassemble as the Engelmans take a villa in the neighbourhood. Lucy comes to realize that she loves George, not Cecil, but it takes her some time to extricate herself from what she describes as 'the muddle'. The second half of the drama is played against a sharply and intimately observed background of tennis and tea parties and amateur piano recitals; it ends in the Pensione Bertolini, with George and Lucy on their honeymoon.

Roots (1959) by A. *Wesker, a sequel to *Chicken Soup with Barley. It portrays the effects of Ronnie Kahn's idealism on his fiancée Beatie Bryant, the daughter of a Norfolk agricultural labourer; she returns to her family for a visit full of his praises and his notions, but her mother and sister retaliate with talk of pop songs and gossip about operations. As she is trying to rouse them to share her interests, a letter arrives from Ronnie cancelling his impending visit and breaking off the engagement. Initially despairing, Beatie finds her own voice as she attacks her family for its acceptance of the third-rate. The third part of the trilogy, I'm Talking about Jerusalem (1960), shows the collapse of the Utopian dreams of Ronnie's sister Ada and her newly demobbed husband Dave as they fail to create a craftsman's oasis of economic independence.

ROPER, Margaret (1505–44), daughter of Sir T. *More. According to Stapleton (1535–98), she purchased the head of her dead father nearly a month after it had been exposed on London Bridge and preserved it in spices until her death. It is believed that it was buried with her. *Tennyson alludes to this:
her, who clasped in her last trance
    Her murdered father’s head.
    (‘A Dream of Fair Women’)

ROPER, William (1496–1578), of Lincoln’s Inn. He married Sir T. *More’s daughter Margaret (above) and wrote an early life of his father-in-law first published at Saint-Omer (1626).

RORTY, Richard (1931—), American philosopher, and the best-known contemporary advocate of pragmatism in the tradition of J. *Dewey. Influenced also by *Heidegger, *Derrida, and the later *Wittgenstein, his critique of the traditional philosophical project leads many to identify him as an exponent of *postmodernism. His major work Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979) rejects conceptions of language and thought as representations mirroring an independent reality, while Contingency, Irony and Solidarity (1989) applies this anti-foundationalist perspective to ethics and politics, presenting an ‘ironic’ defence of liberalism.

ROS, Amanda McKittrick, née Anna Margaret McKittrick (1860–1939), Irish writer, known as ‘the World’s Worst Novelist’, wrote Irene Iddesleigh (1897), Delina Delaney (1898), and other works, remarkable for their extraordinary and unselfconsciously colourful prose, to which A. *Huxley devoted an essay, ‘Euphues Redivivus’ (1923).

ROSA, Salvator (1615–73), Neapolitan painter, etcher, satirical poet, and actor. He painted genre scenes, battles, marines, and ambitious figure compositions, but has remained most famous for his macabre subjects (witches, monsters, meditations on death) and for his wild, craggy landscapes. In England his reputation rose steadily throughout the 18th cent. Horace *Walpole, crossing the Alps in 1739, exclaimed ‘Precipices, mountains, torrents, wolves, rumblings—Salvator Rosa’, and writers on the *picturesque frequently invoked his name. His stormy personality also fascinated artists, and with the publication of Lady *Morgan’s biography in 1824 the legends associated with him—that he had lived with bandits and fought in a popular uprising in Naples—became more important than his pictures. He came to represent the archetypal Romantic artist, outlawed by a corrupt society, whose genius bore comparison with Shakespeare.

Rosa Bud, a character in Dickens’s *Edwin Drood.

Rosalind, (1) in Spenser’s *Shepheardes Calender and *Colin Clouts Come Home Againe, an unknown lady celebrated by the poet as his love; (2) the heroine of Shakespeare’s *As You Like It, whose chief source was Lodge’s *Rosalynde.

Rosaline, (1) in Shakespeare’s *Love’s Labour’s Lost, a lady attendant on the princess of France, and loved by *Borowe; (2) in his *Romeo and Juliet, Capulet’s niece, with whom Romeo is in love before he sees *Juliet. She is mentioned, but does not appear in the play. Both Rosalines are, like the lady of the *Sonnets, described as being dark.

Rosalynde, Euphues Golden Legacie, a pastoral romance in the style of Lyly’s *Euphues, diversified with sonnets and eclogues, written by *Lodge during his voyage to the Canaries (everie line was wet with a surge), published 1590.

The story is borrowed in part from The Tale of *Gamelyn and was dramatized by Shakespeare in *As You Like It. Lodge’s Rosader is Shakespeare’s Orlando; Saladyne is Oliver; Alinda, Celia; and Rosalind is common to both. Jaques and Touchstone have no equivalents. The ill-treatment of Rosader (Orlando) is more developed by Lodge, and the restoration of the rightful duke to his dukedom is effected by arms instead of persuasion. Lodge’s romance, which includes such well-known lyrics as ‘Love in my bosome like a Bee! Doth sucke his sweete’, is also diversified by a variety of rhetorical speeches and descriptions.

ROSAMOND, Fair, Rosamond Clifford (d. ?1176), probably mistress of Henry II in 1174. She was buried in the choir of Godstow Abbey near Oxford, and her remains were removed to the chapter house there c.1191. A legend transmitted by *Stow following *Higden declares that Henry kept her in a maze-like house in Woodstock where only he could find her, but the queen, *Eleanor of Aquitaine, traced her whereabouts by following a thread and ‘so dealt with her that she lived not long after’. The story is told in a ballad by *Deloney included in Percy’s *Reliques; *Daniel published in 1592 ‘The Complaint of Rosamond’, a poem in rhyme-royal; and *Addison wrote an opera, Rosamond, in 1707.

Rosciad, The (1761), a *mock-heroic satire by Charles *Churchill in heroic couplets, originally 730 lines, but expanded in later editions to 1,090.

It describes the attempt to find a worthy successor to Roscius, the celebrated Roman comic actor who died c.62 BC. It provides satiric sketches of many famous theatrical personalities of the day, both actors and critics (including *Quin, *Foote, and *Colman the elder). It caused a great sensation, and T. *Davies in his Life of Garrick wrote that ‘the players ... ran about like so many stricken deer.’ But Churchill’s criticism is not all negative, and his praise of *Garrick, chosen to succeed Roscius, is high.

ROSCOE, William (1753–1831), lawyer and banker, book-collector, writer, scholar, and botanist. He published his early verses in 1777, and from then until the end of his life, a considerable number of works of poetry, biography, jurisprudence, botany, and arguments against the slave trade. His principal work was his Life of Lorenzo de’ Medici (1795). In 1805 (having now acquired Greek) he published the Life of Leo the Tenth, and in 1806 The Butterfly’s Ball and the Grasshopper's Feast, which became a children's classic. His edition of *Pope appeared in 1824. He did much to stimulate an interest in Italy and Italian literature in England.

ROSCOMMON, earl of, see DILLON.

Rose and the Ring, The, a fairy story written and illustrated by *Thackeray, first published 1855.

The magic rose and ring have the property of making those who have possession of them seem irresistibly attractive, which introduces comic complications into the story of Prince Giglio and Princess Rosalba, who have been ousted from their proper positions as a result of the Fairy Blackstick's wish that they shall suffer 'a little misfortune'. Thackeray makes gentle fun both of *fairy-story conventions, and of 'improving' children's books in this 'Fireside Pantomime for Great and Small Children'.

Rose Aylmer, a short poem by W. S. *Landor, published 1806, on the daughter of Lord Aylmer. She was an early love of Landor's, but on her mother's second marriage she was sent out to her aunt at Calcutta, where she died at the age of 20.

ROSENBERG, Isaac (1890–1918), war poet, born in Bristol. He moved with his family to Whitechapel in 1897; his parents were émigrés from western Russia, and his father, a scholarly Jew, worked as a pedlar and market-dealer. During his irregular East End schooling Isaac learned to paint, and began to experiment with poetry. He became an apprentice engraver at 14, but in 1911 another Jewish family paid for him to attend the Slade School of Art; in 1912 he published at his own expense a collection of poems, Night and Day, and was encouraged by *Bottomley, *Pound, and others. In 1915 he published another volume of verse, Youth, which passed largely unregarded. In the same year he defied his family's pacifist views and joined the army, arriving as a private in the trenches in 1916. He was killed in action. His poetry is forceful, rich in its vocabulary, and starkly realistic in its attitudes to war; Rosenberg greatly disliked Brooke's 'begloried invigilator, P'Tang Yang Kipperbang (1982) portrayed schoolboy ritual, London's Burning (1986) dramatized the perils of the fire service, and And a Nightingale Sang (1989) evoked wartime nostalgia. Eskimo Day (1996) and its successor Cold Enough for Snow (1997) depicted the tragi-comic effects of social class upon parents as their children entered university. Rosenthal is one of the few television writers still commissioned to produce single dramas.

Rose Tavern, the in Russell Street, Covent Garden, a favourite place of resort in the later part of the 17th and early 18th cents. It is frequently referred to in the literature of the period, e.g. by Pepys (18 May 1668), and by Farquhar (The Recruiting Officer).

Rose Theatre, the on Bankside, Southwark, built in 1587, and altered and enlarged in 1592, closing in 1602. Henslowe was its owner and Edward Alley its leading actor. Shakespeare is thought to have acted there. Its foundations were discovered in 1989.

Rosicrucian, a member of a supposed society or order, 'the brethren of the Rosy Cross', reputedly founded by one Christian Rosenkreuz in 1484, but first mentioned in 1614. Its manifestos were the Fama Fraternitatis (1614) and the Confessio Fraternitatis (1615), which aroused intense interest on the Continent and in Britain. Its members were said to claim various forms of secret and magic knowledge, such as the transmutation of metals, the prolongation of life, and power over the elements and elemental spirits, and to derive much of their alchemy and mystical preoccupations from *Paracelsus. No Rosicrucian society appears to have actually existed, and the Rosicrucian movement seems to have been rooted in some kind of anti-Jesuit Protestant alliance, with deep religious interests, as well as interests in alchemy, medicine, and the Cabbala. F. *Yates, in her study The Rosicrucian Enlightenment (1972), describes the term as representing 'in the purely historical sense . . . a phase . . . intermediate between the Renaissance and the so-called scientific revolution of the 17th cent.', 'a historical label for a style of thinking', and names as major figures in the English Rosicrucian movement Dee, Fludd, and Ashmole; she also discusses the Rosicrucian connections of F. *Bacon, Comenius, I. *Newton, Leibniz, and many others.

ROSS, Alan (1922– ), poet, travel writer, and editor, born in Calcutta and educated at St John's College, Oxford. He has published several volumes of poetry and prose, many evocatively describing sojourns and travels abroad, sometimes in pursuit of art and love, sometimes of cricket. Open Sea (1975) collects poems about the Second World War from earlier works, and includes his compressed epic 'J.W.51B', a grey, haunting, first-hand description of naval endurance on the Arctic convoy route. He edited the London Magazine 1961–85.

ROSS, Alexander (1699–1784), a Forfarshire schoolmaster, and an early follower of *Ramsay, published a lengthy pastoral in Scots entitled The Fortunate Shepherdess (1768); several editions are called Helenvore, or The Fortunate Shepherdess. But he is best remembered as the author of various spirited songs, including 'Woo'd and Married and a'.

Ross, the Man of, see KYRLE.

Ross, Martin, see SOMERVILLE AND ROSS.

ROSS, Robert Baldwin (1869–1918), journalist, art dealer, and critic, and literary executor of O. *Wilde. He was born in Tours of Canadian parents but lived most of his life in England. Probably Wilde's first male lover, Ross was his loyal friend in life and death. He helped support him after his release from prison, and, entrusted with De Profundis, published a version in 1905 which, though omitting the more painful accusations against Lord A. *Douglas, led to the latter's undying enmity. A close friend of Wilde's sons, Ross cleared the estate of debt (1906), organized the Collected Works (completed 1908), encouraged performance of the plays, and commissioned the first biography from A. *Ransome (1912). This infuriated Douglas into a series of vicious legal actions, which continued until and may have contributed to Ross's early death. Ross commissioned the sphinx for Wilde's tomb from Jacob Epstein. His own ashes are interred in it.

ROSSERTER, Philip (1567–1623), court musician, composer, and lutenist, a friend of T. *Campion, who wrote half the songs in Campion's first Book of Ayres (1601). He was appointed a lutenist at the court of James I in 1603.

ROSSETTI, Christina Georgina (1830–94), sister of D. G. and W. M. *Rossetti. She was educated at home, shared her brothers' intellectual interests, and contributed to their childhood family journals. Ill health (possibly strategic when young, but later severe) ended her attempts to work as a governess, and confined her to a quiet life. Her engagement to the painter James Collinson, an original member of the *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, was broken off in 1850 when he rejoined the Roman Catholic Church. Christina, like her mother and sister Maria, was a devout High Anglican, much influenced by the Tractarians (see OXFORD MOVEMENT). She contributed to the Germ (1850), where five of her poems appeared under the pseudonym 'Ellen Alleyn'. In 1861 Macmillan's Magazine published 'Up-hill' and 'A Birthday', two of her best-known poems. Goblin Market and Other Poems appeared in 1862, The Prince's Progress and Other Poems in 1866, Sing-Song, a Nursery Rhyme Book (with illustrations by Arthur Hughes) in 1872, and A Pageant and Other Poems in 1881. Time Flies: A Reading Diary (1885) consists of short passages and prose, one for each day of the year. She also published much prose and poetry in periodicals and anthologies, and many prose devotional works. Her Poetical Works, ed. W. M. Rossetti, with a memoir, was published in 1904. Her work ranges from poems of fantasy and verses for the young to ballads, love lyrics, sonnets, and religious poetry. Much of it is pervaded by a sense of melancholy, verging at times on the morbid. The recurrent themes of unhappy, delayed, or frustrated love and of premature resignation ('Grown old before my time') led her biographer L. M. Packer (1963) to suppose an unsatisfied passion for W. B. *Scott, who was already married when she met him in 1847; G. Battiscombe (A Divided Life, 1981) questions this, stressing the close connection in her work of the spiritual and the erotic. Her work has often been compared with that of E. *Brontë, but, while both share a sense of mystical yearning, Rossetti's is more subdued, more hopeless, less fulfilled. Her technical virtuosity was considerable, and her use of short, irregularly rhymed lines is distinctive.

ROSSETTI, Dante Gabriel (1828–82), whose full Christian names were Gabriel Charles Dante (but the form which he gave it has become inveterate), the son of Gabriele Rossetti (1783–1854), an Italian patriot who came to England in 1824. He was brought up in an atmosphere of keen cultural and political activity which contributed more to his artistic development than his formal education at King's College School, London. He studied painting with *Millais and H. Hunt, and in 1848, with them and four others, founded the *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. For many years he was known only as a painter, though he began to write poetry early. Several of his poems, including The Blessed Damozel and 'My Sister's Sleep', and a prose piece, 'Hand and Soul', were published in the Germ (1850), the year in which he met Elizabeth *Siddal (or Siddall), who modelled for him and many of his circle. In 1854 he met *Ruskin, who did much to establish the reputation of the Pre-Raphaelite painters, and in 1856 W. *Morris whom he greatly influenced; he was to paint Morris's wife Jane many times. In 1860 Rossetti and Lizzie married; she died in 1862, and Rossetti buried with her the manuscript of a number of his poems. Later that year he moved to 16 Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, where *Swinburne and *Meredith were briefly joint tenants; he filled the house with antiques, bric-à-brac, and a curious selection of animals, including a wombat. In 1868 he showed a renewed interest in poetry, possibly inspired by renewed contact with Jane Morris; sixteen sonnets, including the 'Willowwood' sequence, were published in March 1869 in the *Fortnightly Review. That summer he wrote many more, and also arranged the exhibition of the poems buried with his wife. Poems (1870) contained 'Sister Helen', 'Troy Town', 'Eden Bower', *'Jenny', and the first part of his sonnet sequence *'The House of Life'; it was well received, partly because Rossetti took care that his friends should review it. In 1871 Morris and Rossetti took a joint lease of Kelmscott Manor, where Rossetti continued his intimacy with Jane, with Morris's apparent consent, and continued to paint her; there also he wrote the ballad 'Rose Mary' and further sonnets for the 'House of Life' sequence. In Oct. 1871 appeared R. *Buchanan's notorious attack *The Fleshly School of Poetry' (under the pseudonym Thomas Maitland) in the *Contemporary Review. This accused Rossetti and his associates of impurity and obscenity; the sonnet 'Nuptial Sleep' was singled out for particular criticism, and was not reprinted in the 1881 edition, though the prolonged and bitter controversy which Buchanan aroused ended with the Pre-Raphaelites on the whole victorious. Rossetti's reply, 'The Stealthy School of Criticism', appeared in the *Athenaeum, Dec. 1872. Rossetti's later years were overshadowed by ill health and chloral, though he continued to paint and to write and was recognized by a new generation of aesthetes, including *Pater and *Meredith, as a source of inspiration; the admiration was not wholly mutual. Poems and Ballads and Sonnets both appeared in 1881; the first was largely rearrangements of earlier works, and the second completed *The House of Life with 47 new sonnets, and also contained other new work, including *'The King's Tragedy' and *'The White Ship', both historical 'ballads'.

Rossetti's poetry is marred for many readers by its vast and cloudy generalities about Life, Love, and Death, though some of his work shows in contrast a Pre-Raphaelite sharpness of detail, and much of it has an undeniable emotional and erotic power. His letters (ed. O. Doughty and J. R. Wahl, 4 vols, 1965–7) reveal another side of his colourful and extravagant personality; they are witty, irreverent, at times coarse, and demonstrate the wide range of his artistic interests. Mention should also be made of his translations from the Italian (*The Early Italian Poets Together with Dante's Vita Nuova, 1861, known later as Dante and his Circle, 1874), and of *Villon. Many of his poems were written as commentaries on his own and other paintings.

Rossetti, William Michael (1829–1919), brother of D. G. *Rossetti, educated at King's College School, London; he worked as an official of the Inland Revenue, and is remembered as a man of letters and art critic. He was a member of the *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, edited the *Germ, and wrote the sonnet that was printed on its cover. His reviews of art exhibitions for the *Spectator were published as Fine Art: Chiefly Contemporary (1867). He edited 15 volumes of *Moxon's Popular Poets, and was responsible for important editions of *Blake and *Shelley. He edited *Whitman in 1868, introducing him to a British public, and the two corresponded frequently. He translated *Dante, and was responsible for encouraging James *Thomson ('B. V.). He also edited many of his family's papers, letters, and diaries, and wrote memoirs of his brother and his sister Christina (above). *Ruskin: Rossetti: Preraphaelitism (1899); Preraphaelite Diaries and Letters (1900); Rossetti Papers, 1862–70 (1903); D. G. Rossetti, His Family Letters, with a Memoir (1895); Family Letters of Christina Rossetti (1908). His Some Reminiscences (1906) is a valuable biographical source. His diary for 1870–3 was edited with notes by O. Bornand (1977).

Rossini, Gioacchino (1792–1868), Italian composer, and one of the greatest exponents of 19th-cent. opera. His early success was based on opera buffa, but he later devoted himself to serious drama, beginning with Otello. Unfortunately the text, adapted for him by a wealthy dilettante, Francesco di Salsa, has become a locus classicus of trivialization: 'They have been crucifying Otello into an opera', wrote *Byron: 'the music is good, but lugubrious; but as for the words, all the real scenes with Iago cut out, and the greatest nonsense inserted; the handkerchief turned into a billet-doux, and the singer would not black his face, for some exquisite reasons.' Nevertheless Otello is not without its qualities, particularly in the last act, of which it has been well said that Rossini here 'came of age as a musical dramatist'. But it was no match for *Boito and Verdi's version of 1887 and fell into relative oblivion. The only other British author on whom Rossini drew was W. *Scott, whose *The Lady of the Lake supplied the libretto of La donna del lago (1819). Two later works based on Scott, Ivanhoe (1826) and Robert Bruce (1846), are both pasticcios, and only very loosely connected with Scott. Also put together from pre-existing music was the *Pianto delle muse in morte di Lord Byron which Rossini produced at the second of his London concerts in 1824, shortly after the news of Byron's death had reached London.
ROSTAND, Edmond (1868–1918), French playwright, author of *Les Romanesques (1894), *La Princesse Lointaine (1895), *La Samaritaine (1897), *L'Aiglon (1900, based on the life of Napoleon's son), and *Chantecler (1910). The poetic drama *Cyrano de Bergerac (1897), his most popular and successful work, revives in romantic guise the 17th-cent. soldier and duellist *Cyrano. It has been translated into Glaswegian demotic by E. *Morgan (1992), and was successfully filmed (1990) with Gérard Depardieu in the title role, with English subtitles rendered into rhyming verse by A. *Burgess.

ROTA, Bertram (1903–66), bookseller, who entered the book trade in 1918 in the bookshop conducted by his uncles Percy and Arthur Dobell. In 1923, at the age of 19, he began his own business with £100 borrowed from his mother's savings. The firm has continued its tradition of specializing in first editions of literature of the last 100 years.

ROTH, Joseph (1894–1939), Austrian-Jewish writer, who was born in Galicia and died in exile in Paris. Brilliantly successful as a journalist (on the Frankfurter Zeitung, among other papers) he also published 13 novels. In his books, he is a sardonic observer of post-war *mœurs, an elegist for the Central European *shtetl, and a belated apologist for the Dual Monarchy. He once wrote, 'My strongest experience was the War and the destruction of my fatherland, the only one I ever had, the Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy.' His characteristic locations are border garrison towns, his heroes decent men overtaken by events. Radetzkymarsch (1932, The Radetzy March), his family epic, is commonly accounted his masterpiece, though unfortunately at the expense of other works. His later manner, in Das falsche Gewicht (1937, Weights and Measures), Die Kapuzinergruft (1938, The Emperor's Tomb), and Die Legende vom heiligen Trinker (1939, The Legend of the Holy Drinker), is supremely beautiful and desolate.

ROTH, Philip (1933– ), novelist, born in New Jersey, of second-generation Jewish American parentage. His writing career has been combined with various teaching posts in America. His complex relationship with his Jewish background is reflected in most of his works, and his portrayal of contemporary Jewish life has aroused much controversy. His works include Goodbye, Columbus (1959, a novella with five short stories), Letting Go (1962), and a sequence of novels featuring Nathan Zuckerman, a Jewish novelist who has to learn to contend with success: My Life as a Man (1974), The Ghost Writer (1979), Zuckerman Unbound (1981), The Anatomy Lesson (1983), and The Prague Orgy (1985). He remains best known for Portnoy's Complaint (1969), un succès de scandale which records the intimate confessions of Alexander Portnoy to his psychiatrist. Later novels include The Counterlife (1987); Patrimony: A True Story (1991), about his father Herman Roth; and Operation Shylock: A Confession (1993), in which the author meets his double, whose self-appointed task is to lead the Jews out of Israel and back to Europe. American Pastoral was published in 1997.

ROUBILIAC, Louis François (1702 or 1705–62), French rococo sculptor, who settled in London c.1732. His first success was the statue of Handel (1738) commissioned for Vauxhall Gardens, which introduced a new informality into English sculpture. Roubiliac was successful as a tomb sculptor; the monuments to General Hargrave (1757) and to Lady Elizabeth Nightingale (1761; both Westminster Abbey), his most famous works, are strikingly original and sensationally baroque. As a portrait sculptor Roubiliac attracted a very wide circle of patrons; his image of Pope (there are four marble busts dating from 1738, 1740, and 1741, all inscribed ad vivum; and one terracotta model) is unflinchingly realistic yet deeply poignant. Roubiliac also executed a series of vivid historical busts of famous scientists, writers, and men of letters for the library of Trinity College, Cambridge.

ROUGEMONT, Louis De, assumed name of Swiss-born Louis Grin (1847–1921), an adventurer who decided at the age of 16 to see the world. He began as footman to Fanny *Kemble, touring through Europe and America, and eventually became butler to the governor of Australia. After spending many years there he contributed to Wide World Magazine in 1898 sensational articles relating to his extraordinary, mostly bogus, voyages and adventures in search of pearls and gold, where he encountered an octopus with tentacles 75 feet long and rode turtles in the water.

Round Table, the, in the Arthurian legend, the symbol of the common purpose of Arthur's court and knights. According to *Malory (in Vinaver's Tale 1) it was made for *Uther Pendragon who gave it to King Lodegrean (see *LEODEGRANCE) of Camelerde (Cornwall). The latter gave it as a wedding gift, with 100 knights, to Arthur when he married Guinevere, his daughter. It would seat 150 knights, and all places round it were equal. The 'Siege Perilous' was reserved for the knight who should achieve the quest of the *Grail. In *La3amon's *Brut, however, the table was made for Arthur by a crafty workman. It is first mentioned by *Wace.

Rousillon, countess of, *Bertram's mother and *Helena's guardian in Shakespeare's *All's Well that Ends Well. Rousillon was a province in the south-west of France near Spain.

ROUSSEAU, Jean-Jacques (1712–78), born into a Protestant artisan family at Geneva. His mother having died soon after his birth, Jean-Jacques was cared for in childhood by an aunt, by his father, a watchmaker of unstable temperament, and (after the latter's departure for France) by a maternal uncle. He was apprenticed to an engraver when, at the age of 15, he decided to leave his master and Geneva. Thus began the movement of residence which was to become habitual and which took him to many parts of Switzerland, France, and Italy, and (in 1766–7) to England. During these peregrinations he owed much to the generosity of friends and patrons; otherwise he maintained himself by a succession of clerical, secretarial, and tutorial posts and by teaching and copying music. Rousseau’s emotional nature, his often tempestuous personal relations, extreme sensitivity, and penchant for controversy filled his career with striking and dramatic episodes; while his critical and enquiring intellect, his lifelong interest in music and excursions into opera and drama, a voluminous correspondence, and important and influential contributions to social and political philosophy, the novel, autobiography, moral theology, and educational theory mark him out as one of the dominant writers and thinkers of the age.

Rousseau was 38 years old when his essay on a subject proposed by the Academy of Dijon, Discours sur les sciences et les arts (1750), was awarded first prize and published. In the Discours, the first of many works in which the natural man is preferred to his civilized counterpart, Rousseau argued that the development and spread of knowledge and culture, far from improving human behaviour, had corrupted it by promoting inequality, idleness, and luxury. The Discours sur l’origine de l’inégalité (1755) contrasts the innocence and contentment of primitive man in a ‘state of nature’—his mode of existence determined by none but genuine needs—with the dissatisfaction and perpetual agitation of modern social man, the majority of whom are condemned to the legally sanctioned servitude necessary to preserve the institution of private property. The suggestion by d’Alembert that a theatre should be established at Geneva prompted the Lettre sur les spectacles (1758), in which the passive nature of playgoing, the preoccupation of modern plays with love, and the consequent unnatural bringing forward of women are seen as dangerous symptoms of the ills of society.

A return to primitive innocence being impossible, these ills were only to be remedied, Rousseau held, by reducing the gap separating modern man from his natural archetype and by modifying existing institutions in the interest of equality and happiness. Emile (1762) lays down the principles for a new scheme of education in which the child is to be allowed full scope for individual development in natural surroundings, shielded from the harmful influences of civilization, in order to form an independent judgement and a stable character. The ‘Profession de foi du vicaire savoyard’, contained in the fourth book of Emile, sets against institutional Christianity a form of Deism grounded in religious sentiment and guided by the divine instinct of conscience. The year 1762 also saw the publication of Du contrat social, his theory of politics, in which he advocated universal justice through equality before the law, a more equitable distribution of wealth, and defined government as fundamentally a matter of contract providing for the exercise of power in accordance with the ‘general will’ and for the common good, by consent of the citizens as a whole, in whom sovereignty ultimately resides.

In the novel Julie, ou la nouvelle Héloïse (1761), Rousseau’s greatest popular success, a critical account of contemporary manners and ideas is interwoven with the story of the passionate love of the tutor St Preux and his pupil Julie, their separation, Julie’s marriage to the Baron Wolmar, and the dutiful, virtuous life shared by all three on the Baron’s country estate.

The posthumously published autobiographical works Les Confessions (1781–8) and Les Rêveries du promeneur solitaire (1782) were written towards the end of Rousseau’s life as exercises in self-justification and self-analysis. As expressions of the complex individuality of a personality and a sensibility, unexampled in their time for candour, detail, and subtlety, they remain landmarks of the literature of personal revelation and reminiscence.

ROUTH, Martin Joseph (1755–1854), president of Magdalen College, Oxford, for 63 years; he edited the Gorgias and Euthydemus of Plato, and Reliquiae Sacrae (1814–43), a collection of writings of ecclesiastical authors of the 2nd and 3rd cents. Routh was a man of immense learning, and a strong, old-fashioned ‘High Churchman’. He was also, perhaps, the last man in England who always wore a wig. His long life (he died in his 100th year) and literary experience lend weight to his famous utterance: ‘I think, Sir, you will find it a very good practice always to verify your references.’ A life of Routh by R. D. Middleton was published in 1938.

ROWE, Nicholas (1674–1718), educated at Westminster School; he became a barrister of the Middle Temple, but abandoned the legal profession for that of a playwright, and made the acquaintance of Pope and Addison. He produced at Lincoln’s Inn Fields his tragedies The Ambitious Stepmother (1700), The Fair Penitent (1701), and The Fair Penitent (1703). His Ulysses was staged in 1705, The Royal Convert in 1707, Jane Shore in 1714, and Lady Jane Grey in 1715. He also produced one unsuccessful comedy, The Biter (1704). He became poet laureate in 1715, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His poetical works include a famous translation of Lucan (1718), ‘one of the greatest productions of English poetry’, according to Dr Johnson. Rowe also did useful work as editor of Shakespeare’s plays (1709), dividing them into acts and scenes, supplying stage directions, and generally making the text more intelligible. As a writer he is best remembered for his ‘She-Tragedies’ (his own phrase), which provided Mrs *Siddons, as Calista and Jane Shore, with two of her most famous roles: their tone is moral, their stress is on the suffering and penitence of victimized women, and their intention is to arouse ‘pity; a sort of regret proceeding from good-nature’.
Rowe saw himself as the heir of *Otway, who had also been renowned for tenderness and pathos. See Three Plays, ed. J. R. Sutherland (1929), with a life and bibliography.

Rowland, Childe, see Childe Roland.

Rowlands, Samuel (?1565–1630), a writer of satirical tracts, epigrams, jests, etc., mainly in verse. His works include a satire on the manners of Londoners, The Letting of Humors Blood in the Head-Vaine (1600); Tis Merrie when Gossips Meete (1602), a vivid and dramatic character sketch of a widow, a wife, and a maid who meet in a tavern and converse; Greene’s Ghost (1602), on the subject of ‘coney-catchers’ (see GREENE, R.); Democritus, or Doctor Merry-man His Medicines against Melancholy Humors (1607); and The Melancholie Knight (1615). His Complete Works, including Martin Mark-all (1610), now considered spurious, were edited with an essay by *Gosse and S. J. H. Herrtage in 1880.

Rowlandson, Thomas (1756–1827), painter, book illustrator, and caricaturist famous for his comic depiction of scenes from social life. Among his most important productions were The Loyal Volunteers of London and Environs (1799); The Microcosm of London (1808–10), with Augustus Pugin; The Three Tours of Doctor Syntax, for *Combe; The English Dance of Death (1815–16); and The Dance of Life (1816–17), also with Combe, all of which issued from R. *Ackermann. Rowlandson was equally adept at rendering the picturesque landscape and the caricatured human figure. He is best remembered for his comic invention, for the spontaneity and fluid quality of his draughtsmanship, and for the often ribald jocularity of his social commentary. See Bernard Falk, Thomas Rowlandson: His Life and Art (1949), and John T. Hayes, The Art of Thomas Rowlandson (1990).

Rowley, Samuel (fl. 1597–1624), an actor in the Admiral’s Company and a playwright employed by *Henslowe; he is believed to be responsible for the comic additions to Marlowe’s *Dr Faustus. His only extant play is a chronicle drama about Henry VIII, When You See Me, You Know Me, acted 1603.

Rowley, William (?1585–1626), dramatist and actor. Nothing is known about his birth and his early life, but he was probably Samuel *Rowley’s brother. His first compositions were episodic adventure-plays for Queen Anne’s Men, The Travels of the Three English Brothers (1607), written with *Day and Wilkins, Fortune by Land and Sea (1607–9, printed 1655), with *Heywood, and, unassisted, A Shoemaker, a Gentleman (1607–9, printed 1638). Collaborations, in which he usually contributed comic sub-plot, account for nearly all of his surviving dramatic work. His most notable partnership was with *Middleton with whom he wrote Wit at Several Weapons (1613, printed 1647), *A Fair Quarrel (1615–16, printed 1617), The Old Law (c.1618, printed 1656), The World Tossed at Tennis (1619–20, printed 1620), and *The Changeling (1622, printed 1653). He also assisted in *The Witch of Edmonton (1621, printed 1658), with *Dekker and *Ford; The Maid in the Mill (1623, printed 1647), with *Fletcher; *A Cure for a Cuckold (1624–5, printed 1661), with *Webster; and A New Wonder, a Woman Never Vexed (1624–6, printed 1632), with an unknown collaborator. His non-dramatic work includes a satirical pamphlet, A Search for Money (1609), and elegies on Prince Henry and a fellow actor, Hugh Attwell. From 1609 he was a member of the Duke of York’s (later Prince Charles’s) Men, and by 1616 had become leader of the company. His speciality as an actor was the role of a fat clown, and he took the part of Jacques in his own *All’s Lost by Lust (c.1619). In 1625 he was cited in a legal action over Keep the Widow Waking, a sensational dramatization, now lost, of two contemporary scandals which he had written with Dekker, Ford, and Webster. He died before he could testify, and was buried at St James’s, Clerkenwell.

Rowley Poems, see CHATTERTON.

Rowse, Alfred L(eslie) (1903–97), poet, biographer, and Tudor historian, born at St Austell, Cornwall, and educated at St Austell Grammar School and Christ Church, Oxford. Cornwall forms the setting for many of his poems and works of history and autobiography, including A Cornish Childhood (1942). He published several books on Shakespeare (1963, 1973, and 1977), and argued that Emilia *Lanier was the ‘dark lady’ of Shakespeare’s *Sonnets.

Roxana, or The Fortunate Mistress, a novel by *Defoe, published 1724.

This purports to be the autobiography of Mlle Beleau, the beautiful daughter of French Protestant refugees, brought up in England and married to a London brewer, who, having squandered his property, deserts her and her five children. She enters upon a career of prosperous wickedness, passing from one protector to another in England, France, and Holland, amassing much wealth, and receiving the name Roxana by accident, in consequence of a dance that she performs. She is accompanied in her adventures by a faithful maid, Amy, a very human figure. She marries a respectable Dutch merchant in London and subsequently lives as a person of consequence in Holland. When one of her daughters appears on the scene in London, Roxana dares not acknowledge her, fearing that her past life will be revealed to her new spouse and her life of security will be ruined. When Amy says she will murder the girl, if necessary, to silence her inquiries about Roxana’s identity, Roxana is filled with horror and relief. Both Amy and the girl disappear, and Roxana, miserable and apprehensive, is tormented by her conscience. Her husband discerns her iniquity and soon thereafter dies, leaving her only a small sum of money. In the company of her alter ego Amy, Roxana descends into debt, poverty, and remorseful penitence.

ROXBURGHE, John Ker, third duke of (1740–1804), an ardent bibliophile, who secured an unrivalled collection of books from *Caxton's press. His splendid library, housed in St James's Square, was dispersed in 1812. Valdarfer's edition of *Boccaccio (1471), for which the second duke had paid 100 guineas, was then sold to the marquis of Blandford for £2,260. To celebrate this event the chief bibliophiles of the day dined together at St Alban's Tavern, St Alban's Street, under the presidency of Lord Spencer, and there inaugurated the Roxburgh Club, the first of the 'book-clubs', consisting of 25 members, with T. F. *Dibdin as its first secretary. The Club, at first rather convivial in character, began its valuable literary work with the printing of the metrical romance of *Havelok the Dane (1828). Each member is expected once in his career to present (and pay for a limited edition of) a volume of some rarity. See N. Barker, *The Publications of the Roxburgh Club 1814–1962 (1964).

ROY, Arundhati, see ANGO-INDIAN LITERATURE.

Royal Academy of Arts, the, founded under the patronage of George III in 1768, for the annual exhibition of works of contemporary artists and for the establishment of a school of art. It was first housed in Pall Mall, moved in 1780 to Somerset House, then to the National Gallery, and finally to Burlington House, Piccadilly, in 1869. Sir Joshua *Reynolds was its first president. Since 1870 the Academy has also held important loan exhibitions and its Summer Exhibition remains a regular fixture. *Ruskin's *Notes on the Royal Academy (1855–9 and 1875) were an important influence on public taste.

Royal Court Theatre, the, built in 1888; it has a historic association with new writing. Under the management of J. E. Vedrenne and Harley *Granville-Barker from 1904 to 1907, it staged premières by *Shaw, *Galsworthy, *Yeats, and *Masefield. But it was with the foundation of the *English Stage Company in 1956, under the direction of George Devine (1910–66), that it became a national centre of new writing. The initial intention was to encourage novelists to write for the stage but, although work by Angus *Wilson and Nigel *Dennis was presented, it was the production of *Look back in anger by Osborne (8 May 1956) that liberated other writers through its scalding rhetoric and social candour. The Court has subsequently championed many living dramatists including *Wesker, *Arden, *Bond, *Storey, *Friel, *Fugard, *Churchill, Mustapha Matura, and Timberlake *Wertenbaker as well as reviving, through the advocacy of Peter Gill, neglected masters such as D. H. *Lawrence. In the mid-1990s, under the direction of Stephen Daldry, it acquired fresh impetus through its encouragement of a new generation of socially angry, anti-materialist young writers, including Sarah *Kane and Mark Ravenhill, and its promotion of eloquent new Irish dramatists, notably Martin McDonagh and Conor McPherson.

Royal Historical Society, the, founded in 1868 and granted the title 'Royal' in 1887. Its aim is to promote the study of history by publishing documentary material and, from time to time, bibliographical and reference works; its papers are published annually as *Transactions. In 1897 the *Camden Society was amalgamated with the Royal Historical Society, which now publishes the Camden Series.

Royal Literary Fund, the, a benevolent society to aid authors and their dependants in distress, founded in 1790 as the Literary Fund Society at the instigation of the Revd David Williams, a Dissenting minister. In 1818 it was granted a royal charter, and was permitted to add 'Royal' to its title in 1845. Beneficiaries have included *Coleridge, *Peacock, *Hogg, *Clare, D. H. *Lawrence, E. *Nesbit, *Joyce, and Dylan *Thomas. It has also made grants to literary refugees, including *Chateaubriand. The Fund receives no government subsidy and depends on gifts, subscriptions, and legacies—including authors' royalties.

Royal Society, the, more correctly the Royal Society of London for the Improving of Natural Knowledge; it obtained its royal charters in 1662 and 1663. The prehistory of the Society extends back to a variety of scientific meetings held in London and Oxford from 1645 onwards. Traditionally, the originator of these meetings is identified as Theodore Haak, known also as the first to translate *Milton into German. F. *Bacon provided the major philosophical inspiration for the Society; Solomon's House in *New Atlantis has been taken as its model. No scientific society has made a more conspicuous debut—its founders and early members included *Boyle, *Hooke, *Petty, *Ray, *Wilkins, and *Wren. Among more literary figures, *Ashmole, *Aubrey, *Cowley, *Dryden, *Evelyn, and *Waller were members. The Society featured prominently in Dryden's *Annum Mirabilis. *Its Philosophical Transactions (1665–), first edited by Henry Oldenburg, is the first permanent scientific journal. Individual members of the Royal Society made an outstanding scientific contribution, but the Society itself was not entirely successful. It was attacked and ridiculed by a bizarre coalition of interests, including Henry Stubbe, S. *Butler, and *Shadwell; the latter's *The Virtuoso threatened the stature of the latitudinarian 'Christian Virtuosi' of the Society. The Society was also drawn into the ancients versus moderns controversy (see BATTLE OF THE BOOKS). In replies to attacks by the ancients, the modernism of the Society was defended by J. *Glanvill and *Sprat. The latter's *History of the Royal Society (1667) is known for its defence of the 'close, naked, natural way' of style. The Society risked degenerating into a squabbling London club. Its decline was temporarily arrested under I. *Newton. Its fortunes revived in the later 19th cent., but in the modern period the Royal Society has played a less active part in the nation's cultural life.

Royal Society of Edinburgh, the, established in 1783 for 'the cultivation of every branch of science, erudition, and taste'. The membership was originally divided into the Physical Class and a larger Literary Class, the latter including A. *Alison, *Beattie, H. *Blair, *Burke (elected 1784), A. *Carlyle, A. *Ferguson, A. *Gerard, J. *Home, *Jamieson (1803), H. *Mackenzie, T. *Reid, W. *Robertson (who was instrumental in the Society's creation), and Sir W. *Scott (elected 1800, president 1820–32). D. *Stewart was a member of the Physical Class. *Tennyson (1864) and T. *Carlyle (1866) had honorary membership. Scientific proceedings and publications have been predominant in the Society's work since the early 19th cent., but the Literary Class was revived in 1976. The Society is the successor of the Philosophical Society of Edinburgh (1737), of which *Hume was once joint secretary, and its library is the principal repository for Hume's correspondence and surviving manuscripts.

Royal Society of Literature, the, founded in 1820 at the suggestion of Thomas Burgess, bishop of St David's, and under the patronage of George IV, who assigned the sum of £1,100 guineas to be applied in pensions of 100 guineas to each of ten Royal Associates, and in a premium of 100 guineas for a prize dissertation. The Associates were elected by the council of the Society (*Malthus and S. T. *Coleridge were among the first ten). The Society published papers read to it under the title Transactions; publication was suspended during the First World War and was resumed in 1921 as a new series under the title Essays by Divers Hands. The Society has members, fellows, and, since 1961, companions; recipients of the title of companion have included *Betjeman, *Koesler, E. M. *Forster, Angus *Wilson, and many others. There is a history of the RSL by Isabel Quigly (2000).

RÓŻEWICZ, Tadeusz (1921– ), Polish poet and playwright. With his compatriots Z. *Herbert and *Miłosz he is one of the most influential writers of post-war eastern Europe. His stark, powerful poems provide an often disturbingly realistic account of his country's recent history. They Came to See a Poet was published in 1991. Much of his controversial political drama, including The Trap (1981; English trans. 1984), has also been published in English.

RUBENS, Peter Paul (1577–1640), Flemish painter, the chief northern exponent of the baroque. Studying first under Flemish masters, he went to Italy in 1600 and became court painter to the duke of Mantua. He returned to Antwerp in 1608, became court painter to the Spanish ruler of Flanders, and set up a large and productive workshop with numerous assistants. In addition he served on various diplomatic missions, visiting Spain in 1628 and England in 1629, where he was knighted and commissioned to paint the ceiling of the Banqueting House. During his visit Rubens stayed with his friend the Zeeland-born painter and architect Sir Balthazar Gerbier (1591–1667) whose children appear in his magnificent Allegory of Peace and War (1629, National Gallery, London). Rubens was a prolific and vital painter. His style was based on the great Italian masters, but in later life he painted for his own pleasure landscapes with a new feeling for the country. One of the few English writers to appreciate his full stature was G. *Eliot, who wrote from Munich (1858, in a letter), 'His are such real, breathing men and women . . . What a grand, glowing, forceful thing life looks in his pictures.'

‘Ruин, The’, a 45-line poem in Old English in the *Exeter Book, one of the group known as ‘elegies’. The poem describes the result of the devastation of a city, and it is thought likely that the reference is to the Roman city of Bath which was a ruin in Anglo-Saxon times. There are two references to hot baths in the poem, the second of them extensive. Ed. R. F. Leslie, Three Old English Elegies (1961).

‘Ruined Cottage, The’, or ‘The Story of Margaret’, a poem by Wordsworth, written in 1797, and subsequently embodied in Bk I of The Excursion.

It is a harrowing tale of misfortune befalling a cottager and his wife. The husband leaves his home and joins a troop of soldiers going to a distant land. The wife stays on, pining for his return in increasing wretchedness, until she dies and the cottage falls into ruin.

‘Ruins of Time, The’, a poem by Spenser, included in the Complaints published in 1591. It is an allegorical elegy on the death of Sir P. Sidney, which had also been the occasion of his earlier elegy Astrophel. The poet passes to a lament on the decline of patronage and neglect of literature, with allusion to his own case. The poem is dedicated to the countess of Pembroke, Sidney’s sister.

Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, a comedy by J. Fletcher, performed 1624.

Margarita, a rich heiress of Seville, plans to marry, but only in order to provide a cover for her own pleasures; she must therefore choose a husband ‘of easy faith’, who will allow her to dominate and deceive him, and serve as ‘a shadow, an umbrella, I To keep the scorching world’s opinion’ from her good name. Altea, her companion, plots to win her for her brother Leon; he assumes the character of a fool, but, once married, abandons docility, asserts his authority, and finally wins her affection.

‘Rule, Britannia’, for the words see Thomson, J. The air was composed by Arne for Thomson and Mallet’s masque Alfred.

rune, a letter or character of the earliest surviving Germanic script, most extensively used in inscriptions on wood or stone by the Scandinavians and Anglo-Saxons. The earliest runic alphabet seems to date from about the 3rd cent. AD, and is formed by modifying the letters of the Greek and Roman alphabets. Magical and mysterious powers were associated with runes from the Anglo-Saxon period, perhaps because of their employment in riddles, as in the Rune Poem, a 94-line piece illustrating the runes of the Anglo-Saxon runic alphabet, the Futhorc (see ASPR 6, 28–30 for edition). The other important occurrence of runes in Old English literature is in the runic signature to the poems of Cynewulf. See R. W. V. Elliott, Runes: An Introduction (1959).

Rupert of Hentzau, a novel by Anthony Hope (Hawkins), a sequel to The Prisoner of Zenda.

Rural Rides, a collection of essays by W. Cobbett, published 1830, which had originally appeared in the Political Register. A committee in 1821 had proposed certain remedies for the agricultural distress that followed the war. Cobbett disapproved of these and ‘made up his mind to see for himself, and to enforce, by actual observation of rural conditions, the statements he had made in answer to the arguments of the landlords before the Agricultural Committee’. The result was this series of lively, opinionated accounts of his travels on horseback between Sept. 1822 and Oct. 1826, largely in the south and east of England. (Later journeys, in the Midlands and the north, were added in subsequent editions.) He rails against tax collectors, ‘tax-eaters’, landlords, gamekeepers, stockjobbers, and excisemen, and against the monstrous swelling of the ‘Great Wen’ of London; but the whole work is also informed with his own knowledge of and love of the land in all its minutely observed variety, and he breaks occasionally into rapturous praise for a landscape, a hedgerow, a hanging wood, or, less characteristically, the ruins of Malinesbury Abbey. The standard edition is by G. D. H. and M. Cole (3 vols, 1930).

Ruritania, an imaginary kingdom in central Europe, the scene of The Prisoner of Zenda by Anthony Hope (Hawkins). The name connotes more generally a world of make-believe romance, chivalry, and intrigue.

RUSHDIE, (Ahmed) Salman, (1947— ), novelist and short story writer, born in Bombay to a Muslim family, educated at the Cathedral School, Rugby, and King’s College, Cambridge. He worked for a time in television in Pakistan, as an actor in London, and as an advertising copywriter. Rushdie’s bicultural upbringing informs all his work. He draws on the allegorical, fable-making traditions of both East and West and is often classed amongst the exponents of magic realism—the narrative style in which the realistic mingles with the fantastic and the inexplicable. His first novel, Grimus (1975), was a fantasy based on a medieval Sufi poem and was followed by Midnight’s Children (1981), the book that brought him to literary prominence and which won the Booker Prize. It tells the story of Saleem Sinai, born on the stroke of midnight on the day that India was granted independence and whose life becomes emblematic of the political and social destiny of the new nation. In Shame (1983) the subject is Pakistan, the struggle between military and civilian rule, and the culture of shame and honour which oppresses women; the historical figures wear satirical and allegorical disguise, but the narrative is interrupted by direct autobiographical interventions from the author. The Satanic Verses (1988) is a jet-propelled panoramic novel which moves with dizzying speed from the streets and film studios of Bombay to multicultural Britain, from Argentina to Mount Everest, as Rushdie questions illusion, reality, and the power of faith and tradition in a world of hijackers, religious pilgrimages and warfare, and cellular fantasy. Certain passages were interpreted by some Muslims as blasphemous and brought upon Rushdie the notorious sentence of death, or fatwa, invoked by the Ayatollah Khomeini in February 1989, which obliged him to seek police protection. Haroun and the Sea of Stories, a novel for children about a boy-hero who has to combat the enemy of storytelling, Prince Khattam-Shud, was published in 1990 (adapted for the stage at the *National Theatre, 1998), and Imaginary Homelands, a collection of critical journalism and interviews, in 1991. In 1994 Rushdie published his first collection of short stories, East, West, which, written on the cultural cusp between two traditions, also confronts the conflicting claims of the real and the imagined. The Moor's Last Sigh (1995) is a dense and exuberant study of cultural and personal inheritance narrated in the first person by Moraes Zogoiby—the 'Moor' of the title—who ages at twice the normal rate.

RUSKIN, John (1819–1900). The only child of John James and Margaret Ruskin, he grew up in Surrey. His father paid off family debts and built up the wine business of which he was a founding partner; he was able to pass on to his son a large fortune, of which Ruskin gave much away. To his parents Ruskin also owed a reliance on the Bible, a strong affection for romantic literature, stern political views, and an early attraction to contemporary landscape painting. Much of his schooling was given at home, and from 1836 to 1842 he was at Christ Church, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate Prize but did not find the curriculum profitable. Travel was a more important part of his education. The family took regular tours through the picturesque areas of Britain, and, from 1833, on the Continent. These helped fix Ruskin's lifelong preference for French cathedral towns, the Alps, and certain cities of northern Italy, and gave scope to what he spoke of as his main passion, the study of the facts of nature. Among his earliest publications were essays in London's Magazine of Natural History (1834 and 1836). Others were The Poetry of Architecture (Architectural Magazine, 1837–8) and numerous Byronesque poems and stories written for Christmas annuals. He contributed regularly from 1835 to 1846, mainly to Friendship's Offering, whose editor, W. H. Harrison, acted as his personal literary adviser. He also devoted time to drawing; he admired the work of Copley Fielding, J. D. Harding, Clarkson Stanfield, James Holland, David Roberts, Samuel Prout, and, above all, *Turner. He took lessons from two of these artists (Fielding and Harding), made friends of several, and bought the work of all. With the first of the five volumes of *Modern Painters (1843) he became their public champion.

Seven months' work in Italy in preparation for Modern Painters II (1846) confirmed Ruskin in his 'function as interpreter'. They also compelled him to write of the medieval buildings of Europe before they should be destroyed by neglect, restoration, industrialization, and revolutions. He postponed further enquiry into natural beauty and its representation: Modern Painters III and IV did not appear until 1856. The interval produced The Seven Lamps of Architecture (1849) and *The Stones of Venice (1851–3), both written during the period of his marriage to Euphemia Chalmers Gray, for whom the lastingly popular The King of the Golden River had been a gift (written 1841, published 1851). In 1854, after seven years of marriage, she divorced him on grounds of impotence, and soon afterwards married *Millais. Ruskin had defended Millais and the *Pre-Raphaelites in letters to *The Times and the pamphlet Pre-Raphaelitism (1851). He continued to notice their work in Notes on the Royal Academy (1855–9 and 1875), guides intended to influence public taste and to intervene in the production and distribution of a national art.

Ruskin wrote for the Arundel Society (Giotto and His Works in Padua, 1853–4, 1866), taught at the Working Men's College in Red Lion Square, produced drawing manuals, helped with plans for the Oxford Museum of Natural History building, arranged for the National Gallery the drawings of the Turner bequest, tried to guide the work of individual artists (D. G. *Rossetti, J. Inchbold, J. W. Brett), gave evidence before parliamentary committees, and lectured extensively throughout the country. Some of these addresses appeared in Lectures on Architecture and Painting (1854) and The Two Paths (1859). But Ruskin's was a critical, not a collaborative intervention, and his judgements often offended. Speaking in Manchester on *The Political Economy of Art (1857), Ruskin challenged economic laws affecting matters in which he had a standing. In the final volume of Modern Painters (1860) he denounced greed as the deadly principle guiding English life. In attacking the 'pseudo-science' of J. S. *Mill and *Ricardo in Unto this Last (1860) and Essays on Political Economy (1862–3; later Munera Pulveris, 1872), Ruskin entered new territory and declared open warfare against the spirit and science of his times.

This fight, against competition and self-interest, for the recovery of heroic, feudal, and Christian social ideals was to occupy Ruskin for the rest of his life. It is expressed in considerations of engraving or Greek myth (The Cestus of Aglaia, 1865–6; The Queen of the Air, 1869), geology lectures for children (The Ethics of the Dust, 1866), as essays on the respective duties of men and women (Sesame and Lilies, 1865, 1871), lectures on war, work, and trade (The Crown of Wild Olives, 1866, 1873), or letters to a workman (Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne, 1867). The letter was a favourite mode with Ruskin. In *Fors Clavigera (1871–8) he found a serial form well suited to his public teaching and to the diversity of his interests, which also expressed themselves during the 1870s and 1880s in a multitude of writings on natural history, travel, painting, etc., and in practical projects, many associated with the Guild of St George, a utopian society founded by Ruskin under his own mastership in 1871.

In 1870 Ruskin was elected first Slade professor of art at Oxford. He started a drawing school, arranged art collections of his own gift, and drew crowds to his eleven courses of lectures. Seven volumes of them were published shortly after delivery: Lectures on Art (1870), Aratra Pentelicci, The Relation between Michael Angelo wrote nothing and spoke rarely, but was cared for by a girl, was 11 years old when Ruskin came across her in 1858. 18 girls were the objects of his affection. Rose, an Anglo-Irish evangelical religious views, her parents were also opposed, and she died, mad, in 1875. Four years later Ruskin himself went through the first of a series of delirious illnesses. He often wrote for her and, indirectly, of her, in later life, and in Praeterita, the autobiography on which he worked sporadically between 1885 and 1889, he would have spoken of her directly; but he did not complete it. After 1889 Ruskin wrote nothing and spoke rarely, but was cared for by his cousin, Joan Severn, at his house on Coniston Water.

RUSSELL, Bertrand Arthur William, third Earl Russell (1872–1970), educated privately and at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He wrote voluminously on philosophy, logic, education, economics, and politics, and throughout his life was the champion of advanced political and social causes. While much of his writing was relatively practical and ephemeral in intent, and successfully aimed at a wide audience, he also contributed work of lasting importance in some of the most technical fields of philosophy and logic. He was the inventor of the Theory of Descriptions, The Principles of Mathematics (1903) and Principia Mathematica (the latter in collaboration with A. N. *Whitehead, 1910) quickly became classics of mathematical logic. Other important philosophical works include The Analysis of Mind (1921), An Inquiry into Meaning and Truth (1940), and Human Knowledge, Its Scope and Limits (1948). Russell was awarded the *Nobel Prize for literature in 1950. For an account of his relationships with Ottoline *Morrell, D. H. *Lawrence, G. *Murray, G. E. *Moore, *Wittgenstein, and many other figures in the literary and intellectual world, see a life by R. W. Clark (1975).

RUSSELL, George William (/E) (1867–1935), born in Ireland. He became an art student in Dublin, and in 1894 published Homeward, his first volume of mystical verses, with the encouragement of *Yeats. His poetic drama Deirdre was performed in 1902 at the Irish National Theatre (later the * Abbey), which he helped to found. From 1905 to 1923 he edited The Irish Home­ stead, a journal which encouraged interest in Irish crafts, arts, writing, agriculture, and home economics, and achieved large sales in Ireland and the USA; meanwhile he continued to publish poetry, including The Divine Vision (1904), Gods of War (1915), The Interpreters (1922), and Midsummer Eve (1928). From 1923 until 1930 he edited the Irish Statesman, a literary and political journal supporting the Free State. The Avatars, a fantasy of the future, aroused much interest in 1933. In 1934 he published an ambitious poem of Celtic mythology, The House of the Titans, and in 1935 his Selected Poems. He published many political essays, and did much to support young Irish writers, such as *Colum and *Stephens. His pseudonym ‘/E’ was a contraction of the word ‘Æon’, which he had once used as a signature. See H. Summerfield, That Myriad-Minded Man (1975).

RUSSELL, Lord John, First Earl Russell: see Reform Bills.

Russell, Lady, a character in J. Austen’s *Persuasion.

Ruth, a novel by Mrs *Gaskell, published 1853.

Ruth Hilton, a 15-year-old orphan apprenticed to a dressmaker, is seduced and then deserted by the wealthy young Henry Bellingham. She is rescued from suicide by Thurston Benson, a Dissenting minister, who with the connivance of his sister and of his outspoken old servant Sally takes her into his own house under an assumed name as a widow. She bears Bellingham’s son, and is redeemed by her love for her child and by the guidance of Benson. Later she is employed as a governess in the family of the tyrannical and pharisaical Mr Bradshaw, where she is discovered by Bellingham, whose offer of marriage she rejects. Bradshaw, learning the truth about her past, brutally dismisses her and quarrels with Benson. Ruth regains esteem by becoming a heroic hospital nurse during a cholera epidemic, and dies after nursing Bellingham to recovery. Mrs Gaskell’s purpose in this novel was to arouse more sympathy for ‘fallen women’ who had been unprotected victims of seduction, but she shocked many contemporary readers.

RUTHERFORD, Mark, see WHITE, W. H.

Ruthwell Cross, a stone monument in the parish church at Ruthwell, Dumfriesshire, dating perhaps from the 8th cent., on which are inscribed in *runes some alliterating phrases closely corresponding to parts of the Old English poem *Dream of the Rood. It was thrown down by the Presbyterians in 1642 and the inscriptions partly effaced. See The Dream of the Rood, ed. B. Dickins and A. S. C. Ross (1934), 1–13; J. L. Dinwiddie, The Ruthwell Cross and Its Story (1927).

Ryence, Rion, Rience, or Royns, King, a British or Celtic king (usually of Ireland but of north Wales in Malory) who sent an arrogant message to Arthur demanding his beard to make up a set of 12 taken from his vanquished enemies. He was overcome and taken prisoner by Balyn and Balan who delivered him to Arthur’s court (in the first of Vinaver’s eight Works of Malory). He is usually represented as a pagan giant, the same as the ‘Ritho’ mentioned by Geoffrey of Monmouth and Wace as a challenger of Arthur.

RYLE, Gilbert (1900–76), educated at Brighton College and The Queen’s College, Oxford; Waynflete professor of metaphysical philosophy in the University of Oxford (1945–68). The author of numerous articles on a wide variety of philosophical topics, he is best known for his attack on the traditional metaphysical dualism of mind and body, which he calls the ‘dogma of the ghost in the machine’. His best-known book is The Concept of Mind (1949). A general account of his view of philosophical problems is contained in Dilemmas (1954).

RYMAN, Geoff (1951– ), Canadian-born novelist, based in London since 1973. Having won awards for his science fiction, which includes The Unconquered Country (1986) and The Child Garden (1989), Ryman moved towards slightly more realistic territory with Was (1992), a novel about Dorothy from The Wizard of Oz. 253 (1996) was published initially on the Internet and later in a very successful ‘print remix’. Set on London Underground’s Bakerloo line between Embankment and Elephant & Castle on a particular day in 1995, 253 consists of character sketches (each 253 words long) of the 253 passengers there would be on a such a train if every seat were taken. See INTERACTIVE FICTION.

RYMER, Thomas (1641–1713), educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, chiefly remembered for his valuable collection of historical records, Foedera (1704–35). He wrote a play in rhymed verse, Edgar, or The English Monarch (1678, unperformed), but is better known as a critic of considerable learning but dogmatic views, who supported the ancients in the battle between them and the moderns (see BATTLE OF THE BOOKS, THE) and upheld French neo-classical principles. The Tragedies of the Last Age Considered (1678) was a critical attack on Elizabethan drama, continued in his A Short View of Tragedy (1692) which contains his famous condemnation of Othello as ‘a bloody farce’.

RYSBRACK, Michael (1694–1770), Flemish sculptor, trained in Antwerp, who settled in England; the classicism of his style made him popular with the virtuosi in the circle of Lord Burlington. Rysbrack’s Roman reliefs in the chimney-pieces at Houghton (Norfolk) and Clandon Park (Surrey) satisfied the taste of an era formed by the writings of Shaftesbury, and his bust of Daniel Finch, earl of Nottingham (1723), introduced the fashion for the portrait bust into English sculpture. Pope (of whom he made an idealized bust, 1730) collaborated with him on some of his monuments in Westminster Abbey, where his most famous work is the monument to Sir I. *Newton; his contributions to *Poets’ Corner include memorials to Jonson (c.1737), Gay (1736), Prior, and N. Rowe The national pride that inspired Poets’ Corner found striking expression in the cult of British Worthies; William Kent’s Temple of British Worthies (1733) at Stowe is decorated with many busts by Rysbrack.
SABA, Umberto (1883–1957), Italian poet. Born Umberto Poli in Trieste of a Jewish mother, he adopted the name Saba from his nurse, his father having deserted him before his birth. He draws on different strands of Italian literary tradition, *Petrarch, *Pascoli, *d’Annunzio, and from Freudian ideas; but on the surface he remains a simple poet of nature and domestic affections. His main poems are in his Canzoniere, of which there are three different collections (1921, 1945, 1948). He has been translated by R. *Lowell.

Sabrina, a poetic name for the river Severn (see under Estrildis). In Milton’s *Comus, Sabrina is the goddess of the Severn.

Miss Sabrina is the new schoolmistress in Galt’s *Annals of the Parish. ‘Old Mr Hookie, her father, had, from the time he read his Virgil, maintained a sort of intromission with the Nine Muses, by which he was led to baptize her Sabrina, after a name mentioned by John Milton in one of his works.’

Sacharissa, see Waller.

SACHS, Hans (1494–1576), shoemaker of Nuremberg, and author of a vast quantity of verse, including meistersongs and some 200 plays. He was raised to mythic status by *Wagner in his opera Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1868).

SACKS, Oliver (1933– ), London-born neurologist and writer, educated at St Paul’s School, the Queen’s College, Oxford, and Middlesex Hospital; he has worked for many years as clinician and instructor in New York. *Awakenings (1973, the source of A Kind of Alaska by *Pinter) is a description, with vividly written case histories, of the reactions of post-encephalitic ‘sleeping-sickness’ patients of the 1916–17 epidemic to the new drug L-DOPA. Other works include Seeing Voices (1989), An Anthropologist on Mars (1995), and The Island of the Colour-Blind and Cycad Island (1996). *The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat was adapted by Peter *Brook as L’Homme qui (Paris, 1993: UK, The Man Who, 1994).

SACKVILLE, Charles, Lord Buckhurst, and later sixth earl of Dorset (1638–1706), a favourite of Charles II and noted for dissipation, who later became a loyal supporter of William III. He was a friend and patron of poets, was praised as a poet by *Prior and *Dryden, and has been identified with the Eugenius of the latter’s *Of Dramatick Poesy. His poems, which appeared with those of *Sedley in 1701, include some biting satires and the ballad ‘To all you Ladies now at Land’.

SACKVILLE, Thomas, first earl of Dorset and Baron Buckhurst (1536–1608), son of Sir Richard Sackville. He was probably educated at Oxford. He was a barrister of the Inner Temple. He entered Parliament in 1558, was raised to the peerage in 1567, and held a number of high official positions, including those of lord treasurer and chancellor of Oxford University. He wrote the induction and *The Complaint of Buckingham for *A Mirror for Magistrates, and collaborated (probably writing only the last two acts) with Thomas Norton in the tragedy of *Gorboduc. He was an ancestor of V. *Sackville-West and is discussed in her Knole and the Sackvilles (1922).

SACKVILLE-WEST, Hon. Victoria Mary (‘Vita’), CH (1892–1962), poet and novelist. She was born at Knole, Kent, about which she wrote Knole and the Sackvilles (1922) and which provided the setting for her novel The Edwardians (1930). In 1913 she married Harold *Nicolson, with whom she travelled widely during his diplomatic career before settling at Sissinghurst, Kent, where she devoted much time to gardening. In 1922 she met Virginia *Woolf, whose Orlando (1928) was inspired by their close friendship. Her other works include a pastoral poem, The Land (1926, Hawthordon Prize), *All Passion Spent (1931, novel), Collected Poems (1933), and many works on travel, gardening, and literary topics. Her unorthodox marriage was described by her son Nigel Nicolson in Portrait of a Marriage (1973). A biography by Victoria *Glendinning was published in 1983.

Sacripant, (1) in *Orlando innamorato and *Orlando furioso, the king of Circassia and a lover of *Angelica. He catches *Rinaldo’s horse *Bayard, and rides away on it, and Rinaldo calls him a horse-thief; (2) in Tassoni’s Seccia rapita (The Rape of the Bucket), a hectoring braggart; (3) Sacripant, a magician in Peel’s *The Old Wives Tale. In modern French sacrïpant is a rascal or blackguard.

SADE, Donatien Alphonse, comte, known as marquis de (1740–1814), French novelist and pornographer. His career as a cavalry officer was destroyed by the disorder of his life. During prolonged periods of imprisonment he wrote a number of pornographic novels, including Justine ou les malheurs de la vertu (1791), La Philosophie dans le boudoir (1795), and Nouvelle Justine (1797). Their obsession with the minutiae of sexual pathology and their extreme hedonistic nihilism have been seen to anticipate *Nietzsche, *Freud and *Foucault. Long censored in Britian, but now readily available, they have had a considerable influence on English literature, inspiring imitation and parody from writers as diverse as *Swinburne, Angrus *Wilson, and A. *Carter. De Sade's period of imprisonment at the mental hospital of Charenton (where he died) was the basis of *Weiss's play, commonly known as the 'Marat/Sade' (1964), which, through Peter *Brook's production, had a powerful impact on British theatre. There is a life of de Sade by Maurice Lever (1991, trans. 1993).

SA'DÍ (d. ?1292), a celebrated Persian poet, whose principal works were the collections of verse known as the 'Gulistan' or Rose Garden, and the 'Bustan' or Tree Garden.

SA'DLEIR (formerly Sadler), Michael (1888–1957), bibliographer and novelist, educated at Rugby and Balliol College, Oxford. He joined the publishing house of Constable of which he became director in 1920. He amassed an outstanding collection of 19th-cent. books, often of less-known authors, and wrote important bibliographical works, including Excursions in Victorian Bibliography (1922) and Nineteenth Century Fiction (2 vols, 1951). His best-known novel, Fanny by Gaslight (1940), has been made into a film.

Sad Shepherd, The, or A Tale of Robin Hood, the last and unfinished play of *Jonson, a pastoral tragi-comedy written c.1635, printed 1641.

Robin Hood invites the shepherds and shepherdesses of the Vale of Belvoir to a feast in Sherwood Forest, but the feast is marred by the arts of the witch Maudlin, aided by her familiar, Puck-Hairy. Aeglamour, the Sad Shepherd, relates the loss of his beloved Earine, whom he believes drowned in the Trent. In reality Maudlin has stripped her of her garments to adorn her daughter and shut her up in an oak as a prey for her son, the uncouth swineherd Lorel. The witch assumes the form of Maid Marian, sends away the venison prepared for the feast, abuses Robin Hood, and throws his guests into confusion. Lorel tries to win Earine but fails. The wiles of Maudlin are detected, and Robin's huntsmen pursue her. Only the first three acts of the play exist; there are continuations by Francis Waldron (1783) and Alan Porter (1935).

saga is an Old Norse word meaning 'story', applied to narrative compositions from Iceland and Norway in the Middle Ages. There are three main types of saga: family sagas, dealing with the first settlers of Iceland and their descendants; kings' sagas, historical works about the kings of Norway; and legendary or heroic sagas, fantastic adventure stories about legendary heroes. The family sagas and the kings' sagas share an elegant, laconic style, notable for its air of detached objectivity. This led early scholars to suppose that the family sagas were reliably historical, being based almost wholly on oral traditions from an earlier period; but modern critics see these works as literary fictions with some historical basis. The most celebrated of the family sagas is Njáls saga, a long but tightly structured narrative about Gunnarr, a brave and worthy man who marries the beautiful but morally flawed Hallgerr; she sets in motion a series of feuds which culminates first in her husband's heroic last stand and death, and then in the burning of Gunnarr's friend Njall, a wise and peaceable lawyer who accepts his fate with Christian resignation. The main concerns of the saga (the growth of social stability, legal and political, among the settlers of a new community, and the part played by human emotions, especially rivalry, loyalty, and sexual jealousy, in the course of this development) are characteristic of the other family sagas too, though Njáls saga stands out because of its scope and breadth of characterization. Eyrbyggja saga is especially concerned with the emergence of a politically stable community, though it also recounts some bizarre supernatural incidents. Laxdaela saga deals with the theme of a tragic love triangle and the fortunes of one of Iceland's most powerful families at that time. Grettis saga tells, with remarkable psychological depth and subtlety, the story of a famous Icelandic outlaw; Grettir's fights with the monstrous walking corpse Glámr and with a troll woman are analogous to Beowulf's fight with Grendel and Grendel's mother (see Beowulf). Snorri Sturluson's Heimskringla comprises a history of the kings of Norway; Volsungasaga recounts the legends of the Goths and Burgundians which underlie Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen cycle. Sturlunga saga is unique in being a compilation of sagas about figures almost contemporary with their 13th-cent. authors. W. *Morris did much to popularize Icelandic literature in England. (See Sigurd the Volsung.)

SAID, Edward (1935— ), Palestinian critic, born in Jerusalem, and educated at Victoria College, Cairo, then at Princeton and Harvard. Since 1963 he has taught at Columbia University, New York. His works of general literary theory, Beginnings (1975) and The World, the Text and the Critic (1983), show the influence of Foucault. His most influential book, Orientalism (1978), shows how Western 'experts' have constructed a myth of the 'Orient'; it is a founding text of modern post-colonial theory, complemented by the essays collected in Culture and Imperialism (1993). His other roles have been as a music critic and a public defender of the Palestinian cause.

STAUBIN DE TERÁN, Lisa (1953— ), novelist, born in south London. Her father is Guyanese writer Jan Carew (1925— ). She married a Venezuelan landowner when she was 16, and her travels and experiences are reflected in Keepers of the House (1982), a chronicle which tells the dramatic story of the decline of the Beltrán family, its feuds, its tragedies, its interbreeding, and its decaying elegance, from the days of Columbus. through to the 1970s. This oral history is conveyed through the persona of English bride Lydia, married to Diego Beltrán. The vast plantation of sugar and avocado recurs again and again in St Aubin de Terán’s works: the exiled Venezuelan husband Cesar in The Slow Train to Milan (1983) harks back to it in memory, though this novel is set in Europe (London, Oxford, Paris, Milan, Bologna) and evokes a life of a group of wandering exiles with a passion for ‘the extravagance of clothes’ and ‘the comfort of travel’.

The spirited first-person narration is by child-bride Lizaveta, herself the descendant of a highly eccentric family, and it brilliantly and wittily combines elements of the ‘road’ novels of the Beat Generation with South American magic realism and a tragicomic sense of the heroic futility of political struggle. The Tiger (1984) returns to the history of a plantation in the Andes from Armistice Day, 1918, when it was dominated by a ferocious German-born tyrant from Tilsit: her grandson Lucien inherits, lives the high life for a short time in Caracas, and is condemned as a traitor to 25 years of brutal incarceration. Later works include The Bay of Silence (1986), Black Idol (1987), Joanna (1990), and short stories, The Marble Mountain (1988); Off the Rails: Memoirs of a Train Addict (1989) is ostensibly a memoir, returning to the erotic obsession with trains, but in her work fact, fantasy, and myth are deliberately entangled, and it is not always easy to tell where memoir ends and fiction begins. The Hacienda: My Venezuelan Years (1997) is a memoir.

ST AUBYN, Edward (1960–), novelist, author of a trilogy of short novels Never Mind (1992), Bad News (1992), and Some Hope (1994); the first describes with horrific conviction the indulged but appalling childhood of Patrick Melrose, sexually abused by his father on holiday in the south of France in the 1960s, and the two later volumes follow Patrick to New York (where his father lies dead in a funeral parlour) and back to London, as he struggles to cope with his drug addiction and his terrible paternal legacy. Sharp, understated, and stylish, they counteract the baroque nature of much Chemical Generation writing. On the Edge (1998) is a journey through the New Age cults of the 1990s, from Findhorn to California, and follows with some unease the spiritual and sexual quests of several pilgrims, including a drop-out English banker.

ST JOHN, Henry, see Bolingbroke, H. St J.

ST PATRICK’S DAY, a play in two acts by R. B. *Sheridan, produced 1785.

In this brief skit a wily lieutenant, in love with the daughter of a justice, impersonates a German quack and, when the justice is convinced he is poisoned, extracts the promise of the daughter’s hand, as the price for a cure.
Vested in scientists and artists in order to secure the women. The association was declared illegal in 1832.

SAINT-PIERRE, Jacques-Henri Bernardin de, see Bernardin de Saint-Pierre.

St Ronan’s Well, a novel by Sir W. *Scott, published 1823.

The novel, one of only two set within Scott’s lifetime, is the only one in which he attempts contemporary social satire. St Ronan’s Well is a tawdry, third-rate spa, inhabited by meretricious, pretentious characters. Against this background, he sets the melodrama of two half-brothers, sons of the late earl of Etherington, both of whom are involved with Clara Mowbray, daughter of the local laird. The younger son impersonates the elder, Francis, at a midnight marriage with Clara, who is thus married to a man she detests, and the novel ends in unrelieved tragedy.

SAINTSBURY, George Edward Bateman (1845–1933), critic and journalist, educated at King’s College School, London, and Merton College, Oxford. He contributed numerous articles to the Fortnightly Review, Pall Mall Gazette, and other journals. He was an industrious journalist for the Daily News and the Manchester Guardian, and was introduced by his friend Lang to the Saturday Review, of which he became assistant editor (1883–94). His first book, A Primer of French Literature, was published in 1880, and thereafter he published voluminously. In 1895 he was appointed to the chair of rhetoric and English literature at Edinburgh, which he held for 20 years, during which he published some of his largest works, including A History of Nineteenth Century Literature (1896), The History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe (1900–4), A History of English Prosody (1906–10), and books on Sir Walter Scott (1897) and Matthew Arnold (1898). Saintsbury was a connoisseur of wine and the success of his Notes on a Cellarbook (1920) led to the founding of the Saintsbury Club.

SAINT-SIMON, Louis de Rouvroy, duc de (1675–1755), French chronicler and memorialist. After a period of reluctant army service, he sought advancement at court until 1723, when the death of his patron, the duc d’Orléans, put an end to his participation in public affairs. His great work, the Mémoires (first authentic edition in 21 vols, 1829–30), composed during the 20 years of his retirement, offers an incomparable record of life at court in the latter part of Louis XIV’s reign. The verve of his writing, the liveliness of his observation, and the penetration of his portraits have made this work a classic of the genre. It was among Proust’s favourite reading. A new translation in three volumes by Lucy Norton was published 1967–72.

SAKI, pseudonym of Hector Hugh Munro (1870–1916), known principally for his short stories; he was born in Burma, the youngest of three children: his mother died when he was an infant, and he was brought up in north Devon by two aunts. In 1893 he joined the military police in Burma, but was invalided home and went to London to earn his living as a writer. In 1899 he published The Rise of the Russian Empire, in 1900 wrote political satire for the Westminster Gazette, and between 1902 and 1908 was correspondent for the Morning Post in Poland, Russia, and Paris. His first characteristic volume of short stories, Reginald, was published under the pseudonym Saki (of uncertain origin) in 1904, followed by Reginald in Russia (1910), The Chronicles of Clovis (1911), Beasts and Super-Beasts (1914), The Toys of Peace (1919), and The Square Egg (1924). The Unbearable Bassington (1912) and When William Came (1913) are both novels. In 1914 he enlisted as a trooper and he was killed in France, shot through the head while resting in a shallow crater. His stories include the satiric, the comic, the macabre, and the supernatural, and show a marked interest in the use of animals—wolves, tigers, bulls, ferrets, cats—as agents of revenge upon mankind.

SALA, George Augustus (1828–96), journalist and illustrator. He began his literary career as editor of Chat in 1848, and became a regular contributor to Household Words (1851–6); he was sent by *Dickens to Russia as correspondent at the end of the Crimean War and subsequently wrote for the Daily Telegraph. He published books of travel and novels.

SALADIN (Salah-ed-Din Yusuf ibn Ayub) (c.1138–93), a Kurd who was the founder of the Ayyubid dynasty in Egypt. He was established as caliph there in 1171, and he took possession of southern Syria and Damascus on the death of Nur-ed-Din in 1174. After defeat by the Christians in 1177, he made further advances and he defeated their forces led by Guy de Lusignan at the battle of Tiberias on 4 July 1187. He then besieged and captured Acre and Jerusalem (Oct. 1187). After several defeats by the forces of the Third Crusade led by Richard I, Cœur de Lion, he made a truce with them in 1192 which allowed Henry of Champagne, titular king of Jerusalem, a strip of coastal land around Acre and access to Jerusalem itself. But the progress made by his conquests remained considerable at his death in 1193. Largely because of his clemency towards the defeated Christian forces after Tiberias, he is traditionally represented as chivalrous, loyal, and magnanimous: by Boccaccio who represents him thus in two stories in the Decameron (Day 1, Tale 3; Day 10, Tale 9); by Dante who places him in the limbo of heroes (Inferno, iv. 129); and by English writers such as Scott in The Talisman. See H. A. R. Gibb, Studies on the Civilisation of Islam (1962), 91–107.

Salerio and Solanio, two (or possibly three, if ‘Salarino’ is distinct from Salerio) friends of Antonio and Bassanio in Shakespeare’s The Merchant of Venice.

Salinguer, Jerome D(avid) (1919– ), American novelist and short story writer, born in New York. He served with the 4th Infantry Division in the Second World War and was stationed at Tiverton, Devon, in Mar. 1944, an experience which inspired his story ‘For Esme with Love and Squalor’. He is best known for his novel The Catcher in the Rye (1951), the story of adolescent Holden Caulfield who runs away from boarding school in Pennsylvania to New York, where he preserves his innocence despite various attempts to lose it. The colloquial, lively, first-person narration, with its attacks on the ‘phoniness’ of the adult world and its clinging to family sentiment in the form of Holden’s affection for his sister Phoebe, made the novel accessible to and popular with a wide readership, and was followed by Franny and Zooey (1961), Raise High the Roof Beam, Carpenters, and Seymour: An Introduction (published together, 1963), containing stories reprinted from the New Yorker. A notably reclusive character, he was the subject of a biographical exercise by Ian Hamilton (1988).

Salkey, Andrew (1928–95), Caribbean poet, short story writer, editor and broadcaster, born in Colón, Panama, of Jamaican parents, and educated in Jamaica and at London University. He was an active figure in the promotion of Caribbean culture in Britain and abroad: his later years were spent teaching at Amherst, Massachusetts. His novels include Escape to an Autumn Pavement (1960) and A Quality of Violence (1978). His many publications include stories and fables for younger readers, such as Anancy’s Score (1973), which takes its name from the Jamaican folk-trickster hero spiderman Anancy. Havana Journal is a portrait of Cuba, and Georgetown Journal (1972) describes a visit to Guyana on the occasion of its independence celebrations in 1970.

Sallustius Crispus (86–35 BC), Roman historian whose surviving works are two monographs Bellum Catilinae (The Conspiracy of Catiline), a major source of Jonson’s Catiline, and Bellum Iugurthinum (The War against Jugurtha). He was popular in the Middle Ages, and his practice of including speeches, gnomic sayings, and character sketches in his narrative was copied by William of Poitiers, the historian of the Norman Conquest, and by the 12th-cent. William of Malmesbury. The Jugurtha was translated by A. Barclay early in the 16th cent., and T. Heywood translated both monographs (1668). Sallust’s condemnations of corruption were much savoured in the 18th cent. by the architects of the American Revolution.

‘Sally in Our Alley’, a ballad by H. Carey.

Salmusius, professional name of Claude de Sau­­maise (1588–1653), an eminent French scholar, professor at Leiden University in 1649 when Charles II was living at The Hague. At the age of 19 he discovered the Palatine library at Heidelberg and unearthed the 10th-cent. Palatine Anthology (The Greek Anthology). He was commissioned by Charles to draw up a defence of his father and an indictment of the regicide government. This took the form of the Latin Defensio Regia which reached England by the end of 1649. Milton was ordered by the Council in 1650 to prepare a reply to it, and in 1651 issued his Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, also in Latin, a work which brought him an international reputation and attracted great attention, much of it hostile. It is a repetitious and tedious work, a mixture of scholarship and scurrilous invective, but Milton himself was well satisfied with it. Salmusius rejoined in his Responsio, which similarly contains much personal abuse, published posthumously in 1660. Hobbes in his Behemoth said he found the two Defensiones ‘very good Latin both . . . and both very ill reasoning’.

Salome, a play by O. Wilde, which later formed the basis for the libretto of an opera by R. Strauss.

Saltykov-Shchedrin, N. (Mikhail Evgrafovich) (1826–89), Russian satirical writer and polemical journalist. Born in a merchant family near Tver, he was educated at Tsarskoe Selo, outside St Petersburg, and worked in government service while writing reviews for major journals and moving in circles interested in utopian socialism. After serving as vice-governor of provincial towns, he was retired in 1868 and devoted himself to literature, working first for the Contemporary and then for Notes of the Fatherland, eventually as editor. His novels often developed from journalistic sketches. With the passage of time he became increasingly radical and in 1884 Notes of the Fatherland was closed. Turgenev (with uncharacteristic exaggeration) called him the Russian Swift. Saltykov-Shchedrin’s major works are The Story of a Town (1869–70; English trans. 1980), The Golovlev Family (1875–80; trans. 1931), and the semi-autobiographical Old Times in Poshekhsin (1887–9). Samson Agonistes, a tragedy by *Milton, published 1671, in the same volume as Paradise Regained. Its composition was traditionally assigned to 1666–70, but W. R. Parker in his biography (1968) argues that it was written much earlier, possibly as early as 1647. A closet drama never intended for the stage, it is modelled on Greek tragedy, and has been frequently compared to Prometheus Bound by Aeschylus or Oedipus at Colonus by *Sophocles; other critics have claimed that its spirit is more Hebraic (or indeed Christian) than Hellenic. Predominantly in blank verse, it also contains passages of great metrical freedom and originality, and some rhyme. Samson Agonistes (i.e. Samson the Wrestler, or Champion) deals with the last phase of the life of the Samson of the Book of Judges when he is a prisoner of the Philistines and blind, a phase which many have compared to the assumed circumstances of the blind poet himself, after the collapse of the Commonwealth and his political hopes.

Samson, in prison at Gaza, is visited by friends of his tribe (the chorus) who comfort him; then by his old father Manoa, who holds out hopes of securing his release; then by his wife *Dalila, who seeks pardon and reconciliation, but being repudiated shows herself ‘a manifest Serpent’; then by Harapha, a strong man of Gath, who taunts Samson. He is finally summoned to provide amusement by feats of strength for the Philistines, who are celebrating a feast to Dagon. He goes, and presently a messenger brings news of his flight. The tragedy, which has many passages questioning divine providence (‘just or unjust, alike seem miserable’), ends with the chorus’s conclusion that despite human hopes, Just or unjust, alike seem miserable, “One cannot help but believe the last words, ‘calm of mind all their unpleasant consequences, and attempts to curb his master’s enthusiasms by his shrewd common sense.

Sancho Panza, the squire of *Don Quixote, who accompanies him in his adventures, shares many of their unpleasant consequences, and attempts to curb his master’s enthusiasms by his shrewd common sense.

SAND, George, pseudonym of Aurore Dupin, Baronne Dudevant (1804–76), French novelist. After separating from her husband, the Baron Dudevant, a retired army officer, she went to Paris in 1831 to begin an independent life as a writer. Her fame now largely derives from two groups of novels, of the many that she wrote in a long career. The first, a series of romantic tales, portrayed the struggles of the individual woman against social constraints, especially those of marriage, e.g. Indiana (1832), Lelia (1833), Jacques (1834). The simple, artfully told idylls of rustic life that compose the second group are set in the region of Berry, where she had a country property at Nohant, and include La Mare au diable (1846), La Petite Fadette (1848), and François le champi (1850). Elle et lui (1859) fictionalizes her liaison with Alfred de Musset; Un hiver à Majorque (1841) describes an episode in her long relationship with Chopin. Histoire de ma vie (4 vols, 1854–5) is an autobiography.

SANDBURG, Carl August (1878–1967), American poet, born in Chicago of Swedish Lutheran immigrant stock. He challenged contemporary taste by his use of colloquialism and free verse, and became the principal among the authors writing in Chicago during and after the First World War. He published Chicago Poems (1916), Cornhuskers (1918), Smoke and Steel (1920), Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1922), Good Morning America (1928), and Complete Poems (1950). He also compiled a collection of folk songs, The American Songbag (1927), and wrote stories and poems for children. His major prose work is his monumental life of Abraham Lincoln (6 vols, 1926–39); his novel Remembrance Rock (1948) is on an epic scale and traces the growth of an American family from its English origins and its crossing on the Mayflower to the present day. Always the Young Strangers (1953) is a volume of autobiography.

SANDFORD, Jeremy (1930– ), television playwright, born in London, remembered for his powerful BBC television drama Cathy Come Home (1966), directed by Ken Loach, which focused attention on the plight of a young family trapped in a downward spiral of poverty and homelessness. It was one of the landmarks of the socially committed drama documentary of the 1960s. This was followed by Edna the Inebriate Woman (1971, BBC), directed by Ted Kotcheff, a sympathetic portrayal of an elderly ‘bag lady’.

Sanditon, an unfinished novel by J. *Austen, written 1817.

Mr Parker is obsessed with the wish to create a large and fashionable resort out of the small village of Sanditon, on the south coast. His unquenchable enthusiasm sees crescents and terraces, a hotel and a library, and bathing machines. Charlotte Heywood, an attractive, alert young woman, is invited to stay with the Parkers, where she catches the fancy of Lady Denham, the local great lady. Lady Denham’s nephew and niece, Sir Edward and Miss Denham, live nearby, and the second heroine of the novel, Clara Brereton, is staying with her. Edward plans (with a frankness of expression new to the author) to seduce Clara; but his aunt intends him to marry a West Indian heiress, under the care of a Mrs Griffiths and her entourage, whose visit to Sanditon is anticipated shortly. After a ludicrous series of complications, involving both Mrs Griffiths’s party and a ladies’ seminary from Camberwell, the excited inhabitants of Sanditon find the expected invasion of visitors consists merely of Mrs Griffiths and three young ladies.

This highly entertaining fragment was written in the first three months of 1817, when Jane Austen was already suffering from Addison’s disease (of which she died on 18 July); one of its remarkable features is the spirit with which the author satirizes the hypochondria of the sisters and brother of Mr Parker (Diana, Susan, and Arthur) and the scorn she pours on their dependence on patent medicines and tonics for their imaginary illnesses.

SANDYS, George (1578–1644), educated at St Mary Hall, Oxford. He travelled in Italy and the Near East, and in 1621 went to America as treasurer of the Virginia Company, remaining there probably for ten years. His chief works were a verse translation of Ovid’s Metamorphoses (1621–6), a verse Paraphrase upon the Psalms (1636), and Chrys’s Passion: A Tragedie, a verse translation from the Latin of Grotius (1640). He was a member of *Falkland’s circle at Great Tew.

Sanglier, Sir, in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (v. i), the wicked knight who has cut off his lady’s head, and is forced by Sir *Artegall to bear the head before him, in token of his shame. He is thought to represent Shane O’Neill, second earl of Tyrone (?1530–67), a leader of the Irish, who invaded the Pale in 1566. Sanglier in French means ‘wild boar’.

Sangreal, see GRAIL.

SANKEY, I. D., see MOODY AND SANKEY.

SANNAZARAR (Jacopo Sannazzaro) (1457–1530), Neapolitan author and rediscoverer of the charms of nature and the rustic life. He was author of an influential pastoral, in prose and verse, the Arcadia, and of Latin eclogues and other poems including five piscatorial eclogues, a genre of his own invention which was later adopted by Walton.

Sansfoy, Sansjoy, and Sansloy, three brothers in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (l. ii. 25 et seq.). Sansjoy (‘faithless’) is slain by the *Redcrosse Knight, who also defeats Sansjoy (‘joyless’), but the latter is saved from death by Duessa. Sansloy (‘lawless’) carries off Una and kills her lion (l. iii). This incident is supposed to refer to the suppression of the Protestant religion in the reign of Queen Mary.

SANSM, William (1912–76), short story writer, travel writer, and novelist, born in London and educated at Uppingham. He travelled widely as a young man, and worked at various jobs, including that of copy-writer for an advertising agency. His first stories were published in literary periodicals (Horizon, New Writing, the Cornhill, and others) and his first volume, Fireman Flower and Other Stories (1944), reflects his experiences with the National Fire Service in wartime London. This was followed by many other collections of stories, some set in London, others making full use of backdrops from Germany, Scandinavia, and the Mediterranean. His most successful novel, The Body (1949), is set in London. A collection of stories, with an introduction by E. Bowen, appeared in 1963.

SANTAYANA, George (1863–1952), a Spaniard brought up in Boston and educated at Harvard, where he taught philosophy from 1889 to 1912; he then came to Europe, living in France and England and later in Italy, where he died. He was a speculative philosopher, of a naturalist tendency and opposed to German idealism, whose views are embodied in his The Life of Reason (1905–6). He holds that the human mind is an effect of physical growth and organization; but that our ideas, though of bodily origin, stand on a higher and non-material plane; that the true function of reason is not in idealistic dreams but in a logical activity that takes account of facts. He analyses religious and other institutions, distinguishing the ideal element from its material embodiment. Thus the wisdom embodied in the ritual and dogmas of religion is not truth about existence, but about the ideals on which mental strength and serenity are founded. He later modified and supplemented his philosophy in a series of four books, Realms of Being (1927–40).

Santayana also published poetry, criticism, reviews, memoirs, etc.; his other works include Soliloquies in England (1922), essays on the English character; Character and Opinion in the United States (1920), one of several studies of American life; and Persons and Places (3 vols, 1944–53). His only novel, *The Last Wallace Stevens, whose poem 'To an Old Philosopher' where war is imminent, and where conventional boundaries between reality and illusion have lost their meaning. In Ensaio sobre a cegueira (1995; Blindness, 1997), in which the spread of an epidemic of white blindness brings about the collapse of a civilized society, Saramago uses allegory to illustrate the basic threat of latent human savagery. He was awarded the *Nobel Prize in 1998.

Sardinapalus, a poetic drama by Lord *Byron, published 1821.

The subject was taken from the Bibliotheca Historica of Siculus. Sardanapalus is represented as an effete but courageous monarch. When Beleses, a Chaldean soothsayer, and Arabaces, governor of Media, lead a revolt against him, he shakes off his slothful luxury and, urged on by Myrrha, his favourite Greek slave, fights bravely at the head of his troops. Defeated, he arranges for the safety of his queen, Zarina, and of his supporters, then prepares a funeral pyre round his throne and perishes in it with Myrrha.

Sarras, in the legend of the Grail, the land to which Joseph of Arimathea fled from Jerusalem. In the prose La Queste del Saint Graal, the three knights who are successful in the Quest, Galaad, Perceval, and Bohort (Bors), are borne there by Solomon's ship, and Galaad dies in ecstasy after seeing openly the ultimate mystery there.

Sarraute, Nathalie, see nouveau roman.

Sartoris, Adelaide, née Kemble (?1814–79), singer and author, sister of Fanny *Kemble. After a distin­guished operatic career she settled with her husband in Rome. She had many friends in the literary and artistic world, some of whom (notably *Leighton as Kioski) appear in A Week in a French Country House (1867), her roman à clef.

Sartor Resartus: The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh, by T. *Carlyle, originally published in Fraser's Magazine 1833–4, and as a separate volume, at Boston, Massachusetts, 1836 (partly through the intervention of Emerson, who had visited Carlyle at Craigenputtock in 1833); first English edition 1838.

This work was written under the influence of the German Romantic school and particularly of *Richter. It consists of two parts: a discourse on the philosophy of clothes (sartor resartus means 'the tailor re-patched') based on the speculations of an imaginary Professor Teufelsdröckh, and leading to the conclusion that all symbols, forms, and human institutions are properly clothes, and as such temporary; and a biography of Teufelsdröckh himself, which is in some measure the author's autobiography, particularly in the description of the village of Entepfuhl and of the German university (suggested by Ecclefechan and Edinburgh), and still more in the notable chapters on 'The Everlasting No', 'Centre of Indifference', and 'The Everlasting Yea', which depict a spiritual crisis such as Carlyle himself had experienced during his early Edinburgh days. The prose is highly characteristic, dotted with capital letters, exclamation marks, phrases in German, compound words of the author's own invention, wild apostrophes to the Reader, apocalyptic utterances, and outbursts of satire and bathos; an early example of what came to be known as 'Carlylese'.

Sartre, Jean-Paul (1905–80), French philosopher, novelist, playwright, literary critic, and political ac­tivist. He was the principal exponent of existentialism in France, and exercised a considerable influence on French intellectual life in the decades following the Second World War. He was educated at the École Normale Supérieure, where he studied philosophy and psychology, and subsequently spent a period studying phenomenology at the French Institute in Berlin. He held various teaching posts in France until the outbreak of war. Mobilized in 1939, taken prisoner in 1940, he was released the following year and played a part in the resistance movement. After the war he devoted himself exclusively to writing and, with varying degrees of intensity, to the pursuit of socialist political objectives. Through the great range of his creative and critical energies, his personal involvement in many of the important issues of his time, and his unceasing concern with problems of freedom, commitment, and moral responsibility, he won a wide audience for his ideas. He made important contributions in many areas: existentialist and Marxist philosophy, L'Être et le néant (1943; Being and Nothingness, 1956) and Critique de la raison dialectique (1960; Critique of Dialectical Reason, 1976); the novel, La Nausée (1938; Nausea, 1949) and three volumes of a projected tetralogy Les Chemins de la liberté (1945–7; The Roads to Freedom, 1947–50), comprising L'Âge de raison, Le Sursis, and La Mort dans l'âme (The Age of Reason, The Reprieve, and Iron in the Soul); drama, Les Mouches (1943; The Flies, 1947). Huis clos (1945; In Camera, 1946; No Exit, 1947), Les Mains sales (1948; Dirty Hands, 1949, Crime Passionnel, 1949), and Les Séquestrés d’Altona (1960; Loser Wins, 1960; The Condemned of Altona, 1961); biography, with studies of *Baudelaire (1947), *Genet (1952), and *Flaubert (1971–2); literary criticism, Qu’est-ce que la littérature? (1948; What Is Literature? 1949). He was one of the founders of the influential literary and political review Les Temps modernes (1945). His autobiography, Les Mots (Words), appeared in 1964, in which year he was awarded the *Nobel Prize for literature. His friend and companion from her university days was Simone de *Beauvoir.

SASSOON, Siegfried Loraine (1886–1967), educated at Marlborough and Clare College, Cambridge. Destined by his mother to be a poet, he lived in Kent and Sussex, following country pursuits and publishing verse in private pamphlets. In the trenches in the First World War he began to write the poetry for which he is remembered; his bleak realism, his contempt for war leaders and patriotic cant, and his compassion for his comrades found expression in a body of verse which was not acceptable to a public revering R. *Brooke. During his first spell in the front line he was awarded the MC, which he later threw away. Dispatched as 'shell-shocked' to hospital, he encountered and encouraged W. *Owen, and organized a public protest against the war. In 1917 he published his war poems in The Old Huntsman and in 1918 further poems in Counter-Attack, both with scant success. Further volumes of poetry published in the 1920s finally established a high reputation, and collections were published in 1947 and 1961. From the late 1920s Sassoon began to think of himself as a religious poet and was much influenced by G. *Herbert and *Vaughan. The spare, muted poems in Vigils (1935) and Sequences (1956) are much concerned with spiritual growth. In 1957 he became a Catholic.

Meanwhile he was also achieving success as a prose writer. His semi-autobiographical trilogy (Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man, 1928; Memoirs of an Infantry Officer, 1930; and Sherston’s Progress, 1936) relates the life of George Sherston, a lonely boy whose loves are cricket and hunting, who grows into a thoughtful young gentleman and eventually finds himself a junior officer in the trenches, where he is brutally thrust into adulthood. The three books were published together as The Complete Memoirs of George Sherston in 1937. In 1938 Sassoon published The Old Century and Seven More Years, an autobiography of his childhood and youth, and his own favourite among his books. The Weald of Youth (1942) and Siegfried’s Journey (1945) brought his story up to 1920. His attachment to the countryside emerges as a major theme in his post-1918 poetry and in most of his prose work. His diaries 1920–2 and 1915–18, ed. R. *Hart-Davis, were published 1981 and 1983.

Satanic school, the name under which R. *Soutey attacks *Byron and the younger Romantics in the preface to his *A Vision of Judgement.

satire, from the Latin satura, a later form of satura, which means 'medley', being elliptical for lanx satura, 'a full dish, a potch-pot'. The word has no connection with 'satur', as was formerly often supposed. A 'satire' is a poem, or in modern use sometimes a prose composition, in which prevailing vices or follies are held up to ridicule [OED]. In English literature, satire may be held to have begun with *Chaucer, who was followed by many 15th-cent. writers, including *Dunbar. *Skelton used the octosyllabic metre, and a rough manner which was to be paralleled in later times by Butler in *Hudibras, and by *Swift. Elizabethan satirists include *Gascoigne, *Lodge, and *Marston, whereas J. *Hall claimed to be the first to introduce satires based on *Juvenal to England. The great age of English satire began with *Dryden, who perfected the epigrammatic and antithetical use of the *heroic couplet for this purpose. He was followed by *Pope, *Swift, *Gay, *Prior, and other satirists of the Augustan period (see MOCK-BIBLICAL and MOCK-HEROIC). The same tradition was followed by Charles *Churchill, and brilliantly revived by Byron in *English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. The Victorian age was not noted for pure satire, although the novel proved an excellent vehicle for social satire with *Dickens, *Thackeray, and others. In the early 20th cent. *Bello, *Chesterton, and R. *Campbell (in his *Georgiad) contributed to a moderate revival of the tradition, pursued in various verse forms by P. *Porter, J. *Fuller, Clive James...
(1939— ), and other young writers; and prose satire continued to flourish in the works of E. *Waugh, A. *Powell, Angus *Wilson, K. *Amis, and others. In theatre and television the ‘satire boom’ of the 1960s is generally held to have been pioneered by the satirical revue *Beyond the Fringe (1960) by Alan *Bennett, Jonathan Miller, Peter Cook, and Dudley Moore.

Satiromastix, or The Untrussing of the Humorous Poet, a comedy by Dekker, written 1601 (with John *Marston?), printed 1602.

Jonson in his Poetaster had satirized Dekker and Marston, under the names of Demetrius and Crispinus, while he himself figures as Horace. Dekker here retorts, bringing the same Horace, Crispinus, and Demetrius on the stage once more. Horace is discovered sitting in a study laboriously composing an epithalamium, and at a loss for a rhyme. Crispinus and Demetrius enter and reprove him gravely for his querulousness. Presently Captain Tucca (of the Poetaster) enters, and turns effectively on Horace the flow of his profanity. Horace’s peculiarities of dress and appearance, his vanity and bitterness, are ridiculed; and he is finally untrussed and crowned with nettles.

The satirical part of the play uses a somewhat inappropriate romantic setting—the wedding of Sir Walter Terill at the court of William Rufus, and the drinking of poison (as she thinks) by his wife Caestantine, but really of a sleeping-potion, to escape the king’s attentions.

Its protagonist, anarchic young Arthur Seaton, lathe operator in a Nottingham bicycle factory, provided a new prototype of the working-class Angry Young Man; rebellious, contemptuous towards authority in the form of management, government, the army, and neighbourhood spies, he unleashes his energy on drink and women, with quieter interludes spent fishing in the canal. His affair with Brenda, married to his workmate Jack, overlaps with an affair with her sister Winnie, inaugurated in the night that Brenda attempts a gin-and-hot-bath abortion recommended by his Aunt Ada; both relationships falter when he is beaten up by soldiers, one of them Winnie’s husband, and he diverts his attention to young Doreen, to whom he becomes engaged (after a fashion) in the penultimate chapter. Arthur’s wary recklessness, at once aggressive and evasive, is summed up in his reaction to the sergeant-major who tells him, ‘You’re a soldier now, not a Teddy boy’: ‘I’m me, and nobody else; and whatever people think I am, that’s what I’m not, because they don’t know a bloody thing about me’ (ch. 9). A landmark in the development of the post-war novel, with its naturalism relieved by wit, high spirits, and touches of lyricism, the novel provided the screenplay (also by Sillitoe) for Karel Reisz’s 1960 film, a landmark in British cinema.

Saturday Review, an influential periodical founded in 1895, which ran until 1938. Among the many brilliant contributors of its early days were Sir Henry Maine (1822–88), Sir J. F. Stephen, J. R. Green, and *Freeman; it later became more literary in its interests (notably under the editorship of F. Harris, 1894–8), publishing work by *Hardy, H. G. *Wells, *Beerbohm, Arthur *Symons, and others. G. B. *Shaw was dramatic critic from 1895 to 1898, and *Agate from 1921 to 1923.

Satyrene, Sir, in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (i. vi), a knight ‘Plaine, faithfull, true, and enmy of shame’, son of a satyr and the nymph Thyamis. He rescues Una from the satyrs, perhaps symbolizing the liberation of the true religion by Luther.

satyr drama, a humorous piece with a chorus of satyrs that authors in the 5th and 4th cents BC were expected to append to tragic trilogies offered for competition. This practice, which had the incidental virtue of providing light relief, may have been due to the fact recorded by *Aristotle (Poetics, ch. 4) that tragedy had its origin in performances by actors dressed as satyrs. The surviving fragments of *Aeschylus’ Diktyoulkoi (The Net-Drawers) and *Sophocles’ Ichneutai (The Trackers) reveal sympathy for the promptings of animal impulse and a lyrical feeling for nature. They were both probably superior to the one extant satyric drama, *Euripides’ Cyclops. J. C. *Scaliger (Poetice, 1561) sparked off a controversy when he claimed that Roman satire was descended from Greek satyric drama. The claim was contradicted by *Casaubon who demonstrated that the Latin ‘satire’ had no connection with satyrs (De Satyrca Poesi, 1605), a view that Dryden was to accept.

SAPIROMASTIX | SAUSSURE

Ferdinand de (1857–1913), born in Geneva; he entered the university there in 1875 but moved after a year to Leipzig to study Indo-European languages. After four years in the powerful language department there, he went to Paris in 1881 where he taught for ten years. In 1891 he became professor at Geneva where, between 1907 and 1911, he delivered the three courses of lectures which were reconstructed from students’ notes into the Cours de linguistique générale (pub. 1915), a book which is the basis of 20th-century *linguistics and of much modern literary criticism. His most important and influential idea was the conception of language as a system of signs, arbitrarily assigned and only intelligible in terms of the particular system as a whole. (This idea was applied outside language in the new science called semiotics.) Language is a structure whose parts can only be understood in relation to each other; this structuralism has been very influential in literary criticism and in other fields, such as sociology. Two other sets of distinctions made... vocabularies, and he was tried, condemned, and executed as a heretic. There is a careful study of his career as a struggling writer, his pardon after conviction on a murder charge in 1727, and his poverty-stricken death in a Bristol jail. Savage wrote two plays (Love in a Veil, pub. 1719, and The Tragedy of Sir Thomas Overbury, pub. 1724), and various odes and satires, but is remembered as a poet for The Wanderer (1729) and The Bastard (1728), a spirited attack on his ‘Mother, yet no Mother’, which contains the well-known line ‘No tenth transmitter of a foolish face’. See Richard *Holmes, Dr Johnson and Mr Savage (1993).

Savage Club, a club with strong literary and artistic connections founded in 1857, with Sala as one of the founder members; it was named after the poet (above). Members have included Bridie, E. *Wallace, G. and W. *Grossmith, and Dylan *Thomas.

Saved, a play by E. *Bond, which caused much controversy when it was first seen (members only) at the *Royal Court in 1965, having been refused a licence for public performance. In short, minimalist-realistic scenes, with dialogue of stark and stylized crudity, Bond evokes a bleak south London landscape of domestic and street violence and the somewhat caricatured impoverished pastimes of the working class—fishing, football pools, TV, pop music. In the central episode Pam’s baby, which has been neglected by her and which cries loudly through much of the preceding action, is tormented and stoned to death in its pram by a gang of youths and its putative father, Fred. The subsequent lack of response to the child’s death adds to the sense of dramatic shock.

SAVILLE, George, see Halifax.

SAVILLE, Sir Henry (1549–1622), educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, and a fellow and subsequently warden of Merton College and provost of Eton. He was secretary of the Latin tongue to *Elizabeth I, perhaps also teaching her Greek, and one of the scholars commissioned to prepare the authorized translation of the Bible. He translated the Histories of *Tacitus (1591) and published a magnificent edition of St John *Chrysostom (1610–13) and of *Xenophon’s Cyropædia (1613) at Eton. Savile assisted *Bodley in founding his library and established the Savilian professorships of geometry and astronomy at Oxford. He left a collection of manuscripts and printed books, now in the Bodleian Library.

Savile Club, founded in 1868 as the Eclectic Club, renamed in 1869 the New Club, and from 1871, when it moved to independent premises in Savile Row, known as the Savile Club. It moved to its present home, 69 Brook Street, in 1927. The club has always had a strong literary tradition; members have included R. L. *Stevenson, *Hardy, *Yeats, L. *Strachey, H. *James, and S. *Potter. *Day-Lewis, in his biography of C. *Day-Lewis, describes the Savile as the home of Potter’s invention of the concept of ‘Gamesmanship’; and it was in the Savile billiards room that Stevenson is alleged to have said to H. *Spencer ‘that to play billiards well was the sign of an ill-spent youth’, though other clubs also claim this honour.

SAVONAROLA, Fra Girolamo (1452–98), Dominican monk, an eloquent preacher whose sermons at Florence gave expression to the religious reaction against the artistic licence and social corruption of the Renaissance. Savonarola was leader of the democratic party in Florence after the expulsion of the *Medici, and aroused the hostility of Pope Alexander VI (Rodrigo *Borgia) by his political attitude in favour of Charles VIII of France. His influence was gradually undermined, and he was tried, condemned, and executed as a heretic. There is a careful study of his character in G. Eliot’s *Romola.

Savoy, a short-lived but important periodical, edited by Arthur *Symons, of which eight issues appeared in 1896, with contributions by *Beardsley, *Conrad, *Dowson, and others.

Savoy operas, see Gilbert and Sullivan operas.

Sawles Warde, an allegorical work of alliterative prose, found in three manuscripts with the saints’ lives called *the Katherine Group’, dating from the end of the 12th cent. and emanating from the west Midlands (probably Herefordshire). It is a loose translation of part of De Anima by Hugh of St Victor, and it presents a morality in which the body is the dwelling-place of the soul and comes under attack by the vices. It has connections then with the morality castle, found from *Grosseteste's Chasteau d'Amour to *The Castle of Perseverance. Its prose has the same virtues—elegance and colloquialism—as *Ancrene Wisse and the Katherine Group. Ed. J. A. W. Bennett, G. V. Smithers, and N. Davis, Early Middle English Verse and Prose (2nd edn, 1968).

SAYERS, Dorothy L(eigh) (1893–1957), daughter of a Fenland clergyman, and married in 1926 to a journalist, O. A. Fleming. She worked as a copy-writer in an advertising agency (where she considerably influenced the style of contemporary advertising) till the success of her detective novels gave her financial independence. Her detective fiction is among the classics of the genre, being outstanding for its well-researched backgrounds, distinguished style, observant characterization, and ingenious plotting, and for its amateur detective Lord Peter Wimsey; she reached her peak with Murder Must Advertise (1933) and The Nine Tailors (1934). She also wrote religious plays, mainly for broadcasting (see under BBC), and her learning, wit, and pugnacious personality made her a formidable theological polemicist. Her last years were devoted to a translation of Dante's Divina commedia. See James Brabazon, Dorothy L. Sayers (1981).

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus (1540–1609), the son of J. C. *Scaliger, one of the greatest scholars of the Renaissance. His edition of Manilius (1579) and his De Emendatione Temporum (1583) revolutionized ancient chronology by insisting on the recognition of the historical material relating to the Jews, the Persians, the Babylonians, and the Egyptians. He also issued critical editions of many classical authors. He incurred the enmity of the Jesuits and retired from France to Lausanne in 1572, and subsequently to Leiden. He was attacked in his old age by Gaspar Scippius on behalf of the Jesuits, who contested the claim of the Scaligers to belong to the Della Scala family. See Anthony Grafton, Joseph Scaliger: A Study in the History of Classical Scholarship (2 vols, 1983, 1993).

SCALIGER, Julius Caesar (1484–1558), classical scholar, born at Riva on Lake Garda. He settled at Agen in France as a physician. In the Renaissance debate about the purity of Latin, he was an advocate of *Cicero and so found himself in dispute with *Erasmus, against whom he wrote two tracts (1531, 1536). He wrote an important treatise on poetics (1561) which contained the earliest expression of the conventions of classical tragedy.

The scene of the story is the Puritan New England of the 17th cent. An aged English scholar has sent his young wife, Hester Prynne, to Boston, intending to follow her, but has been captured by the Indians and delayed for two years. He arrives to find her in the pillory, with a baby in her arms. She has refused to name her lover, and has been sentenced to this ordeal and to wear for the remainder of her life the red letter A, adulteress, upon her bosom. The husband assumes the name of Roger Chillingworth and makes Hester swear that she will conceal his identity. Hester goes to live on the outskirts of the town, an object of contempt and insult, with her child, Pearl. Her ostracism opens for her a broader view of life, she devotes herself to works of mercy, and gradually wins the respect of the townsfolk. Chillingworth, in the character of a physician, sets out to discover her paramour. Hester's lover is, in fact, Arthur Dimmesdale, a young and highly revered minister whose lack of courage has prevented him from declaring his guilt and sharing Hester's punishment. The author traces the steps by which Chillingworth discovers him, the cruelty with which he fastens on and tortures him, and at the same time the moral degradation that this process involves for Chillingworth himself. When Dimmesdale at the end of seven years is on the verge of lunacy and death, Hester, emancipated by her experience, proposes to him that they shall flee to Europe, and for a moment he dally with the idea. But he puts it from him as a temptation of the Evil One, makes public confession on the pillory which had been the scene of Hester's shame, and dies in her arms.

Scarlet Pimpernel, The, see ORCZY.

SCARRON, Paul (1610–60), French poet, dramatist, and writer of prose fiction. In 1652 he married Françoise...
d'Aubigné, who later became the secret wife of Louis XIV by whom she was created Mme de Maintenon. Besides a number of comedies, Scarron was the author of a collection of short fiction, Nouvelles tragico-comiques (1661), and a burlesque novel of 17th-cent. provincial life, Le Roman comique (Pt I 1651, Pt II 1657), recounting the adventures of a touring company of actors in the town of Le Mans. His burlesque verse includes Virgile travesti (1648–52), a mock-heroic parody of the Aeneid in which the ancient gods and heroes speak like ordinary mortals, and which inspired C. Cotton's popular Scarronides, or Virgile Travestie (1664, 1665).

Scenes of Clerical Life, a series of three tales by G. Eliot, published in two volumes 1858, having appeared in Blackwood's Magazine in the previous year.

The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton is the sketch of a commonplace clergyman, the curate of Shepperton, without learning, tact, or charm, underpaid, unpopular with his parishioners, who earns their affection by his misfortune—the death from overwork, childbearing, and general wretchedness of his beautiful, gentle wife Milly.

'Mr Gilfil's Love-Story' is the tale of a man whose nature has been warped by a tragic love experience. Maynard Gilfil was parson at Shepperton before the days of Amos Barton. He had been the ward of Sir Christopher Cheverel and his domestic chaplain, and had fallen deeply in love with Caterina Sastri (Tina), the daughter of an Italian singer, whom the Cheverels had adopted. But Capt. Anthony Wybrow, the heir of Sir Christopher, a shallow selfish fellow, had flirted with Tina and won her heart. At his uncle's bidding he had thrown her over for the rich Miss Assher. The current fame rests largely on his Delée, object de plus haute vertu, a mysterious and emblematic sequence of 449 dizains, primarily concerned with the problems and conflicts of love, published in 1544. He also wrote a pastoral eclogue, La Saulsaye (1547), and Le Microcosme (1562), an epic poem dealing with the history of mankind since the fall of Adam.

Scheherazade, or Shahrazad, in the Arabian Nights, the daughter of the vizier of King Shahriyar, who married the king and escaped the death that was the usual fate of his wives by telling him the tales which compose that work, interrupting each one at an interesting point, and postponing the continuation till the next night. The Scheherazade framework of overlapping and interlinked stories has been adopted by many novelists and storytellers.

SCHELLING, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von (1775–1854). German philosopher, professor of philosophy at Jena, Würzburg, Munich, and Berlin. He was at first a disciple of Fichte, but soon departed from his doctrine. Unlike Fichte, Schelling makes the universe rather than the ego the element of reality. Nature, obedient to the laws of human intelligence, is a single living organism working towards self-consciousness, a faculty dormant in inanimate objects and fully awake only in man, whose being consists in 'intellectual intuition' of the world he creates. Schelling's numerous works include Ideen zu einer Philosophie der Natur (Ideas towards a Philosophy of Nature, 1797) and System des transcendentalen Idealismus (System of Transcendental Idealism, 1800). The clarity of these earlier philosophical works gradually yielded to Schelling's growing pantheistic and eventually theistic enthusiasms. His doctrine of the interaction between subject and object, mind and nature, was fruitful for *Coleridge's formulation of the poetic imagination as the reconciler of opposite qualities (see *Biographia Literaria, 1817). His poems were collected and published posthumously in 1913.

SCHILLER, Johann Christoph Friedrich von (1759–1805), German dramatist and lyric poet, the son of an army surgeon, and, with his early play Die Räuber (The Robbers, 1781), the chief figure of the Sturm und Drang period of German literature. In this play Karl von Moor, the heroic robber, takes to the woods to redress the evils of his father's court, in contrast to his wicked brother Franz, who combines some of the characteristics of Shakespeare's Richard III and Edmund in King Lear. The topicality of the theme of authoritarianism and liberty gave the play great popularity. In England Hazlitt and Coleridge read it with enthusiasm (see Coleridge's sonnet 'Schiller! That hour I would have wish'd to die', 1794). In his next important play, Kabale und Liebe (Intrigue and Love, 1784, the play on which Verdi based his opera Luisa Miller), Schiller attacked contemporary society by showing the forces of a despotic state interfering tragically with the love of a patrician youth and a middle-class girl. There followed the blank verse drama Don Carlos (1787), and Schiller achieved his greatest dramatic success with the historical tragedy of Wallenstein (1799), composed of three parts, the second and third of which were translated into English verse by Coleridge in 1800. Maria Stuart (1800) also dramatizes history, as does Die Jungfrau von Orleans (The Maid of Orleans, 1801). Schiller then wrote a 'classical' drama with chorus, Die Braut von Messina (The Bride of Messina, 1803), and his last finished play was Wilhelm Tell (1804). All his plays are concerned with the problem of freedom and responsibility, either political, as in the early dramas, or personal and moral.

Schiller was also a fine poet, author of reflective and lyrical poems as well as ballads (he and Goethe collaborated on a collection of ballads in 1797–8, as Wordsworth and Coleridge did in England at the same time). Some of the best-known poems are 'Die Künstler' (The Artists'), a poem on the humanizing influence of art; 'Das Ideal und das Leben' (The Ideal and Life'), a philosophical poem on the unbridgeable gap between the real and the ideal; 'Die Glocke' ('The Bell'); and 'An die Freude' ('Ode to Joy'), which Beethoven set to music in his Ninth Symphony.

Appointed professor of history at Jena in 1789, Schiller was also the author of historical works on the Revolt of the Netherlands (1788) and the Thirty Years War (the period of Wallenstein). He was also a serious student of Kant's philosophy and the author of Philosophische Briefe (Philosophical Letters, 1786). Kant influenced his thinking about art, and of his many essays on aesthetics the most important were influential on German Romantic critics like the Schlegel and also possibly on Coleridge, who knew and admired his works. These are the Briefe über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (On the Aesthetic Education of Man, 1795, trans. and introd. E. M. Wilkinson and L. A. Willoughby, 1967); Über naive und sentimentale Dichtung (On Naive and Reflective Poetry, 1795–6), in which Schiller contrasts his own 'modern', reflective mode of writing with Goethe’s more 'antique', unselfconscious genius; and several essays on the liberating and moral influence of the theatre.

SCHLEGEL, August Wilhelm von (1767–1845), German Romanticist, critic, and philologist, chiefly known in England for his translation into German, with the assistance of his wife and others, of the plays of Shakespeare. He also became famous for his lectures Über dramatische Kunst und Literatur (1809–11), translated by John Black as Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature (1815). Wordsworth and Hazlitt praised the lectures dealing with Shakespeare, and Coleridge almost certainly borrowed from them for his own lectures on Shakespeare. Schlegel was also, with his younger brother Friedrich (below), the co-editor of Das Athenäum (1798–1800), a journal of German Romanticism.

SCHLEGEL, Friedrich von (1772–1829), younger brother of A. W. von Schlegel (above), notable for his studies of the history of literature, particularly Geschichte der alten und neuen Literatur, trans. Lockhart as Lectures on the History of Literature, Ancient and Modern (1818); his recognition of the importance of ancient Hindu poetry, Spruche und Weisheit der Inder (Language and Wisdom of the Indians, 1808); and his critical fragments and essays, many of them published in the periodical he wrote with his brother, Das Athenäum (1798–1800). He contrasted classical and Romantic literature, and expounded his theory of 'romantic irony', or the consciousness on the part of the artist of the unbridgeable gap between the ideal artistic goal and the limited possibilities of achievement.

Schlemihl, Peter, in the story or allegory by Chamisso, the impecunious young man who surrendered his shadow to the devil, a thin elderly gentleman in a grey coat, in exchange for a purse of Fortunatus (see Old Fortunatus). The lack of a shadow exposes Peter to disagreeable notice, and in spite of his wealth he finds himself an outcast from human society.

Teazle, and his love is returned; Joseph is courting the brothers: *Joseph Surface, the sanctimonious hypocrite, Sir Oliver Surface, the rich uncle of Joseph and Charles, returns unexpectedly from India, and decides to test the characters of his nephews before revealing his identity. He visits Charles in the guise of a moneylender, Mr Premium, and Charles, always hard up, cheerfully sells him the family portraits—but refuses to sell the portrait of ‘the ill-looking little fellow over the settee’, who is Sir Oliver himself. Thus he unwittingly wins the old man’s heart. Meanwhile Joseph receives a visit from Lady Teazle and attempts to seduce her. The sudden arrival of Sir Peter obliges Lady Teazle to hide behind a screen, where she is filled with shame and remorse as she listens to proof of Sir Peter’s generosity to her, even though he suspects an attachment between her and Charles. The arrival of Charles sends Sir Peter in turn to hide. Sir Peter detects the presence of a woman behind the screen, but is told by Joseph that it is a little French milliner, so he takes refuge in a cupboard instead. The conversation between Charles and Joseph proves to Sir Peter that his suspicions of Charles were unfounded. On Joseph’s leaving the room, Sir Peter emerges and together he and Charles agree to reveal the little French milliner. When Charles flings down the screen he reveals Lady Teazle. Lady Teazle begs Sir Peter’s forgiveness and Joseph returns, to be upbraided by both. Sir Oliver then enters in the character of a needy relative, begging for assistance. Joseph refuses, giving as his reason the avarice of his uncle, Sir Oliver, and his character now stands fully revealed. Charles is united to Maria, and Sir Peter and Lady Teazle are happily reconciled.

Schoolmen, the succession of writers, from about the 11th to the 15th cent., who treat of logic, metaphysics, and theology, as taught in the ‘schools’ or universities of Italy, France, Germany, and England, that is to say on the basis of *Aristotle and the Christian Fathers, whom the schoolmen endeavoured to harmonize. Among the great Schoolmen were *Peter Lombard, *Abelard, *Albertus Magnus, *Aquinas, *Duns Scotus, and Ockham. (See SCHOLASTICISM.)

Schoolmistress, The, see Shenstone.

School of Night, a name drawn from a satirical allusion in Love’s Labour’s Lost (iv. iii. 214), and first ascribed by Arthur Acheson in 1903 (Shakespeare and the Rival Poet) to a supposed circle of speculative thinkers, led by *Harriot and *Raleigh, and including *Marlowe, *Chapman, Lawrence Keymis, and the ‘Wizard Earl’ Northumberland. J. Dover *Wilson, G. B. *Harrison in his edition of Willibrie His Avisa (1926), and M. C. Bradbrook in The School of Night (1936) supported the theory that Love’s Labour’s Lost was an attack upon this coterie, which engaged in free-thinking philosophical debate (not necessarily atheistic) and dabbled in hermeticism, alchemy, and the occult. The existence of such a circle is now widely disbelieved.

Wille und Vorstellung (The World as Will and Idea, 1818: title-page 1819). According to this, Will, of which we have direct intuition, is the ‘thing-in-itself’, the only reality. Will, which is self-consciousness in man, finds its equivalent in the unconscious forces of nature. Will, then, it is that creates the world; and the world is not only an illusion but a malignant thing, which inveigles us into reproducing and perpetuating life. Asceticism, and primarily chastity, are the duty of man, with a view to terminating the evil. Egoism, which manifests itself principally in the ‘will to live’, must be overcome. Its opposite is compassion, the moral law, based on the intuition of the essential identity of all beings. God, free will, and the immortality of the soul are illusions.

Schreiner, Olive Emilie Albertina (1855–1920), born in Cape Colony, South Africa, the daughter of a missionary. She began to write while working as a governess, and when she came to England in 1881 had completed her best-known novel, The Story of an African Farm, published to much acclaim in 1883 under the pseudonym ‘Ralph Iron’. Set in the vividly evoked landscape of her childhood, it recounts the lives of two orphaned cousins, stay-at-home Em and unconventional Lyndall, greeted by feminists as one of the first ‘New Women’, who breaks away from her Bible-belt origins, becomes pregnant by a lover whom she refuses to marry, and dies after the death of her baby; also of Waldo, son of the farm’s German overseer, whose rebellious spirit is aroused (as was Schreiner’s) by reading H. Spencer’s First Principles. This novel won her the friendship of Havelock Ellis, and while in England she moved in progressive literary and political circles, returning in 1889 to South Africa, where she married the farmer and politician Samuel Cron Cronwright. In 1914 she came back to England, returning to the Cape to die. Her other novels, both with feminist themes, From Man to Man (1927) and Undine (1929), appeared posthumously, but during her lifetime she published various other works, including collections of allegories and stories, articles on South African politics, and Woman and Labour (1911). Courageous and unconventional as a woman and public figure, Schreiner as a writer has been acknowledged as a pioneer both in her treatment of women and in her fictional use of the African landscape. See Ruth First and Ann Scott, Oliver Schreiner (1980); Joyce Avrech Berkman, The Healing Imagination of Olive Schreiner (1989); and Cherry Clayton, Oliver Schreiner (1997).

Schubert, Franz Peter (1797–1828), Austrian composer and successor to Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven in the Viennese classical school. It is as a writer of lieder that he has been most highly regarded, but out of more than 600 songs, only 14 are settings of texts of British origins (all in German translation). The most famous of these in his own lifetime were the W. Scott songs, especially Ellen’s three songs from The Lady of the Lake (1825) which include the ‘Ave Maria’; from the same source are two part-songs, one of them the beautiful ‘Coronach’. Three more Scott songs, ‘Lied der Anne Lyle’, ‘Gesang der Norna’, and ‘Romanze des Richard Löwenherz’ (the king’s song from Ivanhoe), were written at the same time, though not published till 1828. There are settings of C. Gibber’s ‘The Blind Boy’ and the Scottish ballad Edward. Most famous of all, however, are the Shakespeare settings of 1826: the clear freshness of ‘Hark, hark, the lark’ and the exquisite simplicity of ‘Who is Sylvia’ remain undimmed in their appeal to listeners.

Schumann, Robert (1810–56), German composer. Literary inspiration was very important to Schumann (who was also a writer and journalist) and although most of this was drawn from his own language there is a sprinkling of English associations in his work. The first of his major choral works, Das Paradies und die Peri (1843) is a setting of T. Moore’s Lalla Rookh, treated as a kind of secular oratorio. More successful is the incidental music for Byron’s Manfred (1849) for which (unlike Byron) he seems to have envisaged a stage presentation: it is not easy to bring off in performance, though the overture is the best of Schumann’s late orchestral works. The late overture to Julius Caesar (1852) does not live up to its impressive opening. As a composer of songs, Schumann made nine settings of Burns (eight included in the Myrthen cycle of 1840), several of which catch the simple lyricism of the words, and a later group of five Gedichte der Königin Maria Stuart (1852), written during the onset of his final illness and insanity, and on the whole less successful. Also in Myrthen are a single, very beautiful Byron song, ‘Mein Herz ist schwer’, and two Venetianischer Lieder of Moore. One Shakespeare setting, ‘When that I was and a little tiny boy’ in the new translation by Tieck and Schlegel, appeared in 1840.

Schwartz, Delmore (1913–68), poet and short story writer, born into a Jewish family in Brooklyn. He achieved early recognition with his family-dream story ‘In Dreams Begin Responsibilities’, published in 1937 in the Partisan Review (which he was later to edit, 1943–55); this became the title work of a celebrated volume of stories and poems (1938). The World is a Wedding (1948) also collects stories. Shenandoah (1941) is a verse drama. Volumes of verse include Summer Knowledge (1959) and Last and Lost Poems (1979). Schwartz’s decline into drinking and loneliness and his death in a cheap hotel room created a ‘doomed poet’ legend, and inspired elegies from Berryman: his exuberance is celebrated by Bellow in a portrait of him as Von Humboldt Fleisher in Humboldt’s Gift.

Science fiction, see overleaf.

Science, the literature of. Science writing in the 20th cent. built from the Victorian tradition that important ideas in science should be communicated to a wide audience. Charles Lyell (1797–1875) with his Principles of Geology (1830–3) and Charles Darwin, with a stream of popular and successful books, are the obvious 19th-cent. pioneers, but John *Tyndall was a science popularizer (his American tours rivaled the success of those of *Dickens) whose books reached a wide audience. The periodical *Nature, edited by Norman Lockyer, was founded in 1869 to bring scientific information to the general public, with the support of Darwin, T. H. *Huxley, and Tyndall. The archetypal figure of 20th-cent. science, Albert Einstein (1879–1955), wrote about his scientific work (notably in *The Theory of Relativity, 1905) and also about wider issues (*Why War?, 1933; *The World as I See It, 1935). But, in the English-speaking world at least, the widest publicity for the theory of relativity came from the writings of astronomer Arthur Eddington (1882–1944), one of the pioneers of a great tradition of astronomers who have written accessible books. Eddington’s contemporary James Jeans (1877–1946), also an astronomer, had no university post after 1912 but devoted himself to writing popular books and broadcasting, although still doing research.

In the biological sciences, Julian *Huxley summed up the theory of evolution by natural selection for both scientists and lay persons with his *Evolution: The Modern Synthesis (1942) while a quantum physicist turned biologist, Erwin Schrödinger (1887–1961), pointed the way forward to an understanding of the genetic code with his enormously influential book *What is Life? (1944). Among those who were influenced was Francis Crick (1916–2004), who, with James Watson (1928–), determined the structure of DNA. Watson himself went on to write the best-seller *The Double Helix (1968), and other genetic researchers, notably Jacques Monod (1910–76) with *Chance and Necessity (1970), presented their ideas to a wide public. Sir Peter Medawar (1915–87), zoologist and immunologist, also addressed a large readership with works such as *The Future of Man (1960) and *The Limits of Science (1984).

An important popularizer of science in the second half of the 20th cent. was George Gamow (1904–68), particularly with his *Mr Tompkins series. Other scientists who achieved success as writers include Fred Hoyle (1915–86) and Nobel Prize-winning physicist Richard Feynman (1918–88). In the biological sciences, the superstars have been Richard Dawkins (1941–), Stephen Jay Gould (1941–2002), and the Pulitzer Prize-winning Edward O. Wilson (1929–), author of *On Human Nature (1978) and *The Diversity of Life (1992). But the phenomenal sales since 1988 of A Brief History of Time by Stephen Hawking (1942–) brought a flood of books by scientists onto the market, trying to emulate his success. Few of these are of any lasting value, and most are by scientists who will never write a book again; but the consistently good science writers of the 1990s include Paul Davies, Daniel Dennett, John Gribbin, and Ian Stewart.

Scientific progress in the 19th and 20th cents also led to the rise of *science fiction: although most of what is called science fiction today is actually *fantasy, there is a sub-genre, known as ‘hard SF’, which presents science and scientists in a realistic way. The great exponents of hard SF in its heyday of the 1950s were Isaac Asimov and Arthur C. *Clarke: the tradition is kept alive today by scientists such as Gregory Benford (*Against Infinity, 1983; *Across the Sea of Suns, 1984) and John Cramer (*Twistor, 1989).

Scillaes Metamorphosis, a poem by T. *Lodge, later published (1610) under the title *Glaucus and Scilla. It is the earliest of many Ovidian epyllia, or minor epics, in the Elizabethan period, and describes the sea-god Glaucus’ courtship of the nymph Scilla, who is punished for her cruelty to him by being metamorphosed into a lonely rock in the sea. It bears both a generic and a specific relationship to Shakespeare’s *Venus and Adonis, including a brief account of the death of Adonis beginning:

He that hath seen the sweet Arcadian boy
Wiping the purple from his forced wound.

Scogan, Henry (71361–1407), a poet whose only surviving literary work is the *Moral Balade, dedicated to the four sons of Henry IV to whom he was tutor. It is generally agreed that he is the dedicatee of *Chaucer’s ‘Lenvoy de Chaucer a Scogan’, written towards the end of 1393. *Leland says he was a man given to all sort of jocoseness and wit, and he is perhaps mentioned by Shakespeare (2 *Henry IV, III. ii. 30—though the reference may be to John Scogan, below).

Scogan, John, a celebrated jester of Edward IV, whose exploits, real or imagined, are recorded in *The Jestes of Skogyn (c.1570).

Lord Copper, proprietor of the *Daily Beast (which stands for ‘strong mutually antagonistic governments everywhere’), is persuaded to send novelist John Boot to cover the war in Ishmaelia, but William Boot, writer of nature notes (torn reluctant and bewildered from his quiet life at Boot Magna), is dispatched by mistake. After many adventures he returns to find himself covered with glory, although in another case of mistaken identity John Boot has been knighted in his stead. Based on Waugh’s own experiences in Abyssinia in 1936, where he was writing for the *Daily Mail, the novel is a brilliantly comic satire of Fleet Street ethics and manners, and on the battle for readership between the *Beast and the *Brute.

Scot, Michael, see *Scott, M. (c.1175–c.1235).

Scott, or *Scot, Reginald (c.1537–99), educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, and MP for New Romney, 1588–9, author of *The Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584). This was written with the aim of preventing the persecution of poor, aged, and simple persons who were popularly believed to be witches, by exposing the impostures on the one

The label ‘science fiction’ suggests a hybrid form, not quite ordinary fiction, not quite science, yet partaking of both. Beneath this label, we find a variety of wares, some of which trail off from a hypothetical central point into utopianism or dystopianism, heroic fantasy, horror, and books on UFOs and the paranormal. Yet its startles are normally based either on a possible scientific advance, or on a natural or social change, or on a suspicion that the world is not as it is commonly represented. It follows that one of the unacknowledged pleasures of reading science fiction (or SF) is that it challenges readers to decide whether what they are reading is within the bounds of the possible. The altitude for a willing suspension of disbelief varies considerably from one novel to another. H. G. Wells’s The Time Machine (1895) is a case in point. The machine of the title is an impossibility, as far as we know; but the book (more properly a novella) has been taken seriously as both sociological and cosmological speculation ever since its publication in 1895.

Perhaps the safest broad definition of SF is to say that it is a series of mythologies of power, whether it be the power to travel through time or space, or to enter the thoughts of another, or to overcome death or the ineluctable process of evolutionary forces. The long-running TV series Star Trek utilizes all these elements at one time or another. Thus it is able, within a stereotyped format, to produce those surprises which are an inescapable element of the genre.

Of course, such elements, touching as they do on basic human fears, have a long ancestry. But it is really with Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein: or, The Modern Prometheus (1818), that the fundamental lever of power and human control enters. Mary Shelley, as recent research has shown, was well versed in the science of her time. While human beings, golems, and so forth, had been brought back to life before Shelley wrote, some kind of super-natural agency was involved. Shelley rejects all that. Only when Victor Frankenstein has engaged in scientific research does he achieve the seemingly impossible, and bring forth life from death. The shade of Frankenstein and his monster has become a cultural reference and a standard part of our imaginings. As if she wished to be understood as the mother of science fiction, Shelley repeated her futuristic experiment, publishing The Last Man in 1826. This disaster novel, set far into the future, features a plague which wipes out all humanity except for one man. It did not win the acclaim of its predecessor.

Jules Verne’s vigorous adventure writings, such as Journey to the Centre of the Earth (1864), proved to be the next great worldwide success. Undoubtedly, Wells was the great innovator, originating many themes, such as the invasion of the earth by alien beings, which have since been extensively cultivated. A writer who acknowledges his debt to Wells, while pursuing his own concerns, is W. Olaf Stapledon. His two great books are Last and First Men (1930) and Star-Maker (1937). These quasi-novels transcend the SF genre. The brilliantly imaginative Star-Maker presents, in full icy grandeur, an atheist’s vision of the cosmos, past, present, and to come. More continuously popular, because more accessible, is the C. S. Lewis trilogy beginning with Out of the Silent Planet (1938), which presents—for once—a favourable view of the planet Mars.

British writers are less cut off from the main vein of literary culture than their American colleagues. So we find well-known authors turning occasionally to SF. Bulwer-Lytton, Rudyard Kipling, E. M. Forster, Aldous Huxley, C. S. Lewis, Kingsley Amis, Anthony Burgess, and, most considerably, Doris Lessing, have all written in this mode. George Orwell’s fame rests partly on his trilogy beginning with Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949), an apotropaic novel much filmed and televised.

In the 1960s, the rather tame British SF magazine New Worlds was taken over and transformed by editor Michael Moorcock. The future had arrived: among Moorcock’s revolutionaries, the names of J. G. Ballard and Brian Aldiss stand out. These three writers seem to have followed the English pattern, and have written on other themes, without entirely forsaking SF. During this period, SF reached a level of popularity among intellectuals as well as the general public that it has since lost. Its involvement with the future and with technological advance has made it more enduringly popular with scientists than with the literary fraternity. What can be created must first be imagined. Moreover, events have made the USA the centre of a science-fictional industry which not only encroaches on movies and television, but also on such forward-looking institutions as NASA. Against such forces, Britain and other countries which produce SF writers (most notably Russia, Japan, and China) cannot compete.

The invention in the 1880s of linotype machines, which were cheaper and faster than their predecessors, led to a proliferation of newsprint and magazines of all kinds. The magazines had an unquenchable thirst for short stories. The segregation of types of story into separate magazines, while tending to produce ghetto mentalities, proved commercially viable. The first magazine to be devoted entirely to a kind of gadget SF was the New York-based Amazing Stories, beginning publication in 1926. It fostered a vigorous but conservatively minded fandom, which still flourishes and holds many conventions, large and small.

The so-called Paperback Revolution, in the 1950s, accounts for another advance in the output of popular SF, increasing the number of novels available, many of them prophetically looking towards the coming Space Age. Then, with the arrival of television, another channel for SF opened. SF is not the only genre to have close links with technology; but, significantly, both the movies (with Georges Méliès) and British television (with Nigel Kneale’s Quatermass series and Orwell’s Nineteen Eighty-Four) first acquired their mass audiences with science-fictional themes. The computer has again diversified and diluted the original strain of power-based ideas. SF’s ability to generate strange and striking images has made it an ideal medium for filmic special effects.

Inevitably, the wider popularity of science fiction has led to a diminution of challenging ideas. Yet there are those who still succeed in making readers think while being entertained. Among these are authors of long standing, such as Arthur C. *Clarke, who commanded a worldwide audience with his novels of the 1950s, The City and the Stars (1950) and Childhood’s End (1953), and who still continues to hold our attention. Many authors suffer from writing too much (a habit easily acquired in the days when magazines paid writers 2 cents a word). Isaac Asimov is a case in point, although such early novels as The Naked Sun (1957) and his first Foundation Trilogy (1963), both essentially products of the 1950s, were deservedly popular, so much so that, by 1995, Asimov became the eighth most translated author in the world (to be overtaken by Lenin, whose popularity has subsequently dwindled).

If the USA dominates the market place, it does leave British writers free to go their own sweet way, at least to some extent. Noteworthy examples are Robert Holdstock with his Mythago series, Stephen Baxter, and the idiosyncratic Iain M. *Banks, who rose to prominence with his first novel, The Wasp Factory (1984). Nor should one forget that most successful lord of misrule and creator of Discworld, Terry Pratchett.

Some of the best-known names in the international language of SF have been American. A. E. Van Vogt, Robert Heinlein, Philip K. Dick, Frank Herbert, Harry Harrison, Ursula *Le Guin, William *Burroughs, William Gibson, the inventor of Cyberpunk, Gregory Benford, and Greg Bear. Bear’s Blood Music (1985) is all that SF should be: its narrative changes the world and makes us see everything anew.

But the man whose example changed the direction of SF itself is J. R. R. *Tolkien, the learned Merton professor of English language and literature at the University of Oxford, whose Lord of the Rings was published in three volumes (1954–5). Tolkien’s Secondary Universe became, in paperback, a campus favourite, inspiring many imitations and ‘good long reads’. These imaginary worlds, the recounting of whose affairs often sprawls across several volumes, generally provide a platform for a pre-industrial struggle between Good and Evil. By removing the centre of science-fictional speculation to easier pastures, dream-pastures, they lower the intellectual temperature of a genre still struggling to attain some philosophical status.

A significant development in recent years has been the growth of SF scholarship. Institutions like the SFRA (Science Fiction Research Association) and the lively IAFA (International Association for the Fantastic in the Arts) publish learned papers and hold annual conferences. The SF Foundation in Liverpool is encouraging a research and teaching facility.

hand, and the credulity on the other, that supported the belief in sorcery. He also wrote A Perfitte Plaunforme of a Hoppe Garden (1574).

Scotist, see Duns Scotus.

Scots is a historical offshoot of the Northumbrian dialect of Anglo-Saxon, sharing with northern Middle English a strong Norse element in vocabulary and vowel and consonant developments which still mark off northern speech from Standard English. To this Gaelic, French (Norman and Parision), and Dutch elements accrued and the political independence of Scotland gave this speech a national status. It became also the vehicle of a considerable literature in *Barbour, *Henryson, *Dunbar, *Douglas, Sir D. *Lindsay, and there was much prose translation as well, but the failure to produce a vernacular Bible at the Reformation, the Union of the Crowns in 1603, and that of the Parliaments in 1707 all helped to extend the bounds of English and prevent the evolution of an all-purpose Scots prose. The 18th-cent. literary revival of Scots under * Ramsay, * Ferguson, and Burns, who gave it the name of ‘Lallans’ (Lowlands), was confined to poetry, with prose used merely to represent the colloquy of rustic characters, in Sir W. *Scott, *Hogg, *Galt, R. L. *Stevenson, and the Kailyard School. With the renaissance of the period 1920–50, writers like *MacDiarmid, Robert Maclellan (1907–85), S. G. *Smith, Douglas Young (1913–73), Alexander Scott (1920– ), Robert Kemp (1908–67), and others, attempted a re-creation of a full canon of Scots to cope with modern themes, which was also called Lallans, the name now connoting the new experimental speech rather than the old historical vernacular which had been losing ground in the previous 100 years.

Scots Musical Museum, The (1787–1803), edited by James Johnson, an important collection of songs with music, some genuinely antique, some fake antique, and some new. *Burns made many notable contributions to the later volumes.

SCOTT, C. P., see Manchester Guardian.

SCOTT, Geofffrey (1883–1929), poet and biographer, son of a Unitarian manufacturer and nephew of C. P. Scott, editor of the Manchester Guardian. He was educated at Rugby and New College, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate Prize in 1906 with a poem, The Death of Shelley. His interest in architectural theory was confirmed by his friendship with *Berenson, and culminated in his study The Architecture of Humanism (1914). Scott had great conversational talents, which, combined with what the artist William Rothenstein described as his ‘Botticellian’ beauty, made him dis­astrously attractive to women, not least, it would appear, to Berenson’s wife Mary. Scott’s best-known book is The Portrait of Zélide (1925), an elegant and evocative life of Mme de Charrière (see Zélide) which his friend Edith *Wharton described as a ‘wellhigh perfect’ book; Scott wrote in a ‘Note’, ‘I have sought to give her the reality of fiction; but my material is fact.’ In the same year appeared Four Tales by Zélide, translated by Scott’s wife Lady Sybil (née Cuffe). Scott was working on a biography of *Boswell and an edition of a collection of Boswell papers when he died in New York of pneumonia.

SCOTT, John (1783–1821), educated at the same Aberdeen school as *Byron. He was the first editor, 1820–1, of the remarkable *London Magazine; he had by then edited the Champion, and published A Visit to Paris (1814) and Paris Revisited (1816), both books of high repute and admired by many, including *Wordsworth. He began his editorial career approving of *Blackwood’s Magazine for its ‘spirit of life’, and he based the London on roughly the same plan, but with a greater emphasis on books and original writing. He attracted a brilliant set of contributors; De Quincey’s *Confessions of an English Opium Eater, *Lamb’s earlier ‘Elia’ essays, and much of *Hazlitt’s Table-Talk first appeared in the London Magazine, as well as work by *Keats, *Clare, *Hood, *Darley, * Carlyle, *Cunningham, and others. His reviewers aimed to seek out excellence rather than to condemn, and they were permitted no political bias. Scott’s own writing on Wordsworth, Sir W. *Scott, *Shelley, Keats, Byron, and other young writers, is of high quality. *Talfourd described him as ‘a critic of remarkable candour, eloquence and discrimination’. Eventually he found conflict with Blackwood’s impossible to avoid; he came to detest what he saw as its ‘scurrility and ’ duplicity and treachery’, and he felt obliged to defend his Cockney School. His attacks on Blackwood’s, in particular on *Lockhart, led to a series of confusions which culminated in a duel with J. H. Christie, a close friend of Lockhart, in which Scott was killed. There is a biography, Regency Editor (1983), by Patrick O’Leary.

SCOTT, or SCOT, Michael (c.1175–c.1235), a Scottish scholar, born at Balwearie, who studied at Oxford, Bologna, and Paris, and was attached to the court of Frederick II at Palermo, probably in the capacity of official astrologer. He translated works of *Aristotle from Arabic to Latin (including De Anima, pre-1220), and perhaps *Averroës’ great Aristotelian Commen­tary, which he certainly began. Because the science he studied was astronomy, legends of his magical power grew up and served as a theme for many writers from *Dante (Inferno, xx. 116) to Sir W. Scott in *The Lay of the Last Minstrel. Works of his on astronomy and alchemy, and various translations, still remain in manuscript. See Lynn Thorndike, Michael Scot (1965).

SCOTT, Michael (1789–1835). He was for some years an estate manager in Jamaica, which he left in 1822 to settle in his native Glasgow. Between 1829 and 1833 he published in Blackwood’s Magazine the anonymous violent incident in which an Indian colleague is killed, the death of a missionary, Edwina Crane, who was one of the first victims of the massacres attending the Day of the Scorpion. A group of young Indians, including Daphne’s friend, the English-reared and educated at Edinburgh High School and University, and apprenticed to his father. He was called to the bar in 1792. His interest in the old Border tales and ballads had early been awakened, and was stimulated by Percy’s *Reliques and by the study of the old romantic poetry of France and Italy and of the modern German poets. He devoted much of his leisure to the exploration of the Border country. In 1797 he published anonymously The Chase and William and Helen, *Shaw, and Beryl *Bainbridge’s novel The Birthday Boys (1991).

SCOTT, Sir Walter (1771–1832), son of Walter Scott, a writer to the signet, born in College Wynd, Edinburgh, educated at Edinburgh High School and University, and apprenticed to his father. He was called to the bar in 1792. His interest in the old Border tales and ballads had early been awakened, and was stimulated by Percy’s *Reliques and by the study of the old romantic poetry of France and Italy and of the modern German poets. He devoted much of his leisure to the exploration of the Border country. In 1797 he published anonymously The Chase and William and Helen, a translation of Bürger’s ‘Der wilde Jäger’ (*The Wild Huntsman’) and ‘Lenore’, and in 1799 a translation of Goethe’s Götz von Berlichingen. In 1797 he married Margaret Charlotte Charpentier (or Carpenter), daughter of Jean Charpentier of Lyons in France, and was appointed sheriff-depute of Selkirkshire in 1799. In 1802–3 appeared the three volumes of Scott’s *Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, and in 1805 his first considerable original work, the romantic poem *The Lay of the Last Minstrel. He then became a partner in James *Ballantyne’s printing business and published *Marmion in 1808. This was followed by *The Lady of the Lake (1810), *Rokey and The Bridal of Triermain (1813), *The Lord of the Isles (1815), and Harold the Dauntless (1817), his last long poem. In 1806 he had entered into partnership with James’s brother John *Ballantyne in the bookselling business known as...
'John Ballantyne & Co.', and in 1811 he had purchased Abbotsford on the Tweed, where he built himself a residence. Scott promoted the foundation in 1809 of the Tory *Quarterly Review—he had been a contributor to the *Edinburgh Review, but seduced from it owing to its Whig attitude. In 1813 he refused the offer of the laureateship and recommended *Southey for the honour. Eclipsed in a measure by *Byron as a poet, in spite of the great popularity of his verse romances, he now turned his attention to the novel as a means of giving play to his wide erudition, his humour, and his sympathies. His novels appeared anonymously in the following order: *Waverley (1814); *Guy Mannering (1815); *The Antiquary (1816); *The Black Dwarf and *Old Mortality (1816), as the first series of *Tales of My Landlord; *Rob Roy (1817); *The Heart of Midlothian (1818), the second series of *Tales of My Landlord; *The Bride of Lammermoor and *A Legend of Montrose (1819), the third series of *Tales of My Landlord; *Ivanhoe (1819); *The Monastery (1820); *The Abbot (1820); *Kenilworth (1821); *The Pirate (1821); *The Fortunes of Nigel (1822); *Peveril of the Peak (1823); *Quentin Durward (1823); *St Ronan's Well (1823); *Redgauntlet (1824); *The Betrothed and *The Talisman (1825), together as *Tales of the Crusaders; *Woodstock (1826); *Chronicles of the Canongate (1827), containing *The Highland Widow, *The Two Drovers', and *The Surgeon's Daughter; Chronicles of the Canongate (2nd series): *A Legend of Montrose, *Tales of My Landlord (4th series): *Count Robert of Paris and *Castle Dangerous (1831). Scott was a baronet in 1820, and avowed the authorship of the novels in 1827. In 1826 James Ballantyne & Co. became involved in the bankruptcy of Constable & Co., and Scott, as partner of the former, found himself liable for a debt of about £114,000. He shouldered the whole burden himself and henceforth worked heroically, shortening his own life by his strenuous efforts to pay off the creditors, who received full payment after his death.

Scott's dramatic work, in which he did not excel, includes *Halidon Hill (1822), *Macduff's Cross (1823), *The Doom of Devorgoil, a Melodrama and *Auchindrane or *The Ayrshire Tragedy (both 1830). Of these *Auchindrane is the best. It is founded on the case of Mure of Auchindrane in Pitcairn's *Secret History of James I (1808); *The Works of Swift with a life (1814); *Provincial Antiquities of Scotland (1819-26); an abstract of the *Eyrbiggia Saga' in *Northern Antiquities (1814); *Description of the Regalia of Scotland (1819); *Lives of the Novelists prefixed to Ballantyne's *Novelist's Library (1821-4); essays on Chivalry (1818), the Drama (1819), and Romance (1824) contributed to the *Encyclopaedia Britannica; *The Life of Napoleon Buonaparte (1827); *The Tales of a Grandfather (1827-30); *History of Scotland (1829-30); *Letters to His Kinsfolk appeared in 1816. Scott founded the *Bannatyne Club in 1823. In 1826 he addressed to the *Edinburgh Weekly Journal three letters 'from Malachi Mallowther', Thoughts on the proposed Change of Currency', defending the rights of Scotland.

Scott's influence as a novelist was incalculable; he established the form of the *historical novel, and, according to V. S. *Pritchett, the form of the short story (with 'The Two Drovers' and 'The Highland Widow'). He was avidly read and imitated throughout the 19th century, not only by historical novelists such as *Ainsworth and *Bulwer-Lytton, but also by writers like Mrs *Gaskell, *Eliot, the *Brontës, and many others, who treated rural themes, contemporary peasant life, regional speech, etc., in a manner that owed much to Scott. His reputation gradually declined (though his medieval and Tudor romances retained a popular readership) until there was a revival of interest from European *Marxist critics in the 1930s (see *Lukács), who interpreted his works in terms of historicism. In 1951 three seminal essays were published, David *Daiches's 'Scott's Achievement as a Novelist' (Nineteenth-Century Fiction), *Arnold Kettle's chapter in his *Introduction to the English Novel (vol. 1), and S. *Stewart Gordon's 'Waverley and the "Unified Design"' (English Literary History, 18); these heralded a considerable upsurge of scholarly activity and reappraisal, most of which concurs in regarding the Scottish 'Waverley' novels (including *The Antiquary, *Old Mortality, *The Heart of Midlothian) as his masterpieces. For a survey of critical attitudes, see Walter *Scott: Modern Judgements (ed. D. D. Devlin 1968), and Walter Scott (1982) by T. Crawford.

Scott, William Bell (1811-90), poet, artist, and art critic, who taught for many years in Newcastle upon Tyne; his mural Iron and Coal (1862) at Wallington Hall, Northumberland, is one of the earliest representations in art of heavy industry. Scott was a friend of D.G. *Rossetti (who made his acquaintance through an admiring letter) and later of *Swinburne; he was associated with the birth of the *Pre-Raphaelite movement, and contributed to the *Germ. His poems and verses (of which he published several volumes, some illustrated by himself) range from rambling Pindaric odes to sonnets and medieval-style ballads. His Autobiographical Notes (1892), edited by W. Minto, gave much offence to the Rossetti family.

Scottish Enlightenment, a phrase used to describe an intellectual movement originating in Glasgow in the early 18th cent. but reaching fruition mainly in Edinburgh between 1750 and 1800. Several threads are traceable in the attitudes of the scientists, philosophers, and literati associated with the movement, although no single tenet was held by all: a deep concern for the practical implications and social benefits of their enquiries (proclaimed as leading to ‘improvement’), an emphasis on the interconnection between separable human practices, and an interest in the philosophical principles underlying them. Several of the group developed an interest in history, and many were at least nominal *Deists.

The main philosophers were *Hutcheson, *Hume, Adam *Smith, A. *Ferguson; for his leadership of the so-called ‘common-sense’ opposition, *Reid should be mentioned, and later D. *Stewart. The political, economic, and social thought of Hume, Smith, and Ferguson was particularly influential in France and America, and the works of Reid and Stewart played a central role in the development of American college education, along with the lectures on rhetoric of H. *Blair. The scientists of the movement included William Cullen, who established chemistry as a discipline in its own right, Joseph Black, who propounded the theories of latent and specific heat, James Hutton, the founder of modern geology, and the Doctors Monro, who were instrumental in establishing the reputation of the Edinburgh Medical School. The names of James Watt and John Loudon McAdam should also be listed. The literary figures, like their French contemporaries, were often ambivalent towards the theories and practices of their scientific and speculative colleagues, and increasingly distanced themselves towards the end of the century. *Boswell and *Burns were never part of the movement, although Sir W. *Scott is associated with its closing decades. Numerous learned societies and journals flourished during the period, and the founding of the *Encyclopaedia Britannica was in part a product of the movement. (See also Royal Society of Edinburgh.)

Scottish Text Society, the, founded in 1882 for the purpose of printing and editing texts illustrative of the Scottish language and literature. It has issued editions of many works of general literary interest, such as *The Kingis Quair, *Barbour’s Bruce, Gawin *Douglas’s Eneados, the *Basilikon Doron (*James I and VI), and the poems of *Dunbar, *Henryson, *Drummond of Hawthornden, and Sir D. *Lindsay. Although the Society’s primary concern has been with medieval and Renaissance works, it has also produced a few important editions of later writers, including A. *Ramsay and R. *Ferguson.

SCOTUS, John Duns, see Duns Scotus.

SCOTUS ERIGENA, John (John the Scot) (c.810–77), of Irish origin. He was employed as teacher at the court of Charles the Bald, afterwards emperor, c.847. The leading principle of his philosophy, as expounded in his great work De Divisione Naturae, is that of the unity of nature; this proceeds from (1) God, the first and only real being (Nature which creates and is not created); through (2) the Creative Ideas (Nature which creates and is created); to (3) the sensible Universe (Nature which is created and does not create); everything is ultimately resolved into (4) its First Cause (immanent, unmoving God: Nature which is not created and does not create). He was one of the originators of the mystical thought of the Middle Ages, as well as a precursor of *Scholasticism (though with no Aristotelian elements). His originality lies in departing from the mainstream Latin tradition of theology to incorporate into it elements drawn from Pseudo-*Dionysius and others in the *Neoplatonist tradition. He translated the works of Pseudo-Dionysius in 858, as well as of other Neoplatonists, and he wrote a commentary on the *Celestial Hierarchy of Pseudo-Dionysius. The presence of a Neoplatonic element in all medieval philosophers, including *Aquinas, owes much to his influence. See *Works, ed. H. J. Floss in *Migne’s *Patrologia Latina, 122.

Scriblerus Club, an association of which *Swift, *Arbuthnot, T. *Parnell, *Pope, and *Gay were members, and the earl of Oxford (R. *Harley) a regularly invited associate member. The group appears to have met from January to July 1714, though various members later collaborated on joint projects. Its object was to ridicule ‘all the false tastes in learning’, but nothing was produced under the name of *Martinus Scriblerus for some years. See *Memoirs of the Extraordinary Life, Works and Discoveries of Martinus Scriblerus, ed. C. Kerby-Miller (1950); *A Manner of Correspondence (1997) by Patricia C. Brückmann.

Scrutiny, a Cambridge periodical which ran for 19 volumes, 1932–53, edited by L. C. *Knights, Donald Culver, Denys Thompson, D. W. Harding, and others, but dominated largely by F. R. *Leavis; a 20th issue, with a ‘Retrospect’ by Leavis, appeared in 1963. Its contributors included Q. D. *Leavis, H. A. Mason, E. *Rickword, D. A. Traversi. It published little creative work of importance, with the exception of the posthumous poems of *Rosenberg, but was an important vehicle for the views of the new Cambridge school of criticism, and published many seminal essays, particularly in the pre-war years, on J. *Austen, Shakespeare, *Marvell, etc. Its critical standards proved less illuminating when applied to contemporary writing; it ignored most of *Orwell, dismissed G. *Greene, Dylan *Thomas, and most of V. *Woollf (Leavis described *Between the Acts as a work of ‘extraordinary vacancy and pointlessness’), and in later years attacked the reputations of *Spender and *Auden, both of whom had been originally greeted as heralds of a Poetic Renascence which, by 1940, Leavis declared not to have taken place. In a preface to A Selection from Scrutiny (2 vols, 1968) Leavis deplored the lack of support that this indisputably important periodical had received, which he claimed amounted to ‘positively hostile non-recognition of our existence’, and went on to blame the British Council, the BBC, the ‘intellectuals of literary journalism’, etc., for the climate of opinion that had allowed it to perish, while demanding reprints of its back numbers.

Scudamour, Sir, in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (Bk IV), the lover of *Amoret, who is reft from him on his wedding day by the enchanter *Busirane.

SCUDÉRY, Madeleine de (1607–1701), author of French heroic romances. Her Artamène, ou le Grand Cyrus (10 vols, 1649–53) and Clélie, histoire romaine (10 vols, 1654–60) consisted of an interweaving of improbable tales of love and war in an antique setting with ingenious systems and codes of contemporary allusions. They had an immense vogue that extended well beyond the frontiers of France, and influenced heroic plays of the court of Charles II.

Scythrop, a character in Peacock’s Nightmare Abbey, a satirical portrait of the style and literary opinions of *Shelley.

SEACOLE, Mary, see BLACK BRITISH LITERATURE.

Seafarer, The, an Old English poem of about 120 lines in the *Exeter Book, one of the group known as ‘elegies’. The opening section of the poem ostensibly discusses the miseries and attractions of life at sea, before moving by an abrupt transition to moral reflections on the transience of life and ending in an explicitly Christian part (the text of which is uncertain), concluding with a prayer. *Pound made a loose but highly evocative translation of the first half of the poem.

The structure of the poem and the coherence of the relationship between its two halves have been much debated. Some critics regard the didactic second part as an appendage to an earlier secular poem; others see the whole as an allegorical representation of human exile from God on the sea of life. A comparable pattern (though not so sharply divided) can be seen in such poems as The Wanderer and The Husband’s Message. Whichever view is taken of the coherence of the whole, nobody disputes that the powerful sea description of the opening section is much more appealing than the second half, at least to a post-Romantic readership. Ed. I. L. Gordon (1960).

‘Winter’ was composed first, and its first version, of 405 lines, was written and published in 1726; it was gradually expanded to 1,069 lines by 1746 (the other books were also expanded over the years, but less extensively). It describes the rage of the elements and the sufferings of men and animals; two well-known episodes are the visit of the redbreast to a family who feed him crumbs from the table, and the death of a shepherd in a snowdrift while his family wait anxiously (the latter much illustrated). Many of the passages are notably sublime.

Next came ‘Summer’ (1727), which sets forth the progress of a summer’s day, with scenes of hay-making, sheep-shearing, and bathing, followed by a panegyric to Great Britain and its ‘solid grandeur’. It also includes two narrative episodes, one of the lover Celadon whose Amelia is struck by lightning, the other of Damon who beholds Musidora bathing, the latter highly popular, according to *Wordsworth, because it was titillating.

‘Spring’ (1728) describes the influence of the season on all the natural world, and ends with a panegyric on nuptial love; its opening lines were particularly admired by *Clare.

‘Autumn’ (1730) gives a vivid picture of shooting and hunting, sports condemned for their barbarity, and of harvesting, wine-making, etc., and ends with a panegyric to the ‘pure pleasures of the rural life’. It includes the episode of Palemon who falls in love with Lavinia, a gleaner in his fields, based on the story of Ruth and Boaz. The whole was completed by a Hymn (1730) and illustrations by William Kent.

The work contains many elegant compliments to Thomson’s various patrons and their country seats (*Lytton, *Dodington, and others). It was immensely popular and went through many editions in the 18th and 19th cents. The text of *Haydn’s oratorio Die Jahreszeiten (1801) was adapted from Thomson by Baron von Swieten, whose version did not please the composer; he objected to having to represent the croaking of frogs and unpoetic sentiments such as ‘Fleiss, O edler Fleiss’ (‘Oh Industry, noble Industry!’). Ed. J. Sambrook (1981).

SEATON, Thomas (1684–1741), a fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, who founded by legacy the Seatonian Prize at Cambridge for sacred poetry. This is referred to in Byron’s *English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

Sebastian, (1) Viola’s twin brother in Shakespeare’s *Twelfth Night; (2) in his *The Tempest, brother to *Alonso whom he tries to murder.

Second Mrs Tanqueray, The, a play by Sir A. *Pinero, first performed 1893.

Tanqueray, knowing of Paula’s past reputation, still determines to marry her, in the belief that his love and the generosity of his friends will prove strong enough to counter prejudice and hypocrisy. Ellean, his young convent-bred daughter from a previous marriage, comes to live with him and Paula; soon Tanqueray begins to realize that Ellean, his friends, and his own suspicions are proving too powerful an opposition to his once-loving marriage. When Paula also realizes that she has lost his love, she kills herself. Because of its daring theme Pinero had great difficulty in having the play accepted for production; but once produced it was an immediate and abiding success.

Secret Agent, The, a novel by *Conrad, published 1907.

A seedy shop in Soho provides cover for Verloc, the secret agent, who is working as a spy for a foreign embassy and as informer for Chief Inspector Heat of Scotland Yard. His wife Winnie has married him chiefly to provide security for her simple-minded younger brother Stevie, and is ignorant of Verloc's spying activities. The shop is a meeting place for a bunch of ill-assorted political fanatics united only in their effort to arouse some extremism in the over-modern British. We are introduced to the Russian agent provocateur Vladimir; the terrorist 'the Professor'; and Ossipon, Yundt, and Michaelis who easily accommodate their principles to their material needs. The foreign embassy is planning a series of outrages aimed at discrediting the revolutionary groups, which will be held responsible. The first target is the Greenwich Observatory and an unwilling Verloc is ordered to engineer the explosion. He uses the poor innocent Stevie as an accomplice and the boy is blown to pieces while carrying the bomb. Winnie, stricken by her brother's death and outraged by Verloc's lack of remorse, kills him with a knife. Fleeing, she encounters Ossipon who flirts with her and they plan to leave the country. But when he discovers Verloc's murder he remorse, kills him with a knife. Fleeing, she encounters Ossipon who flirts with her and they plan to leave the country. But when he discovers Verloc's murder he

Robert Kirk (?1641–92), minister of Aberfoyle, of which the first text, from a manuscript dating from 1691, dates from 1815; it was printed with a commentary by A. *Lang in 1893 and edited by R. B. *Cunninghame Graham in 1933.

SEDLEY, or SIDLEY, Sir Charles (?1639–1701), dramatist and poet, friend of *Rochester and *Dryden, famous for his wit and urbanity and notorious for his profligate escapades. His tragedy *Antony and Cleopatra (1677) was followed by two comedies, *Bellamira (1687) and *The Mulberry Garden (1668), which was based partly on *Molière's *L'École des maris. His poems and songs ('Phillis is my only joy', 'Love still has something of the sea', etc.) were published in 1702, with his Miscellaneous Works. *Malone identified him as the Lisideius of Dryden's *Of Dramatic Poesy, who defends the imitation of French drama in English. He also had a hand in a translation of *Corneille's *Pompeé with *Waller, Godolphin, C. *Sackville, and *Filmer.

Sedley, Mr, Mrs, Joseph, and Amelia, characters in Thackeray's *Vanity Fair.

SEFERIS, George (1900–71), Greek poet and diplomat, born in Smyrna and educated in Athens. He spent several periods in Britain, including some years as ambassador (1957–62), and in 1963 was awarded the *Nobel Prize. He published several volumes of poetry, from 1931 onwards, much of it strongly imbued with classical mythology: translations include *Poems (1960), by R. *Warner, and *Collected Poems (1981), by E. Keeley and P. Sherrard.

Sejanus His Fall, a Roman tragedy by *Jonson, performed by the King's Men 1603, with Shakespeare and *Burbage in the cast, printed 1605. At its first performance it was hissed from the stage.

Based mainly on *Tacitus, the play deals with the rise of Sejanus during the reign of Tiberius, his destruction of the family of Germanicus, and his poisoning of Tiberius' son Drusus. Suspecting the scope of his favourite's ambition, Tiberius leaves Rome, setting his agent Macro to spy on him. Tiberius denounces Sejanus in a letter to the Senate, which condemns him to death, and the mob, stirred up by Macro, tears him to pieces.

Selden, John (1584–1654), English jurist, orientalist, and legal historian, born near Worthing, Sussex, and educated at Hart Hall, Oxford. He then became an eminent lawyer and bencher of the Inner Temple. His *History of Tythes (1618) gave offence to the clergy and was suppressed by public authority. In Parliament he took an active part against the Crown until 1649, when he withdrew from public affairs on the principle that 'The wisest way for men in these times is to say nothing.' He won fame as an orientalist with his treatise De Diis Syriis (1617), and subsequently made a valuable collection of oriental manuscripts, most of which passed at his death to the Bodleian Library. His Table Talk, containing reports of his utterances from time to time during the last 20 years of his life, composed by his secretary Richard Milward, appeared in 1689. His works include Marmor Arundelliana (1628), Mare Clausum (1635), translated by *Nedham, in which he maintained against the Mare Liberum of *Grotius that the sea is capable of sovereignty, and Illustrations to the first 18 'songs' of Drayton's Poly-Olbius. His works were collected by Dr David Wilkins (1726).

Select Society, the, an association of educated Scotsmen formed in 1754, whose members met in Edinburgh to discuss philosophical questions. *Hume and W. *Robertson were among its prominent members.

SELF, Will (1961– ), novelist and journalist, born in London. Self is a former cartoonist whose first collection of stories, The Quantity Theory of Insanity (1991), commanded immediate attention, both for the fertility of its ideas and for its hectic, energetic prose, crammed with word-play and arcane vocabulary. Cock and Bull (1992) contained a pair of novellas, each a wry commentary on gender reversal. My Idea of Fun (1993), his first full-length novel, was a surreal and disturbing Bildungsroman. Subsequent story collections are Grey Area (1994) and Tough Tough Toys for Tough Tough Boys (1998); in between Self published a selection of journalism, Junk Mail (1995), which included some candid pieces about his drug addiction, and a novella of urban life, The Sweet Smell of Psychosis (1996). His most sustained and accomplished work is the novel Great Apes (1997), which (like 'Scale', a story of skewed perspectives from Grey Area) shows his ability to seize upon an absurd premis and see it through to its logical conclusion. This long satiric parable of a society where human beings find themselves transformed into monkeys recalls Swift in its ambition and scatological vigour.

SELKIRK, Alexander (1676–1721), born in Fife. He ran away to sea and joined the privateering expedition of *Dampier in 1703. Having quarrelled with his captain, Thomas Stradling, he was put ashore on one of the uninhabited Pacific islands of Juan Fernández in 1704, and remained there until 1709 when he was rescued by W. *Rogers. On his return he met *Steele, who published an account of his experiences in the Englishman (3 Dec. 1713). Defoe used the story in Robinson Crusoe and Cowper in his poem 'I am monarch of all I survey'.

SELVON, Samuel Dickson (1923–94), Trinidad-born novelist, playwright, and short story writer, educated at San Fernando in Trinidad. He began to write while serving as a wireless operator in the Royal Navy during the Second World War, and came to England in 1950, travelling on the same boat as G. Lamming. His first novel, A Brighter Sun (1952), set in Trinidad during the war, was written in London: it describes the life and brightening prospects of Tiger, a young Indian peasant. Selvon became well known for his novels about London: these include The Lonely Londoners (1956), Moses Ascending (1975), and Moses Migrating (1983), which chart with comedy, sympathy, and a pioneering use of Caribbean idiom the experiences of black immigrants trying to find fame and fortune, or at least a bed, in the unknown terrain of Earls Court, Notting Hill, and Bayswater. Selvon also wrote many plays for BBC radio before leaving to settle in Canada in 1978. See also black British literature.

SENANCOUR, Étienne Pivert de (1770–1846), French author, now chiefly remembered for his Obermann (1804), a lightly fictionalized series of letters to a friend supposed to have been written over a period of years, mostly from a remote Alpine valley. The author reflects on the society he has fled and on man, describing his own frustrated inactivity, melancholy, and ennui, his solitude and mystical attachment to Nature. The mental and emotional condition given voice in Obermann appealed to many first-generation Romantic writers in France. Senancour was much admired by *Sainte-Beuve and by M. *Arnold, who discerned in his sentimentalism a distinctive 'gravity and severity'. Two well-known poems by Arnold, 'Stanzas in Memory of the Author of Obermann' (1852) and 'Obermann Once More' (1867), take the form of meditations that develop from reflecting on Senancour's book in its Alpine setting. Arnold also wrote an essay 'Obermann' (Academy, 9 Oct. 1869).

SENECA, Lucius Annaeus (c.4 BC–AD 65), Roman Stoic philosopher, tragic poet, and, like his father the elder Seneca, a noted rhetorian; born in Córdoba, Spain. He was appointed tutor to the young Nero and, when the latter became emperor, acted as one of his chief advisers, checking his crimes for a period; but, finding this position untenable, he withdrew from the court in AD 62. Three years later he was accused of being implicated in a conspiracy and was forced to commit suicide. His writings consist of tragedies in verse, dialogues, treatises, and letters in prose, which in their different ways all aim to teach Stoicism. Most of his nine plays are on subjects drawn from Greek mythology and treated in extant Greek dramas, but his manner is very different from that of Greek tragedy. He uses an exaggerated rhetoric, dwells habitually on bloodthirsty details, and introduces ghosts and magic; the plays were almost certainly not intended for performance but for reading aloud, probably by the author himself, to a select audience. Senecan drama was familiar in the 16th cent. at a time when Greek tragedies were scarcely known; all the nine plays were translated (1559–81) and imitated by dramatists from the time of *Gorboduc onwards. For an account of Seneca's influence, see T. S. *Eliot's important essay 'Seneca in Elizabethan Translation' (1927) and his 'Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca' (1927). *Dryden's *Troilus and Cressida (1679), more than a century later than the Elizabethan imitations, still shows traces of Senecan influence. Seneca's prose writings consist of treatises, some of which are clumsily disguised as dialogues (*De Clementia, De Ira, etc.) and a collection of what purport to be letters addressed to one Lucilius after the author's retirement, constituting a sort of elementary course in Stoicism. These writings were widely read in the 17th and 18th cents. *L'Estrange's digest of them (1678) reached ten editions by 1711, so that there is an undercurrent of Stoicism in much of early 18th-cent. thinking, visible not only in Addison's *Cato but also in a wide range of writers from *Pope to *Duck. (For Senecan drama, see also *Lucan.)

SENIOR, Olive (1941— ), poet and short story writer, born and brought up in Jamaica, and educated at Carleton University, Ottawa; she divides her time between Jamaica and Canada. Her collections of poetry, Talking of Trees (1985) and Gardening in the Tropics (1994), employ a wide range of voices, from the colloquial and the conversational to the prophetic, to explore the struggles and history of her land and its people. Her volumes of short stories are Summer Lightning (1986), Arrival of the Snake Woman (1989), and Discerner of Hearts (1995).

sensation, novel of, an enormously popular genre of fiction that flourished from c.1860 onwards. It relocated the terrors of the *Gothic novel to a recognizably modern, middle-class England. Its high-impact narrative style employed cliffhanging conclusions to chapters, which gave the genre a reputation for 'preaching to the nerves'. Its plots commonly involved guilty family secrets, bigamy, insanity, and murder (especially poisoning), often taking inspiration from real criminal cases. This accounts for an intense interest in legal papers, telegrams, diary entries, and written testimony. Indeed, many of Wilkie *Collins's sensation novels represent themselves as bundles of documents authored by witnesses in the case. The genre was also noted for its energetic—and frequently criminal—heroines, and for its enervated, hypersensitive heroes. The 'sensation' label, however, was a pejorative one, and its practitioners rarely declared themselves as such. The most influential works in the genre are Wilkie Collins's The Woman in White (1860) and The Moonstone (1868); Mrs H. Wood's East Lynne (1861); M. E. Braddon's Lady Audley's Secret (1862); and C. Reade's Hard Cash (1863). The novels of Rhoda *Broughton and Ouida are usually considered to be on the margins of the genre. Modern detective fiction can trace its roots back to sensation fiction.

Sense and Sensibility, a novel by J. *Austen, which grew from a sketch entitled 'Elinor and Marianne'; revised 1797–8 and again 1809; published 1811.

Mrs Henry Dashwood and her daughters Elinor and Marianne, together with the younger Margaret, are left in straitened circumstances, because the estate of which Mrs Dashwood's husband had the life interest has passed to her stepson John Dashwood. Henry Dashwood, before his death, had urgently recommended to John that he look after his stepmother and sisters, but John's selfishness, encouraged by his grasping wife (the daughter of the arrogant Mrs Ferrers), defeats his father's wish. Mrs Henry Dashwood and her daughters accordingly retire to a cottage in Devon, but not before Elinor and Edward Ferrers, brother of Mrs John Dashwood, have become much attracted to each other. However, Edward shows a strange uneasiness in his relations with Elinor. In Devon Marianne is thrown into the company of John Willoughby, an attractive but impetuous and unprincipled young man, with whom she falls desperately—and very obviously—in love. Willoughby likewise shows signs of a strong affection for her, and their engagement is expected daily. Willoughby suddenly departs for London, leaving Marianne in acute distress. Eventually Elinor and Marianne also go to London, on the invitation of their tactless and garrulous old friend Mrs Jennings. Here Willoughby shows complete indifference to Marianne, and finally, in a cruel and insolent letter, informs her of his approaching marriage to a rich heiress. Marianne makes no effort to hide her grief. Meanwhile Elinor has learned, under pledge of secrecy, from Lucy Steele (a sly, self-seeking young woman) that she and Edward Ferrers have been secretly engaged for four years. Elinor, whose self-control is in strong contrast to Marianne's demonstrative emotions, silently conceals her distress. Edward's engagement, which had been kept secret because of his financial dependence on his mother, now becomes known to her. In her fury at Edward's refusal to break his promise to Lucy, she dismisses him from her sight, and settles on his younger brother Robert the property that would otherwise have gone to Edward. At this juncture a small living is offered to Edward, and the way seems open for his marriage with Lucy. But Robert, a fashionable young fop, falls in love with Lucy, who, seeing her best interest in a marriage with the wealthier brother, throws over Edward and marries Robert. Edward, immensely relieved to be released from an engagement he has long and painfully regretted, proposes to Elinor and is accepted. Marianne, slowly recovering from the despair that followed her abandonment by Willoughby, eventually accepts the proposal of Colonel Brandon, an old family friend, whose considerable quiet attractions had been eclipsed by his brilliant rival.

sentiment, or sensibility, novel of. The object of this type of novel was to illustrate the alliance of acute sensibility with true virtue. An adherence to strict morality and honour, combined with copious feeling and a sympathetic heart, were (with whatever consequences of failure or humiliation) the marks of the man or woman of sentiment. The cult may be traced particularly to the work of *Marivaux, *Richardson, and S. *Fielding; the most popular and influential novels to which they gave rise were probably H. Brooke’s *The Fool of Quality, Sterne’s *A Sentimental Journey, and Mackenzie’s *The Man of Feeling, together with the work of F. *Brooke, C. *Lennox, and F. *Sheridan. Late in the century *Lamb’s *The Tale of Rosamund Gray (1798) was in the mainstream of such novels, but the cult was then dying. The early chapters of J. Austen’s *Northanger Abbey mock the ‘refined susceptibilities’ of the novel of sentiment, and *Sense and Sensibility was intended to demonstrate the serious consequences of following its standards. (See also NOVEL, RISE OF THE.)

sentimental comedy, a type of sentimental drama introduced by *Steele, a reaction from the comedy of the *Restoration. In France it evolved into la comédie larmoyante of La Chaussée (1692–1754). (See KELLY.)

The narrator, Parson Yorick (borrowed from *Tristram Shandy), is a man of great charm, sensibility, and gallantry, who sets out to travel through France and Italy. At the end of the book he has gone little further than Lyons, and it is not known whether Sterne intended any further volume. As it is, the work begins by breaking into the middle of a dialogue (with the famous words, ‘They order, said I, these matters better in France’) and ends ambiguously in mid-sentence: ‘So that when I stretch’d out my hand, I caught hold of the Fille de Chambre’s—’ Sterne referred to the book as his ‘Work of Redemption’ and declared that its aim was ‘to teach us to love the world and our fellow creatures’. The amiable Yorick, who revives ‘Dear sensibility!’ and is frequently moved to tears, does indeed find much to commend and little to condemn in France and the French. In parading fashionable works of travel, he contrasts his own appreciation with Smelfungus (a caricature of *Smollett) and with Mundungen (perhaps a Dr Sharp), both of whom had written disparaging travel books about Europe. Whether Sterne is serious or ironic in describing Yorick’s displays of acute sensibility is a matter of conjecture. Certainly the parson is as full of gaiety and irony as of tender feeling. In his travels from Calais to Amiens, Paris, the Bourbonsnais, and nearly to Modane, with his servant La Fleur, he enjoys many encounters with all manner of men, from marquis to potboy, and, more especially, with pretty women, who range from ladies of wealth and elegance to chambermaids and shop-girls, and include the pathetic Maria from vol. ix of *Tristram Shandy.

The book was no doubt based on Sterne’s two journeys abroad in 1762–4 and 1765. It was well received by the public, and in 1769, after Sterne’s death, was continued by a *Eugenius, traditionally assumed to be Sterne’s old friend *Hall-Stevenson. *A Sentimental Journey is probably the first English novel to survive in the handwriting of its author. There is a scholarly edition, ed. G. D. Stout Jr (1967).

Serious Call, A, to a Devout and Holy Life, see LAW.

Serious Money, by Caryl *Churchill (perf. 1987). Inspired by the deregulation of the City in 1986, known as the Big Bang, the play, written largely in spirited rhyming verse, evokes the ruthless greed, buoyant materialism, changing culture, and cynical of the financial world in the monetarist 1980s. The play opens with a short satirical extract on speculation from *Shadwell’s comedy *The Volunteers, or *The Stockjobbers (pub. 1693), and then introduces a noisy gallery of contemporary traders, dealers, jobbers, bankers, and stockbrokers. The plot revolves round Scilla Todd’s investigations into the suspicious death of her brother Jake, involved in insider dealing and an attempted takeover bid of the symbolically named company Albion: Churchill’s ear for the new jargon of the media, PR, and the City itself is acute and the play, launched at the *Royal Court, was also a West End success, much enjoyed by those it mocked. The play ends with a chorus singing in praise and hope of ‘Five more Glorious Years’—‘pissed and promiscuous, the money’s ridiculous—five more glorious years’.

sestina, a poem of six six-line stanzas (with an envoy) in which the line-endings of the first stanza are repeated, but in different order, in the other five [OED].

Setebos, a god of the Patagonians, worshipped by Caliban’s mother Sycorax (in Shakespeare’s *The Tempest). His purpose in creating the world is worked out by Caliban in R. *Browning’s ‘Caliban upon Setebos’.

SETH, Vikram (1952– ), poet, novelist, short story and travel writer, born in India and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, Stanford University, and Nanjing University, China. Early works included collections of poems, Mappings (1981) and The Humble Administrator’s Garden (1985). A travel book, From Heaven Lake: Travels through Sinkiang and Tibet, appeared in 1983. The Golden Gate (1986) is a novel set in San Francisco written in 14-line rhyming stanzas, a virtuoso performance of Byronic verve with audacious rhymes and great metrical fluency, dealing with ultra-modern protagonists in what might have been thought an archaic medium. A Suitable Boy (1993) is a long and intricately structured novel about the Mehras’ search for a suitable husband for a daughter, Lata. The novel is set in India some years after Independence and Partition, and the domestic and the political are entwined in the interlocking lives and friendships of four families, the Mehras, the Kapoors, the Chatterjis (Hindu), and the Khans (Muslim). Other works include Three Chinese Poets (1992, translation) and Arion and the Dolphin (1994), a children’s book and opera libretto. See Anglo-Indian Literature.

SETTLE, Elkanah (1648–1724), educated at Trinity College, Oxford, the author of a series of bombastic Oriental melodramas which threatened Dryden’s popularity and aroused his hostility. He appears to have written Cambyses (1667) while still at Oxford, and his The Empress of Morocco (1673) had such a vogue that Dryden, with Crowne and Shadwell, wrote a pamphlet of criticism of it. Settle retorted with an attack on Dryden’s Almanzor and Almahide, and Dryden vented his resentment by satirizing Settle as Doeg in the second part of Absalom and Achitophel. Settle published Absalom Senior, or Achitophel Transposed in 1682, and Reflections on Several of Mr Dryden’s Plays in 1687. He was appointed city poet in 1691, took to writing drolls for Bartholomew Fair (as he may have done before his success), and died in the Charterhouse. He also wrote two interesting rogue biographies (see Rogue Literature).

Seven Champions of Christendom, The Famous History of the, see JOHNSON, R.

Seven Deadly Sins, usually given as Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Covetousness, Gluttony, and Lust; frequently personified in medieval literature (e.g. Piers Plowman, B, Passus V; Dunbar’s ‘The Dance of the Sevin Deidly Synnis’), and used too in Chaucer’s ‘Parson’s Tale’ (see Canterbury Tales, 24) and in Spenser’s Faerie Queene where they are personified again. They provide one of the organizing structures for Dante’s Inferno and Purgatorio; the most important medieval source authority for these literary occurrences is believed to be Guilielmus Peraldus’ Summa seu Tractatus de Viciis which dates from the mid-13th cent. See M. W. Bloomfield, The Seven Deadly Sins (1952).

Seven Sages of Rome, The, a metrical romance of the early 14th cent., varying in length in different versions from 2,500 to 4,300 lines. In form it is a framed collection of tales, derived through Latin and French from Eastern collections, the original of which is the Indian Book of Sindibad (see Syntipas), of interest as one of the earliest English instances of the form of short verse story used by Chaucer in The Canterbury Tales.

The Emperor Diocletian has his son educated by seven sages. His stepmother is jealous of the boy and accuses him to the emperor of attempting to seduce her; the boy is silent for seven days, under the influence of the stepmother’s magic, and he is ordered to execution. On each of the seven nights a tale is told by the queen to illustrate the dangers of supplantation of the emperor by his son, and on each of the following mornings a tale is told by one of the sages on the theme of the danger of trusting women. The emperor is alternately persuaded by the queen and the sages. When the seven days are passed, the boy speaks and exposes the stepmother, who is burnt. The most widely attested manuscript version (‘A’) in 3,974 lines of short couplets has been edited by K. Brunner (EETS OS 191, 1933; repr. 1971).

Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, seven noble Christian youths of Ephesus who, fleeing from the persecution of Decius (AD 250), concealed themselves in a cavern in a neighbouring mountain. They were ordered by the emperor to be walled up therein, and fell into a deep slumber, which was miraculously prolonged for 187 years. At the end of that time the slaves of one Adolius, to whom the inheritance of the mountain had descended, removed the stones with which the cavern had been walled up, and the seven sleepers were permitted to awake. Under the impression that they had slept a few hours, one of them proceeded to the city for food, but was unable to recognize the place. His singular dress and obsolete speech (or, in some versions, the fact that he tried to buy food with obsolete money) caused him to be brought before a magistrate, and the miracle was brought to light. The people, headed by the bishop, hastened to visit the cavern of the sleepers, ‘who bestowed their benediction, related their story, and at the same instant peaceably expired’ (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, xxxiii). The legend was translated from the Syriac by Gregory of Tours, and is also given by other authors. It is included in the Koran (sura 18) among Muhammad’s revelations.

Seven Types of Ambiguity, a critical work by W. *Empson, published 1930, rev. 1947, 1953; one of the most enjoyable and influential offshoots from I. A. *Richards’s experiments with practical criticism. Empson uses the term ambiguity ‘in an extended sense’, to refer to ‘any verbal nuance, however slight, which gives room for alternative reactions to the same piece of language’. The first, or simplest, type of ambiguity he defines as simple metaphor, ‘a word or a grammatical construction effective in several ways at once’. The second occurs ‘when two or more meanings are resolved into one’ (as by ‘Double Grammar’ in Shakespeare); the third consists of two apparently disconnected meanings given simultaneously, as in a pun, or, by extension, in allegory or pastoral, where reference is made to more than one ‘universe of discourse’; the fourth occurs when ‘alternative meanings combine to make clear a complicated state of mind in the author’ (with examples from Shakespeare, *Donne, and G. M. *Hopkins); the fifth consists of what Empson calls ‘fortunate confusion’, with examples from *Shelley and *Swinburne, suggesting the possibility that 19th-cent. technique is ‘in part the metaphysical tradition dug up when rotten’; the sixth occurs when a statement in itself meaningless or contradictory forces the reader to supply interpretations; and an account of the seventh, which ‘marks a division in the author’s mind’, is accompanied by quotations from *Freud and illustrations from *Crashaw, *Keats, Hopkins. In detail, the work is an interesting example of the rewards of close linguistic analysis, applied to a wide though well-established range of authors; more broadly, it indicates the tendency of the period to elevate intellectual and verbal complexity and richness above simplicity.

SEVERN, Joseph (1793–1879), painter, and devoted friend and correspondent of *Keats, of whom he made several drawings and portraits, and of whom he took a death-mask. He won the RA Gold Medal in 1818 but had little public success. He accompanied Keats to Italy in 1820 and attended him at his death. His care of Keats brought him to general notice and for a time he prospered as a painter, especially in English circles in Rome. He attempted fiction, without success, but published The Vicissitudes of Keats’s Fame in 1863. He was eventually given the British consulship in Rome.

SÉVIGNÉ, Marie de Rabutin-Chantal, marquise de (1626–96), French letter writer. Orphaned at a very young age, she was brought up by an uncle as a person with little public success. He accompanied Keats to Italy in 1820 and attended him at his death. His care of Keats brought him to general notice and for a time he prospered as a painter, especially in English circles in Rome. He attempted fiction, without success, but published The Vicissitudes of Keats’s Fame in 1863. He was eventually given the British consulship in Rome.

SEWARD, Anna (1742–1809), poet, essayist, and letter writer, born in Eyam, Derbyshire; known as the ‘Swan of Lichfield’, where she lived from the age of 10, and where her father was canon; he also edited the works of Beaumont and Fletcher (10 vols, 1750). Her grandfather John Hunter had taught the young Dr *Johnson and she furnished *Boswell with many details of his early life, while admitting that she did not much care for him. Her poems included Elegy on Captain Cook (1780), Llangollen Vale, with Original Sonnets (1799). Her literary friends included E. Darwin (of whom she wrote a memoir, 1804), T. *Day, and *Hayley. In 1802 she wrote an admiring letter to Sir W. *Scott, who found some merit in her poetry and edited her works in three volumes, with a memoir, in 1810, at her suggestion. Her letters were published in 1811 (6 vols) and there is a selection in H. Pearson’s The Swan of Lichfield (1936).

SEWELL, Anna (1820–78). She wrote only one book, Black Beauty (1877), a story for children relating the life of a black horse, which suffers much but eventually finds a happy home. The book, for which she received £20, was published three months before her death; its immediate success and fame survived for many generations, and it became established as a children’s classic. There is a life by S. Chitty (1971).

SEXTON, Anne (1928–1974), American poet, born into a privileged Massachusetts family. Following an early elopement, children, and a breakdown, she started to write poetry as therapy. She attended Robert *Lowell’s classes with Sylvia *Plath, with whom she shares the use of a dramatic, apparently *confessional, T, and the thematic territory of family life, jealous passion, and mental illness. Her early work makes dynamic use of strict poetic form, but, from the Pulitzer Prize-winning Live or Die (1966), this is replaced by free verse which relies on dense, sometimes surreal, metaphors, wit, and rhythmic lists for impact. Her later work is increasingly haunted by a troubled relationship with God. Despite much success, especially with her adaptation of Grimm, Transformations (1971), Sexton took her own life, an event which has overshadowed her considerable gift, range, and influence, notably on Sharon Olds. Collected Poems was published in 1981, Selected Poems in 1988.

Shadow, Simon, in Shakespeare’s 2 Henry IV, one of Falstaff’s recruits.

SHADWELL, Thomas (?1642–92), dramatist, whose first play The Sullen Lovers (1668) was based on Molière’s Les Fâcheux; in its preface he proclaimed himself a follower of *Jonson’s comedy of humours. He wrote some 14 comedies, including The Squire of Alsatia (1688), The Virtuoso (1676, a satire on the Royal Society), Epsom Wells (1672), and Bury Fair (1689); the last two give an interesting if scurrilous picture of contemporary manners, watering places, and amusements. He also wrote operas, adapting Shakespeare’s The Tempest as The Enchanted Island (1674). A successful dramatist in his day, he has been perhaps unfairly remembered for his quarrel with *Dryden, dating from 1682. He was probably the author of The Medal of John Bayes (1682) and other anonymous attacks on Dryden; Dryden’s counter-attacks include *Mac Flecknoe and the second part of *Absalom and Achitophel, where Shadwell appears as Og. Shadwell somewhat plaintively defends himself from the charge of dullness in his dedication to *Sadley of his translation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal (1687). As a ‘true-blue’ Whig, he succeeded Dryden as *poet laureate and historiographer at the revolution in 1689; their quarrel had been partly political, for Shadwell had been virtually unable to get his plays performed during the last years of Charles II’s reign, or in James II’s.

SHAFFER, Peter Levin (1926— ), playwright, born in Liverpool, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. His first play, Five Finger Exercise (1958), a drama of middle-class family life, was followed by many other successes, including The Royal Hunt of the Sun (1964, pub. 1965), an epic about the conquest of Peru; Black Comedy (1965, pub. 1967), a cleverly constructed *farce set in a London apartment which reverses dark and light, so that the cast, in full glare of the lights and view of the audience, stumbles around during the pitch darkness of a dramatic electricity failure; Equus (1973), a drama about an analyst’s relationship with his horse-obsessed patient; Amadeus (1979, pub. 1980), which deals with the nature of creativity through a portrayal of the composers Mozart and Salieri; Letter and Lovage (1987); and The Gift of the Gorgon (1992). His twin brother Anthony Shaffer, author of Sleuth (1970, pub. 1971), is also a successful playwright.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, first Baron Ashley and first earl of (1621–83), a statesman prominent on the king’s side in the Civil War, as leader of the parliamentary opposition to *Cromwell, after the Restoration as a member of the *Cabal and chancellor. After his dismissal he was leader of the opposition, a promoter of the Exclusion Bill, and a supporter of Monmouth. He is closely associated with the foundation of the Whig party and was for a time its most prominent politician. He died in Holland. He was satirized as Achitophel in Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel, by Otway in Venice Preserv’d, and by many others.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of (1671–1713). Excluded by ill health from active politics after 1702, he devoted himself to intellectual pursuits, and in particular to moral and aesthetic philosophy. His principal writings are embodied in his Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times, published 1711 (rev. edn. 1714), which included various treatises previously published (notably his Inquiry Concerning Virtue, or Merit, 1699). Shaftesbury was influenced by *Deism; he was at once a Platonist and a churchman, an opponent of the selfish theory of conduct advocated by *Hobbes. Man has ‘affections’, Shaftesbury held, not only for himself but for the creatures about him. ‘To have one’s affections right and entire, not only in respect of oneself, but of society and the public: this is rectitude, integrity, or virtue.’ And there is no conflict between the self-regarding and social affections; for the individual’s own good is included in the good of society. Moreover, man has a capacity for distinguishing right and wrong, the beauty or ugliness of actions and affections, and this he calls the ‘moral sense’. To be truly virtuous, a man must have a *disinterested affection for what he perceives to be right. Shaftesbury’s aesthetic thought, by its attempt to explain nature by the analogy of art and its assertion of a close connection between art and morality, had some influence on later writers, such as *Arbuckle in Hibernicus’s Letters, and *Akenside in The Pleasures of Imagination. His influence is also seen in the writing of *Fielding, and in the philosophy of *Hutcheson and *Turnbull. A master satirist, Shaftesbury employs an amalgam of irony, indirection, ambiguity, and juxtaposition to achieve a broad range of witty effects. His principle that ideas and arguments should be subject to ‘the test of ridicule’ influenced many 18th-cent. writers.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, seventh earl of (1801–85), philanthropist, active in many movements for the protection of the working classes and the benefit of the poor.

SHAH, Idries (1924–96), writer and teacher, born in the north of India, whose many works have done much to introduce Sufi thought to the West. They include The Sufis (1964), The Tales of the Dervishes (1967), Caravan of Dreams (1968), The Way of the Sufi (1968), and Learning How to Live (1978, with an introduction by D. *Lessing, 1981: Lessing has been much influenced by his work). He also collected stories from the *Nasrudin corpus and published other selections of Oriental tales. His works are unconventional mixtures of jokes, anecdotes, questions, precepts, and illuminations, inspired by Sufi wisdom and psychology.

SHAKESPEARE, William (1564–1616), dramatist, man of the theatre, and poet, baptized in Holy Trinity Church, Stratford-upon-Avon, on 26 Apr. 1564. His birth is traditionally celebrated on 23 Apr., which is also known to have been the date of his death. He was the eldest son of John Shakespeare, a glover and dealer in local affairs, becoming bailiff and justice of the peace in 1568, but whose fortunes later declined. John had married c.1557 Mary Arden, who came from a family of higher social standing. Of their eight children, four sons and one daughter survived childhood.

The standard and kind of education indicated by William’s writings are such as he might have received at the local grammar school, whose records for the period are lost. On 28 Nov. 1582 a bond was issued permitting him to marry Anne Hathaway of Shottery, a village close to Stratford. She was eight years his senior. A daughter, Susanna, was baptized on 26 May 1583, and twins, Hamnet and Judith, on 2 Feb. 1585.
We do not know how Shakespeare was employed in early manhood; the best-authenticated tradition is *Aubrey’s: ‘he had been in his younger yeares a Schoolmaster in the Countrie.’ This has fed speculation that he is the ‘William Shakeshafte’ named in the will of the recusant Alexander Houghton, of Lea Hall, Lancashire, in 1581, and in turn that he had Catholic sympathies.

Nothing is known of his beginnings as a writer, nor when or in what capacity he entered the theatre. In 1587 an actor of the Queen’s Men died through manslaughter shortly before the company visited Stratford. That Shakespeare may have filled the vacancy is an intriguing speculation. The first printed allusion to him is from 1592, in the pamphlet *Greene’s Groats-Worth of Witte, ostensibly by R. *Greene but possibly by *Chettle. Mention of ‘an upstart Crow’ who ‘supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blanke verse as the best of you’ and who ‘is in his owne conceit the onely Shake-scene in a countrey’ suggests rivalry, and parody of a line from *Henry VI shows that Shakespeare was established on the London literary scene. He was a leading member of the Lord Chamberlain’s Men soon after their reformation in 1594. With them he worked and grew prosperous for the rest of his career as they developed into London’s leading company, occupying the *Globe Theatre from 1599, becoming the King’s Men on James I’s accession in 1603, and taking over the Blackfriars as a winter house in 1608. He is the only prominent playwright of his time to have had so stable a relationship with a single company.

Theatrical life centred on London, which necessarily became Shakespeare’s professional base, as various records testify. But his family remained in Stratford. In 1596 his father applied, successfully, for a grant of arms, and so became a gentleman; in August William’s son Hamnet died, and was buried in Holy Trinity churchyard. In October Shakespeare was lodging in Bishopsgate, London, and in May of the next year he bought a substantial Stratford house, New Place. His father died in 1601, and in the following year William paid £320 for 127 acres of land in Old Stratford. In 1604 he lodged in London with a Huguenot family called Mountjoy. In the next year he paid £440 for an interest in the Stratford tithes, and there in June 1607 his daughter Susanna married a physician, John Hall. His only granddaughter, Elizabeth Hall, was christened the following February; in 1608 his mother died and was buried in Holy Trinity.

Evidence of Shakespeare’s increasing involvement with Stratford at this time suggests that he was withdrawing to New Place, but his name continues to appear in London records; in Mar. 1613, for instance, he paid £140 for a gatehouse close to the Blackfriars Theatre, probably as an investment. In the same month he and the actor R. *Burbage received 44 shillings each for providing an *impressa to be borne by the earl of Rutland at a court tourney. In Feb. 1616 his second daughter Judith married Thomas Quiney, causing her father to make alterations to the draft of his will, which he signed on 25 Mar. He died, according to the inscription on his monument, on 23 Apr., and was buried in Holy Trinity. His widow died in 1623 and his last surviving descendant, Elizabeth Hall, in 1670.

Shakespeare's only writings for the press (apart from the disputed ‘Funeral Elegy’ of 1613) are the narrative poems *Venus and Adonis and *The Rape of Lucrece, published 1593 and 1594 respectively, each with the author’s dedication to Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, and the short poem *The Phoenix and the Turtle, published 1601 in Robert Chester’s *Loves Martyr, a collection of poems by various hands. His *Sonnets, dating probably from the mid-1590s, appeared in 1609, apparently not by his agency; they bear a dedication to the mysterious ‘Mr W.H.’ over the initials of the publisher, Thomas Thorpe. The volume also includes the poem *A Lover’s Complaint.

Shakespeare’s plays were published by being performed. Scripts of only half of them appeared in print in his lifetime, some in short, sometimes manifestly corrupt, texts, often known as ‘bad quartos’. Records of performance are scanty and haphazard: as a result dates and order of composition, especially of the earlier plays, are often difficult to establish. The list that follows gives dates of first printing of all the plays other than those that first appeared in the 1623 *Folio.

Probably Shakespeare began to write for the stage in the late 1580s. The ambitious trilogy on the reign of Henry VI, now known as *Henry VI Parts 1, 2, and 3, and its sequel *Richard III, are among his early works. Parts 2 and 3 were printed in variant texts as *The First Part of the Contention betwixt the Two Famous Houses of York and Lancaster (1594) and *The True Tragedy of Richard, Duke of York (1595). *Henry VI Part 1 may have been written after these. A variant quarto of *Richard III appeared in 1597. Shakespeare’s first Roman tragedy is *Titus Andronicus, printed 1594, and his earliest comedies are *The Two Gentlemen of Verona, *The Taming of the Shrew (a derivative play, *The Taming of a Shrew, was printed 1594), *The Comedy of Errors (acted 1594), and *Love’s Labour’s Lost (printed 1598). All these plays are thought to have been written by 1595.

Particularly difficult to date is *King John: scholars still dispute whether a two-part play, *The Troublesome Reign of John, King of England, printed 1591, is its source or (as seems more probable) a derivative. *Richard II, printed 1597, is usually dated 1595. For some years after this, Shakespeare concentrated on comedy, in *A Midsummer Night’s Dream and *The Merchant of Venice (both printed 1600), *The Merry Wives of Windsor (related to the later history plays, and printed in a variant text 1602), *Much Ado about Nothing (printed 1600), *As You Like It (mentioned in 1600), and *Twelfth Night, probably written in 1600 or soon afterwards. *Romeo and Juliet (ascribed to the mid-1590s) is a tragedy with strongly comic elements, and the tetralogy begun by *Richard II is completed by three comical histories: *Henry IV Parts 1 and 2, each printed a year or two after composition (Part 1 1598, Part 2 1600), and *Henry V, almost certainly written 1599, printed, in a shortened, possibly corrupt, text, 1600.

In 1598 *Meres, a minor writer, published praise of Shakespeare in Palladis Tamia: Wit's Treasury, mentioning 12 of the plays so far listed (assuming that by *Henry the 4 he means both Parts) along with another, *Love's Labour's Won, apparently either a lost play or an alternative title for an extant one.

Late in the century Shakespeare turned again to tragedy. A Swiss traveller saw *Hamlet apparently dates from the following year, but was only entered in the register of the *Stationers' Company in July 1602; a short text probably reconstructed from memory by an actor appeared in 1603, and a good text printed from Shakespeare's manuscript in late 1604 (some copies bear the date 1605). A play that defies easy classification is *Troilus and Cressida, probably written 1602, printed 1609. The comedy *All's Well that Ends Well, too, is probably of this period, as is *Measure for Measure, played at court in December 1604. The tragedy *Othello, played at court the previous month, reached print abnormally late in 1622. *King Lear probably dates, in its first version, from 1605; the quarto printed in 1608 is now thought to have been badly printed from Shakespeare's original manuscript. The text printed in the Folio appears to represent a revision dating from a few years later. Much uncertainty surrounds *Timon of Athens, printed in the Folio from uncompleted papers, and probably written in collaboration with T. *Middleton. *Macbeth, probably adapted by Middleton, is generally dated 1606, *Antony and Cleopatra 1606–7, and *Coriolanus 1607–9.

Towards the end of his career, though while still in his early forties, Shakespeare turned to romantic tragi-comedy. *Pericles, printed in a debased text 1609, certainly existed in the previous year; it is the only play generally believed to be mostly, if not entirely, by Shakespeare that was not included in the 1623 Folio. *Forman, the astrologer, records seeing both *Cardenio, acted by the King's Men in 1613 and attributed to the two dramatists in a Stationers' Register entry of 1653; and *The Two Noble Kinsmen, which appears to incorporate elements from a 1613 masque by F. *Beaumont, and was first printed 1634. No Shakespeare play survives in authorial manuscript, though three pages of revisions to a manuscript play, *Sir Thomas *More, variously dated about 1593 or 1601, are often thought to be by Shakespeare and in his hand.

It may have been soon after Shakespeare died, in 1616, that his colleagues *Heminges and Condell began to prepare Mr William Shakespeare’s Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies, better known as the First Folio, which appeared in 1623. Only once before, in the 1616 *Jonson folio, had an English dramatist's plays appeared in collected form. Heminges and Condell, or their agents, worked with care, assembling manuscripts, providing reliable printed copy when it was available, but also causing quartos to be brought wholly or partially into line with prompt-books. Their volume includes a dedicatory epistle to William and Philip Herbert, ears of Pembroke and Montgomery, an address 'To the great Variety of Readers' by themselves, and verse tributes, most notably the substantial poem by Jonson in which he declares that Shakespeare 'was not of an age, but for all time'. Above all, the Folio is important because it includes 16 plays which in all probability would not otherwise have survived. Its title-page engraving, by *Droeshout, is, along with the half-length figure bust by Gheerart Janssen erected in Holy Trinity, Stratford, by 1623, the only image of Shakespeare with strong claims to authenticity. The Folio was reprinted three times in the 17th cent.; the second issue (1664) of the third edition adds *Pericles and six more plays. Other plays, too, have been ascribed to Shakespeare, but few scholars would add anything to the accepted canon except part (or even all) of *Edward III, printed anonymously 1596.

Over 200 years after Shakespeare died, doubts were raised about the authenticity of his works (see *Baconian theory). The product largely of snobbery—reluctance to believe that a man of humble origins wrote many of the world's greatest dramatic masterpieces—and of the desire for self-advertisement, they are best answered by the facts that the monument to William Shakespeare of Stratford-upon-Avon compares him with *Socrates and *Virgil, and that Jonson's verses in the Folio identify the author of that volume as the 'Sweet Swan of Avon'.

The documents committed to print between 1593 and 1623 have generated an enormous amount of varied kinds of human activity. The first editor to try to bring them into order, reconcile their discrepancies, correct their errors, and present them for readers of his time was the dramatist *Rowe, in 1709. His 18th-cent. successors include *Pope (1723–5), *Theobald (1733), Dr *Johnson (1765), *Capell (1767–8), and *Malone (1790: third variorum 1821 by James Boswell the younger, out of Malone's edition). The most important 19th-cent. edition is the Cambridge Shakespeare (1863–6, rev. 1891–3), on which the Globe text (1864) was based. The American New Variorum edition, still in progress, began to appear in 1871. Early in the 20th cent. advances in textual studies transformed attitudes to the text. Subsequent editions include *Quiller-Couch's and J. Dover *Wilson's New...

Great critics who have written on Shakespeare include Dryden, Samuel Johnson, S. T. *Coleridge, Hazlitt, A. C. *Bradley, and (less reverently) G. B. *Shaw. The German Shakespeare Jahrbuch has been appearing since 1865; other major periodicals are Shakespeare Survey (annual from 1948), Shakespeare Quarterly (from 1950), and Shakespeare Studies (annual from 1965). The standard biographical studies are E. K. *Chambers, William Shakespeare: A Study of Facts and Problems (2 vols, 1930) and S. *Schoenbaum, William Shakespeare: A Documentary Life (1975). The play scripts have been translated into over 90 languages and have inspired poets, novelists, dramatists, painters, composers, choreographers, film-makers, and other artists at all levels of creative activity. They have formed the basis for the English theatrical tradition, and they continue to find realization in readers’ imaginations and, in richly varied transmutations, on the world’s stages.

Shakespearean Criticism, a two-volume collection of the lectures of S. T. *Coleridge given between 1808 and 1818, ed. T. M. Raysor (1930).

Coleridge himself never published these lectures. Vol. i consists of notes and fragments patched together from his papers; vol. ii of shorthand reports, and contemporary accounts made by members of his audience. Uneven in quality, at his best Coleridge combines acute insight into details of dramatic psychology, with his broad general theories about the ‘organic’ form of the Shakespearian play and the process of creating character from ‘within’. Coleridge drew heavily on the aesthetics of *Schelling about the role of the unconscious in art, and on the dramatic criticism of A. W. *Schlegel (1811).

Shakuntalā, a celebrated Sanskrit drama by *Kālidāsa, translated by Sir W. *Jones. It tells the story of King Dushyanta’s love for the maiden Shakuntalā, whom he sees while hunting in the forest; he contracts a summary marriage with her and departs, leaving her a royal ring as a pledge. She is then laid under a curse by the sage Durvasas, who thinks he has been treated with insufficient respect; he decrees that her husband the king shall forget her until he once more sees the ring. Unfortunately she loses the ring while bathing, and when she goes to the palace, she is rejected; she returns to the forest, where she gives birth to Bharata. The ring is shortly recovered by a fisherman from the belly of a fish, the king remembers his lost love, seeks her, and finds her, and they are reunited. Kālidāsa’s play was greatly admired by *Goethe.

Shallow, in Shakespeare’s 2 *Henry IV a foolish country justice. He appears again in *The Merry Wives of Windsor, upbraiding Falstaff for beating his men and killing his deer. This event has been taken as a reference to a poaching incident in Shakespeare’s early days.

Shamela Andrews, An Apology for the Life of Mrs, a parody by H. *Fielding, published pseudonymously 1741.

Richardson’s *Pamela was published in 1740, and in 1741 Fielding, irritated by what he regarded as the sententious hypocrisy of the book, replied with the lively travesty Shamela. The gullible Parson Tickletext, overcome by the beauty of the person and character of Pamela, writes to his friend, Parson Oliver, commending ‘sweet, dear, pretty Pamela’. Oliver, however, has in his possession certain letters which reveal the true nature and history of the heroine. Events and characters remain as in *Pamela, but all is now seen in a very different light, with Parson Williams appearing as a scheming rogue, Mr B as Mr Booby, Pamela as a calculating hussy, and morality equated with expediency throughout. Richardson was convinced the work was Fielding’s and never forgave him. The novel’s title satirically alludes to An Apology for the Life of Colley *Cibber (1740).

Shandean, derived from ‘shandy’, a word of obscure origin, meaning ‘crack-brained, half-crazy’, now used to describe anyone or anything reminiscent of Sterne’s *Tristram Shandy.

Shandy, Tristram, Walter, Mrs, and Captain Tobias (Toby), see *Tristram Shandy.

SHAPCOTT, Jo (1953– ), poet, born in London and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, Oxford, and Harvard. Her first collection was Electroplating the Baby (1988), of which the title poem explored a characteristic vein of scientific and medical fantasist: this was followed by Phrase Book (1992), with its invigorating sequence of ‘Mad Cow’ poems (1996), and My Life Asleep (1998). Her poetry combines contemporary references (to film, cartoon, news stories) with literary and historical allusions, and is distinguished by sharp word-play and a disturbing surreal animism. She edited Emergency Kit (1996), an eclectic anthology of contemporary verse, with Matthew *Sweeney.

SHARP, Cecil (1859–1924), English folk-music collector and editor. He began collecting folk songs in 1903, and soon became the most important of all the workers in SHARP, James (1618–79), appointed archbishop of St Andrews in 1661 as a reward for his assistance in restoring episcopacy in Scotland. His treachery to the Presbyterian cause made him obnoxious to the Covenanters, a party of whom murdered him on Magus Muir. Oliver Cromwell had already nicknamed him ‘Sharp of that ilk’. The murder figures in Scott’s *Old Mortality.

SHARP, William (‘Fiona Macleod’) (1855–1905), born in Paisley, educated at Glasgow University. He wrote under his own name essays, verse, minor novels, and lives of D. G. Rossetti (1882), *Shelley (1887), *Heine (1888), and R. Browning (1890). He is chiefly remembered for his mystical Celtic tales and romances of peasant life by ‘Fiona Macleod’ written in the manner of the *Celtic *Twilight movement. These include Pharaoh (1893), The Mountain Lovers (1895), The Sin Eater (1895), and plays, including The House of Usna (1903) and The Immortal Hour (1900). Sharp successfully concealed the identity of ‘Fiona Macleod’ (including writing a bogus entry in *Who’s Who) until his death.

SHARPE, Tom (1928– ), novelist, born in London and educated at Lancing and Pembroke College, Cambridge. He spent some years in South Africa (1951–61) and his first two novels, Riotous Assembly (1971) and Indecent Exposure (1973), are political satires set in that country. On his return to England he taught for a decade in Cambridge, and Porterhouse Blue (1974) is a farcical *campus novel set in a fictitious college. Other works, all in a vein of fierce and sometimes grotesque satirical comedy, include Blott on the Landscape (1975), Wilt (1976), and Ancestral Vices (1980).

SHAW, (George) Bernard (1856–1950), born in Dublin, the youngest child of unhappily married and inattentive parents. In 1876 he moved to London, joining his mother and sister, and began his literary career by ghosting music criticism and writing five unsuccessful novels (including Cashel Byron’s Profession, 1886, and An Unsocialist Socialist, 1887, both first published in Today, in 1885–6 and 1884 respectively). During his first nine years in London he calculated that he earned less than £10 by his pen. He wrote music, art, and book criticism for the Dramatic Review (1885–6), Our Corner (1885–6), the *Pall Mall Gazette (1885–8), the World (1886–94), and the Star (1888–90, as ‘Corno di Bassetto’). His music criticism has been collected in three volumes as Shaw’s Music (1981, ed. Dan H. Laurence) (see also under music, literature of) and his theatre criticism in four volumes as The Drama Observed (1993, ed. B. Dukore). He was a drama critic for the *Saturday Review (1895–8) and produced a series of remarkable and controversial weekly articles (published in book form as Our Theatres in the Nineties, 3 vols, 1932), voicing his impatience with the artificiality of the London theatre and pleading for the performance of plays dealing with contemporary social and moral problems. He campaigned for a theatre of ideas in Britain comparable to that of *Ibsen and *Strindberg in Scandinavia, and came nearest to achieving this with *Granville-Barker at the Court Theatre in London between 1904 and 1907. During this period he took up various causes and joined several literary and political societies, notably the *Fabian Society, serving on the executive committee from 1885 to 1911. Not naturally a good public speaker, he schooled himself to become a brilliant one and gave over 1,000 lectures. He edited and contributed to Fabian Essays in Socialism (1889) and wrote many tracts setting down his socialist and collectivist principles. He was a freethinker, a supporter of women’s rights, and an advocate of equality of income, the abolition of private property, and a radical change in the voting system. He also campaigned for the simplification of spelling and punctuation and the reform of the English alphabet. He was well known as a journalist and public speaker when his first play, *Widowers’ Houses (pub. 1893), was produced in 1892, but it met with little success. There followed Arms and the Man (1894, pub. 1898: partly used for Oscar Straus’s musical The Chocolate Soldier), The Devil’s Disciple (perf. NY 1897, pub. 1901), You Never Can Tell (1899, pub. 1898), Caesar and Cleopatra (pub. 1901, perf. Berlin 1906), Mrs Warren’s Profession (pub. 1898, perf. 1902), and *John Bull’s Other Island (1904, pub. NY 1907), a play which, thanks to its characteristic ‘Shavian’ wit, brought his first popular success in London. The critics also were gradually persuaded that the plays were not simply dry vehicles for his reformist zeal.

which a wide-ranging miscellany of episodes, reflections, and pugnacious opinions is haphazardly held together by the character of a 'Noble Savage', the Native American Cannassetego. (See PRIMITIVISM.)

SHEBBEARE, John (1709–88), an apothecary and surgeon who gave up his practice in about 1754 to devote himself to writing. He became a pungent and often scurrilous pamphleteer (twice imprisoned for libel), and was a bitter opponent of *Smollett, who satirized him as Ferret in *Sir Launcelot *Greaves. He also wrote many political and medical works, and two novels, The Marriage Act (1754) and Lydia (1755), in which a wide-ranging miscellany of episodes, reflections, and pugnacious opinions is haphazardly held together by the character of a 'Noble Savage', the Native American Cannassetego. (See PRIMITIVISM.)

SHEFFIELD, John (1648–1721), a patron of *Dryden and a friend of *Pope, and a statesman who held high offices but was 'neither esteemed nor beloved'. He wrote an Essay upon Satire (published anonymously, ?1680), which cost Dryden a beating at the hands of *Rochester's braves, and an Essay upon Poetry (1682) of no great value. He erected the monument to Dryden in Westminster Abbey.

Sheik, The, a best-selling novel by E(dith) M(aude) Hull, the retiring wife of a Derbyshire pig-farmer. Published in 1919, it had an international success, and was to provide Rudolph Valentino with one of his most famous film roles. It is the erotic and sadomasochistic story of 'proud Diana Mayo', an English girl kidnapped by the sheik, whose brutal treatment of her finally wins her devotion; at this point it emerges he is not an Arab at all, but, in Claud Cockburn's words, 'son of a tip-top British peer and his beautiful Spanish wife...everything is race-wise and class-wise OK.' (Bestseller: The Books that Everyone Read 1900–1939, 1972). See ROMANTIC FICTION.

SHELDON, Gilbert (1598–1677), warden of All Souls College, Oxford, 1636–48, and archbishop of Canterbury from 1663 until his death. As chancellor of Oxford he built and endowed, at his own expense, in 1669, the Sheldonian Theatre, where much of the printing work of the university was conducted until the Clarendon Building was erected in 1713.

SHELLEY, Mary Wollstonecraft (1797–1851), only daughter of W. *Godwin and Mary *Wollstonecraft. Her mother died a few days after her birth. In 1814 she left England with P. B. *Shelley, and married him in 1816 on the death of his wife Harriet. Only one of their children, Percy, survived infancy. She returned to England in 1823, after Shelley's death. She is best remembered as the author of Frankenstein, or The Modern Prometheus (1818), but wrote several other works. Valperga (1824) is a romance set in 14th-cent. Italy. The Last Man (1826), a novel set in the future, describes England as a republic, and the gradual destruction of the human race by plague; its narrator, Lionel Verney, begins life as a shepherd boy and after many wanderings finds himself as the last survivor amidst the ruined grandeurs of Rome in the year 2100, an interesting variation of the 'Noble Savage' motif (see PRIMITIVISM). The same motif is seen in Lodore (1835); the heroine, Ethel, is taken as a child by her father, Lord Lodore, to the wilds of Illinois and reared amidst the grandest objects of nature, whence she returns to a life of romance and penury in London reminiscent of Mary Shelley's early years. She wrote other novels, several biographies, and many short stories, most of which were published in the Keepsake; some have *science fiction elements, others are *Gothic or *historical, and many are continental in setting. Her Rambles in Germany and Italy, in 1840, 1842 and 1843 (1844) was well received. She also edited her husband's poems (1830) and his essays, letters, etc. (1840). Her children's story Maurice, written in 1820, Shelley, Memoirs of, by *Peacock, published 1858. Not a full-dress biography, it originated as a review of reminiscences by *Trelawny and T. J. *Hogg, which Peacock thought inaccurate, particularly in relation to Shelley’s first wife Harriet Westbrook. Peacock’s book is polished and reliable, but its reticence and its willingness to question Shelley’s veracity have not endeared it to the poet’s admirers.

SHELLEY, Percy Bysshe (1792–1822). The eldest son of the MP for Horsham (and later baronet), he was born at Field Place, Sussex, and destined for a parliamentary career. Active, mischievous, and highly imaginative as a child, he was conventionally educated at Syon House Academy, Eton, and University College, Oxford; an upbringing that made him deeply unhappy and rebellious. At school he was mocked and bullied as ‘Mad Shelley’ and the ‘Eton Atheist’; at home he was worshipped by a tribe of younger sisters; a pattern that recurs throughout his life.

Early encouraged in his ‘printing freaks’, he privately published a series of *Gothic-horror novelettes and verses in his teens: Zastrozzi (1810); Original Poetry by Victor and Cazire (1810, with his beloved sister Elizabeth); and St Irvyne or The Rosicrucian (1811). At Oxford he read radical authors—*Godwin, *Paine, Condorcet—dressed and behaved with provoking eccentricity, and in Mar. 1811 was summarily expelled for circulating a pamphlet, The Necessity of *Atheism, written with his friend T. J. *Hogg. He quarrelled violently with his father, and eloped to Scotland with 16-year-old Harriet Westbrook, the daughter of a coffee-house proprietor. They married in Edinburgh in August 1811, though Shelley disapproved of matrimony, as well as royalty, meat-eating, and religion. Three years of nomadic existence followed. At York he tried sharing Harriet with Hogg; in the Lakes he argued with R. *Southey; in Dublin he spoke on public platforms, and published An Address to the Irish People (1812) and Proposals for reform associations. He corresponded with Godwin; circulated pamphlets on vegetarianism and on the free press (A Letter to Lord Ellenborough, 1812); and fly-posted a democratic broadsheet, A Declaration of Rights (for which his servant was democratically arrested). He tried setting up a radical commune of ‘like spirits’ first at Lynmouth, Devon, and later at Tremadoc, north Wales. Much of his early philosophy, both in poetry and politics, is expressed in *Queen Mab (1813), with its remarkable Notes: they show Shelley as the direct heir to the French and British revolutionary intellectuals of the 1790s.

In 1814 his marriage with Harriet collapsed, despite the birth of two children and the kindly intervention of *Peacock. After suicidal scenes, Shelley eloped abroad with Mary Godwin (see SHELLEY, M.W. above), together with her 15-year-old stepsister Jane ‘Claire’ Clairmont: their triangular relationship endured for the next eight years. His unfinished novella The Assassins (1814) reflects their dreamy travels through post-war France, Switzerland, and Germany, as does their combined journal, History of a Six Weeks Tour (1817). He returned to London, an annuity of £1,000, and, after many upheavals, a house with Mary on the edge of Windsor Great Park. Here he wrote *Alastor (1816), a non-political poem of haunting beauty, which first brought him general notice and reviews. His favourite son William was born. The summer of 1816 was spent on Lake Geneva with *Byron. Mary began *Frankenstein, and Shelley composed two philosophic poems much influenced by *Wordsworth, the ‘Hymn to Intellectual Beauty’ (partly about his childhood) and ‘Mont Blanc’, a meditation on the nature of power in a Godless universe.

In the autumn of 1816 Harriet drowned herself in the Serpentine. Shelley immediately married Mary and began a Chancery case for the custody of his first two children, which he lost. The experience shook him deeply, and is recalled in many verse fragments, such as the ‘Invocation to Misery’, ‘Lines: The cold earth slept below . . .’, and the cursing ‘To the Lord Chancellor’ (1817—a so-called *‘flyting’). However, friendships developed with Leigh *Hunt, *Keats, *Hazlitt, and others of the liberal *Examiner circle; while Peacock, now an intimate family confidant, drew a portrait of Shelley as Scythrop Gloomy in *Nightmare Abbey. In 1817 the family settled at Great Marlow, on the Thames, where Shelley wrote his polemical ‘Hermit of Marlow’ pamphlets, drafted a self-searching ‘Essay on Christianity’, and slowly composed ‘Laon and Cythna’, which was published, with alterations to avoid prosecution, as *The Revolt of Islam in 1818.

Harried by creditors, ill health, and ‘social hatred’, Shelley took his household permanently abroad, to Italy in the spring of 1818, leaving behind his sonnet ‘Ozymandias’ and a mass of unpaid bills. He stayed at Lucca, where he translated Plato’s *Symposium and wrote a daring essay ‘On the Manners of the Ancient Greeks’; and then at Venice and Este, where he composed *Julian and Maddalo, based on his friendship with Byron. He wintered in Naples, where he wrote the passionately unhappy ‘Stanzas Written in Dejection’; he also registered a mysterious baby, Elena Adelaide Shelley, as his adopted—or probably illegitimate—child. In the spring of 1819 he was working on *Prometheus Unbound.

His domestic situation was increasingly strained. His little daughter Clara had died at Venice; now his favourite ‘Willmouse’ died at Rome and Mary suffered a nervous breakdown. The shaken family settled in Tuscany: first outside Livorno, then at Florence, and finally at Pisa, which became their more or less permanent home until 1822.

Yet the twelve months from the summer of 1819 saw Shelley’s most extraordinary and varied burst of major poetry. He completed the fourth act of Prometheus (pub. 1820); wrote The Mask of Anarchy (Sept. 1819); Ode to the West Wind (Oct. 1819); the satirical Peter Bell the Third (Dec. 1819); his long political odes, ‘To Liberty’ and ‘To Naples’ (both spring 1820); the lively, intimate ‘Letter to Maria Gisborne’ (July 1820); and the Witch of Atlas (Aug. 1820). Much of this work was inspired by news of political events, which also produced a number of short, angry, propaganda poems: ‘Young Parson Richards’, ‘Song to the Men of England’, and ‘Sonnet: England 1819’. At the same time he dashed off several pure lyric pieces, including ‘To a Skylark’ and ‘The Cloud’ (both spring 1820), of dazzling metrical virtuosity; and completed a verse melodrama, The Cenci (1819). Yet despite this period of creativity, he could get very little accepted for publication in England, and he felt increasingly isolated and despondent. The birth of his youngest son, Percy Florence, somewhat cheered his domestic life.

The quieter period at Pisa which followed (1820–1) saw him at work on a number of prose pieces: A Philosophical View of Reform (1820); the impish ‘Essay on the Devil’; and his famous Defence of Poetry (1821). He also wrote some of his most delicate, low-keyed, and visually suggestive short poems: ‘The Two Spirits’, ‘To the Moon’, ‘The Aziola’, and ‘Evening: Ponte Al Mare, Pisa’.

In the spring of 1821 news of the death of Keats in Rome produced Adonais. The absence of Claire and growing restlessness precipitated a platonic love affair with Emilia Viviani, a beautiful 17-year-old heiress ‘tyrannized’ in a convent at Pisa. Instead of a third elopement this resulted in Epipsychidion (1821).

In the winter of 1821 Byron also moved to Pisa, and a raffish circle formed round the two poets, including E. J. Trelawny, Edward and Jane Williams, and eventually Leigh Hunt, who came from England to edit a monthly journal, the Liberal (1822–4). Shelley was roused again to public utterance: his last completed verse drama, Hellas (1822), though ‘a mere improvise’, was inspired by the Greek war of independence. He also began ‘Charles I’, a political drama of the English Civil War, with its touching song by Archy, the jester, ‘A widow-bird sat mourning for her love’.

In April 1822 he moved his household to an isolated beach house on the bay of Lerici. Here Mary suffered a dangerous miscarriage; Claire reacted violently to news of the sudden death of Allegra, her daughter by Byron; and Shelley saw the ghost of a child in the sea. Here he began his last major poem, The Triumph of Life. At the same time he composed a number of short lyrics, some to Jane Williams, of striking melodic grace: ‘When the lamp is shattered’, ‘With a Guitar, to Jane’, and the melancholy ‘Lines Written in the Bay of Lerici’.

His letters, still full of political hope and magically descriptive of the Italian seascape, are nonetheless shadowed with personal premonitions. Shelley was drowned in August 1822, in his small schooner the ‘Ariel’, together with Edward Williams and an English boatboy, on a return trip from visiting Byron and Hunt at Livorno. Overtaken by a violent summer squall, the boat went down without lowering its sails.

His lyric powers and romantic biography have until recently obscured Shelley’s most enduring qualities as a writer: his intellectual courage and originality; his hatred of oppression and injustice; and his mischievous, sometimes macabre, sense of humour (especially evident in his light verse and letters). He was widely read in the classics, philosophy, and contemporary science; he translated from Greek (Plato and Homer), Latin (Spinoza), Spanish (Calderón), German (Goethe), Italian (Dante), and some Arabic fragments. His essays—very few published in his lifetime—are highly intelligent, his political pamphlets both angry and idealistic.

His weaknesses as a writer have always been evident: rhetorical abstraction; intellectual arrogance; and moments of intense self-pity. But in great poems like the ‘West Wind’, or in great prose like passages from the Defence, it is precisely these limitations that he transcends, and indeed explodes. Among the English Romantics, he has recovered his position as an undoubted major figure: the poet of volcanic hope for a better world, of fiery aspirations shot upwards through bitter gloom.

SHENSTONE, William (1714–63), poet, essayist, and landscape gardener of the Leasowes, Halesowen. Educated at Solihull and Pembroke College, Oxford, where he published his Poems upon Various Occasions (1737), he established his reputation with The Judgment of Hercules (1741) and The Schoolmistress (1742). His poetic works included elegies, odes, songs, ballads, and levities, the most famous being ‘A Pastoral Ballad’ and ‘Lines Written at an Inn’ (which Dr Johnson once quoted by heart). From 1743 he transformed the Leasowes, a grazing farm, into a ferme ornée, an early example of a natural landscape garden, beautified with cascades, pools, vistas, urns, and a grove to Virgil, encircled by a winding walk. His friends included Lord Lytelton from nearby Hagley, Somervile, Lady Luxborough, Richard Graves, and Jago. Later he was befriended by Dodgson, whose Collection of Poems he helped to edit, and he worked with Percy on editing the Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, as well as providing the Birmingham printer Baskerville with advice. His poetry, mainly pastoral in treatment, was popular in the 18th cent.; his Essays on Men and Manners, in the style of La Rochefoucauld, included his views on landscape gardening; his essay on elegy contributed to the development of that form. Though his way of life was criticized by Johnson and Horace Walpole, he was respected by friends for his good taste. His correspondence reveals a sensitive, educated man living a provincial semi-rural life.

SHEPARD, E(rnest) H(oward) (1879–1976), painter and illustrator, chiefly remembered for his popular and enduring illustrations of the works of A. A. Milne, beginning with When We Were Very Young (1924) and continuing through the Winnie-the-Pooh stories. He also illustrated works by K. Grahame, R. Jeffries, and L. Housman. His delicate, innocent drawings were finely attuned to the ‘golden age’ vision of childhood that haunted the early decades of the 20th cent.

SHEPARD, Sam (1943– ), American playwright and actor, born in Illinois. Having staged his first plays in New York, Shepard spent four years (from 1971) living in London, where a number of his own plays were produced at the National Theatre and the Royal Court. His work deals with American mythologies, the death of the American Dream, and Americans’ relationship to their land and history. His most famous work is True West (1980), in which two brothers in southern California argue over the nature of the ‘true’ American West—real or mythologized—where each character fights to maintain his own identity and destroy his brother’s. Shepard’s other plays include Buried Child (1978), which won the Pulitzer Prize for drama in 1979, and which links True West in a trilogy with Curse of the Starving Class (1976); and Fool for Love (1983), which Shepard directed off-Broadway and acted in on screen. He is also the author of a number of screenplays, including Paris, Texas (1984).

Shepheardes Calender, The, the earliest important work of Spenser, published 1579, dedicated to Sidney. It was illustrated by woodcuts and had accompanying glosses by one ‘E.K.’ (see KIRKE).

It consists of 12 eclogues, one for each month of the year, written in different metres, and modelled on the eclogues of Theocritus, Virgil, and more modern writers, such as Mantuan and Marot. They take the form of dialogues among shepherds, except the first and last, which are complaints by ‘Colin Clout’, the author himself. Four of them deal with love, one is in praise of Elisa (Queen Elizabeth), one a lament for a ‘mayden of great bloud’, four deal allegorically with matters of religion or conduct, one describes a singing-match, and one laments the contempt in which poetry is held.

SHEPHERD, Lord Clifford, the, (Henry de Clifford, 14th Baron Clifford) (?1455–1523), celebrated in Wordsworth’s ‘Brougham Castle’ and The White Doe of Rylstone. His father was attainted and his estates forfeited in 1461. Henry de Clifford was brought up as a shepherd, and restored to his estates and title on the accession of Henry VII.

Shepherd’s Calendar, The, a volume of verse by J. Clare.

Shepherd’s Week, The, a series of six pastorals by J. Gay, published 1714. They are eclogues in mock-classical style, five of them based more or less closely on Virgil, but presenting shepherds and milkmaids not of the golden age but of the poet’s day, in their earthy simplicity. They were designed to parody those of A. Philips, but they have a charm and freshness of their own; Gay portrays his rustic characters (Blouzelinda, Bowzybeus, Cloddipole, Grubbinol, etc.) at work as well as at play, paints (in his own words) a ‘lively landscape’, and includes many references to folklore, games, superstitions, etc. Empson provides an interesting commentary on mock-pastoral in Some Versions of Pastoral (1935).

SHEPPARD, John, ‘Jack Sheppard’ (1702–24), a notorious thief and highwayman, who, after repeated escapes from prison, was hanged at Tyburn. He was the subject of tracts by Defoe, of many plays and ballads, and of a novel by W. H. Ainsworth. See NEWGATE CALENDAR.

SHERIDAN, Frances (1724–66), the wife of Thomas and the mother of R. B. Sheridan (below). She was greatly encouraged in her writing by Richardson, who arranged for the publication of The Memoirs of Miss Sydney Biddulph (‘after the manner of Pamela’) in 1761, and in an expanded version in 1767. The novel, which ends not happily but in despair, describes with honesty and precision the terrible misfortunes and distress of conscience of Sydney, who feels she has not the first claim to her beloved Faulkland. The novel was warmly received and translated into French and German, but Dr Johnson wondered whether Mrs Sheridan had the moral right to make her readers suffer so. The Discovery, a comedy in which Garrick took part, was very successful in 1763. The History of Nourjahad, a much admired and highly moral Oriental novel, appeared in 1767. An apparently indulgent sultan permits his friend to indulge all desires, and to enjoy life to eternity; but the liberty is a trick, and retribution falls.

SHERIDAN, Richard Brinsley (1751–1816), the son of Thomas Sheridan, an Irish actor-manager, and Mrs F. *Sheridan. Richard learned early that as a livelihood the theatre was both precarious and ungentlemanly. He was sent to Harrow School, where he was unhappy and regarded as a dunce. In Bath, however, where he joined his family in 1770, he was at once at home. His skit, written for the local paper, on the opening of the New Assembly Rooms was considered good enough to be published as a separate pamphlet. He fell in love with Eliza Linley, a beautiful and accomplished young singer, with whom he eloped to France and entered into an invalid form of marriage contract, and on whose behalf he fought two farcical duels with her overbearing admirer Captain Matthews. Sheridan’s angry father sent him to London to study law, but eventually the fathers withdrew their opposition and in 1773 he was lawfully married to Eliza. Very short of money, he decided to try his hand at a play, and in a very few weeks wrote *The Rivals, which was produced at Covent Garden in 1775. It was highly successful and established Sheridan in the fashionable society he sought. *The Rivals was followed in a few months by the farce *St Patrick’s Day, again a success; and in the autumn by *The Duenna, an operatic play which delighted its audiences. In 1776 Sheridan, with partners, bought *Garrick’s half-share in the *Drury Lane Theatre and became its manager. Early in 1777 appeared *A Trip to Scarborough, loosely based on Vanbrugh’s *The Relapse, and this again was a success. In March of that year Sheridan was elected a member of the *Club, on the proposal of Dr *Johnson. Meanwhile he was working hard and long on *The School for Scandal, which was produced, with Garrick’s help and with a brilliant cast, in May. The play was universally acclaimed, and all doors, from those of the duchess of Devonshire and Lady Melbourne downwards, were open to the dramatist—whose personal expenses rose accordingly. Although *The School for Scandal had 73 performances between 1777 and 1789 and made a profit of £15,000, Sheridan’s financial anxieties, which were to dog him to the end of his life, became even more acute. In 1779 he became the sole proprietor of Drury Lane, and began to live far beyond his means. Although he seems to have been a sympathetic and creative producer, he found the business side of management increasingly irksome. In 1779 he produced his new play *The Critic, based on *The Rehearsal by Buckingham; once again he enjoyed a huge success, and the world regarded him as the true heir of Garrick. But it was not what he wanted. He had grown up with a positive dislike of the theatre, and he declared he never saw a play if he could help it. He wished to shine only in politics, but he had neither the correct family connections nor the financial stability. He became the friend and ally of *Fox and in 1780 won the seat at Stafford. After only two years as an MP he became the under-secretary for foreign affairs, but he neglected his office work, both as a politician and as the manager of Drury Lane. Fortunately his father had secured both Mrs *Siddons and J. P. *Kemble, who brought the required audiences to the theatre. In 1783 he became secretary to the treasury and established his reputation as a brilliant orator in the House of Commons. In 1787 *Burke persuaded him into supporting the impeachment of *Hastings, and his eloquent speech of over five hours on the Begums of Oude ensured that he was made manager of the trial. He was by now confirmed an intimate friend of the prince regent and other royal figures. Eliza died in 1792, and in the same year the Drury Lane Theatre was declared unsafe and had to be demolished. Sheridan raised £150,000 for a new theatre with apparent ease, but he was plunging himself yet deeper into debt, and payments to his actors became more uncertain than ever. In 1795 he married Esther Ogle. All through these years he was speaking eloquently in the House and hoping for eventual political advancement. *Pizarro, adapted by Sheridan from *Kotzebue, was performed in 1799 and was successful enough to bring a brief reprieve, but in 1802 the theatre funds were impounded and the bankers put in charge. Enormous sums were owing to the landlord, the architect, the actors, and stage staff. Although he was still speaking daily at the Commons, Sheridan’s friendship with Fox was fading, and when Grenville formed the ‘ministry of all the talents’ in 1806 Sheridan was offered only the treasurership to the navy, without cabinet rank. The money which came with his appointment to a post with the duchy of Cornwall was soon spent. In 1809 the new Drury Lane was destroyed by fire, the debts became crushing, and Sheridan was excluded from all aspects of management. In 1811 he lost his seat at Stafford, and in 1813 he was arrested for debt. Friends rallied, but he and his wife became ill. His house was discovered to be filthy and denuded of almost all furnishings. He died in July 1816 and was given a fine funeral, with four lords as pall-bearers. He wished to be remembered as a man of politics and to be buried next to Fox, but he was laid near Garrick instead. He is remembered chiefly as the author of two superb comedies, but his speeches and letters have also been published. The standard edition of the plays is *The Plays and Poems of Sheridan, ed. R. C. Rhodes (3 vols, 1928): see also Harlequin Sheridan (1933), a life by R. C. Rhodes. The Letters were edited by C. Price (3 vols, 1966).

SHERLOCK, Thomas (1678–1761), son of W. *Sherlock, who succeeded his father as master of the Temple (1704–53), obtained a high reputation as a preacher, and was successively bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London. He strongly attacked *Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy. His best-known work was *A Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus (1729), a defence of the historical occurrence of miracles.
SHERLOCK, William (1641–1707). He became master of the Temple and dean of St Paul’s. He was author of A Practical Discourse Concerning Death (1689), his most popular work, and various controversial treatises. In 1688 he sided with the nonjurors who refused to swear the oath of allegiance to William and Mary and was suspended, but took the oath in 1690, an act which made him the object of many attacks, vindications, and pasquinades.

SHERIFF, R(obert) C(edric) (1896–1975), playwright, born in Kingston upon Thames, who worked in a local insurance office and began to write plays to raise money for his rowing club. His best-known play was Journey’s End (1928, pub. 1929), based on his experiences in the trenches as a captain during the First World War. Realistic and low-key, it was praised by G. B. *Shaw as a ‘useful corrective to the romantic conception of war’, and has also proved lastingly popular on the stage. It portrays the relationships under stress of Captain Stanhope, new lieutenant Raleigh (with whose sister Stanhope is in love), the reliable second-in-command Osborne, the cowardly Hibbert, etc., and ends in mid-battle after the deaths of Osborne and Raleigh. Other plays include Badger’s Green (1930), a comedy of village politics and cricket; St Helena (1934), about Napoleon’s last years; Home at Seven (1950), in which a banker suffering from amnesia fears he may have committed a crime; and The White Carnation (1953), a ghost story about a conscience-stricken stockbroker. Sherriff also wrote several novels, including The Fortnight in September (1931).

SHERWOOD, Mrs Mary Martha (1775–1851). She published nearly 100 books of stories and tracts, many for children and young people. Susan Gray, a very successful pious work intended for the poor, appeared in 1802. Little Henry and His Bearer, a tale published in 1815 after a period spent in India, was translated into French, German, Hindustani, Chinese, and Sinhalese. The best known of all her works is The History of the Fairchild Family, which appeared in 1818, its tremendous success leading to a second part in 1842 and a third in 1847.

She Stoops to Conquer, or The Mistakes of a Night, a comedy by *Goldsmith, produced 1773.

The principal characters are Hardcastle, who loves ‘everything that’s old; old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine’; Mrs Hardcastle, and Miss Hardcastle their daughter; Mrs Hardcastle’s son by a former marriage, Tony Lumpkin, a frequenter of the Three Jolly Pigeons, idle and ignorant, but cunning and mischievous, and doted on by his mother; and young Marlow, ‘one of the most bashful and reserved young fellows in the world’, except with barmaids and servant-girls. His father, Sir Charles Marlow, has proposed a match between young Marlow and Miss Hardcastle, and the young man and his friend Hastings accordingly travel down to pay the Hardcastles a visit. Losing their way they arrive at night at the Three Jolly Pigeons, where Tony Lumpkin directs them to a neighbouring inn, which is in reality the Hardcastles’ house. The fun of the play arises largely from the resulting misunderstanding. Marlow treating Hardcastle as the landlord of the supposed inn, and attempting to seduce Miss Hardcastle, whom he takes for one of the servants. This contrasts with his bashful attitude when presented to her in her real character. The arrival of Sir Charles Marlow clears up the misconception and all ends well, including a subsidiary love affair between Hastings and Miss Hardcastle’s cousin Miss Neville, whom Mrs Hardcastle destines for Tony Lumpkin.

The mistaking of a private residence for an inn was said by Goldsmith’s sister Mrs Hodson to have been founded on an actual incident in his own youth.

The play was greeted from its opening with immense success, and was seen as a victory in the newly formulated battle against ‘that monster called *Sentimental Comedy’ (*London Magazine, 1773).

She Wou’d if She Cou’d, the second of the comedies by *Etherege, produced 1668.

Sir Oliver Cockwood and his wife, Sir Joslin Jolley and his young kinswomen Ariana and Gatty, come up from the country to London to divert themselves, Sir Oliver and Sir Joslin with dissipation, Lady Cockwood, in spite of her virtuous professions, with an affair, and the two spirited young ladies with innocent flirtations. Lady Cockwood pursues Mr Courtal, a gentleman of the town, with her unwelcome attentions. Mr Courtal and his friend Mr Freeman strike up acquaintance with the young ladies, and take them and Lady Cockwood to the Bear in Drury Lane for a dance, where Sir Joslin and Sir Oliver arrive, bent on less innocent pleasures. Sir Oliver gets drunk, dances with his wife, supposing her to be someone quite different, and confusion ensues. The ladies go home. Freeman arrives to console Lady Cockwood. Courtal arrives and Freeman is concealed in a cupboard. Sir Oliver arrives and Courtal is hidden under the table. Sir Oliver drops a ‘China orange’, which rolls under the table. The two men are discovered, the young ladies are awarded to them, and Lady Cockwood resolves to ‘give over the great business of the town’ and confine herself hereafter to the affairs of her own family.

SHIELDS, Carol (1935– ), novelist and poet, born in Oak Park, Illinois, and living in Canada since 1957. She studied at Hanover College and the University of Ottawa and is married with five children. None of her novels was published in the UK until 1990, when Mary Swann established her as a major writer. Happenstance followed in 1991 plus the epistolary novel A Celibate Season, co-authored with Blanche Howard. The Republic of Love (1992) was shortlisted for the Guardian fiction prize and is her only novel set in her home town of Winnipeg. In 1995 The Box Garden (first pub. 1977) appeared in Britain; through the novel's correspondence between Charleen Forrest and a mysterious, religious figure, the alluring Brother Adam, Shields's talent for investing the small and insignificant with a passionate reality appears at its most trenchant and poignant. In 1998 Larry's Party was published and shortlisted for the Guardian fiction prize. In Shields's characteristically restrained and witty style, the novel charts the journey of Larry Weller towards a dramatic and powerfully observed dinner party. Shields's poetry, including Coming to Canada (1992), like her novels, focuses on the 'small ceremonies' of life, valuing and illuminating the normal and everyday.

'Shipman's Tale, The', see Canterbury Tales, 15.

Ship of Fools, The, an adaptation of the famous Narrenschiff of Sebastian Brant. The Narrenschiff was written in the dialect of Swabia and first published in 1494. It became extremely popular and was translated into many languages. Its theme is the shipping off of fools of all kinds from their native land to the Land of Fools. The fools are introduced by classes and reproved for their folly. The popularity of the book was largely due to the spirited illustrations, which show a sense of humour that the text lacks.

It was translated into English 'out of Laten, Frenche, and Doche' by A. *Barclay, and published in England in 1509; the translation is not literal but is an adaptation to English conditions, and gives a picture of contemporary English life. It starts with the fool who has great plenty of books, 'But fewe I rede, and fewer understande', and the fool 'that newe garments loves, or devyses', and passes to a condemnation of the various evils of the time, notably the misdeeds of officials and the corruption of the courts. The work is interesting as an early collection of satirical types. Its influence is seen in *Cocke Lorells Bote.

Shipwreck, The, see Falconer.

Shirburn Ballads, The, edited in 1907 by Andrew Clark from a manuscript of 1600–16 (a few pieces are later) at Shirburn Castle, Oxfordshire, belonging to the earl of Macclesfield. The collection contains ballads not found elsewhere, dealing with political events, with legends and fairy tales, or with stories of domestic life. Some of them are homilies.

Shirley, a novel by C. *Brontë, published 1849.

The scene of the story is Yorkshire, and the period the latter part of the Napoleonic wars, the time of the *Luddite riots, when the wool industry was suffering from the almost complete cessation of exports. In spite of these conditions, Robert Gérard Moore, half English, half Belgian by birth, a mill-owner of determined character, persists in introducing the latest labour-saving machinery, undeterred by the opposition of the workers, which culminates in an attempt first to destroy his mill, and finally to take his life. To overcome his financial difficulties he proposes to Shirley Keeldar, an heiress of independent spirit, while under the mistaken impression that she is in love with him; he himself loves not her but his gentle and retiring cousin Caroline Helstone, who is pining away for love of him and through enforced idleness in the oppressive atmosphere of her uncle's rectory. Robert is indignantly rejected by Shirley, who is in fact in love with his brother Louis, a tutor in her family, also of proud and independent spirit. The misunderstandings are resolved, and the two couples united.

Despite touches of melodrama (such as the sub-plot, which reveals that Shirley's companion and one-time governess Mrs Pryor is in fact Caroline's long-lost mother) this is Charlotte Brontë's most social novel, intended in her own words to be 'unromantic as Monday morning', and one of its recurrent themes is its plea for more useful occupations for women, condemned by society either to matrimony or, as old maids, to a life of self-denial and acts of private charity. Caroline is forbidden even the career of governess by her uncle, and this career is itself painted by Mrs Pryor as 'sedentary, solitary, constrained, joyless, toilsome'. Shirley herself is an attempt to portray a woman with freedom and power to act; Charlotte told Mrs Gaskell that she was intended to be what Emily *Brontë might have been 'had she been placed in health and prosperity', but despite certain recognizable characteristics (her relationship with her dog Tartar, her physical courage, her nickname of 'Captain'), the fictitious character for most readers sheds little light on her enigmatic original.

Shirley, James (1596–1666), born in London and educated at Merchant Taylors' School, St John's College, Oxford, and St Catharine's Hall, Cambridge. His first work appears to have been a poem on the Echo and Narcissus story, published as 'Echo' in a lost edition of 1618 and as 'Narcissus' in 1646.

Shirley took Anglican orders, and was a master at St Albans Grammar School until 1624, when he moved to London. The reason for his departure is said to have been his conversion to Roman Catholicism. His first recorded play, Love Tricks, or The School of Compliment (1625), was produced at the Cockpit Theatre, and he continued to write for it, probably under contract, until 1636. In the dedication to his play The Bird in a Cage (1632–3), he sarcastically complimented *Prynne, who was then in prison awaiting trial for writing Histriomastix. Perhaps because of this dedication, Shirley was made a member of Gray's Inn and invited to supply the literary part of the Inns of Court masque *The Triumph of Peace (1634).

During the plague closure of 1636–7 he went to Ireland, where he wrote a number of plays for the Dublin theatre, including St Patrick for Ireland (c. 1639). At his return in 1640 he succeeded *Massinger, recently deceased, as principal dramatist for the King's Men, but the outbreak of the Civil War put an end to this career. He was in the Royalist army under the earl of *Newcastle, who was both his patron and possibly a former collaborator on a play (*The Country Captain, 1639–40). After the defeat of the Royalist cause he returned to London and was for a time patronized by T. *Stanley; he then returned to his career as a schoolmaster. Such works as he wrote during the rest of his life seem designed for school performance. His *Contention of Ajax and Ulysses (pub. 1659) was also written during this period; it is largely a dramatic debate interspersed with songs, one of which, ‘The glories of our blood and state’, was a favourite with Charles II. Shirley and his wife are said to have died as a result of terror and exposure when they were driven from their home by the Great Fire of London.

Shirley wrote some 40 dramas, most of which are extant, including *The Traitor (1631), *Hyde Park (1632), *The Gamester (1633), *The Lady of Pleasure (1635), and *The Cardinal (1641). He had a considerable reputation in his lifetime and died very well off; Dryden’s bracketing of him with *Heywood and *Shadwell in *Mac Flecknoe probably does not represent a considered judgement of his work.

SHIRLEY, John (1566–1456), the scribe of many works of *Chaucer, *Lydgate, and others, whose attributions have been particularly important for the ascriptions to Chaucer of some of the shorter poems, including the Complaints ‘To Pity’, ‘To His Lady’, and ‘Of Mars’; ‘Adam Scriveyn’; ‘Truth’; ‘Lak of Stedfastnesse’; and ‘The Complaint of Venus’. He is said to have been a traveller in various lands, and he translated a number of works from French and Latin, among the latter being ‘A Full Lamentable Cronycle of the Dethe and False Murdure of James Stewarde, Late Kynge of Scotys’ (see James I of Scotland).

Shoemakers’ Holiday, The, or, The Gentle Craft, a comedy by *Dekker, written 1599, published 1600.

Rowland Lacy, a kinsman of the earl of Lincoln, loves Rose, the daughter of the lord mayor of London. To prevent the match the earl sends him to France in command of a company of men. Lacy resigns his place to a friend and, disguised as a Dutch shoemaker, takes service with Simon Eyre, who supplies the family of the lord mayor with shoes. Here he successfully pursues his suit, is married in spite of the efforts of the earl and the lord mayor to prevent it, and is pardoned by the king. The most entertaining character in the play is that of Eyre, the cheery, eccentric master-shoemaker, who becomes lord mayor of London. See also Deloney.

SHOLOKHOV, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1905–84), Russian novelist, of mixed Cossack, peasant, and lower-middle-class background, who became well known in the West for his lengthy regional epic novel about Cossack life in the early 20th cent., And Quiet Flows the Don (4 vols, 1928–40), which has been much admired (despite allegations of plagiarism: he was accused in some circles of having made use of the manuscript of a dead White Army officer). His other works include a novel which has been described as a classic of Socialist Realism, Virgin Soil Upturned (1931), which chronicles life under a five-year plan in south Russia. Sholokhov was awarded the *Nobel Prize in 1965.

SHORE, Jane (d. ?1527), mistress of Edward IV. She was the daughter of a Cheapside mercer and wife of a Lombard Street goldsmith, and exercised great influence over Edward IV by her beauty and wit. She was afterwards mistress of Thomas Grey, first marquess of Dorset. She was accused by Richard III of sorcery, imprisoned, and made to do public penance in 1483, and she died in poverty.

She is the subject of a ballad included in Percy’s Reliques, of *Churchyard’s Shore’s Wife in Mirror for Magistrates, of a remarkable passage in Sir T. *More’s History of Richard the Thirde, and of a descriptive note by *Drayton (Englands Heroicall Epistles). The last two passages are quoted in Percy’s Reliques. Her adversities are the subject of a tragedy by *Rowe.

Short, Codlin and, see Codlin.

Shortest Way with the Dissenters, see Defoe.

SHORTHOUSE, Joseph Henry (1834–1903), born into a Birmingham Quaker family. He became an Anglican convert, and the historical novel by which he is remembered, John Inglesant (1881, privately printed 1880), is an evocation of 17th-cent. religious intrigue and faith. Inglesant becomes a tool of the Jesuit faction, joins the court of Charles I, and after the king’s death visits Italy to seek vengeance for his brother’s murder; the most interesting part of the book is an account of N. *Ferrar’s religious community at *Little Gidding. Inglesant falls in love with Mary Collet in a wholly fictitious episode, but the background is on the whole drawn in accurate detail. The novel had a considerable vogue in its day, and bears witness to the religious and historical interests revived by the *Oxford movement and the *Pre-Raphaelites.

Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, see Collier, Jeremy.

SHOSTAKOVICH, Dmitri Dimitrievich (1906–75), one of the most distinguished Russian composers of the Soviet era. He was above all a symphonist, though he wrote in most other forms as well. The best known and most controversial of his early operas, Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District (1932), from a story by *Leskov, has no connection with Shakespeare except for a certain propensity to murder on the part of the heroine. Shakespearean in a more normal sense is the incidental music written for films of Hamlet (1964) and King Lear (1970), and there is a group of Six Songs with texts by *Ralegh, *Burns, and Shakespeare, dating from 1942.

Shropshire Lad, A, see Housman, A. E.

SHUTE, Nevil (1899–1960), the pen-name of Nevil
Shute Norway, popular novelist, born in England, who later (1950) settled in Australia. His many readable, fast-moving novels, several based on his involvement with the aircraft industry and his own wartime experiences, include Pied Piper (1942); No Highway (1948); A Town Like Alice (1950), in which an English girl is captured by the Japanese and survives the war to settle in Australia; and On the Beach (1957), which describes events after a nuclear holocaust.

SHUTTLE, Penelope (1947– ), poet and novelist, born in Staines, Middlesex. Her first volume of poetry was The Orchard Upstairs (1980), which was followed by several others, including Adventures with My Horse (1988), Taxing the Rain (1992), and Selected Poems 1980–1996 (1998). Her poetry is distinguished by a rich, sensual awareness of sexuality and the natural and animal world: her use of female imagery (as in ‘Home Birth’, 1992, which combines knitting and childbirth) is arresting and celebratory. Her novels include Wailing Monkey Embracing a Tree (1973). She is married to Peter *Redgrove, with whom she has collaborated in several works. They live in Cornwall.

Shylock, the Jewish usurer in Shakespeare’s *The Merchant of Venice.

SIDDAL, Elizabeth (‘Lizzie’) Eleanor (1829–62), poet, painter, and red-haired model to the Pre-Raphaelites. She was ‘discovered’ by the painter Walter Howard Deverell while she was working as a milliner in a shop near Leicester Square. She met D. G. *Rossetti in 1850, and in 1852 modelled as the drowned Ophelia for *Millais, who put her health at risk by demanding that she lie for hours in a bath of cold water. Rossetti appears to have encouraged her artistic talents, but their relationship was vexed and complicated: he appears to have encouraged her artistic talents, but their relationship was vexed and complicated. She returned briefly to the stage in 1819 but was no longer a success. She was a friend of Dr *Johnson, Horace *Walpole, Joshua *Reynolds, and many other eminent figures. Reynolds’s portrait of her as ‘The Tragic Muse’ is at Dulwich, and *Gainsborough’s portrait in the National Portrait Gallery.

SIDGwick, Henry (1838–1900), educated at Rugby and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1859. He was from 1883 professor of moral philosophy at that university. A follower in economics and politics of J. S. *Mill, his attitude on the question of our knowledge of the external world resembles that of *Reid. But his most important work as a philosophical writer relates to ethics, and his reputation rests on *The Methods of Ethics (1874). Here he considers three ‘methods’ of determining the right course of action: intuitionism, according to which we have direct apprehension of moral principles; egoism, according to which an agent’s own interests determine what he should do; utilitarianism, according to which right and wrong are fixed by considerations of the interests of everyone affected by our actions. Intuitionism and utilitarianism, Sidgwick believes, combine to form a coherent system; but egoism will sometimes conflict with the other methods, producing practical contradictions which we cannot resolve.

In 1876 Sidgwick married Eleanor Mildred Balfour (1845–1936), who was from 1892 to 1910 principal of Newnham College, Cambridge; it was partly through their efforts on behalf of women’s higher education that the college was founded. She and Sidgwick’s brother Arthur wrote a memoir of Henry (1906).

SIDNEY, Algernon (1622–83), the grandson of Sir P. *Sidney and younger brother of *Waller’s ‘Sacharissa’. He took up arms against Charles I and was wounded at Marston Moor. He was employed on government service until the Restoration, but his firm republicanism aroused *Cromwell’s hostility. At the Restoration he refused to give pledges to Charles II, and lived abroad in poverty and exile until 1677. He was imprisoned in the Tower after the discovery of the Rye House Plot, tried before *Jeffreys, and condemned to death without adequate evidence, though there was little doubt of his guilt. His *Discourses Concerning Government were published in 1698, and a treatise on *Love in 1884. *Burnet described him as ‘a man of most extraordinary courage . . . who had set up Marcus Brutus for his pattern’.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip (1554–86), born at *Penshurst Place, eldest son of Sir Henry Sidney (who was thrice lord deputy governor of Ireland), educated at Shrewsbury School (with his close friend Fulke *Greville), and Christ Church, Oxford, where his contemporaries included *Camden, *Hakluyt, and *Ralegh. He may have spent some time also at Cambridge. Between 1572 and 1575 he travelled in France, where he witnessed the massacre of St *Bartholomew’s day in Paris, and in Germany, Austria, and Italy. During his year in Italy, most of it spent in Venice, he was painted by Veronese, but gave most of his time to serious study of history and ethics, and to correspondence with the elderly Protestant statesman Hubert Languet. After his return to England, in spite of a successful embassy to Vienna in 1577, Sidney did not achieve any official post which matched his ambitions until his appointment as governor of Flushing in 1585. His knighthood was awarded for reasons of court protocol in 1583.

Years of comparative idleness enabled him to write and revise the *Arcadia, and to complete the *Defence of Poetry, *The Lady of May, and *Astrophel and Stella. The first Arcadia, and probably other works, were composed while he was staying with his younger sister Mary, countess of *Pembroke, at Wilton. We do not know his exact relations with Penelope Devereux (later *Rich), whose father’s dying wish had been that she should marry Philip Sidney. Though this did not happen (Penelope in 1581 marrying Lord Rich, and Philip in 1583 marrying Frances, daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham), verbal and heraldic references leave no room for doubt that she was the ‘Stella’ of Sidney’s sonnet sequence. During these years Sidney also became a notable literary patron, receiving dedications from a variety of authors, the best known being that of Spenser’s *The Shepheardes Calender in 1579. Sidney was interested in experimenting with classical metres in English on the lines prescribed by Thomas Drant, but it is unlikely that his discussion of this and other matters with Greville, *Dyer, and *Spenser (the ‘Areopagus’) amounted to anything so formal as an academy or learned society. The last year of his life was spent in the Netherlands, where his greatest military success was a surprise attack on the town of Axel, in alliance with Count Maurice. On 22 Sept. 1586 he led an attack on a Spanish convoy bringing supplies to the fortified city of Zutphen; he received a musket shot in his thigh and died of infection three weeks later. Greville, who was not present, subsequently told the story of Sidney’s death with two famous embellishments, claiming that Sidney left off his thigh-armour deliberately, so as not to be better armed than the marshal of the camp, and that as he was being carried wounded from the field he saw a dying soldier gazing at his water bottle, and gave it to him with the words, ‘Thy necessity is yet greater than mine.’ Sidney was buried in St Paul’s Cathedral, and the almost immediate appearance of volumes of Latin elegies from Oxford, Cambridge, and the Continent testified to the great political and literary promise he had shown. Among many English elegies on him the best known, Spenser’s ‘Astrophel’, was not printed until 1595, among his Complaints. This included elegies by Lodowick Bryskett, Matthew Royden, Ralegh, and Dyer. Royden’s is unusual in evoking the hero’s presence, his ‘sweet attractive kind of grace’. Sidney’s posthumous reputation, as the perfect Renaissance patron, soldier, lover, and courtier, far outstripped his documented achievements, and can be seen as having a life independent of them which has become proverbial, as when *Yeats paid tribute to Major Robert *Gregory as ‘our Sidney and our perfect man’.

None of Sidney’s works was published during his lifetime, but Greville and the countess of Pembroke seem to have taken pains to preserve the texts they thought best. The revised Arcadia was published in 1590, and again in 1593 with the last three books of the earlier version appended; Astrophel and Stella in 1591, first in a pirated and then in an authorized text; and A Defence of Poetry, also in two slightly varying texts, in 1595. Editions of the Arcadia from 1598 onwards included all the literary works except his version of the Psalms. These were completed posthumously by his sister, and not printed until 1823. *Ruskin admired them and published selections under the title Rock Honeycomb (1877). Sidney’s complete Poems were edited by W. A. Ringler in 1962, the Old Arcadia (1973) by Jean Robertson, The New Arcadia by Victor S. Skretkowicz (1987), and the Miscellaneous Prose by K. Duncan-Jones and J. van Dorsten (1973); the standard life is by M. W. Wallace (1915). See also K. Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Courtier and Poet (1991).

SIDNEY, Sir Robert (1563–1626), the younger brother of Sir P. *Sidney. His early career closely followed that of his brother, whom he succeeded as governor of Flushing in 1589, a post he continued to hold for over 25 years. He was created Baron Sidney by James I in 1603, Viscount Lisle in 1605, and earl of Leicester in 1618; he held the post of lord chamberlain to Anne of Denmark. It has been claimed that he wrote lyrics for settings by Robert Dowland, who was his godson. An autograph manuscript of his poems, consisting of sonnets, pastorals, songs, and epigrams, apparently written in the mid-1590s, was identified by P. J. Croft in 1973; he edited them for the Clarendon Press (1984).

Siege of Corinth, The, a poem by Lord *Byron, published 1816.

The poem is founded on the story of the Turkish siege of Corinth, then held by the Venetians, and it was the last of Byron’s Eastern tales. The Turks, guided by the fierce and daring renegade Alp, who loves the daughter of the Venetian governor Minotti, make their way into the fortress. Minotti, discovering the betrayal, flies the magazine and violently destroys both victors and defenders, including himself.

Siege of Rhodes, The, one of the earliest attempts at English opera, by *D’Avenant, performed 1656.

Dramatic performances having been suppressed by the Commonwealth government, D’Avenant obtained permission in 1656 to produce at Rutland House an ‘Entertainment after the manner of the ancients’, in which *Diogenes and *Aristophanes argue against and for public amusements, and a Londoner and Parisian compare the merits of their two cities; this was accompanied by vocal and instrumental music, composed by Henry *Lawes. Immediately after this prologue was given The Siege of Rhodes (at first in one, but in 1662 in two parts), a heroic play, the ‘story sung in recitative music’, which was composed by Dr Charles Coleman and George Hudson. The play deals with the siege of Rhodes by Solyman the Magnificent, and the devotion by which Ianthe, wife of the Sicilian Duke Alphonso, saves her husband and the defenders of the island.

SICAL, Clancy (1926— ). American writer and journalist, born in Chicago and educated at the University of California. He came to England in the 1950s, where he wrote Weekend in Dinlock (1960), a fictionalized exploration of life in a mining community in south Yorkshire, to which the American narrator is introduced by a young miner who is also an artist. Going Away (1963) is a first-person ‘road’ novel: here the narrator leaves Hollywood and drives across the USA in search of his lost idealism, embarking in the last pages for Europe. Zone of the Interior (USA 1976) is set in England. Sigal lived for some 30 years in England, and contributed regularly to the New Statesman and other periodicals. He now lives and writes in California.

Sigismonda (Ghismonda), in Boccaccio’s Decameron (Day 4, Tale 1), daughter of Tancred, prince of Salerno. Her father, having discovered her love for his squire Guiscardo, slew the latter and sent his heart in a golden cup to Sigismonda, who took poison and died. The father, repenting his cruelty, caused the pair to be buried in the same tomb. The story is the subject of Sigmund’s son Sigmund and of the fatal marriage of his sister Signy to the king of the Goths; the second and third, ‘Regin’ and ‘Brynhild’, deal with Sigmund’s son Sigurd, his betrothal to Brynhild, his subsequent marriage (under the influence of a magic potion) to Gudrun, the Niblung king’s daughter, and the deaths of Sigurd and Brynhild; the last, ‘Gudrun’, tells of Gudrun’s own death and the fall of the Niblungs. (See also SAGA.)

Silas Marner, a linen-weaver, has been driven out of the small religious community to which he belongs by a false charge of theft, and has taken refuge in the agricultural village of Raveloe. His only consolation in his loneliness is his growing pile of gold. This is stolen from his cottage by the squire’s reprobate son Dunstan Cass, who disappears. Dunstan’s elder brother Godfrey is in love with Nancy Lammeter, but is secretly and unhappily married to a woman of low class in a neighbouring town. Meditating revenge for Godfrey’s refusal to acknowledge her, this woman carries her child one New Year’s Eve to Raveloe, intending to force her way into the Casset’s house; but dies in the snow. Her child, Eppie, finds her way into Silas’s cottage, is adopted by him, and restores to him the happiness which he has lost with his gold. After many years the draining of a pond near Silas’s door reveals the body of Dunstan with the gold. Moved by this revelation, Godfrey, now married to Nancy, acknowledges himself the father of Eppie and claims her, but she refuses to leave Silas. The solemnity of the story is relieved by the humour of the rustic travellers at the Rainbow Inn, and the genial motherliness of Dolly Winthrop, who befriends Silas.

Silence, in Shakespeare’s 2 *Henry IV, a country justice and cousin to *Shallow.

Silence, see Epicene.

Silkin, Jon (1930–97), poet, born in London, the son of a solicitor, and educated at Wycliffe and Dulwich colleges. He established himself as a poet while working as a manual labourer, then as a teacher, and subsequently lectured extensively. His first volume, The Peaceable Kingdom (1954), was followed by many others, including Nature with Man (1965, which contains many of his piercingly observed ‘flower poems’), Amana Grass (1971, with work inspired by visits to Israel and America), and The Principle of Water (1974); his Selected Poems was published in 1980. Other volumes include The Psalms with Their Spoils.
which describes the life of Arthur Seaton, a dissatisfied working man, not a rising member of the lower middle class. The title story of Silurist (1973), a collection of short stories; Barbarians and Other Poems (1974), and written plays and screenplays from his own fiction. His Collected Poems appeared in 1993.

SIMONE, Ignazio (Secondo Tranquilli) (1900–78), Italian novelist, critic, and founder member of the Italian Communist Party in 1921. To escape Fascist persecution he went into exile to Switzerland in 1930, where he remained until 1945. The peasant south, its deprivation, and the impact on it of Fascism, are the themes of his best-known novels: Fontamara (1930) and Pane e vino (published first in English, Bread and Wine, 1936; in Italian 1937, rev. 1955 as Vino e pane). His memoir in The God that Failed (1950) indicates his importance for Anglo-American culture as the type of the European ex-communist.

Silurist, the, see Vaughan, H.

SILVA, Feliciano da (16th cent.), a Spanish romance writer, who composed sequels to Amadis of Gaul and Celestina, and was ridiculed in Don Quixote.

silver-fork school, see FASHIONABLE NOVEL.

Silvia, in Shakespeare's The Two Gentlemen of Verona, the duke of Milan’s daughter, who is loved by Valentine. The famous song ‘Who is Silvia?’ (iv. ii) is addressed to her.

SIMENON, Georges (1903–89), Belgian-French popular novelist. One of the most prolific of modern writers, he launched his celebrated detective Maigret in 1931. The sympathy and range of his observation of French life, his sensitivity to local atmosphere, his insight into human motives, and the naturalness and accuracy of his use of the French language have earned him a respect rarely accorded to writers in the genre of detective fiction.

SIMIC, Charles (1938– ), Serbian-born poet, who moved to America at the age of 15. His collection White (1972) returns to the foreign country he equates with his past, one which in recent history suffered the ravages of war. His poems in this collection typically combine this perspective on a historical ‘elsewhere’ with his characteristically original depictions of everyday objects. This portrayal of the familiar in startling, often unsettling ways runs through his later collections, most notably Charon’s Cosmology (1977), Classic Ballroom Dances (1980), and Austerity (1982), and betrays the influence of the surrealists, as well as of Serbian poetry, which he had done much to promote. He has translated widely, and edited The Horse Has Six Legs (1992), a collection of his own translations of Serbian poetry. Much of his work deals with this dual identity, as a Serbian writer who returns to his ‘psychic roots’, but ‘with foreign words in my mouth’. A revised and expanded edition of his Selected Poems 1963–1983 was published in 1990.

simile, an object, scene, or action introduced by way of comparison for explanatory, illustrative, or merely ornamental purpose, e.g. ‘as strong as an ox’, or more poetically, ‘The moon, like a flower | In heaven’s high bower | With silent delight | Sits and smiles on the night’ (Blake, ‘Night’, Songs of Innocence); or, in more Modernist vein, ‘the evening is spread out against the sky | Like a patient etherised upon a table’ (T. S. *Eliot, ‘The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock’). See also EPIC SIMILE.

Simon Legree, the brutal slave-owner in H. B. Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin, who beats Tom to death.

Simple Story, A, a romance by Mrs *Inchbald, published in 1791.

The author’s avowed purpose is to show the value of ‘a proper education’, but the interest of the work lies in its blend of melodramatic Gothic sexual intensity and realistic psychological observation. Miss Milner, a headstrong, clever, pleasure-loving orphaned heiress, falls in love with her attractive and sensitive guardian Dorrifort, a Roman Catholic priest: when he inherits a title to become Lord Elmwood he renounces his vows and marries her, but later undergoes a personality change, and becomes violently autocratic. During his prolonged absence overseas she is unfaithful to him, and dies estranged. Their daughter Matilda, forbidden her father’s presence, and brought up under many restrictions, is finally reconciled with him, and marries her cousin and her father’s favourite, Rushbrook. The expiation of jealousy and guilt over two generations has been compared to *The Winter’s Tale, in which Mrs Inchbald probably appeared, and Dorrifort may be in part modelled on her friend J. P. *Kemble.

_Simplicissimus, The Adventurous_, the English title of Der abenteuerliche Simplicissimus Teutsch (1669), by J. J. C. von *Grimmelshausen: a description of the life of a strange vagabond named Melchior Sternfels von Fuchshaim. The work was first translated into English (with an account of the author) in 1912; its chief interest lies in the fact that it is one of the few existing contemporary records of the life of the people during the Thirty Years War.

_SIMPSON, (Norman) F(rederick) (1919– ),_ playwright, whose surreal comedies _A Resounding Tinkle_ (perf. 1957) and _One-Way Pendulum_ (perf. 1959) established him as a writer of the Theatre of the *Absurd. His work shows an affinity with that of Ionesco, which enjoyed a considerable vogue in Britain in the late 1950s. Other works include _The Cresta Run_ (1965) and a novel, _Harry Bleachbaker_ (1976).

_SINCLAIR, Catherine (1800–64),_ philanthropist and prolific Scottish writer of travel, biography, children’s books, novels, essays, and reflections. In _Holiday House_ (1839) she produced a classic children’s novel that made a conscious stand against the prevailing fashion for moralizing tales for the young and enjoyed success for many years.

_SINCLAIR, Clive (1948– ),_ novelist and short story writer, born in London and brought up in its north-western suburbs, and educated at the universities of East Anglia and Santa Cruz. The title of his first novel, _Bibliosexuality_ (1973), indicates a characteristic and idiosyncratic strain of verbal play and erotic bravura. This was followed by _Hearts of Gold_ (1979, stories) and _Bedbugs_ (1982, stories) and the novel _Blood Libels_ (1985). _Cosmetic Effects_ (1989) is a neo-Gothic self-reflexive thriller, in which the action is divided between Israel and St Albans: narrator Dr Jonah Isaacs, who teaches film studies, becomes unwittingly involved in a terrorist plot and loses an arm, an injury which does not preclude much sexual activity and a macabre and successful bid to prevent his wife Sophie from procuring an abortion. _Augustus Rex_ (1992), a novel about the resurrection of *Strindberg, and _The Lady with the Laptop_ (1996, stories) were followed by _Kidneys in the Mind: A Lecture_ (delivered at the British Library, May 1996; pub. 1996), which discusses the kidney as organ and metaphor, and describes his own experience of dialysis and transplant with stoic wit and scholarship. Sinclair has also written a study of the brothers *Singer (1983).

_SINCLAIR, May (Mary Amelia St Clair Sinclair) (1863–1946),_ novelist, the youngest daughter of a shipowner who went bankrupt; he died in 1881, and May (who was educated at home, apart from one year at Cheltenham Ladies’ College) lived with her mother in London lodgings until her mother’s death in 1901. She never married, and supported herself by reviews, translations, etc., and by writing fiction. She was a supporter of *women’s suffrage, and deeply interested in psychoanalysis; her reviews and novels show considerable knowledge of both *Jung and *Freud. Among the most notable of her 24 novels are _The Divine Fire_ (1904), _The Three Sisters_ (1914, a study in female frustration with echoes of the *Bronte story), _The Tree of Heaven_ (1917), _Mary Olivier: A Life_ (1919), and _Life and Death of Harriett Frean_ (1922). The last two are *stream-of-consciousness novels, taking a woman from girlhood to unmarried middle age, and both show themselves keenly aware (though not necessarily wholly critical) of woman’s tendencies towards self-denial; much of _Mary Olivier_ (the alcoholic father, the loved but dominating mother, the deaths of several brothers from heart failure, the intellectual curiosity and thirst for unprovided knowledge) is clearly autobiographical. Her novels had a considerable influence on R. *West and R. *Lehmann, but were largely forgotten until their revival (by *Virago) in the 1980s. See T. E. M. Boll, _Miss May Sinclair: Novelist_ (1973).

_SINCLAIR, Upton Beall (1878–1968),_ American nov-writing novels, and continued to write prolifically in whatever—is still somewhere in the universe. This is a way of life which lives on in his art; in an interview in varying forms of nationalism, and between the primity to which the public reacted so violently that an investigation of the yards was instituted by the US government; it also marks a conversion to socialism on the part of its author and of its protagonist, Slav immigrant Jurgis Rudkus. Sinclair’s many other works include The Metropolis (1908), King Coal (1917), Oil! (1927), and Boston (1928); and a series with international settings featuring Lanny Budd, illegitimate son of a munitions manufacturer, who appears in World’s End (1940), Dragon’s Teeth (1942), The Return of Lanny Budd (1953), and other works.

SINGER, Isaac Bashevis (1904–91), Polish-born Yiddish author, the son and grandson of rabbis, educated at the Warsaw Rabbinical Seminary. In 1935 he emigrated to New York, in the footsteps of his brother, the novelist Israel Joshua Singer (1893–1944), and became a journalist, writing in Yiddish for the Jewish Daily Forward, which published most of his short stories. The first of his works to be translated into English was The Family Moskat (1950), which was followed by many other works, including Satan in Goray (Yiddish, 1935; English, 1955); The Magician of Lublin (1960); The Slave (1962); The Manor (1967) and its sequel The Estate (1969). His collections of stories include Gimpel the Fool (1957); The Spinoza of Market Street (1961); Zlateh the Goat (1966); and A Friend of Kafka (1970). Singer’s work portrays with a colourful intensity and much realistic detail the lives of Polish Jews of many periods of Polish history, illumined by hints of the mystic and supernatural; many of his novels and stories describe the conflicts between traditional religion and rising scepticism, between varying forms of nationalism, and between the primitive, the exotic, and the intellectually progressive. He provides an extraordinarily vivid record to a vanished way of life which lives on in his art; in an interview in Encounter (Feb. 1979) he claimed that although the Jews of Poland had died ‘something—call it spirit, or whatever—is still somewhere in the universe. This is a mystical kind of feeling, but I feel there is truth in it.’ Singer’s writings have been increasingly admired internationally, and he was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1978. There is a life by P. Kresh (1979), and see also The Brothers Singer (1983) by Clive Sinclair, which includes an account of the life of the Singer’s sister, novelist Esther Kreitman (1891–1954).

Singleton, Adventures of Captain, a romance of adventure by *Defoe, published 1720.

Singleton, the first-person narrator, having been kidnapped in his infancy is sent to sea. Having ‘no sense of virtue or religion’, he takes part in a mutiny and is put ashore in Madagascar with his comrades; he reaches the continent of Africa and crosses it from east to west, encountering many adventures and obtaining much gold, which he dissipates on his return to England. He takes once more to the sea, becomes a pirate, carrying on his depredations in the West Indies, Indian Ocean, and China Seas, acquires great wealth, which he brings home, and finally marries the sister of a shipmate.

Sir Charles Grandison, see Grandison, Sir Charles.

Sir Courtly Nice, or It Cannot Be, a comedy by *Crowne, produced 1685.

This, the best of Crowne’s plays, is founded on a comedy, No puede ser el guardar una mujer, by the Spanish dramatist Moreto. Leonora is in love with Farewel, a young man of quality, but her brother Lord Bellguard, owing to a feud between the families, is determined she shall not marry him. Bellguard keeps Leonora under watch by her aunt, ‘an old amorous envious maid’, and a pair of spies, Hothead and Fanatick, who hold violently opposed views on religious matters and quarrel amusingly. Thanks to the resourcefulness of Crack, who introduces himself in an assumed character into Lord Bellguard’s house, Fare-wel is enabled to carry off and marry Leonora; while her rival suitor Sir Courtly Nice, favoured by Lord Bellguard, a fop whose ‘linen is all made in Holland by neat women that dip their fingers in rosewater’, is fobbed off with the aunt; and Surly, the rough ill-mannered cynic, gets no wife at all.

Sir Launcelot Greaves, The Life and Adventures of, see Greaves, Sir Launcelot.

Sir Launfal, by Thomas Chestre, a late 14th-cent. *Breton lay, in 1,044 lines in 12-line, tail-rhyme stanzas. It is one of the two English versions of Marie de France’s Lanval (given in an appendix to Bliss’s edition: see below). Launfal is a knight of the Round Table who leaves the court, confronted by tales of Guinevere’s misconduct. He falls in love with a fairy lady, Tryamour. When he returns to Arthur’s court Guinevere declares her love for him, but he rejects her, declaring that even his beloved’s maids are more beautiful than the queen. The queen accuses him of trying to seduce her and at his trial he is asked to produce the beautiful lady he has boasted of. Tryamour appears and breathes on Guinevere’s eyes, blinding her, and the lovers depart happily. The poem has the oversimplicity, but also the narrative liveliness, of its kind and it has been much edited in romance anthologies.

SIR PATRICK SPENS | SITWELL

Sir Patrick Spens, an early Scottish *ballad, included in Percy’s *Reliques. The subject is the dispatch of Sir Patrick to sea, on a mission for the king, in winter; his foreboding of disaster; and his destruction with his ship’s company. Sir W. *Scott, in his version, makes the object of the expedition the bringing to Scotland of the Maid of Norway (1283–90), who died on her voyage to marry Edward, prince of Wales.

Sir Thomas More, see More, Sir Thomas.

sirvente, a form of poem or lay, usually satirical, employed by the *troubadours.

SISMONDI, Léonard Simond de (1773–1842), Swiss historian who lived mainly in Geneva. His famous work was L’Histoire des républiques italiennes du Moyen-Âge (1809–18). He had many friends, including Mme de *Stael’s circle and the duchess of Albany, widow of the Young Pretender, and he was an interesting letter writer.

Sisson, C(harles) H(ubert) (1914— ), poet and translator, born in Bristol, and educated at Bristol University. He worked for many years in the civil service, of which he has been at times an outspoken critic. His volumes of poetry include The London Zoo (1961), Numbers (1965), Metamorphoses (1968), Anchises (1976), In the Trojan Ditch: Collected Poems and Selected Translations (1974), God Bless Karl Marx! (1988), and Antidotes (1991). Translations include works of *Heine, *Catullus, *Horace, and Dante’s *Divina commedia (1980). His poetry mingles biblical and classical themes and imagery with Arthurian references drawn from his native Somerset (as in one of his major poems, ‘In Insula Avalonia’); many are satiric, but the satire is based on a religious preoccupation with man’s fallen nature and a classical view of his limitations. Avolume of autobiography, On the Look Out, was published in 1989. Prose works include a novel, Christopher Homm (1965), The Avoidance of Literature: Collected Essays (1978), Anglican Essays (1983), and English Perspectives (1991). He was made a CH in 1993. His Collected Poems were published in 1998.

Sister Peg, a political satire published in London in 1760, full title The History of the Proceedings in the Case of Margaret, Commonly Called Peg, Only Lawful Sister to John Bull, Esq. The work is modelled on *Arbuthnot’s History of John Bull. It satirizes Anglo-Scottish relations after the Act of Union of 1707 and the cynicism of the politicians in the Scots militia controversy of 1760. *Hume laid claim to the authorship, but most historians follow A. *Carlyle in ascribing the work to A. *Ferguson.

Sitwell, Dame Edith Louisa (1887–1964), brought up at Renishaw Hall, where an unhappy childhood was made bearable by the company of her brothers Osbert and Sacheverell (below). She began to write poetry when young, and her first published poem, ‘Drowned Suns’, appeared in the Daily Mirror in 1913. With her brothers she actively encouraged *Modernist writers and artists; she despised much of the work published in *Georgian Poetry, and from 1916 to 1921 edited Wheels, an anti-Georgian magazine, which first published W. *Owen. Her first volume of verse, The Mother and Other Poems (1915), was followed by many others, and she quickly acquired a reputation as an eccentric and controversial figure, confirmed by the first public performance, in 1923, of Façade, a highly original entertainment (with music by W. *Walton) with verses in syncopated rhythms. Gold Coast Customs (1929), a harsh and powerful work, compared modern Europe with ancient barbaric Africa. Her prose works (which she wrote reluctantly, for money) include a study of *Pope (1930), English Eccentrics (1933), and Victoria of England (1936). Her only novel, I Live under a Black Sun (1937), was poorly received, but it was followed by a period of great acclaim, aroused by her poems of the Blitz and the atom bomb (Street Songs, 1942; Green Song, 1944; The Song of the Cold, 1945; The Shadow of Cain, 1947); as J. *Lehmann said, ‘The hour and the poet were matched.’ Triumphal lecture tours in America followed the war, but in the 1950s her reputation began to fade, as the new austerity of the *Movement became fashionable. She remained, however, a considerable public figure, well known outside literary circles for her theatrical dress and manner (recorded by many artists and photographers) and by her indignant response to real or suspected criticism. F. R. *Leavis had claimed in 1932 that ‘the Sitwells belong to the history of publicity, rather than that of poetry’, but her status as a poet survived this dismissal, although it remains a matter of controversy. See V. *Glendinning, Edith Sitwell (1981).

SITWELL, Sir (Francis) Osbert (Sacheverell) (1892–1969), brother of Edith and Sacheverell *Sitwell. He grew up at Renishaw Hall, Derbyshire, which he later inherited. After Eton he reluctantly served in the First World War, and his early poetry (e.g. The Winstonburg Line, 1919) is sharply satirical and pacifist in tone. He produced many volumes of poetry, fiction, and autobiography, and was, with his brother and sister, an outspoken enemy of the *Georgian poets (whom he regarded as philistine) and an ardent supporter of *Pound, T. S. *Eliot, W. *Lewis, and W. *Walton (for whose Belshazzar’s Feast, 1931, he wrote the words). His prose works include Triple Fugue (1924), a collection of satirical stories; Before the Bombardment (1926), a novel describing the shelling of Scarborough in 1914 and its effect on the lonely, genteel female society of the town; Winters of Content (1932), describing travels in Italy; and Escape with Me! (1939), describing travels in China and the Far East. His most sustained achievement was his autobiography, in five volumes (Left Hand! Right Hand!, 1945; The Scarlet Tree, 1946; Great Morning!, 1948; Laughter in the Next Room, 1949; Noble Essentials, 1950; with a later addition, Tales My Father Taught Me, 1962). These are remarkable for the portrait of the eccentric, exasperating figure of his father Sir George, and their tone is romantic, acidic, nostalgic, and affectionate in turn. See John Pearson, Façades (1978), a biography of all three Sitwells. There is a life by P. Ziegler (1998).

SITWELL, Sir Sacheverell (1897–1988), brother of Osbert and Edith (above). His first volume of verse, The People’s Palace (1918), was followed by several others; his Collected Poems, with an introduction by Edith, appeared in 1936, and a volume of poetry, An Indian Summer, in 1982. Many of his prose works combine an interest in art and travel; they include Southern Baroque Art (1924) and German Baroque Art (1927), both written when the baroque was little studied; Conversation Pieces (1936), again on a not yet fashionable subject; the monumental British Architects and Craftsmen (1945); and Bridge of the Brocade Sash (1959), on the arts of Japan. He also wrote biographies of *Mozart (1932) and *Liszt (1934). His imaginative prose includes *The Dance of the Quick and the Dead (1936), a series of interlocked reflections on literature, art, travel, etc.; *Valse des fleurs (1941), a re-creation of a day in St Petersburg in 1868; and Journey to the Ends of Time (1959), a macabre and despairing work about the condition of man.

skaldic, or scaldic, verse, a form of Old Norse poetry distinguished by its elaborate metre, alliteration, consonance, and riddling diction. The most usual skaldic metre is ‘dróttkvætt’, a strophe which consists of eight six-syllable lines, each ending in a trochee. In regular ‘dróttkvætt’ each odd line contains two alliterating syllables in stressed positions, and the alliteration is continued on one stressed syllable in each following even line. Odd lines also contain two internal half-rhymes; even lines two full rhymes. The first known skald was Bragi Boddason who probably wrote in the late 9th cent. Skaldic verse flourished in the 10th cent. and on into the 11th, and much of it was composed to commemorate the deeds of chieftains who ruled in Norway at this time. Such verses are preserved mainly in the kings’ sagas; many ‘lausavisur’ or occasional verses, and some love poetry are included in the narratives of family sagas (see SAGA).

E. O. G. Turville-Petre, Scaldic Poetry (1976), gives parallel translation and discussion.

SKEAT, W(alter) W(illiam) (1835–1912), one of the greatest of the 19th-cent. editors of Old and Middle English literature. He was educated at Christ’s College, Cambridge, where he became a mathematics lecturer in 1864. He devoted much of his time to the study of Early English and in 1878 he was appointed to the chair of Anglo-Saxon at Cambridge. His edition of Lancelot of the Laik was one of the first publications of the *Early English Texts Society (no. 6, 1865). He edited *Elfric, *Barbour’s Bruce, *Chatterton, and the Anglo-Saxon Gospels; his greatest works were the editions of Langland’s *Piers Plowman (published 1886 after 20 years’ work) setting out in parallel the three manuscript versions, the existence of which was Skeat’s discovery, and of *Chaucer (7 vols, 1894–7, largely establishing the canon and publishing non-canonical works in vol. vii), both of which have been reprinted throughout the 20th cent. He founded the English Dialect Society in 1873, which led to the appearance of Joseph *Wright’s English Dictionary (1896–1905), and his own Etymological Dictionary (1879–82, rev. and enl. 1910) was begun with the object of collecting material for the New English Dictionary (see Murray, J. A. H.). He also began the systematic study of place names in English. His autobiography (to that date) can be found in A Student’s Pastime (1896).

SKEEFFINGTON, Sir Lumley St George (1771–1850), fop, playwright, and devoted man of the theatre, who belonged to the Carlton House circle. His most successful works, The Word of Honour, The High Road to Marriage, and The Sleeping Beauty, were produced in the years 1802–5. He was caricatured by *Gillray, and his dramatic works were described by Byron in *English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809) as ‘skeletons of plays’.

SKEFFINGTON, Sir Lumley St George (1771–1850), created ‘poet-laureate’ by the universities of Oxford, Louvain, and Cambridge, an academical distinction. He became tutor to Prince Henry (Henry VIII) and enjoyed court favour despite his outspokenness. He was admitted to holy orders in 1498 and became rector of Diss in Norfolk. From about 1511 until his death he seems to have lived in Westminster. His principal works include: *The Bowge of Courte (a satire on the court of Henry VII), printed by Wynkyn de *Worde; A Garlande of Laurell (a self-laudatory allegorical poem, describing the crowning of the author among the great poets of the world); Phyllyp Sparowe (a lamentation put into the mouth of Jane Scroupe, a young lady whose sparrow has been killed by a cat, followed by a eulogy of her by Skelton, and a defence of himself and the poem); Collyn Clout (a complaint by a vagabond of the misdeeds of ecclesiastics), which influenced *Spenser. Not only this last poem, but also his satires ‘Speke Parrot’ and Why come ye nat to Courte, contained attacks on Cardinal Wolsey, setting forth the evil consequences of his dominating position. However, he seems to have repented of these, for A Garlande of Laurell and his poem on the duke of Albany, both of 1523, are dedicated to Wolsey. His most vigorous poem was *The Tunynge of Elynowe Rumnyng. His play *Magnyfycence (1516) is an example of the *morality. Skelton’s Ballade of the Scottysshe Kyng is a spirited celebration of the victory of *Flodden. A number of Skelton’s poems were printed and reprinted in the 16th cent., most of the extant copies being, though undated, evidently later than the poet’s death; in 1568 appeared a fairly full collected edition in one volume. There is a complete edition of the English poems by John Scattergood, 1983. Anecdotes of Skelton appeared in the popular Merie Tales (1567) and similar collections.

The verse form now known as ‘Skeltonic verse’ is derived from his favourite metre, ‘a headlong voluble breathless doggrel, which rattling and clashing on through quick-recurring rhymes . . . has taken from the name of its author the title of Skeltonical verse’ (J.C. *Collins). As he himself said (Collyn Clout, 53–8):

For though my ryme be ragged,
Tattered and jagged,
Rudely rayne-beaten,
Rusty and mothe-eaten,
Yf ye take well therwith,
It hath in it some pyth.

Skelton’s modern admirers include Robert *Graves.

Skeltonic verse, see Skelton.

Sketches by Boz, a collection of sketches of life and manners, by *Dickens, first published in various periodicals, and in book form in 1836–7 (in 1 vol., 1839). These are some of Dickens’s earliest literary work.

Skewton, the Hon. Mrs, in Dickens’s *Dombey and Son, the mother of Edith, Dombey’s second wife.

Skimpole, Harold, a character in Dickens’s *Bleak House.

SKINNER, Cyriack (1627–1700), a grandson of Sir E. *Coke, and a student, then a friend (and possibly also an early biographer), of *Milton. Milton addressed two sonnets to him, written c.1654: ‘Cyriack, whose grand­ sire on the Royal Bench’ and ‘To Mr Cyriack Skinner upon His Blindness’.

SKINNER, John (1721–1807), an Aberdeenshire minister chiefly remembered as the author of Tulloch­­gorum (1776), pronounced by *Burns ‘the best Scotch song Scotland ever saw’. His poems and songs were published in vol. iii of his Theological Works (1809).

ŠKVORECKÝ, Josef (1924– ), Czech novelist, born in Náchod in north-east Bohemia, and educated at Charles University, Prague. He worked for a while in publishing, and emigrated to Canada in 1969 with his novelist wife Zdena Salivarová, where they founded a Czech-language publishing house. He is known internationally for his comic and frequently subversive novels of wartime and post-war life, many of them featuring his hero Danny, passionate about women and jazz, who graduates from small-town adolescence in Bohemia to become a professor in Canada. Titles include Zbabělci (The Cowards, 1958) and The Engineer of Human Souls (1977).

Slavery, literature of. This refers to the literature written during or about the period between the 16th and 19th cents when Europeans colonized the Americas and the Caribbean using slave labour from Africa. Slavery played an important role in the development of European thought and literature especially in the 18th cent. The anti-slavery movement, at its peak in the 1780s and 1790s, attracted many poets to its cause, including *Wordsworth, *Blake, *Cowper, and *Southey, and ‘The Dying Negro’ (1773) by Thomas *Day became one of the best-known abolitionist poems of the day. Slavery became a fashionable literary topic. Two of the century’s most popular plays in Britain, *Southerne’s Oroonoko (1696) and Colman’s *Inkle and Yarico (1787: one of 45 different versions of the tale that circulated through Europe), were concerned with slavery. A critique of civilization and commerce links anti-slavery with *primitivism; stock images of the Noble Savage were used as a comparison with the greed and cruelty of Europeans. As an arena for the expression of pity and suffering, slavery was the perfect subject for *sentimental novels such as H. *Mackenzie’s Julia de Roubigné (1777) and Sarah *Scott’s The History of Sir George Ellison (1766). Despite its success in attracting a wide readership to the issue, the compassion displayed towards the slave’s predicament is often directed towards indulging the sensibility and benevolence of the reader rather than as a challenge to the institution of slavery. Even sympathetic observers such as John Stedman, whose Narrative (1796) catalogued the horrors of slavery in Surinam, argued for amelioration of the slaves’ conditions and not their freedom. Anti-slavery politics did not usually transcend the belief in the superiority of European culture of the age and rarely provided insights into the experiences of slaves with their own histories and cultures. Recent scholarship has focused on literature produced by ex-slaves such as I. *Sancho and Olaudah Equiano. Books such as Equiano’s played an important role in the abolition movement because writing and art were given value as expressions of humanity and civilization; by writing his own narrative Equiano countered the argument that Africans could not be considered human. (*Hume’s comment that ‘I am apt to suspect the negroes to be naturally inferior to the whites . . . No ingenious manufactures amongst them, no arts, no sciences’ was representative of attitudes that did not consider Africans worthy of such categories.) These 18th-cent. narratives may be seen as the precursors of the hundreds of slave narratives written in 19th-cent.
America, the most famous of which were written by Frederick Douglass (1817–95) and Harriet Jacobs (1813–97). Since the 1960s these narratives have been central to attempts to recover works by black writers previously excluded from literary history and have formed the basis of newly constructed black British and African-American canons. Literature has continued to be produced which rewrites the experience of slavery, especially in recent decades. The most famous of these to come out of America was T. *Morrison’s *Beloved (1987): she stated that her aim in writing was ‘to fill in the blanks that the slave narratives left, to part the veil that was so frequently drawn’. In Britain, F. *D’Aguiar, D. *Da˘dydeen, C. *Phillips, and Beryl Gilroy have all written literature that reimagines the history of slavery, and novels by Phillipa Gregory, B. *Unsworth, and M. *Warner have explored the role slavery played in British society. In the Caribbean, the need to decolonize literature and develop a post-colonial identity has encouraged writers such as G. *Lamming, D. *Walcott, and Earl *Lovelace to explore and reinterpret the slave past.

*Slay-good, in Pt. II of Bunyan’s *Pilgrim’s Progress, a giant whom Mr *Great-heart killed, rescuing Mr Feeble-mind from his clutches.

*Seleary, the circus proprietor in Dickens’s *Hard Times.

*Sleepy Hollow, The Legend of’, a story by W. *Irving, included in The Sketch Book. Ichabod Crane is a schoolmaster and suitor for the hand of Katrina van Tassel. He meets his death, or, according to ‘Sleepy Hollow’, writers previously excluded from literary history and have formed the basis of newly constructed black British and African-American canons. Literature has continued to be produced which rewrites the experience of slavery, especially in recent decades. The most famous of these to come out of America was T. *Morrison’s *Beloved (1987): she stated that her aim in writing was ‘to fill in the blanks that the slave narratives left, to part the veil that was so frequently drawn’. In the Caribbean, the need to decolonize literature and develop a post-colonial identity has encouraged writers such as G. *Lamming, D. *Walcott, and Earl *Lovelace to explore and reinterpret the slave past.

*Sleary, the circus proprietor in Dickens’s *Hard Times.

*Slender, Abraham, a cousin of *Shallow’s and unsuccessful lover of Anne *Page in Shakespeare’s *The Merry Wives of Windsor.

*Slipslop, Mrs, a character in Fielding’s *Joseph Andrews.

*Sloane, Sir Hans (1660–1753), a physician, secretary to the *Royal Society, 1693–1712, and president of the Royal College of Physicians, 1719–35. He purchased the manor of Chelsea in 1712 and endowed the Chelsea Physic Garden. He published (1696) a Latin catalogue of the plants of Jamaica (where he had been physician to the governor, 1687–9). His collection (including a large number of books and manuscripts) was purchased by the nation and placed in Montague House, afterwards the *British Museum; the geological and zoological specimens formed the basis of the Natural History Museum in South Kensington, opened in 1881. Sloane Square and Hans Place are named after him.

*Slop, Dr, in Sterne’s *Tristram Shandy, a thoroughly incompetent and argumentative physician, now known to be a caricature of Dr John Burton, a male midwife and Tory politician of York, and an enemy of Sterne’s. The name was later applied to Sir John Stoddart (1773–1856), who was editor of the New Times from 1817 until 1828.

*Slope, the Revd Obadiah, a character in Trollope’s *The Warden and *Barchester Towers.

*Slough of Despond, in Bunyan’s *Pilgrim’s Progress, a bog into which Christian and Pliable fall shortly after quitting the City of Destruction. Calvinist horror of sin accompanying conversion is symbolized as a rank fen which the king’s surveyors have been attempting to drain (for this sixteen hundred years) (i.e. since Christ’s crucifixion). As fen drainage was a preoccupation of the age, the image had immediacy, and has since passed into the realm of the proverbial.

*Sludge, Dicky, or ‘Flibbertigibbet’, a character in Scott’s *Kenilworth.

*Slumkey, the Hon. Samuel, in Dickens’s *Pickwick Papers, the Blue candidate in the Eatanswill election.

*Sly, Christopher, see TAMING OF THE SHREW, THE.

Small House at Allington, The, a novel by A. *Trollope, published 1864, the fifth in the *Barsetshire series.

Lily Dale becomes engaged to Adolphus Crosbie, an ambitious civil servant, but Crosbie is invited to a house party at Courcy Castle where he proposes to Lady Alexandrina de Courcy. When news comes back to Allington that Crosbie has jilted her, Lily behaves well, but Johnny Eames, her childhood sweetheart, tries to take some revenge on her behalf by assaulting Crosbie at Paddington station. Crosbie finds that he and his bride are incompatible; Lady Alexandrina returns to her family and travels to Baden, Crosbie taking refuge in wounded bachelordom. Meanwhile Eames’s reputation continues to develop. He grows out of his juvenile dissipations, clears up an unfortunate entanglement with the daughter of his London boarding-house keeper, and begins to spend much of his free time at Allington. There he becomes the protégé of Lord de Guest, and at the intercession of Lady Julia renews his suit to Lily. Lily, however, considers herself bound to Crosbie for life.

Lily’s sister Bell is expected to marry the heir of Squire Dale of the Great House at Allington, but she rejects him in favour of the worthy Dr Crofts.

*SMART, Christopher (1722–71), born in Kent, but educated in Durham and at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a classical scholar and as a poet, winning the Seatonian Prize for sacred poetry five times. In 1749 he came to London and began to write poems and reviews under various pseudonyms, including 'Mrs Midnight', for *Newbery, whose stepdaughter he married in 1752. Newbery published his first collection of verse, Poems on Several Occasions (1752), which included a blank-verse eulogy in two books, 'The Hop-Garden', and lighter verse. The Hilliad, a *mock-heroic satire on the quack doctor John Hill, written with the help of A. *Murphy and modelled on *The Dunciad, appeared in 1753. In 1756 Smart was dangerously ill, and a year later he was admitted to a hospital for the insane; he spent the years 1759–63 in a private home for the mentally ill in Bethnal Green. His derangement took the form of a compulsion to public prayer, which occasioned the famous comment of Dr *Johnson: 'I'd as lief pray with Kit Smart as anyone else.' After leaving the asylum he published his best-known poem, A Song to David (1763), a hymn of praise to David as author of the Psalms, and a celebration of the Creation and the Incarnation; the poem is built on a mathematical and mystical ordering of stanzas grouped in threes, fives, and sevens, and was compared by R. *Browning, one of Smart's few 19th-cent. admirers, to a great cathedral, in both its structure and imagery. Smart also published in these later years translations of the Psalms, of *Horace, two oratorios, and poems, and was supported by the friendship of W. *Mason, Dr *Burney, and others (though Mason, on reading A Song to David, declared him 'as mad as ever'); however he declined into poverty and debt and died within the 'Rules' of the King's Bench Prison. His work is passionate and lyrical, with biblical echoes from the Song of Songs, and was described by B. *Brophy as 'shelled, skinned, nerve-exposed'. She also published poetry (A Bonus, 1977; In the Meantime, 1984) and her journals have been edited (1986, 1994) by Alice Van Wart.

Smetænuus, the name under which five Presbyterian divines, Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow, published a pamphlet in 1641 attacking episcopacy and Bishop J. *Hall. It was answered by Hall, and defended by *Milton (who had been a pupil of Young, the eldest of the five) in his Animadversions upon the Remonstrant's Defence against Smectymnuus (1641) and his An Apology against a Pamphlet Cal'd A Modest Conflation of the Animadversions upon the Remonstrant against Smectymnuus (1642). In the latter Milton also defends himself against the allegations of the anonymous A Modest Conflation (possibly by Hall's son or by the Revd Robert Duncan, 1659–1762), which include the charge that Milton had 'spent his youth in loitering, bezelling and harlotting', and that he had been 'vomited out' of the University: it contains an interesting account of his early studies. From 'Smetænuus' is derived the 'Legion Smec' in Hudibras (11. ii), signifying the Presbyterians:

New modell'd the army and cashier'd
All that to Legion Smec adher'd.

Smedley, Francis Edward (1818–64), a cripple from childhood, who was for three years editor of Cruikshank's Magazine and author of three high-spirited novels of sport, romance, and adventure, including the popular Frank Fairleigh (1850), illustrated by Cruikshank, Lewis Arundel (1852), and Harry Coverdale's Courtship (1855).

Smelfungus, in Sterne's A Sentimental Journey, a caricature of Smollett, who in 1766 had published his Travels through France and Italy.

Smetana, Bedrich (1824–84), Czech composer, most of whose work depends on texts from his own country. He had however an admiration for Shakespeare and one of his earliest orchestral works is the symphonic poem based on Richard III, written when the composer was still unknown and living in Sweden: it contains a successful musical portrait of the hump-backed king with his uneven, halting walk. At about the same time Smetana wrote a long piano piece, Jubilate Agno in 1939 (ed. W. F. Stead as Rejoice in the Lamb: A Song from Bedlam). This unfinished work had been composed between 1758/9 and 1763, largely at Bethnal Green; Smart described it as 'my Magnificat', and it celebrates the Creation in a verse form based on the antiphonal principles of Hebrew poetry. It was to consist of parallel sets of verses, one beginning 'Let . . . with a response beginning 'For . . . The arrangement of the lines intended by Smart himself was demonstrated in 1950 by W. H. Bond, from the autograph manuscript in the Houghton Library at Harvard. It contains an extremely wide range of references, biblical, botanical, zoological, scientific (Smart was opposed to I. *Newton's view of the universe), personal, and cabbalistic; the most celebrated passage is the one on Smart's cat, which begins 'For I will consider my cat Jeffroy . . . There is a scholarly edition of the complete works, ed. K. Williamson and M. Walsh (5 vols, 1980–96). There is a biography by A. Sherbo (1967).
culmination of the Shakespeare tercentenary concert organized by Smetana in Prague in 1864.

SMILES, Samuel (1812–1904), son of a Haddington shopkeeper. He had a mobile and varied career as surgeon, newspaper editor, secretary for a railway company, etc., and devoted his leisure to the advocacy of political and social reform, on the lines of the Manchester school, and to the biography of industrial leaders and humble self-taught students. He published a Life of George Stephenson (1875), Lives of the Engineers (1861–2), Josiah Wedgwood (1894), and many similar works, but is now principally remembered for his immensely successful Self-Help (1859), which was translated into many languages. It preached industry, thrift, and self-improvement, and attacked ‘over-government’; it has been much mocked as a work symbolizing the ethics and aspirations of mid-19th-cent. bourgeois individualism. The titles of other works on similar themes (Character, 1871; Thrift, 1875; Duty, 1880) are self-explanatory.

SMILEY, Jane (1951– ), American novelist, born in Los Angeles, best known for her novel A Thousand Acres (1992), for which she was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for fiction. In this grim retelling of the King Lear story, set like much of Smiley’s work in the American Midwest, Larry King decides to retire and pass his farm down to his three daughters, Ginny, Rose, and Caroline; Smiley describes the tragic consequences of this decision eloquently and with a remarkable sense of both morality on an epic scale and intimate details of character.

SMITH, Adam (1723–90), born at Kirkcaldy. He studied at Glasgow University and as a Snell exhibitioner at Balliol College, Oxford. In 1748 he was appointed to lecture in rhetoric and belles-lettres in Edinburgh where he was associated with the publication of Hamilton of Bangour’s Poems. He was appointed professor of logic at Glasgow in 1751, and in 1752 professor of moral philosophy. He became the friend of Hume. His contributions to the original Edinburgh Review (1755–6) included a critical review of Johnson’s Dictionary. In 1759 he published The Theory of Moral Sentiments, which brought him into prominence. In 1764 he resigned his professorship and accompanied the young duke of Buccleuch as tutor on a visit to France, where he saw Voltaire and was admitted into the society of the physiocrats. After his return he settled down at Kirkcaldy and devoted himself to the preparation of his great work An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, published in 1776. This revolutionized the economic theories of the day. Its appearance on the actual date of the ‘Declaration of Independence’ of the American rebels was of importance if only for the prophecy in Bk IV, ‘They will be one of the foremost nations of the world’: to obviate the danger he proposed the representation of the colonies in the British Parliament. Smith’s edition of the autobiography of Hume in 1777 occasioned some controversy. A projected work on the theatre was never completed, but an essay on the imitative arts was included in his posthumous Essays on Philosophical Subjects (1795). He was a member of Johnson’s Club. A critical edition of Smith’s works in six volumes was published for the University of Glasgow in 1976–80, but the Correspondence volume is defective.

SMITH, Alexander (1830–67), by occupation a lace-pattern designer in Glasgow. He published in 1853 Poems (including ‘A life-drama’), which were received at first with enthusiasm, and satirized, along with other works of the Spasmodic school, in Aytoun’s Firmilian. He published in 1855 sonnets on the Crimean War jointly with S. T. Dobell; City Poems in 1857; and some prose essays, Dreamthorp, in 1863. His best prose is to be seen in A Summer in Skye (1865), a vivid evocation of the region, its history, and its inhabitants.

SMITH, Charlotte, née Turner (1749–1806), novelist and poet, who also wrote many stories and sketches, and enjoyed considerable success. She began her career with Elegiac Sonnets in 1784, followed by a second volume of sonnets (a form for which she was particularly admired) in 1797; the melancholy which informed much of her poetry was not merely fashionable, as some supposed, but sprang in part from intense marital, family, and financial difficulties. Beachy Head; with Other Poems was published posthumously in 1807. Her 11 novels appeared between 1788 and 1802, and include Emmeline (1788), which was admired by Sir W. Scott, and The Old Manor House (1793), which Scott, and posterity, considered her best. Orlando, who is favoured by a rich widow, Mrs Rayland, is forced to leave his beloved Monimia, Mrs Rayland’s ward, in order to seek a livelihood. He joins the army in America, and after many hardships among battles and Native Americans returns to find himself Mrs Rayland’s heir and to marry Monimia. At her best the author’s work is brisk, ironic, and confiding.

SMITH, Clark Ashton, see FANTASY FICTION.

SMITH, Dodie (1866–1990), playwright and novelist, who wrote as C. L. Anthony until 1935. Trained for the stage, she later worked in Heal’s furniture store in London. She wrote ten plays, among them Dear Octopus (1938), and six adult novels, including the romantic minor classic I Capture the Castle (1949). Her children’s book One Hundred and One Dalmatians (1956) has been successfully filmed in cartoon and live action.
SMITH, George (1824–1901). He joined in 1838 the firm of Smith & Elder, publishers and East India agents, of 65 Cornhill, London, which his father had founded in partnership with Alexander Elder in 1816, soon after coming in youth to London from his native town of Elgin. In 1843 Smith took charge of some of the firm’s publishing operations, and on his father’s death in 1846 became sole head of the firm. Under his control the business quickly grew in both the India agency and the business, and himself taking over the publishing directions. The chief authors whose works he published in his early career were *Ruskin, C. *Brontë, whose *Jane Eyre he issued in 1848, and W.M. *Thackeray, whose *Esmond he brought out in 1852. Charlotte Brontë visited Smith and his mother in London on friendly terms, and Smith later acknowledged that ‘In Villette my mother was the original of “Mrs Bretton”, several of her expressions are given verbatim. I myself, I discovered, stood for “Dr John”‘. (Recollections of Charlotte Brontë, Cornhill Magazine, Dec. 1900.)

In 1853 he took a partner, H. S. King, and after weathering the storm of the Indian Mutiny, founded in 1859 the Cornhill Magazine, with Thackeray as editor and numerous leading authors and artists as contributors. In 1865 Smith (with Frederick Greenwood) founded the Pall Mall Gazette, a London evening newspaper of independent character and literary quality, which remained his property till 1880. In 1868 he dissolved partnership with King, leaving him to carry on the India agency branch of the old firm’s business, and himself taking over the publishing branch, which he thenceforth conducted at 15 Water­loo Place, London. His chief authors now included R. *Browning, M. *Arnold, (Sir) L. *Stephen, and Anne Thackeray *Ritchie, all of whom were intimate personal friends. He was founder (1882) and proprietor of the Dictionary of National Biography.

SMITH, Goldwin (1823–1910), educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, Regius professor of modern history at Oxford, 1858–66, and subsequently professor of history at Cornell University in America, finally settling at Toronto in 1871. He was an active journalist and vigorous controversialist, supporting the cause of the North in the American Civil War, and the sentiment of national independence in Canada.

SMITH, Horatio (Horace) (1779–1849), brother of James *Smith. He became famous overnight as the joint author, with his brother, of *Rejected Addresses in 1812, and of *Horace in London (1813), imitations of certain odes of *Horace, chiefly written by his brother. He then turned to the writing of historical romance. In 1826 his Brambletye House, the story of a young Cavalier and a pale shadow of Scott’s Woodstock (published in the same year), went through many editions. The Tor Hill followed in the same year, and between then and 1846 he wrote nearly 20 further novels, as well as plays and poems and work for the New Monthly Magazine.

The herring girls, where did they go to
with their necklaces of salt? (1983)

SMITH, James (1775–1839), elder brother of Horatio *Smith. He was solicitor to the board of ordnance, and produced with his brother *Rejected Addresses in 1812 and *Horace in London (1813), imitations of certain odes of *Horace, largely written by James. He also wrote entertainments for the comic actor Charles Mathews.

SMITH, Captain John (1580–1631). He set out with the Virginia colonists in 1606 and is said to have been rescued by *Pocahontas when taken prisoner by the Native Americans. He became head of the colony and explored the coasts of the Chesapeake. He was author of The General History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles (1624).

SMITH, John (1618–52), see Cambridge Platonists.

SMITH, John Thomas (1776–1833), engraver and artist, and eventually keeper of prints and drawings at the *British Museum. He was particularly interested in the history and character of London. Among other writings he published Antiquities of London (1800) and Vagabondiana (1817), a description of London’s beggars, illustrated by himself. He wrote a remarkably candid life of the sculptor *Nollekens, published in 1828, and in 1839 Cries of London: A Book for a Rainy Day, or Recollections of the Events of the Years 1766–1833 (1845), which provides a lively account of the literary and artistic life of the time.

SMITH, (Lloyd) Logan Pearsall (1865–1946), man of letters, born in Philadelphia of Quaker stock. He spent most of his life in England, devoting himself to the study of literature and the English language; he was (with *Bridges and others) a founder of the *Society for Pure English. One of his sisters became the first wife of Bertrand *Russell, another married *Berenson, and his own circle of literary friends included R. *Fry, H. *James, and C. *Connolly. His works include Trivia (1902), More Trivia (1921), and Afterthoughts (1931), collections of much-polished observations and aphorisms; one of his more memorable, 'People say that life is the thing, but I prefer reading', indicates the nature of his success and limitations as an author. See Recollections of Pearsall Smith (1949), an unsparing account by R. Gathorne-Hardy.

SMITH, Stevie (Florence Margaret) (1902–71), poet and novelist, who was born in Hull but brought up in Palmers Green, north London, where she spent most of her adult life with an aunt. She wrote three novels, Novel on Yellow Paper (1936), Over the Frontier (1938), and The Holiday (1949), but has been more widely recognized for her witty, caustic, and enigmatic verse, much of it illustrated by her own comic drawings. Her first volume, A Good Time Was Had by All (1937), was followed by seven others, including Not Waving but Drowning (1957), of which the title poem (originally published in the *Observer) is perhaps the best known. She was an accomplished reader of her own verse, and found a new young audience at the poetry readings which flourished in the 1960s. Her Collected Poems appeared in 1975; see also Ivy & Stevie (1971) by her friend, the novelist Kay Dick.

SMITH, Sydney Goodsis (1915–75), poet, critic, and journalist, born in New Zealand, who settled in Scotland as a young man and is remembered for his part in the 20th-cent. revival of poetry in the *Scots language. His first volume, Skail Wind (1941), was followed by several others, and he also edited various works on Scottish literature.

SMITH, W. H., and Son, Ltd, a firm of stationers, newsagents, and booksellers, which originated in a small newsvendor's shop opened in London in Little Grosvenor Street in 1792 by Henry Walton Smith and his wife Anna. He died within a few months, leaving the shop to his widow, who on her death in 1816 left it to her sons; the younger, William Henry Smith (1792–1865), gave the firm its name of W H. Smith in 1828. When his son, also William Henry (1825–91), became a partner in 1846, the words 'and Son' were added, and have remained ever since. The business prospered, profiting from the railway boom by opening station bookstalls throughout the country (of which the first was at Euston, 1848), and establishing a circulating *library which lasted until 1961; it was a joint owner (from 1966) of Book Club Associates. In the 20th cent. the wholesale and retail activities of the business expanded greatly, and the name of W. H. Smith is now associated with a wide range of products. The W. H. Smith Literary Award has been awarded annually since 1959, for a work of any genre that constitutes 'the most outstanding contribution to English literature' in the year under review.

SMITH, Sir William (1813–93), lexicographer, classical scholar, and editor of the *Quarterly Review (1867–93). He is associated with the revival of classical teaching in England and among his many educational works are his Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities (1842), a Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology (1844–9), and a Dictionary of the Bible (1866–3).

SMOLLETT, Tobias George (1721–71), the son of a Scots laird, born near Dunbarton. After attendance at Glasgow University he was apprenticed to a surgeon, but did not prosper and lived in some poverty. He wrote a play, The Regicide, which he brought to London in 1739, but he could not get it accepted, then or at any future time. He joined the navy, became surgeon’s mate, and sailed in 1741 for the West Indies on an expedition against the Spaniards. He was present at the abortive attack on Cartagena, when the fleet retired, a fact which greatly disturbed Smollett, who later wrote about the failure in Roderick Random and (probably) in A Compendium of... Voyages. While in Jamaica he met Anne Lassells, a young woman of some property and means, whom he married, probably in 1743. In 1744 he set himself up as a surgeon in Downing Street, and began to entertain generously among a wide circle of friends, many of them his Scots compatriots.

Although never a Jacobite, Smollett’s first publication, in 1746, was a much-admired poem, The Tears of Scotland, elicited by the duke of Cumberland’s cruel treatment of the Scots after 1745. Further poems followed, notably two satires on London life, Advice (1746) and Reproof (1747). In the course of eight months in 1747 he wrote *The Adventures of Roderick Random which was published in 1748 and was a lasting success. The Smolletts’ only child, Elizabeth, was born in 1747 or 1748. Smollett toured France and the Low Countries in 1749, the first of various travels in Europe. Back in London he continued to practise as a surgeon, without any great success, and although he laboured hard at various tasks of editing and translation he was chronically short of money. In 1750 he moved to Chelsea, where he kept open board in his fine large house. In the same year he received his MD from Aberdeen, and travelled to Paris, a journey of which he made use in *The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751). Long, ferocious, and often savagely libellous, the novel was only reasonably successful; Smollett considerably toned down the second edition of 1758. He may have been the author, in 1752, of the scurrilous pamphlet, The Faithful Narrative of Habbakkuk Hilding, attacking Fielding for plagiarism and on many other counts. He and Fielding conducted intermittent warfare, chiefly in the Critical Review and the Covent Garden Journal, but Smollett eventually gave his rival handsome praise in his Continuation of the Complete History (see below).

In 1753 he published *The Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom, a story of cruelty and treachery which did not appeal to the public. Smollett was again in financial difficulties, and took on every medical or literary employment that he could find. In the same year he set out on an extended tour of his native Scotland, and began to exhibit symptoms of consumption. He had long been translating Cervantes, and in 1755 his History and Adventures of Don Quixote appeared, but to his great disappointment received little attention. In 1756 he became co-founder and editor of the Critical Review, his stormy and brilliant editorship lasted till 1763, but the Review was not a commercial success. A Compendium of Authentic and Entertaining Voyages, an anthology of travel, appeared in 1756, and contained an account, probably by his pen, of the retreat at Cartagena. In 1757–8 he published his Complete History of England which engendered much angry controversy, but its sales were immense and at last Smollett could feel financially secure. Also in 1757 he had a success at Drury Lane with his naval farce The Reprisal, staged by Garrick. The first volume of the Continuation of the Complete History appeared in 1760; and The Life and Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves, the story of a quixotic 18th-cent. Englishman, began to appear in instalments in Smollett’s new venture, the British Magazine, to which Goldsmith was a major contributor and which ran until 1767. In the same eventful year of 1760 Smollett was fined £100 and sentenced to three months’ imprisonment for a libel on Admiral Knowles in the Critical Review. His edition of a new translation of *The Works of Voltaire began to appear in 1761, and in 1762 Sir Launcelot Greaves was published in book form, but met with little interest. In 1762–3 Smollett wrote and edited the Tory journal the Briton, which was rapidly killed by Wilkes’s the North Briton.

Smollett’s health had long been deteriorating, and he attempted without success to obtain work abroad. In 1763 his daughter died. He gave up his house and all his literary work and left England with his wife and household for France and Italy. They returned in 1765 and in 1766 he published his epistolary novel Travels through France and Italy, a caustic work which earned him from Sterne the nickname of Smelfungus. In 1767 he tried again, and again without success, to obtain a consulsip abroad. The Present State of All Nations, a complex work of geography, history, statistics, and other matters (a long labour in which he was probably assisted by other hands), was finally published in eight volumes in 1768–9.

In 1768 he and his wife left again for Italy, and in 1769 appeared *The Adventures of an Atom, a rancorous satire on public men and affairs. Meanwhile he had been completing *The Expedition of Humphry Clinker, an epistolary novel generally agreed to be Smollett’s crowning achievement. It was published in London in 1771, some months before Smollett died at his home near Livorno.

Smollett’s passion for controversy did not always endear him to the literary or fashionable world, but his major novels were admired and successful; his reputation sank considerably in the 19th and early 20th cents, but now stands high. His avowed purpose in writing was to arouse ‘generous indignation’ against cruelty and injustice, but his relish in the exploits of his ‘heroes’ sometimes distorts his professed moral purpose. He was greatly attracted by the ‘anti-romance’ of Lesage and many of the episodes of his novels are set in scenes of squalor and violence ‘where the... passions are undisguised by affectation’: his works are often (if somewhat loosely) described as picaresque. See Louis Martz, The Later Career of Tobias Smollett (1942); Paul-Gabriel Boucé, The Novels of Tobias Smollett (1976); and James G. Basker, Tobias Smollett: Critic and Journalist (1988).
Smol'tork, Count, in Dickens's *Pickwick Papers, 'the famous foreigner' at Mrs Leo Hunter's party, 'a well-whiskered individual in a foreign uniform', who is 'gathering materials for his great work on England'.

Snagsby, Mr and Mrs, characters in Dickens's *Bleak House.

Snake, a character in Sheridan's *The School for Scandal.

Sneerwell, Lady, one of the scandal-mongers in Sheridan's *The School for Scandal.

Snevellicci, Mr, Mrs, and Miss, in Dickens's *Nicholas Nickleby, actors in Crummles's company.

Snobs of England, The see Thackeray.

Snodgrass, Augustus, in Dickens's *Pickwick Papers, one of the members of the Corresponding Society of the Pickwick Club.

SNORRI STURLUSON (1178–1241), an Icelandic historian and literary antiquary, the author of *Heimskringla, the Prose Edda, and perhaps Eóils saga, the biography of a Viking poet. Snorri is the most important figure in Old Icelandic literature; our knowledge of Norse myth and understanding of Old Norse poetry is due largely to him. He was politically ambitious, involved in the chief political intrigues of his time, and at last ignominiously assassinated on the order of King Hákon of Norway.

Snout, Tom, in Shakespeare's *A Midsummer Night's Dream, an Athenian tinker. He is cast for the part of Pyramus' father in the play of 'Pyramus and Thisbe', but appears as Wall.

SNOW, C(harles) P(ercy) (Baron Snow of Leicester) (1905–80), novelist, born and educated in Leicester, the son of a church organist. His early career was devoted to scientific research in Cambridge, but he turned increasingly to administration, and in later life held many important public posts. His first novel was a detective story, Death under Sail (1932), followed by New Lives for Old (1933) and The Search (1934), which deals with the frustrations of a scientist's life. His novel sequence (see ROMAN FLEUVE) Strangers and Brothers (the original title of the first volume, 1940, retitled subsequently George Passant) spanned 30 years of writing, and more years in the life of its narrator, Lewis Eliot, a barrister who, like Snow himself, rose from lower-middle-class provincial origins to enjoy worldly success and influence. The settings of the novels (The Light and the Dark, 1947; Time of Hope, 1949; The Masters, 1951; The New Men, 1954; Homecomings, 1956; The Conscience of the Rich, 1958; The Affair, 1959; Corridors of Power, 1963; The Sleep of Reason, 1968; Last Things, 1970) are largely academic or scientific; The Masters, a study of the internal politics of a Cambridge college, is perhaps his best known, but he was equally at home writing of crises in the life of a small-town solicitor or a fashionable and wealthy Jewish family. His interest in public affairs is reflected in his work, and his novel on Westminster life, The Corridors of Power, added a phrase to the language of the day, as did his Rede Lecture on The Two Cultures and the Scientific Revolution (1959). He published several other novels and critical works, including a critical biography of Trollope (1975), a novelist whose influence is evident in his own work. In 1950 he married Pamela Hansford *Johnson.

Snowe, Lucy, the narrator of Villette.

Snubbin, Mr Serjeant, in Dickens's *Pickwick Papers, counsel for the defendant in Bardell v. Pickwick.

Snug, in Shakespeare's *A Midsummer Night's Dream, a joiner, who takes the part of the lion in 'Pyramus and Thisbe'.

SOANE, Sir John (1753–1837), architect. He was architect to the Bank of England from 1788 to 1833 and founder of the museum in Lincoln's Inn Fields which bears his name and contains his library, antiquities, and works of art—perhaps most notably his collection of Hogarth paintings. The library is famous for its hoard of architectural drawings by Wren, the Adam brothers, Dance, and Soane. He published several volumes of his own designs and an extensive description of the museum. His Royal Academy lectures, his only major literary enterprise, were published in 1929.

social problem novel, a phrase used to describe mid-19th-cent. fiction which examined specific abuses and hardships which affected the working classes. These included many of the topics which were simultaneously being exposed by non-fictional writers on social issues, such as poor housing and sanitation; conditions in factories; child labour; the exploitation of seamstresses; and the exhausting nature of agricultural labour. Largely written from a middle-class perspective, it sometimes sought to stimulate legislation, and on other occasions (as in E. Gaskell's Mary Barton, 1848, and North and South, 1854–5) promoted understanding between masters and men on the basis of shared humanity, and shared material interests, as a way forward. Other notable examples include C. Kingsley's Altoun Locke (1850) and Yeast (1848), B. Disraeli's Sybil (1845), F. Trollope's Michael Armstrong, the Factory Boy (1840) and Jessie Phillips (1842–3), and C. E. Tonna's Helen Fleetwood (1841), and works by A. Mayhew, F. Paget, and E. Meteyard. Whilst *Dickens's fiction is usually regarded as more complex in its focus than many of these novels, much of his writing, especially Oliver Twist (1838), The Chimes (1845), Bleak House (1852), and Hard Times (1854), deals very directly with poverty, inequality, and their consequences. The term can be extended to include writing about ‘fallen women’ and prostitution (as in Gaskell’s *Ruth, 1853, Felicia Skene’s *Hidden Depths, 1866). In its search for resolution, whether practical or emotional, the social problem novel differs from later realist fiction by writers like G. *Gissing and A. *Morrison. See also Condition of England.

Socialism, a theory or policy of social organization that aims at the control of the means of production, capital, land, property, etc., by the community as a whole, and their administration or distribution in the interests of all. The early history of the word is obscure, but it was claimed that it was first used in something like the modern sense in 1827 in the Owenite Co-operative Magazine, and it is found in the 1830s used in the sense of Owenism. (See Owen, Robert.) William *Morris was active in the socialist movement, as was Bernard *Shaw, who published in 1928 *The Intelligent Woman’s Guide to Socialism and Capitalism.

Socialist Realism, the official artistic and literary doctrine of the Soviet Union, and consequently of its satellite Communist Parties, promulgated in 1934 at the First Congress of Soviet Writers with the encouragement of the dictator Josef Stalin (1879–1953) and of *Gorky, whose early novel The Mother (1906–7) was held up as a model. The doctrine condemned *Modernist works such as those of *Joyce or *Kafka as symptoms of decadent bourgeois pessimism, and required writers to affirm the struggle for socialism by portraying positive heroic actions. These principles were condemned by major Marxist critics and writers (*Brecht, *Lukács, Trotsky) for propagandist optimism and aesthetic conservatism, and many writers sympathetic to communism found them an embarrassment. Under Stalin’s tyranny, the doctrine was employed as a pretext for the persecution and silencing of nonconformist writers (see *Akhmatova, *Mandelstam, *Pasternak). Hardly any work of significant value conforms to the official line, except by retrospective adoption, as with *Sholokov’s Virgin Soil Upturned (1932). The principal legacy was in painting and statuary of the Soviet period, typified by the omnipresent image of the muscular and smiling tractor-driver.

Society for Psychical Research, the, a body founded in 1882 by F. W. H. *Myers, H. *Sidgwick, and others to examine without prejudice . . . those faculties of man, real or supposed, which appear to be inexplicable in terms of any recognised hypothesis. The Society, in a period of intense interest in spiritualism and the supernormal, investigated with high standards of scientific detachment such matters as telepathy, apparitions, etc., and was instrumental in exposing the fraudulent claims of, for example, Mme *Blavatsky. Its presidents have included A. J. *Balfour, W. *James, and Sir Oliver Lodge (1851–1940), a physicist less sceptical than many of the SPR; members and associates have included *Ruskin, *Tennyson, *Gladstone, and A. R. *Wallace. See R. Haynes, The Society for Psychical Research 1882–1982 (1982).

Society for Pure English, the, an association of writers and academics, inspired by *Bridges, which included H. *Bradley, Sir W. *Raleigh, and L. P. *Smith in its original committee. The Society was formed in Oxford in 1913, but suspended its activities until the end of the First World War. Between 1919 and 1946 it issued a total of 66 tracts of which the last, by R. W. Chapman, was a retrospective account of its work. The name of the Society was somewhat misleading in that the founders had no objections to the entry of foreign words into English, and the writers of its tracts were not for the most part purists in the dogmatic sense. A typical tract would offer an urbane and well-researched enquiry into some question of grammar, pronunciation, etymology, or vocabulary, and there were occasional treatments of quite exotic subjects; for instance, the language of C. M. *Doughty or the pronunciation of *Gladstone.

Society of Antiquaries, the, founded about the year 1752 at the instance of Archbishop *Parker, but suppressed on the accession of James I. The present Society was founded in Jan. 1717/18, with Peter Le Neve as president and W. *Stukeley as secretary. Its Archaeologia was first printed in 1770. From 1921 it has also published the Antiquaries’ Journal.

Society of Authors, the, an organization founded in 1884 by W. *Besant to promote the business interests of authors and fight for their rights, especially in copyright. Progress was slow, but by 1914 much had been achieved; Britain had joined the International Copyright Convention (Berne Union), the USA had offered limited protection to foreign authors, while domestic copyright had undergone a major reform under the Copyright Act of 1911. By then too the Society had succeeded in radically improving publishing contracts and in dealing with recalcitrant publishers in and out of the courts.

Besant’s example was followed by G. B. *Shaw, who fought arduously for playwrights vis-à-vis theatre managers, and to liberalize stage censorship; the League of Dramatists was founded in 1931 as an autonomous section of the Society. Since then the Society has formed other specialized groups, and has also laboured effectively to improve the author’s lot with regard to taxation, libel, social security, etc. It conducted a successful 28-year campaign for *Public Lending Right, and has helped to set up the Authors’ Lending and Copyright Society, in order to secure income in respect of rights (e.g. photocopying) only possible on a collective basis. Its quarterly publication is the Author. See Victor Bonham-Carter, Authors by Profession (2 vols, 1978, 1984).

SOCINIANISM, the doctrine of Lelio Sozini (Sozinus) (1525–62) and his nephew Fausto Sozzini (1539–1604) that Jesus was not God but a divine prophet of God’s word, and that the sacraments had no supernatural quality. The doctrine was set forth in the Confession of Rakow (1605), and was an influence on early *Unitarianism.

SOCRATES (469–399 BC), Greek philosopher, born near Athens, the son of a sculptor or stonemason. He served in the army, saving the life of Alcibiades at Potidea (432 BC). Late in life he held public office, and showed moral courage in resisting illegalities. Legend allotted the role of shrew to his wife Xanthippe. He occupied his life with oral instruction, frequenting public places and engaging in discourse designed to reveal truth and expose error. He incurred much enmity, was caricatured by *Aristophanes in the Clouds, and was finally accused by Meletus, a leather-seller, of introducing strange gods and corrupting youth. He was sentenced to death, and 30 days later took hemlock. Socrates wrote nothing, but his teaching methods are preserved in the Dialogues of *Plato and a more homely account is to be found in *Xenophon’s Memorabilia. The prominent features of his teaching appear to have been: the view that it is the duty of philosophy to investigate ethical questions; and the view that virtue is knowledge: no one is willingly wicked, for happiness lies in virtue; if a man is wicked, it is from ignorance. He inclined to belief in the immortality of the soul, and thought himself subject to divine prompting. (For Socratic method see PLATO.)

Sofronia, or Sophronia, a character in Tasso’s *Jerusalem Delivered.

‘Sohrab and Rustum’, a poem by M. *Arnold, published 1853. The story is taken from *Firdusi’s Persian epic, via a French translation by J. Mohl, Le Livre des rois. It recounts, in blank verse adorned by *epic similes, the fatal outcome of Sohrab’s search for his father Rustum, the leader of the Persian forces. Rustum (who believes his own child to be a girl) accepts the challenge of Sohrab, now leader of the Tartars: the two meet in single combat, at first unaware of one another’s identity, which is confirmed only when Sohrab has been mortally wounded.

soldan (from the Arabic sultan). The soldan or souldan, in Spenser’s *Faerie Queene (V. viii) represents Philip II of Spain. He is encountered by Prince *Arthur and Sir *Artegall with a bold defiance from Queen *Mercilla (Elizabeth), and the combat is undecided until the prince unveils his shield and terrifies the soldan’s horses, so that they overturn his chariot and the soldan is torn ‘all to rags’. The unveiling of the shield signifies divine interposition.

Solinus, the duke of Ephesus in Shakespeare’s *The Comedy of Errors.

SOLZHENITSYN, Alexander Isayevich (1918– ), Russian prose writer. Born in Kislovodsk in the Caucasus, the son of an army officer, he studied mathematics and physics at the University of Rostov-on-Don. He joined the Red Army in 1941. Arrested in 1945 for remarks critical of Stalin, he was sent to a labour camp where in 1952 he developed stomach cancer. In 1953 he was released into ‘administrative exile’. In 1956 he returned to Ryazan, in central Russia, to work as a teacher. His first published story, One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich (1962), caused a sensation through its honest and pioneering description of camp life. This was followed by Matrena’s House (1963) and other stories. His major novels, Cancer Ward (1968) and The First Circle (1969), which continue the basic Solzhenitsyn theme of men in extreme situations facing basic moral choices, could only be published abroad, and in late 1969 he was expelled from the Union of Soviet Writers. In 1970 he was awarded the *Nobel Prize for literature. The appearance abroad of the first volume of The Gulag Archipelago (1973–5), an epic ‘history and geography’ of the labour camps, caused the Soviet authorities to deport Solzhenitsyn to West Germany on 13 Feb. 1974; he later moved to the United States, where he continued a series of novels begun with August 1914 (1971), offering an alternative picture of Soviet history. His memoirs were published in English as The Oak and the Calf in 1980. Rebuilding Russia appeared in English in 1990. A life by D. M. *Thomas was published in 1997.

Some Experiences of an Irish R.M., a collection of stories by *Somerville and Ross, published 1899.

This exuberant and skilful series of stories is narrated by Major Yeates, the resident magistrate, whose misfortune is to attract calamity. With his gallant wife Philippa, he lives at the centre of a vigorous and wily community as the tenant of a dilapidated demesne, Shreelane, which he rents from a well-to-do rogue, Flurry Knox, whose old grandmother lives in squalid splendour at neighbouring Aussolas, overrun with horses. Frequent rain, flowing drink, unruly hounds, and the eccentricities of the populace contribute to innumerable confusions involving collapsing carts, missed meals, sinking boats, shying horses, and outraged visitors. Yet few of the stories are merely farcical, and some have a sombre echo.

SOMERVILE, William (1675–1742), a country gentleman, remembered as the author of The Chace (1735), a poem in four books of Miltonic blank verse on the pleasures of hunting which had a considerable success. In 1740 he published Hobbinol, a *mock-heroic account of rural games in Gloucestershire (see COTSWOLD...
Olimpick Games), and in 1742 his ‘Field Sports’, a short poem on hawking, appeared. Dr Johnson commented in The Lives of the English Poets that ‘he writes very well for a gentleman’.

SOMERVILLE (Edith) and ROSS (Martin), the pen-names of second cousins Edith (Enone Somerville (1858–1949, born in Corfu) and Violet Florence Martin (1862–1915, born in Co. Galway), who first met in 1886. Separately and together they wrote many books, mainly set in Ireland, as well as many articles, letters, diaries, and jottings. Their first collaboration, An Irish Cousin (1889), was well received. In their most sustained novel, The Real Charlotte (1894), Francie Fitzpatrick, a beautiful girl from Dublin, finds herself, on the estate of the wealthy Dysarts, becoming ensnared with the malign Charlotte Mullen, who is jealous of the attention devoted to Francie by the flash estate manager Lambert. Francie, finding herself in love with a handsome English officer, discovers he is already engaged and marries Lambert, only to be killed riding her horse. In 1897 came The Silver Fox, their first book with hunting as a major theme, then Some Experiences of an Irish R.M. (1899). The international success of this book led in 1908 to Further Experiences of an Irish R.M. and in 1915 to the third of the series, In Mr Knox’s Country. After Martin Ross’s death Edith Somerville wrote another 13 books, including The Big House at Inver (1925), a historical romance, but continued to name Ross as co-author.

‘Somnium Scipionis’ (Dream of Scipio) is the fable with which Cicero ends his De Republica. The only extant manuscript of Cicero’s treatise breaks off early in the last book, and the survival of the Somnium is due to the accident of its being reproduced by a certain Macrobius, who in the 4th cent. AD furnished it with a Neoplatonist commentary that interested medieval thinkers.

The fable relates how the younger Scipio saw his grandfather, the elder Scipio, in a dream and was distinguished in the service of their country. The Somnium may have inspired Petrarch’s choice of Scipio Africanus as the hero of his epic Africa. Since the fable expressed to perfection the humanist ideal of combining a quest for personal distinction with tranquillity of mind and patriotic effort, it attracted numerous editors during the Renaissance. Chaucer gives a poetical summary of it in The Parliament of Fowls and mentions it in other passages.

‘Song of the Shirt, The’, a poem by T. Hood, originally published anonymously in Punch in 1843. One of Hood’s best-known serious poems, it takes the form of a passionate protest by an overworked and underpaid seamstress—‘It is not linen you’re wearing out! But human creatures’ lives.’ The poem was a popular theme for illustration, and was treated by Leech in Punch and by the painters Richard Redgrave (1844) and G. F. Watts (1850).

Songs of Experience, see Songs of Innocence.

Songs of Innocence, a collection of poems written and etched by W. *Blake, published 1789. Most of the poems are about childhood, some of them written, with apparent simplicity, as if by children (e.g. ‘Little lamb, who made thee?’ and ‘The Chimney Sweeper’); others commenting on the state of infancy (‘One Echoing Green’); and yet others introducing the prophetic tone and personal imagery of Blake’s later work (‘The Little Girl Lost’, ‘The Little Girl Found’).

In 1795 Blake issued a further volume, entitled Songs of Innocence and of Experience: Shewing the Two Contrary States of the Human Soul, to which he added the ‘Songs of Experience’, some of them (e.g. ‘The Chimney Sweeper’ and ‘Nurse’s Song’) bearing identical titles to poems in the first collection, but replying to them in a tone that questions and offsets their simplicities, and manifests with great poetic economy Blake’s profoundly original vision of the interdependence of good and evil, of energy and restraint, of desire and frustration. They range from fairly straightforward, if highly provocative, attacks on unnatural restraint (‘The Garden of Love’, ‘London’) to the extraordinary lyric intensity of ‘Infant Sorrow’, ‘Ah! Sun-Flower’, and ‘Tyger! Tyger!’

sonnet, a poem consisting of 14 lines (of 11 syllables in Italian, generally 12 in French, and 10 in English), with rhymes arranged according to one or other of certain definite schemes, of which the Petrarchan and the Elizabethan are the principal, namely: (1) a b b a a b b a, followed by two, or three, other rhymes in the remaining six lines, with a pause in the thought after the octave (not always observed by English imitators, of whom Milton and Wordsworth are prominent examples); (2) a b a b c d c d e f e f g g. The sonnets of Shakespeare are in the latter form.

The sonnet was introduced to England by *Wyatt and developed by *Surrey and was thereafter widely used, notably in the sonnet sequences of Shakespeare, *Sidney, *Daniel, *Spenser, and other poets of the *Golden period, most of which are amatory in nature, and contain a certain narrative development: later sonnet sequences on the theme of love include those of D. G. *Rossetti and E. B. *Browning. *Milton, *Donne, *Keats, *Hopkins, and *Yeats have all used the form to great and varied effect, and it continues to flourish.

Sonnets from the Portuguese, a sonnet sequence by E. B. *Browning first published 1859; the so-called ‘Reading Edition’ of 1847 was a forgery by T. J. *Wise. It describes the growth and development of her love for Robert *Browning, at first hesitating to involve him in her sorrowful invalid life, then yielding to gradual conviction of his love for her, and finally rapturous in late-born happiness. The title, chosen to disguise the personal nature of the poems by suggesting that they were a translation, was a secret reference for her, 'the Portuguese', based on her poem 'Catarina to Camoens', which Browning particularly admired and which portrayed a Portuguese woman's devotion to her poet lover.

sonnets of Shakespeare, the, printed in 1609 and probably dating from the 1590s. In 1598 F. *Meres referred to Shakespeare's 'sugred Sonnets among his private friends', but these are not necessarily identical with the ones we now have. Most of them trace the course of the writer's affection for a young man of rank and beauty: the first 17 urge him to marry to reproduce his beauty, numbers 18 to 126 form a sequence of 108 sonnets, the same number as in Sidney's sequence Astrophel and Stella. The complete sequence of 154 sonnets was issued by the publisher Thomas Thorpe in 1609 with a dedication 'To the onlie begetter of these insuing sonnets Mr W.H. *'. Mr W.H. has been identified as (among others) William, Lord Herbert, afterwards earl of Pembroke, or Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, and further as the young man addressed in the sonnets. Another view argues that Mr W.H. was a friend of Thorpe, through whose good offices the manuscript had reached his hands—'begetter' being used in the sense of 'getter' or 'procurer'. Other characters are alluded to in the sequence, including a mistress stolen by a friend (40–2), a rival poet (78–80 and 80–6), and a dark beauty loved by the author (127–52). Numerous identifications for all the 'characters' involved in the sequence, as well as for Mr W.H., have been put forward: none of them is certain. Perhaps the most ingenious and amusing of these is Wilde's The Portrait of Mr W.H.

For the form of these poems see sonnet.

Sons and Lovers, by D. H. *Lawrence, published 1913, a closely autobiographical novel set in the Nottinghamshire coalmining village of Bestwood.

Walter Morel has married a sensitive and high-minded woman better educated than himself. She begins to shrink from his lack of fine feeling and drunkenness; embittered, she turns their marriage into a battle. Morel, baffled and thwarted, is sometimes violent, while Mrs Morel rejects him and turns all her love towards her four children, particularly her two eldest sons, William and Paul. She struggles with the poverty and meanness of her surroundings to keep herself and her family 'respectable' and is determined that her boys will not become miners. William goes to London to work as a clerk, and Paul also gets a job as a clerk with Mr Jordon, manufacturer of surgical appliances; William develops pneumonia and dies. Mrs Morel, numbed by despair, is roused only when Paul also falls ill. She nurses him back to health, and subsequently their attachment deepens. Paul is friendly with the Leivers family of Willey Farm, and a tenderness grows between him and the daughter Miriam, a soulful, shy girl. They read poetry together, and Paul instructs her in French and even algebra and shows her his sketches. Mrs Morel fears that Miriam will exclude her and tries to break up their relationship, while Paul, himself sickened at heart by Miriam's romantic love and fear of physical warmth, turns away and becomes involved with Clara Dawes, a married woman, separated from her husband Baxter, and a supporter of women's rights. Paul is made an overseer at the factory, times are easier, and he now begins to be noticed as a painter and designer. His affair with Clara peters out and she returns to her husband. Meanwhile Mrs Morel is ill with cancer and Paul is in misery at the thought of losing her. At last, unable to bear her suffering, he and his sister Annie put an overdose of morphia in her milk. Paul resists the urge to follow her 'into the darkness' and, with a great effort, turns towards life. Sons and Lovers was perhaps the first English novel with a truly working-class background, and certainly Lawrence's first major novel.

SONTAG, Susan (1933– ), American cultural critic, essayist, and novelist. Born in New York, she studied at the universities of California, Chicago, Harvard, Oxford, and the Sorbonne. Settling in New York as a teacher and an essayist for Partisan Review and other journals, she wrote two experimental novels, The Benefactor (1963) and Death Kit (1967), and collected her essays in two volumes, Against Interpretation (1966) and Styles of Radical Will (1969), in which she surveys a range of topics, from the 'camp' sensibility and pornographic writing to avant-garde music and painting. The title essay of the first volume protests against the hunt for 'meanings' in art, calling for a sensuous appreciation of its surfaces. These early essays foreshadow many of the emphases of *postmodernism. While undergoing treatment for cancer in the 1970s, she wrote two provocative essays, On Photography (1977) and Illness as Metaphor (1978), and collected her short stories as I, Etcetera (1978). Later works include AIDS and Its Metaphors (1988) and a historical romance about Nelson and the Hamiltons, The Volcano Lover (1992). She has also worked as a theatrical and cinematic director.

Sophia Western, the heroine of Fielding's Tom Jones.

SOPHOCLES (496–406 BC), Greek tragedian who wrote c.120 plays, of which seven survive, including Ajax, The Women of Trachis, Electra, and Philoctetes. The group known as the Theban plays, Oedipus Rex, Oedipus at Colonus, and Antigone, have long been influential in English literature, either directly or in versions by Seneca. T. *Watson's translation of the Antigone into Latin (1581) was widely read, and both Milton's Samson Agonistes and Dryden's Oedipus draw on Sophocles, though Dryden is chiefly indebted to *Seneca. It was in the 19th cent. that Sophocles really came into favour. *Shelley read him on his last and fatal sailing trip. Bulwer-Lytton adapted his Oedipus the King (1846). *M. Arnold produced his Sophoclean play Merope (1858) and two Sophoclean fragments, an Antigone (1849) and a Dejaneira (1867). Swinburne introduced Sophoclean touches into his Erechtheus (1876); and during the first decade of the 20th cent. Freud hit on the term ‘Oedipus complex’ to describe certain features of infantile sexuality. This caught the public imagination and led to numerous translations and adaptations of the Theban plays. Yeats drew on Sophocles. Pound produced a version of Women of Trachis, and Heaney adapted Philoctetes as Cure at Troy (1990).

Sophonisba, the daughter of Hasdrubal, a Carthaginian general, who avoided captivity by taking poison at the instigation of her betrothed Masinissa, was the subject of several plays, notably by Marston, N. Lee, and James Thomson. The notorious line ‘Oh! Sophonisba, Sophonisba, Oh!’ occurs in Thomson’s version (1736), was altered to ‘Oh Sophonisba, I am wholly thine’ in later editions, and parodied by Fielding in Tom Thumb as ‘O Huncamunca, Huncamunca O!’

Sophy Crewler, in Dickens’s David Copperfield, ‘the dearest girl in the world’, whom Traddles marries.

Sordello (c.1200–769), a poet born near Mantua but whose political connection with Charles of Anjou, lord of Provence, kept him in Provence for much of his later life. He accordingly wrote ‘troubadour’ poetry in Provençal and so became an important link between the love poetry of Provence and that of Italy which was descended from it. Dante places him in the perpetual purgatory where he acts as guide to Virgil and Dante, pointing out to them the valley of the kings in Purgatorio vii, a role assigned to him perhaps because of his famous lament for the death of Blacatz. Ed. M. Boni (1954).

Sordello, a narrative poem in iambic pentameter couplets by R. Browning, published 1840. The poem had taken seven years to complete, and was interrupted by the composition of Paracelsus and Strafford; Browning intended it to be more ‘popular’ than the former, but the poem was received with comprehension and derision by the critics and the public, and its notorious ‘obscurity’ caused severe and prolonged damage to Browning’s reputation. The Pre-Raphaelites, for whom it became a cult text, were its first defenders, followed later by Pound; it is now coming to be recognized as one of the finest long poems of the century, and of central importance in the interpretation of Browning’s work, particularly its relation to the Romanticism on whose tenets it heavily relies and which, at the same time, it challenges and disputes. Its genuine difficulty springs from the swiftness and compression of the language, the convoluted time-scheme of the narrative, and the fusion of intense specificity (of historical detail, landscape, etc.) with the abstract ideas which form the core of the argument.

The narrative is set in Italy during the period of the Guelf–Ghibelline wars of the late 12th and 13th cents, and traces the ‘development of a soul’, that of the troubadour Sordello (above), along a path of self-realization where political, aesthetic, and metaphysical ideas reflect each other; all this in the framework of a plot strongly influenced by the elements of fairy tale (lost heir, wicked stepmother, unattainable princess, etc.). The whole defies summary and demands rereading.

Sorley, Charles Hamilton (1895–1915), poet, educated at Marlborough; he spent a year in Germany before returning on the outbreak of war in 1914, when he was commissioned and served in the trenches in France where he was killed. He left only 37 complete poems; his posthumous collection, Marlborough and Other Poems (1916), was a popular and critical success in the 1920s, but his verse was then long neglected, despite the efforts of Robert Graves (who considered him, with W. Owen and Rosenberg, ‘one of the three poets of importance killed during the War’) and of Blunden. The best known of his poems include ‘The Song of the Ungirt Runners’, ‘Barbury Camp’, and the last, bitter ‘When you see millions of the mouthless dead’. See The Letters of Sorley, ed. W. R. Sorley (1919), and The Ungirt Runner (1965) by T. B. Swann.

Sorrel, Hetty, a character in G. Eliot’s Adam Bede.

Soul’s Tragedy, A, a play by R. Browning, published 1846, together with Maria, as no. VIII of Bells and Pomegranates. Its subtitle—‘Act First, being what was called the Poetry of Chiappino’s life: and Act Second, its Prose’—indicates both the play’s genre, tragi-comedy, and also its unusual form: the division (as opposed to mixture) of verse and prose represents Browning’s idiosyncratic adaptation of Elizabethan and Jacobean models (see also Pippa Passes).

Chiappino, the ‘hero’, is a discontented liberal in 16th-cent. Faenza, who, at the climax of Act I, nobly (or egotistically?) takes on himself the punishment for the supposed assassination of the tyrannical provost by his friend Luitolfo. He expects to be lynched by the provost’s guards, but is instead acclaimed by the people as their liberator, and is unable to resist the temptation of his new-found role. The provost turns out not to have been killed after all and, just as Chiappino is about to become the new provost himself, he is unmasked by the papal legate Ogniben, who has sardonically played up to his self-deceiving justification for seizing power. Ogniben, who had arrived in Faenza remarking that he had seen ‘three-and-twenty leaders of revolts’, utters the famous line ‘I have seen four-and-twenty leaders of revolts!’ as he watches Chiappino fleeing the town after his humiliation.

Soutar, William (1898–1943), Scottish poet, born in Perth, the son of a master-jointer, and educated at Perth Academy. He served in the navy during the First World War, and contracted an illness which, after his subsequent studies at Edinburgh University, left him paralysed for the last 14 years of his life. He published several volumes of poetry from 1923 onwards; he wrote in both *Scots and English, though his Scots work is generally considered more significant. All his poems are short; they include lyrics, epigrams, riddles, pieces for children which he described as 'bairn-rymes', and other short works which he called 'whigmaleeries'. Several of his poems sing the praises and frustrations of the lost heritage of 'the lawland tongue'. His Collectcd Poems (1948) has an introduction by *MacDiarmid, and his Diaries of a Dying Man, ed. A. Scott, were published in 1954.

South, Marty, a character in Hardy's *The Woodlanders.

SOUTHERNE, or SOUTHERN, Thomas (1659–1746), of Irish parentage. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, but came to London in 1680 and settled there. He was a friend of *Dryden, for several of whose plays he wrote prologues and epilogues. His first tragedy, The Loyal Brother: or The Persian Prince (1682), was, like Otway's *Venice Preserv'd, its immediate contemporary, an attack on *Shaftesbury and the Whigs. He wrote several comedies, but is chiefly remembered for his two highly successful tragedies, The Fatal Marriage (1694) and *Oroonoko (1695), both founded on novels by A. *Behn. Remarkably little is known of his long and, in later years, unproductive life, though there are many affectionate references to his good nature by Dryden. *Swift, *Dennis, *Cibber, and other friends. He became known as the Nestor of poets, and William Broome in a letter to *Pope (1725/6), on being asked to supply a preface to one of his late works, commented, 'His bays are withered with extreme age... It requires some skill to know when to leave off writing.' South-erne is regarded as a successor to *Otway in the art of pathos, and as a link between Restoration tragedy and the sentimental tragedies of the 18th cent. See J. W. Dodds, Thomas Southerne, Dramatist (1933).

SOUTHEY, Robert (1774–1843), the son of a Bristol linen draper, of a respectable Somerset family. Much of his lonely childhood was spent in the home of an eccentric aunt, Miss Tyler, where he acquired a precocious love of reading; he gives a vivid account of these years in letters written when he was 46 to his friend John May. He was expelled from Westminster School for originating a magazine, the Flagellant, and proceeded to Oxford with 'a heart full of poetry and feeling, a head full of Rousseau and Werther, and my religious principles shaken by Gibbon'. He became friendly with S. T. *Coleridge and together they planned their Pantisocratic society (see PANTISOCRACY). At Oxford he wrote a play, Wat Tyler, and another with Coleridge, The Fall of Robespierre. From this time on his literary output was prodigious. In 1795 he travelled to Portugal, married Edith Fricker (Coleridge married her sister Sara), and wrote Joan of Arc (1796). Between 1796 and 1798 he wrote many ballads, including *The Inchcape Rock and 'The Battle of *Blenheim', which had an influence in loosening the constrictrions of 18th-century verse. In 1800 he went to Spain, and on his return settled in the Lake District, where he remained for the rest of his life as one of the *Lake poets. A narrative verse romance, Thalaba, appeared in 1801, but sold poorly. In 1803 he published a translation of *Amadis of Gaul (revised from an older version); in 1805, *Madoc; and in 1807, the year in which he received a government pension, appeared a version of *Palmerin of England and Letters from England by Don Manuel Alvarez Esquius, purporting to be from a young Spaniard and giving a lively account of life and manners in England. In 1808 he translated the Chronicle of the Cid and in 1809 began his long association with the *Quarterly Review, which provided almost his only regular income for most of the rest of his life. A long Oriental poem, The Curse of Kehama, featuring much complex Hindu mythology, appeared in 1810 and Omianiana, an original commonplace book, with contributions by Coleridge, in 1812. He was appointed in 1813 *poet laureate, a post which he greatly disliked, and in the same year published his short but admirable Life of Nelson. A narrative poem Roderick: The Last of the Goths appeared in 1814. In 1817 he produced an edition of *Malory and had to endure the publication, by his enemies, of his youthful and revolutionary Wat Tyler. The final volume of his History of Brazil (3 vols, 1810–19) appeared a year before his Life of Wesley. In 1821, to commemorate the death of George III, he wrote *A Vision of Judgement, in the preface to which he vigorously attacked *Byron. Byron's parody in riposte, *The Vision of Judgement, appeared in 1822, and Southey is frequently mocked in *Don Juan. From 1823 to 1832 Southey was working on his History of the Peninsular War. In 1824 appeared The Book of the Church and in 1825 A Tale of Paraguay. His Sir Thomas More, in which he converses with the ghost of More, came out in 1829. In the same year appeared All for Love; and The Pilgrim to Compostella, and in 1832 Essays Moral and Political and the last volume of History of the Peninsular War (1823–32), which was overshadowed by *Napier's work on the same subject. Between 1832 and 1837 he worked on a life and an edition of *Cowper, and on his Lives of the British Admirals (1833). In 1835 he was granted a pension of £300 by Peel. His wife died in 1837, and in 1839 he married Caroline *Bowles. *The Doctor, etc. was begun in 1834 (7 vols, 1834–47). Southey's last years were marked by an increasing mental decline.

His longer poems, now little read, were admired by men as diverse as *Fox, Sir W. *Scott, and *Macaulay. The scope of his reading and of his writing was vast, and his clear, firm prose style has been much esteemed; but in no sphere was his work of the highest distinction. Although an honest, generous man (who was youthful Jacobinism, he was betraying principles. In which many unprincipled persons took advantage to obtain subscriptions from the public for the most

SOUTH SEA COMPANY | SPANISH CURATE

South Sea Company, the, formed in 1711 by *Harley (later earl of Oxford) to trade with Spanish America under the expected treaty with Spain. An exaggerated idea prevailed of the wealth to be acquired from the trading privileges granted by the Treaty of Utrecht and the Asiento Treaty, and money was readily invested in the Company. A bill was passed in 1720 by which persons to whom the nation owed money were enabled to convert their claims into shares in the Company, and the shares rose in value from £100 to £1,000. The Company shortly afterwards failed. But the scheme meanwhile had given rise to a fever of speculation, of which many unprincipled persons took advantage to obtain subscriptions from the public for the most impossible projects. The collapse of these and of the South Sea scheme caused widespread ruin. The whole affair was known as the South Sea Bubble and was the subject of satires by *Swift and *Hogarth. But the original idea of the South Sea Company was a sound one for perfectly honest trade. See John Carswell, *The South Sea Bubble (rev. edn 1993).

The South-Sea House, where the Company had its offices, is the subject of one of Lamb's *Essays of Elia.

SOUTHWELL, St Robert (?1561–95), educated by the Jesuits at Douai and Rome. He took Roman orders and came to England in 1586 with Henry Garnett (who was subsequently executed for complicity in the Gunpowder Plot). He became in 1589 domestic chaplain to the countess of Arundel, was captured when going to celebrate mass in 1592, repeatedly tortured, and executed after three years' imprisonment. His poems were mainly written in prison. Of these it was his object to make spiritual love, instead of 'unworthy affections', the subject. His chief work was *St Peters Complaint, published 1595, a long narrative of the closing events of the life of Christ in the mouth of the repentant Peter, in which the spiritual is contrasted with the material by numerous comparisons and antitheses. He also wrote many shorter devotional poems (some of them collected under the title *Moeoniae, 1595) of a high order, notably 'The Burning Babe', praised by *Jonson. He was beatified in 1929 and canonized in 1970. His poems were edited by J. H. McDonald and N. P. Brown (1967).

SOUTHWORTH, E. D. E. N., see ROMANTIC FICTION.

Sowerberry, in Dickens's *Oliver Twist, an undertaker, to whom Oliver is apprenticed when he leaves the workhouse.

SOYINKA, Wole (1934– ), Nigerian dramatist and probably Africa's most versatile author, educated at the universities of Ibadan and Leeds. He was play reader at the *Royal Court Theatre, London, where his *The Swamp Dwellers (1958), *The Lion and the Jewel and The Invention (both 1959) were produced. These already demonstrated his development from simple Nigerian village comedies to a more complex and individual drama incorporating mime and dance. Back in Nigeria from 1960, a variety of university posts and the opportunity of producing and acting in his own plays gave him the self-confidence to undertake even more daring innovations, e.g. in *A Dance of the Forests (1960), a half-satirical, half-fantastic celebration of Nigerian independence. Soyinka's first novel, *The Interpreters (1965), captures the idealism of young Nigerians regarding the development of a new Africa—possibly anticipating a new Biafra. In prison for pro-Biafran activity during 1967–9, he produced increasingly bleak verse and prose, *Madmen and Specialists (1970), and his second novel, *Season of Anomy (1973). His translation of the *Bacchae of Euripides was commissioned by and performed at the *National Theatre in 1973. *Death and the King's Horseman (1975) embodied his post-Biafran cultural philosophy, enunciated in *Myth, Literature and the African World (1976), of the need for the distinct aesthetics of Africa and Europe to cross-fertilize each other. Another bleak period, coloured by the deteriorating political situation in Nigeria, followed this patch of optimism: later works include the drama *A Play of Giants (1984), savagely portraying a group of African ex-dictators taking refuge in New York, and *The Open Sore of a Continent (1996), denouncing the military regime in Nigeria, and the brutal execution in November 1995 of Nigerian writer and political activist Ken Saro-Wiwa. Soyinka himself had his Nigerian passport confiscated in 1994, and has since lived abroad, largely in the USA, while continuing actively to campaign for human rights. He was awarded the *Nobel Prize in 1986.

Spanish Bawd, The, see Celestina.

Spanish Curate, The, a comedy by J. *Fletcher, probably in collaboration with *Massinger, written and performed 1622, and based on Gerardo, the Unfortunate Spaniard (1622), translated from the Spanish of Céspedes by L. Digges. It was very popular after the Restoration.

The main plot deals with the intrigues of Don Henrique's mistress Violante, the failure of which leads to the reconciliation of Don Henrique with his divorced wife Jacinta and his brother Don Jamie; Violante is consigned to a nunnery. In the underplot, from which the play takes its name, Leandro, a rich young gentleman, plays on the cupidity of a priest and his sexton, and, with their help, on that of the lawyer Bartolus, the jealous husband of a beautiful wife, Amaranta, to facilitate his affair with her.

Spanish Fryar, The, a tragi-comedy by Dryden, produced and published 1681.

The serious plot is characteristically about a usurpation. Torrismond, though he does not know it, is lawful heir to the throne, and secretly marries the reigning but unlawful queen, who has allowed Torrismond's father, the true king, to be murdered in prison. The sub-plot is dominated by Father Dominic, a monstrous corrupt friar, who uses the cant terms of Dissenters and who pimp for the libertine and whiggish Lorenzo. The latter is a highly dubious young gentleman, plays on the cupidity of a priest and adds tragic decorum and in its deeply sceptical

Amaranta, to facilitate his affair with her. Pepys was seen by Pepys as late as 1668.

The play is like Mr Limberham in breaching comic as well as tragic decorum and in its deeply sceptical treatment of religious and political orthodoxies.

Spanish Gipsy, The, (1) a romantic comedy by T. Middleton and others (1625); (2) a dramatic poem by G. Eliot (1868).

Spanish Tragedy, The, a tragedy, mostly in blank verse, by Kyd, written c.1587, printed 11 times between 1592 and 1633.

The political background of the play is loosely related to the victory of Spain over Portugal in 1580. Lorenzo and Bel-imperia are the children of Don Cyprian, duke of Castile (brother of the king of Spain); Hieronimo is marshal of Spain and Horatio his son. Balthazar, son of the viceroy of Portugal, has been captured in the war. He courts Bel-imperia, and Lorenzo and the king of Spain favour his suit for political reasons. Lorenzo and Balthazar discover that Bel-imperia loves Horatio; they surprise the couple by night in Hieronimo's garden and hang Horatio on a tree. Hieronimo discovers his son's body and runs mad with grief. He succeeds nevertheless in discovering the identity of the murderers, and carries out revenge by means of a play, Solymon and Perseda, in which Lorenzo and Balthazar are killed, and Bel-imperia stabs herself. Hieronimo bites out his tongue before killing himself. The whole action is watched over by Revenge and the Ghost of Andrea who was previously killed in battle by Balthazar.

The play was the prototype of the English revenge tragedy genre. It returned to the stage for decades and was seen by Pepys as late as 1668.

Jonson is known to have been paid for additions to the play, but the additional passages in the 1602 edition are probably not his. The play was one of Shakespeare's sources for Hamlet and the alternative title given to it in 1615, Hieronimo Is Mad Againe, provided T. S. Eliot with the penultimate line of The Waste Land.

SPARK, Dame Muriel Sarah, née Camberg (1918–), author, of Scottish–Jewish descent, born and educated in Edinburgh. After spending some years in central Africa, which was to form the setting for several of her short stories, including the title story of The Go-Away Bird (1958) and one of its other tales, The Seraph and the Zambesi, she returned to Britain where she worked for the foreign office during the Second World War. She began her literary career as editor and biographer, working for the Poetry Society and editing its Poetry Review from 1947 to 1949; the problems of biography and autobiography form the subject of Loitering with Intent (1981). She turned to fiction after winning the Observer short story competition in 1951, and in 1954 became a Roman Catholic. Her first novel, The Comforters (1957), was followed by many others, including Memento Mori (1959), a comic and macabre study of old age; The Ballad of Peckham Rye (1960), a bizarre tale of the underworld, mixing shrewd social observation with hints of necromancy; perhaps her best-known work, The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie (1961), a disturbing portrait of an Edinburgh schoolmistress and her group of favourite pupils, her 'crème de la crème'; The Girls of Slender Means (1963), a tragi-comedy set in a Kensington hostel in 1945; The Public Image (1968); The Driver's Seat (1970), about a woman possessed by a death-wish; The Abbess of Crewe (1974), a satirical fantasy about ecclesiastical and other kinds of politics; and The Take Over (1976), set in Italy, where she settled. Her novels, with the exception of the lengthy and uncharacteristic The Mandelbaum Gate (1965), are short, elegant, eccentric, and sophisticated, with touches of the bizarre and the perverse; many have a quality of fable or parable, and her use of narrative omniscience is highly distinctive. She has also written plays and poems; her Collected Poems and Collected Plays were both published in 1967. A collected edition of her stories appeared in 1986. Later novels include A Far Cry from Kensington (1988), and Symposium (1990). A volume of autobiography, Curriculum Vitae, appeared in 1992. A volume of poems, Going up to Sotheby's, was published in 1982.

Sparkish, a character in Wycherley's The Country Wife.

Sparkler, Edmund, a character in Dickens's Little Dorrit, who marries Fanny, Little Dorrit's sister.

Sparsit, Mrs, a character in Dickens's Hard Times.

Spasmodic school, a term applied by Aytoun to a group of poets which included P. J. Bailey, J. W. Marston, S. T. Dobell, and Alexander Smith. Their works for a brief while enjoyed great esteem; this was largely destroyed by Aytoun's attacks and by his parody Firmilian (1854), which also satirized their critical champion, Gillilan. Spasmodic poems tended to describe intense interior psychological drama, were violent and verbose, and were characterized by obscurity, pathetic fallacy, and extravagant imagery; their heroes (who owed much to *Byron and *Goethe) were lonely, aspiring, and disillusioned, and frequently poets themselves. See M. A. Weinstein, *W. E. Aytoun and the Spasmodic Controversy (1968).

Specimens of English Dramatic Poets Who Lived about the Time of Shakespeare, by C. *Lamb, published 1808; an anthology, with brief but cogent and illuminating critical comments, of extracts of scenes and speeches from Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists, many of them little known or regarded in Lamb's day. His selections include extracts from *Beaumont and *Fletcher, *Jonson, *Marlowe, *Webster, and some dozen others. The book did much to draw the attention of Lamb's contemporaries to this period of drama, which Lamb himself greatly enjoyed 'beyond the diocese of strict conscience'.

Spectator, (1) a periodical conducted by *Steele and *Addison, from 1 Mar. 1711 to 6 Dec. 1712. It was revived by Addison in 1714, when 80 numbers (556–635) were issued, but the first series has been generally considered superior, except by *Macaulay, who found the last volume to contain 'perhaps the finest Essays, both serious and playful, in the English language' (*Edinburgh Review, July 1843). It appeared daily, and was immensely popular, particularly with the new growing middle-class readership. Addison and Steele were the principal contributors, in about equal proportions; other contributors included *Pope, *Tickell, *Budgell, A. *Philips, *Eusden, and Lady M. W. *Montagu.

It purported to be conducted (see the first two numbers) by a small club, including Sir Roger de *Coverley, who represents the country gentry, Sir Andrew Freeport, Captain Sentry, and Will Honeycomb, representing respectively commerce, the army, and the town. Mr Spectator himself, who writes the papers, is a man of travel and learning, who frequents London as an observer, but keeps clear of political strife. The papers are mainly concerned with manners, morals, and literature. Their object is 'to enliven morality with wit, and to temper wit with morality', and succeeding generations of readers endorsed *E. Young's view that the periodical (which succeeded the *Tatler) provided 'a wholesome and pleasant regimen'; both its style and its morals were considered exemplary by Dr *Johnson, H. *Blair, and other arbiters. There is a five-volume edition by Donald F. Bond, published 1965.

(2) A weekly periodical started in 1828 by Robert Stephen Rintoul, with funds provided by Joseph Hume and others, as an organ of 'educated radicalism'. It supported Lord John Russell's *Reform Bill of 1831 with a demand for 'the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill'. R. H. *Hutton was joint editor, 1861–97. John St Loe Strachey (1860–1927) was editor and proprietor from 1898 to 1925, and his cousin Lytton *Strachey was a frequent contributor. Other notable contributors in later years include P. *Fleming, G. *Greene, E. *Waugh, P. *Quennell, K. *Amis, Clive James, Bernard Levin, Peregrine Worsthorne, Katherine Whitehorn, and Auberon *Waugh: a lively new wave of younger writers is represented by Simon Heffer, Andrew Roberts, and Boris Johnson (editor, 1999).

SPEEDING, James (1808–81), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He edited The Works of Francis Bacon (7 vols, 1857–9). His Evenings with a Reviewer (1848) was a refutation of Macaulay’s ‘Essay on *Bacon which he subsequently developed in his The Letters and Life of Francis Bacon (1861–72).

Speed, Valentine’s servant in Shakespeare’s The Two Gentlemen of Verona.

SPEED, John (1552–1629), historian and cartographer. He made various maps of English counties, and was encouraged by *Camden, *Cotton, and others to write his History of Great Britain (1611). The maps were far more valuable than the history; they began about 1607, and an atlas of them appeared in 1611. There were several later editions of this (called The Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain), and the maps are now constantly detached and sold separately.

SPEGHT, Rachel (b. 1597, fl. 1621), daughter of a London Puritan minister, James Speght, who published at the age of 19 a spirited rebuttal of Joseph Sweetnam’s misogynist Arraignment of Lewd, Idle, Froward and Inconstant Women. Her A Mouzell for Melastomus (1617) (A Muzzle for a Black Mouth) objected to the ‘excrement of your raving cogitations’ as a slander on woman, who, as Eve’s daughter, was fashioned from Adam’s side, not his head or foot, ‘near his heart, to be his equal’. In 1621 she published Mortalities Memorandum, with a Dreame Prefixed, the latter being an allegorical narrative poem urging the education of women, under guidance of tutelary female personifications (Thought, Experience, Industrie, Desire, Truth). A Mouzell is reprinted in S. Shepherd (ed.), The Women’s Sharp Revenge (1984).

SPEKE, John Hanning (1827–64), explorer, who discovered Lake Victoria Nyanza, Lake Tanganyika, and gave information to Sir S. Baker which led to the discovery of Lake Albert Nyanza. He published in 1863 his Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile and in 1864 What Led to the Discovery of the Source of the Nile.

SPENCE, Joseph (1699–1768), clergyman, anecdotist, scholar, who succeeded T. *Warton as professor of poetry at Oxford in 1728. A man of much generosity, he befriended *Dodsley in his early days, later helping him to edit his celebrated Collection of Poems, and also S. *Duck, whose life he wrote (1731, reprinted with Duck’s poems, 1736). He also wrote a life of the blind poet *Blacklock (1754). He was a close friend of *Pope, whose version of the Odyssey he defended, and from 1726 collected anecdotes and recorded conversations with Pope and other literary figures. These, although not published until 1820, were well known and widely quoted during the 18th cent., and were made available to and used by *Warburton and Dr *Johnson. They are usually referred to under the title Spence’s Anecdotes: an edition by J. M. Osborn appeared in 1966 under the title Observations, Anecdotes, and Characters of Books and Men, Collected from Conversation.

SPENCER, Herbert (1820–1903), the son of a schoolmaster, who was largely self-taught and showed few intellectual interests until he was over 16. He worked as a civil engineer for the London and Birmingham Railway Company, and was discharged on its completion in 1841; he then turned his attention to philosophy and published Social Statics (1850) and Principles of Psychology (1855); in 1860, after reading C. *Darwin, he announced a systematic series of treatises, to the elaboration of which he devoted the remainder of his life: First Principles (1862), Principles of Biology (1864–7), Principles of Sociology (1876–96), and Principles of Ethics (1879–93). Among his other works were Essays on Education (1861), The Classification of the Sciences (1864), The Study of Sociology (1873), Man versus the State (1884), and Factors of Organic Evolution (1887). His Autobiography was published in 1904.

Spencer was the founder of evolutionary philosophy, pursuing the unification of all knowledge on the basis of a single all-pervading principle, that of evolution, which he defines as follows: ‘an integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion; during which matter passes from an indefinite incoherent homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity; and during which the retained motion undergoes a parallel transformation’. The process continues until equilibrium is reached, after which the action of the environment will in time bring about disintegration. The law holds good of the visible universe as well as of smaller aggregates, suggesting the conception of past and future evolutions such as that which is now proceeding.

This theory of a physical system leads up to Spencer’s ethical system, where he is less successful in producing a consistent whole. He was essentially an individualist, and his first ethical principle is the equal right of every individual to act as he likes, so long as he does not interfere with the liberty of others. His effort is to reconcile utilitarian with evolutionary ethics, but he had to confess that for the purpose of deducing ethical principles ‘the Doctrine of Evolution has not furnished guidance to the extent that I had hoped’. Special reference should be made to Education, Intellectual, Moral and Physical (1861), a collection of articles previously published in magazines in which he criticized standard methods of teaching Latin and Greek, which crushed the spirit of individual enquiry, and advocated the teaching of the sciences, including social sciences, because they were concerned with the problems of survival. Art, although it had no problem-solving power, was important because it yielded immediate good.

In a literary context Spencer is remembered for his friendship with G. *Eliot, whom he met in 1851; he found her ‘the most admirable woman, mentally, I have ever met’ and wrote to *Lewes praising *Midsummer highly, but after her death he was at pains to quell any rumour that they had ever been more than friends. She appears to have been much more strongly attached to him, but transferred her affection to Lewes (c.1852–3). Spencer died a bachelor.

SPENCER, Sir Stanley (1891–1959), a bibliically inspired artist famous for resurrecting the natives of the village of Cookham-on-Thames in Berkshire where he lived. He was one of the models for Gully Jimson, the painter in Joyce *Cary’s novel The Horse’s Mouth, and the subject of a play, Stanley, by Pam Gems, performed at the *National Theatre in 1996.

SPENDER, Sir Stephen Harold (1909–95), poet and critic. His father E. H. Spender was a distinguished liberal journalist, and on his mother’s side he was partly of German–Jewish descent. He was brought up in Hampstead, and educated at University College School, London, and University College, Oxford, where he became friendly with *Auden and *MacNeice and *Isherwood. After leaving Oxford he lived in Germany for a period, in Hamburg and near Isherwood in Berlin, an experience which sharpened his political consciousness. In 1930 a small collection of his verse, Twenty Poems, was published, and in 1932 some of his work appeared in New Signatures; his Poems (1933) contained both personal and political poems, including ‘I think continually of those who are truly great’, ‘The Landscape near an Aerodrome’, and the notorious ‘The Pylons’, which gave the nickname of *Pylon poets to himself and his friends. He also published a critical work, The Destructive Element (1935), largely on H. *James, T. S. *Eliot, and *Yeats and their differing responses to a civilization in decline, which ends with a section called ‘In Defence of a Political Subject’, in which he discusses the work of Auden and *Upward, and argues the importance of treating ‘politico-moral’ subjects in literature. During the Spanish Civil War he did propaganda work in Spain for the Republican side, a period reflected in his volume of poems The Still Centre (1939). During the Second World War he was a member of the National Fire Service. He was co-editor of *Horizon (1939–41) and of *Encounter (1953–67). A gradual shift in his political allegiances may be seen in his poetry, in his critical works (e.g. The Creative Element, 1953, which retracts some of his earlier suggestions, laying more stress on the creative power and resistance of the individual), and in his contribution to *The God that Failed; he also gives an account of his relationship with the Communist Party in his autobiography World within World (1951). His interest in the public and social role and duty of the writer (a duty which he subsequently maintained in his work for the magazine *Index on Censorship) has tended to obscure the essentially personal and private nature of much of his own poetry, including his elegies for his sister-in-law, in Poems of Dedication (1947), and many of the poems in such later volumes as Collected Poems 1928–1953 (1955). His other works include Trial of a Judge (1938), many translations (of *García Lorca, *Rilke, *Schiller, *Toller, and others), The Thirties and after (1978, a volume of memoirs), Collected Poems 1982–85 (1985), and his lively and often comically self-deprecating Journals 1939–83 (1985). The Temple (1988) is a novel inspired by an abandoned manuscript written in 1929 about a young Englishman on vacation in Germany, and rewritten as 'a complex of memory, fiction and hindsight': it contains fictionalized portraits of Auden, Isherwood, and photographer Herbert List, and evokes a brief Golden Age in Germany before the imminent rise of National Socialism.

Spenlow, Dora, in Dickens's *David Copperfield, the hero's 'child-wife'.

Spenlow and Jorkins, in Dickens's *David Copperfield, a firm of proctors in Doctors' Commons, to whom Copperfield is articled. Jorkins is a gentle, retiring man who seldom appears, but Spenlow makes his partner's supposed intractable character the ground for refusing any inconvenient request.

SPENSER, Edmund (c.1552–99), the elder son of John Spenser, who was probably related to the Spencers of Althorp, and was described as a journeyman in the art of cloth-making. Edmund Spenser was probably born in East Smithfield, London, and was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, under *Mulcaster, and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. In 1569, while still at Cambridge, he contributed a number of 'Visions' and sonnets, from *Petrarch and *du Bellay, to van der Noodt's Theatre for Worldlings. To the 'greener times' of his youth belong also the 'Hymne in Honour of Love' and that of 'Beautie' (not published until 1596), which reflect his study of *Neoplatonism. After possibly spending some time in the north, he became secretary to John Young, bishop of Rochester, in 1578, and in 1579, through his college friend G. *Harvey, obtained a place in Leicester's household. There he became acquainted with Sir P. *Sidney, to whom he dedicated his *Shepheardes Calender (1579). He probably married Machabys Chylde in the same year, and also began to write *The Faerie Queene. In 1580 he was appointed secretary to Lord Grey of Wilton, then going to Ireland as lord deputy. In 1588 or 1589 he became one of the 'undertakers' for the settlement of Munster, and acquired Kilcolman Castle in Co. Cork. Here he settled and occupied himself with literary work, writing his elegy *Astrophel', on Sidney, and preparing *The Faerie Queene for the press. The first three books of it were entrusted to the publisher during his visit to London in 1589. He returned reluctantly to Kilcolman, which he liked to regard as a place of exile, in 1591, recording his visit to London and return to Ireland in *Colin Clouts Come Home Againe (printed 1595). The success of *The Faerie Queene led the publisher, Ponsonby, to issue his minor verse and juvenilia, in part rewritten, as Complaints, Containing Sundrie Small Poemes of the Worlds Vanitie (1591). This volume included *The Ruines of Time', which was a further elegy on Sidney, dedicated to Sidney's sister, the countess of *Pembroke, *Mother Hubberds Tale', *Miuiopotmos, *The Tears of the Muses', and *Virgils Gnat'. Also in 1591 Daphnaida was published, an elegy on Douglas Howard, the daughter of Lord Byndon and wife of Sir A. *Gorges. In 1594 he married Elizabeth Boyle, whom he had wooed in his Amoretti, and celebrated the marriage in his superb *Epithalamion: the works were printed together in 1595. He published Books IV–VI of *The Faerie Queene and his Fowre Hymnes in 1596, being in London for the purpose at the house of his friend the earl of Essex, where he wrote his *Prothalamion and also his well-informed though propagandist View of the Present State of Ireland. He returned to Ireland, depressed both in mind and health, in 1596 or 1597. His castle of Kilcolman was burnt in October 1598, in a sudden insurrection of the natives, chiefly O'Neills, under the earl of Desmond; he was compelled to flee to Cork with his wife and three children. We do not know what works, if any, were lost at Kilcolman, but Ponsonby in 1591 had mentioned various other works by Spenser which are not now extant, and in The Shepheardes Calender reference is made to his discourse of the 'English Poet'. He died in London in distress, if not actual destitution, at a lodging in King Street, Westminster. His funeral expenses were borne by the earl of Essex, and he was buried near his favourite *Chaucer in Westminster Abbey. His monument, set up some 20 years later by Lady Anne Clifford, describes him as 'THE PRINCE OF POETS IN HIS TYME': there have been few later periods in which he has not been admired, and the poetry of both *Milton and *Keats had its origins in the reading of Spenser.

See the Variorum edition of his works, with a biography and full critical commentary, ed. E. Greenlaw, C. G. Osgood, F. M. Padelford, et al. (10 vols, 1932–57).

Spenserian stanza, the stanza invented by E. *Spenser, in which he wrote *The Faerie Queene. It consists of eight five-foot iambic lines, followed by an iambic line of six feet, rhyming a b a b c b c.

SPINOZA, Benedict (Baruch) de (1632–77), a Jew of Portuguese origin, born at Amsterdam, who lived there and at The Hague. He was expelled from the Jewish community on account of his criticism of the Scriptures. The principal source of his philosophy was the doctrine of Descartes, transformed by a mind steeped in the Jewish Scriptures. Spinoza rejected the Cartesian dualism of spirit and matter, and saw only ‘one infinite substance, of which finite existences are modes or limitations’. The universe must be viewed ‘sub specie aeternitatis’, and the errors of sense and the illusions of the finite eliminated. God for him is the immanent cause of the universe, not a ruler outside it. ‘By the government of God, I understand the fixed and unalterable order of nature and the interconnection of natural things.’ His system is thus in a sense pantheistic. Among his conclusions are determinism, a denial of the transcendent distinction between good and evil, and a denial of personal immortality.

Spinoza’s famous Ethics, finished about 1665, was not published until 1677, after his death. His morality is founded on the ‘intelectual love’ of God. Man is moved by his instinct to develop and perfect himself, and to seek this development in the knowledge and love of God. And the love of God involves the love of our fellow creatures. It is by goodness and piety that man reaches perfect happiness: virtue is its own reward.

Spinoza founds his political doctrine on man’s natural rights. Man, in order to obtain security, has surrendered part of his rights to the state. But the state exists to give liberty, not to hold in slavery. The sovereign in his own interest must rule with justice and wisdom, nor must the state interfere with freedom of thought. Spinoza’s Tractatus Theologico-politicus was published in 1670; his unfinished Tractatus Politicus in 1677.

Spirit of the Age, The, essays by W. Hazlitt, published 1825, presented as a portrait gallery of the eminent writers of his time: Bentham, W. Godwin, Coleridge, Wordsworth, W. Scott, Byron, Southey, Malthus, C. Lamb, and several others. The essays combine character-sketches with lively critical assessments of the subjects’ works and summaries of their reputations, placed in the context of the political and intellectual ferment of their times. They are strongly animated by Hazlitt’s political loyalties, especially in the sustained assault upon the Tory critic Gifford for his ‘ridiculous pedantry and vanity’.

Spiritual Quixote, The, see Graves, Richard.

Spleen, The, (1) a poem by Anne Finch, countess of Winchilsea (1709); (2) a poem by M. Green (1737).

spondee, see metre.

Sponge, Mr Soapey, see Surtees, R. S.

Spoonerism, see metathesis.

Sporus, the name under which Pope satirizes Lord Hervey in his Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot (ll. 305 ff.). The original Sporus was an effeminate favourite of the Emperor Nero.

SPRAT, Thomas (1635–1713), educated at Wadham College, Oxford, bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster. Politically he was inclined to be a ‘vicar of Bray’; he sat on James II’s objectionable ecclesiastical commission in 1686 and allowed the Declaration of Indulgence to be read (amid deep murmurs of disapproval) in the abbey. As a writer he is chiefly remembered for his history of the Royal Society (1667), of which he was one of the first members, but he was also known as a poet (The Plague of Athens, 1659, was his most popular poem) and for his life of his friend Cowley, which was attached to Cowley’s works from 1668 onwards.

SPRING, (Robert) Howard (1889–1965), journalist and novelist, born in Cardiff, where he began his literary career as a newspaper errand boy; he worked for years on the Manchester Guardian and as book reviewer on the Evening Standard. Of his many novels, the best remembered are his first success O Absalom! (1938; published in the USA and later in Britain as My Son, My Son!), and Fame Is The Spur (1940), the latter being the story of a Labour politician’s rise to power.

sprung, or ‘abrupt, rhythm’, a term invented by G. M. Hopkins to describe his own idiosyncratic poetic metre, as opposed to normal ‘running’ rhythm, the regular alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables. It was apparently based partly on Greek and Latin quantitative metre and influenced by the rhythms of Welsh poetry and Old and Middle English alliterative verse. Hopkins maintained that sprung rhythm existed, unrecognized, in Old English poetry and in Shakespeare, Dryden, and Milton (notably in Samson Agonistes). It is distinguished by a metrical foot consisting of a varying number of syllables. The extra, ‘slack’ syllables added to the established patterns are called ‘outrides’ or ‘hangers’. Hopkins demonstrated the natural occurrence of this rhythm in English by pointing out that many nursery rhymes employed it, e.g.

Ding, Dong, Bell,

Pussy’s in the well.

Conventional metres may be varied by the use of ‘counterpoint’, by which Hopkins meant the reversal of two successive feet in an otherwise regular line of poetry; but sprung rhythm itself cannot be counter-pointed because it is not regular enough for the pattern to be recognized under the variations. Hopkins, an amateur composer, often described his theory in terms of musical notation, speaking of rests, crotchets, and quavers. He felt strongly that his poetry should be read... aloud, but seems to have felt that the words themselves were not enough to suggest the intended rhythms, and frequently added various diacritical markings to indicate where a sound was to be drawn out, and where syllables were to be spoken quickly. Some critics have suggested that sprung rhythm is not a poetic metre at all, properly speaking, merely Hopkins's attempt to force his own personal rhythm into an existing pattern, or recognizable variation of one, and that his sprung rhythm is in fact closer to some kinds of free verse or polyphonic prose.

SPURGEON, Caroline (1886–1942), American critic, whose Shakespeare's Imagery (1935) was the first detailed study of its subject.

spy fiction, see overleaf.

Square, a character in Fielding's Tom Jones.

Squeers, Wackford, in Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby, the headmaster of Dotheboys Hall. He has a heartless wife, who joins him in bullying his miserable pupils, a spiteful daughter, Fanny, and a spoilt son, Wackford.

Squeezum, Justice, a character in Fielding's Rape upon Rape.

SQUIRE, [J]ohn (C)ollings (1884–1958), educated in Devon and at St John's College, Cambridge; he became a highly influential literary journalist and essayist, a skilful parodist, and a poet. He established the London Mercury in 1919, and as sometime literary editor of the New Statesman and chief literary critic of the Observer he exercised considerable power. In the 1920s and 1930s he and his friends formed a literary establishment which was violently opposed by the Sitwells and the Bloomsbury Group, and was irrevocably known as 'the Squirearchy'. Squire edited a large number of successful anthologies, including A Book of Women's Verse (1921) and The Comic Muse (1925), and between 1921 and 1934 edited three widely popular volumes of Selections from Modern Poets. His own Collected Parodies appeared in 1921, he was knighted in 1933, and his Collected Poems, edited by Betjeman, were published posthumously in 1959.

Squire of Dames, a humorous character in Spenser's Faerie Queene (11. vii). He had been ordered by his lady to 'do service unto gentle Dames' and at the end of 12 months to report progress. At the end of the year he was able to bring pledges of 300 conquests. Thereupon his lady ordered him not to return to her till he had found an equal number of dames who rejected his advances. After three years he had only found three, a courtesan because he would not pay her enough, a nun because she could not trust his discretion, and a 'Damzell' of low degree 'in a country cottage found by chance'.

Squire of Low Degree, The, a metrical romance, probably mid-15th cent., opening with the much-quoted distich:

It was a squier of lowe degree
That loved the Kings daughter of Hungre.

The squire declares his love to the princess, who consents to marry him when he has proved himself a distinguished knight. But he is seen in his tryst by a steward whom he kills after the steward reports to the king. The squire is imprisoned but finally released because the princess is inconsolable, whereupon he sets out on his quest, proves his worth, and marries the princess. There is no manuscript of the full-length, 1,131-line version, so the romance is known from a printing c.1560 by W. Copland and fragments of a 1520 printing by Wynkyn de Worde; de Worde's edition is dramatically entitled 'Undo youre Dore' from one of its episodes. Ed. D. B. Sands, Middle English Verse Romances (1966), 249–78.

STACPOOLE, H(enry) de Vere (1863–1951), novelist and ship’s doctor, of Irish ancestry, whose first publication was a poem in Belgravia, but who is remembered for his best-selling romance The Blue Lagoon (1908), the story of two cousins, Dick and Emmeline, marooned at the age of 8 on a tropical island; they grow up, mature, produce a baby, and are eventually swept away by accident across their lagoon to the ocean and the oblivion of 'the never-wake berries' which they providentially carry with them in their dinghy.

STAËL, Anne-Louise-Germaine Necker, Mme de (1766–1817), French writer of Swiss parentage. Daughter of the finance minister Necker and mistress of Constant, she occupied a central place in French intellectual life for over three decades. Her critical study De la littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales (1800) was the first piece of criticism to treat literature as a product of social history and environment. Another study, De l'Allemagne (1810), banned on publication by Napoleon, opened French literature to the influence of the German writers and thinkers of the end of the 18th cent. Her two novels, Delphine (1802) and Corinne (1807), offer to her age a new image of woman as independent artist. She was a major precursor of French Romanticism.

STAINER, Pauline (1941– ), poet, educated at St Anne's College, Oxford, and Southampton University. Her first collection, The Honeycomb (1989), introduced a characteristic mingling of sacred, archaeological, scientific, and wintry ice-haunted imagery, and a cool, spare lyric line. This was followed by Sighting the Slave Ship (1992), which contains poems in homage to Rembrandt, Satie, Henry Moore, and illustrator and war artist Eric Ravilious, who died in 1942 when the Coastal Command aeroplane from Iceland on which he was a passenger disappeared. Other volumes include The Ice-Pilot Speaks (1994) and The Wound-Dresser's Dream (1996).
Stamatakis, John (1935– ), poet, critic, editor, translator, and biographer, born in London and educated at Rugby and Magdalen College, Oxford. He subsequently worked for the Oxford University Press and taught in Oxford, where in 1992 he became professor of English literature. His first collection of poetry, The Astronomy of Love (1961), was followed by several others, including A Familiar Tree (1978), a sequence which mixes deep-rooted family and local history with a story of migration, and The Guest from the Future (1995), which celebrates female survival in the person of Akhatova and others. The title of Rounding the Horn: Collected Poems (1998) pays homage, as do many of his individual poems, to his New Zealand ancestry. He has published biographies of W. Owen (1974), whose work he has also edited, and L. MacNeice (1995), and has edited several anthologies, with a particular interest in war poetry.

Stanhope, Charles (1753–1816), the father of Lady Hester (above). He also devised a stereotyping process, and a microscopic lens which bears his name.

Stanley, Arthur Penrhyn (1815–81), educated at Rugby under T. Arnold (by whom he was much influenced) and at Balliol College, Oxford. On Arnold’s death he was commissioned to write a biography by his widow, which appeared in 1844 as The Life and Correspondence of Thomas Arnold. Stanley was an ecclesiastical historian, a leader of the Broad Church movement, and a courageous champion of religious toleration.

STANLEY, Sir Henry Morton (1841–1904), explorer and journalist, born in Wales; he first bore the name John Rowlands. He went to New Orleans as a cabin boy in 1859 where he was adopted by a merchant named Stanley. He fought in the American Civil War and in 1867 joined the New York Herald. He went as its correspondent to Abyssinia and Spain, and in 1869 was instructed by his editor Gordon Bennett to find Livingstone. He first travelled through Egypt for the opening of the Suez Canal, and to Palestine, Turkey, Persia, and India; he found Livingstone at Ujiji in 1871. How I Found Livingstone (1872) relates these adventures. His further explorations and discoveries in Africa are described in Through the Dark Continent (1878) and In Darkest Africa (1890). In 1890 he married Dorothy Tennant who edited his autobiography in 1909.

STANLEY, Sir Charles Villiers (1852–1924), British composer and teacher. With *Parry, Stanford was a founder figure of the English musical renaissance in the last decades of the 19th cent., whose pupils included virtually all the most successful English composers of the following generation, from *Holst and *Vaughan Williams to *Lambert and *Bliss. His list of compositions includes many settings of English texts. Of the chorals works the larger ones, like the oratorio Eden to words by Bridges (1891), are now forgotten, but the less pretentious examples, the setting of *Tennyson’s ‘The Revenge’ (1886) or the later Newbolt cantatas, Songs of the Sea (1904) and Songs of the Fleet (1910), combine perfect craftsmanship with a racy vigour that has commended them to festivals and choral societies over the years. His nine operas have had little success, with the possible exception of Shamus O’Brien (1896, with a text after *Le Fanu); others that perhaps deserved a better fate are Much Ado about Nothing (1901), The Critic (based on *Sheridan’s play, 1916), and, perhaps best, The Travelling Companion (1926), with a libretto by Newbolt after H. C. *Anderson.

Stanhope, Lady Hester (1776–1839), the niece of the younger *Pitt, in whose house she gained a reputation as a brilliant political hostess. In 1810 she left Europe for good, and in 1814 established herself for the rest of her life in a remote ruined convent at Djoun in the Lebanon. Here she lived in great magnificence among a semi-oriented retinue; her high rank and imperious character gained her some political power in Syria and the desert. In later years her debts accumulated, her eccentricity increased, and she claimed to be an inspired prophetess and mistress of occult sciences. She became a legendary figure, and was visited by many distinguished European travellers, including *Lamartine and *Kinglake.

Stanhope press, an iron printing press invented by Charles, third Earl Stanhope (1753–1816), the father of Lady Hester (above). He also devised a stereotyping process, and a microscopic lens which bears his name.

Stanzaccia Life of Christ, The, a 14th-cent. compilation surviving in three 15th-cent. manuscripts in 10,840 lines of English quatrains, drawn from the Pulchrioricon of Higden and the Legenda Aurea of Jacobus de Voragine (see GOLDEN LEGEND, THE). It was written by a monk of St Werburgh’s, Chester, and it was an influence on the Chester *mystery plays. Ed. F. A. Foster (EETS OS 166, 1926).

One of the most popular forms of fiction over the last 100 years, the British spy novel emerged during the international tensions of the years preceding the First World War. Scandals like the *Dreyfus affair in France highlighted the activities of spies and the intelligence services that employed them, while armaments rivalries such as the Anglo-German naval race fuelled a volatile mood of jingoism and xenophobia receptive to novels of espionage, intrigue, and violence, in which secret agent heroes battled against the evil machinations of villainous spies. The 20th century’s record of war, revolution, subversion, genocide, and the threat of nuclear war has sustained the appeal.

Erskine *Childers’s *The Riddle of the Sands (1903), a suspenseful tale of two amateur British agents foiling a German invasion plot, is often described as the first spy novel, and has become a classic. But the first spy writer to spring to public fame was William Tufnell Le Queux (1864-1927), whose highly successful invasion novel *The Great War in England in 1897 (1893), featuring an enemy spy, heralded a cascade of best-sellers over the next three decades, all of which employ a series of heroic male agents cut from sturdy patriotic cloth who save the nation from the plots of foreign spies. Setting an enduring trend in spy fiction, Le Queux—who fantasized about being a spy himself—deliberately blurred the line between fact and fiction to make spurious claims of authenticity and realism, and his fiction was often thinly disguised propaganda for strengthened national security. The lurid portrait of an army of German spies in Britain in his *Spies of the Kaiser (1909) did much to create the mood of spy fever that prompted the creation in that year of the Secret Service Bureau, later to become MI5 and MI6. Le Queux’s great Edwardian rival was E. Phillips Oppenheim (1866-1946), who wrote a succession of novels featuring glamorous seductresses and society high life that continued until the Second World War and which, unlike those of Le Queux, also sold well in North America; amongst the best known are *The Kingdom of the Blind (1916) and *The Great Impersonation (1920). The year 1920 also saw the creation by *Sapper of the unabashed xenophobe and anti-Semitic Bulldog Drummond, a muscular agent who over the next two decades robustly thwarted the plots of the communist arch-villain Carl Peterson and assorted foreigners in such titles as *The Black Gang (1922), *The Final Count (1926), and *The Return of Bulldog Drummond (1932).

Yet from this inaugural period the writer who has best endured is John *Buchan, whose secret agent hero Richard Hannay first appeared in *The Thirty-Nine Steps (1915), a novel its author described as ‘a romance where the incidents defy the probabilities, and march just inside the borders of the possible’, which defines much other spy fiction as well. There followed such classics as *Greenmantle (1916), *Mr Standfast (1919), and *The Three Hostages (1924). Hannay and his adventures set their stamp on the imagination of a generation and beyond. Recurrent criticism of the hearty clubland ethos of Buchan’s fiction provides exasperated testimony of how popular his novels have remained to this day.

The First World War, the Great Depression, and the rise of Fascism created a sombre inter-war climate that saw the emergence of a new generation of spy writers who broke sharply with the patriotic orthodoxies of their predecessors. Some, such as Compton *Mackenzie and Somerset *Maugham, had worked for British wartime intelligence and painted a far less glamorized and more realistic picture of the secret agent’s life, such as in Maugham’s *Ashenden (1928), his influential collection of short stories based closely on his personal experience. Mackenzie, prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act for indiscretions in his third volume of wartime memoirs, *Greek Memories (1932), took his revenge in his classic parody of the bureaucratic absurdities of the secret service, *Water on the Brain (1933).

Building on the foundations laid by Maugham and Mackenzie, Eric *Ambler crafted plots of considerable technical skill and authenticity, combined with a leftist outlook that featured innocent protagonists caught up in the machinations of ‘merchants of death’ and other capitalist villains. His best-known and most successful novel of this period was *The Mask of Dimitrios (1939), but his post-war production retained its vigour in such masterpieces as *Passage of Arms (1959), *Dr Frigo (1974), and *Send No More Roses (1977). Ambler’s ideological outlook was shared by Graham *Greene, whose *The Stamboul Train (1932), *The Confidential Agent (1939), and *The Ministry of Fear (1943) presaged his even better-known spy novels that appeared after the Second World War when he worked as a British intelligence officer for the Secret Intelligence Service (MI6): The Quiet American (1955), Our Man in Havana (1959), and The Human Factor (1978), which struck a typically Greene-ish theme in its reflections on betrayal, loyalty, and trust.

The dominating figure of the immediate post-war years was Ian Fleming, whose Casino Royale (1953) introduced the iconic figure of James Bond, undoubtedly the most famous fictional secret agent of all time. By the year of Fleming’s premature death his eleven Bond spy novels, including such classics as From Russia with Love (1957) and Goldfinger (1959), had sold over 40 million copies and his hero was beginning to appear in blockbuster movies that continue to this day. The Bond adventures were updated versions of Le Queux and Buchan designed for the Cold War consumer boom and changed sexual mores of the 1950s and 1960s; the enemy is Moscow or, in later novels such as Thunderball (1961), megalomaniacs of international ambition such as the unforgettable Ernst Stavro Blofeld. Bond was a cultural phenomenon that spawned imitations, parodies, comic strips, and even a communist rival in the shape of Akakam Zakhov, penned by the Bulgarian novelist Andrei Gulyashki. Outraged critics deplored the novels as both cause and symptom of cultural decay, and for their sex, snobbery, and violence. Others praised their technical skill and robust good fun. They also provided intriguing texts for their times, for Fleming had wartime intelligence experience and was a practising journalist with an acute and perceptive eye for the cross-currents of tradition and change that revolutionized Britain and its place in the post-war world.

Such change had already cast its post-imperial shadow by the time of Fleming’s death. The 1961 building of the Berlin Wall brought a serious chill to the Cold War climate and in The Spy Who Came in from the Cold (1963) John Le Carré marked out the territory that was to dominate spy fiction until the end of the Cold War and the collapse of the Soviet Union. Making an explicit and conscious break with Bond, he created the anti-heroic figure of George Smiley, the protagonist of several of his novels that culminate in Smiley's People (1980), an emotionally middle-aged and all too human intelligence officer who grapples with the ambiguities and moral maze of real-life Cold War espionage. However noble the end, Le Carré’s spy fiction proclaims, those who work in intelligence always risk their humanity. The Looking-Glass War (1965) is a particularly bleak dissection of a Cold War operation, while Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy (1974), inspired by the infamous case of the KGB traitor Kim Philby, explores the theme of the Soviet ‘mole’ within the service. Here, Le Carré was firmly in tradition, for he, too, had worked for British intelligence and drew heavily (as he continued to do in the 1990s) from personal knowledge. Exploring similar terrain in this period were writers like Len Deighton (1929— ) who made his name with The Ipcress File (1962) and Funeral in Berlin (1964), the former intelligence officer Ted Allbeury (1917— ), and the highly productive William Haggard (pseudonym of Richard Henry Michael Clayton, 1907–93).

Yet even as Le Carré and others explored the moral ambiguities of Cold War espionage, Frederick Forsyth (1938— ) was marking yet another shift in mood. In thrill-packed and highly successful blockbusters such as The Day of the Jackal (1971) and The Odessa File (1972), and continuing through The Fourth Protocol (1984) and The Fist of God (1994), he returned to adventure stories on a global scale in which tough male heroes save the world from a variety of disasters, a trend reflected too in the novels of Ken Follett (1949— ) such as Eye of the Needle (1978) and The Man from St. Petersburg (1982).

The spy novel has always been a hybrid form, sliding over into the *detective, crime, or even romance novel. Yet in whatever shape, the jury is still out on whether the end of the Cold War and superpower confrontation will terminally affect its health. Real-world espionage has predictably survived, and the enduring conflicts of nation-states will continue to provide ample raw material for the spy writer. Yet spy fiction has flourished best in times of crisis or anticipated disaster, such as invasion or nuclear war. National security nightmares have now fragmented into wars against international crime, ethnic conflict, and drugs, threats that to many potential readers may seem distant or remote. Spy fiction can only reflect the results.

Staple of News, The, a comedy by *Jonson, performed 1626, printed 1631.

Pennyboy Junior learns from a beggar, whom he takes on as a servant, that his father has died. He begins to squander his inheritance, buying gaudy clothes, pursuing the rich Lady Pecunia, his miserly uncle's ward, and purchasing a clerkship for his barber at the Staple of News, an office for the collection, sorting, and dissemination of news and gossip, 'authentical and apocryphal'. The beggar reveals that he is Pennyboy's father, and, appalled by his extravagance, disinherits him, but Pennyboy redeems himself, and wins the hand of Lady Pecunia, when he thwarts a plot to ruin his father hatched by the scheming lawyer Picklock. The play is watched throughout by four gossips, Mirth, Tattle, Expectation, and Censure, who sit on the stage and offer an undiscerning commentary at the end of each act.

Stareleigh, Mr Justice, in Dickens's* Pickwick Papers*, the judge in the case of Bardell v. Pickwick.

STARK, Freya (1893–1993), daughter of a sculptor. She was born in Paris, spent her childhood between Devon and Italy, and was educated at Bedford College and the School of Oriental Studies, London. In 1927, having mastered Arabic, she began travelling in the Middle East, and in the next decade made adventurous solitary journeys in that region. During the Second World War she worked for the Ministry of Information in Aden, Cairo, Baghdad, the USA, and India. In 1947 she married the writer Stewart Perowne. Throughout her wanderings her home base was Italy, and she settled in Asolo. She was made a DBE in 1972.

Among her many books on her travels in Iran, Iraq, southern Arabia, and Turkey, the most notable are The Valleys of the Assassins (1934), The Southern Gates of Arabia (1936), Iona: A Quest (1954), The Lycian Shore (1956). Four volumes of autobiography, including Traveller's Prelude (1950), and six volumes of letters appeared in 1950–61 and 1974–81. Her books reveal her as a natural traveller, disregarding discomforts and dangers in spite of poor health, with an unassuming friendliness and curiosity which make her observant and humane descriptions of the life of remote communities memorably lifelike. Her knowledge of classical Arabic and Greek literature gives backbone to her accounts of Middle East travel. Her later works are sometimes diffuse and sententious, without the unaffected charm of her pre-war books. A brilliant photographer, she illustrated her books with portraits of human and architectural splendours and oddities.

STARKE, Mariana, see GRAND TOUR and MURRAY, JOHN.

STARKIE, Walter (1894–1976), Irish-born writer, translator, musicologist, and Hispanist, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, who lived for many years in Madrid, where he was founder and director of the British Institute (1940–54). He is best remembered for Raggle-Taggle: Adventures with a Fiddle in Hungary and Romania (1933), which describes his adventures with the gypsies: this was followed by Spanish Raggle Taggle (1934) and Scholars and Gypsies (1963), all of which joyfully celebrate in a vivid and colourful prose reminiscent of Borrow the freedom and adventures of the open road and 'the music of the wind on the heath'. His sister Enid Starkie (1897–1970) was also a linguist, and taught for many years in Oxford, where she was well known as a colourful and eccentric figure. She wrote on Baudelaire, Flaubert, and others, and wrote a foreword to Gide’s contribution to The God that Failed (1950), which she edited from his published records.

Starveling, in Shakespeare’s* A Midsummer Night's Dream*, a tailor, who is cast for the part of 'Thisby's mother' in the play of 'Pyramus and Thisbe', but appears as 'Moonshine'.

Stationers’ Company, the, incorporated by royal charter in 1557. No one not a member of the Company might print anything for sale in the kingdom unless authorized by special privilege or patent. Moreover, by the rules of the Company, every member was required to enter in the register of the Company the name of any book that he desired to print, so that these registers furnish valuable information regarding printed matter during the latter part of the 16th cent. The Company's control of the printing trade waned during the 17th cent., to be revived in a modified form under the Copyright Act of 1709.

STATIUS, Publius Papinius (AD c.45–96), Roman epic poet and Silver Age imitator of Virgil. The son of a Naples schoolmaster, he made a name for himself winning poetic competitions at an early age. Encouraged by success, he went to Rome, collected rich patrons, and with fulsome flattery won, but failed to keep, the favour of the tyrant Domitian. His surviving works consist of the five books of his Silvae, occasional verses which include a famous piece on sleep that inspired Drummond of Hawthornden, an epic, Thebais, in 12 books, relating the bloody quarrel between the sons of Oedipus, and another unfinished epic, the Achilleis. Statius’ style is mannered and over-ornamental, and his narratives abound in romantic features: magicians, dragons, parted lovers, enchanted woods. These qualities recommended him to medieval taste, and so did the legend of his conversion to Christianity which appears in Dante. Chaucer based his Knight's Tale (see CANTERBURY TALES, 1) on Boccaccio who had used the Thebais, but in the Renaissance Statius was studied rather than imitated. The Thebais was not translated till 1648 when Thomas Stephens produced a version of the first five books. The Achilleis was translated by Robert Howard (1660) and both Pope and Gray tried their hands briefly at translating the Thebais. Dryden deplored his 'blarded greatness: he never thought an expression bold enough if a bolder could be found.'
STEAD, C(hristian) K(arlson) (1932— ), New Zealand poet, critic, and novelist, born and brought up in Auckland; he went to university there and taught in the English department 1959–86. Since then he has been a full-time writer. From the beginning, Stead’s poems were seen as highly intelligent and sophisticated, influenced by such Modernists as Ezra *Pound. In 1964 he published both his own first volume of poems, Whether the Will Is Free, and a critical book, The New Poetic: Yeats to Eliot. The latter was particularly well received, going into many impressions. Stead covered something of the same ground but with renewed incisiveness and persuasiveness in Pound, Yeats, Eliot and the Modernist Movement (1986). He has published several novels, including All Visitors Ashore (1984), The Death of the Body (1986), and The Singing Whakapapa (1994), all of which show his characteristic mixing of New Zealand personal material with experimental techniques. As editor (for example of The Faber Book of Contemporary South Pacific Stories, 1994) and as reviewer, Stead has a reputation for provocation. His most recent selection of poems is Straw into Gold (1997).

STEAD, Christina Ellen (1902–83), Australian novelist, born in Sydney and educated at Sydney University Teachers’ College. She came to London in 1928 and subsequently worked and travelled in Europe and America with her companion, then husband, the American political economist and ex-broker William J. Blake. In 1953 they settled near London; she returned to Australia on his death in 1968. Her wandering life and her left-wing views (which also raised difficulties for her in Hollywood during the McCarthy period) may have contributed to the neglect of her work, which towards the end of her life received renewed attention and admiration. Her first collection of stories, The Salzburg Tales (1934), was followed by several full-length novels, which include her best-known work, The Man Who Loved Children (1940), a bitterly ironic view of American family life and conflict; For Love Alone (1945), in which Teresa escapes to Australia to seek her own freedom; Letty Fox: Her Luck (1946), a first-person narration describing the adventurous, unconventional, and ambitious life of a New York office girl; and Cotter’s England (1967; USA as Dark Places of the Heart, 1966) which presents a vivid portrait of post-war working-class Britain, centred on the extraordinary personality of chain-smoking, emotional, destructive Nellie Cook, née Cotter, a ‘beaky, restless, gabby’ and insatiably curious journalist, working on a left-wing London paper. Many of the novels manifest the author’s admiration for *Zola, and her feminism and politics are deeply interwoven, independent, and personal.

STEAD, W(illiam) T(ommas) (1849–1912). He was assistant editor of the *Pall Mall Gazette in 1880 and during his editorship (1883–8) initiated new and influential political and social movements. He achieved wide notoriety for his ‘Maiden Tribute of Modern Babylon’ (1885) exposing sexual vice, which led to Parliament raising the age of consent to 16 years. He founded the Review of Reviews in 1890 and continued his work for peace, friendship with Russia, and spiritualism (for which he was much ridiculed). He was drowned in the Titanic disaster.

STEEL, Sir Richard (1672–1729), born in Dublin, in the same year as *Addison, and educated with him at Charterhouse. He was subsequently at Merton College, Oxford, whence he entered the army as a cadet in the Life Guards. As a result of a poem on Queen Mary’s funeral dedicated to Lord Cutts, colonel of the Coldstream Guards, he became his secretary and obtained the rank of captain. He published *The Christian Hero in 1701, in which he first displayed his missionary and reforming spirit. In the same year he produced his first comedy, *The Funeral. Neither this nor his two next comedies, The Lying Lover (1703) and The Tender Husband (1705), proved very successful. In 1706 he was appointed gentleman waiter to Prince George of Denmark, and in 1707 gazetteer; and in the same year was married to Mary Scurlock (‘dear Prue’), his second wife. In 1709 he started the *Tatler, which he carried on with the help of Addison till Jan. 1711. He was made a commissioner of stamps in 1710, but lost the gazetteership after the accession of the Tories. In conjunction with Addison he carried on the *Spectator during 1711–12. This was followed by the *Guardian, to which Addison, *Berkeley, and *Pope contributed, and which was attacked by the Tory *Examiner. Steele next conducted the Englishman (1713–14), a more political paper. In 1713 he was elected MP for Stockbridge. In 1714 he published The Crisis, a pamphlet in favour of the Hanoverian succession, which was answered by *Swift, and led to Steele’s expulsion from the House on 18 Mar. 1714. In October of that year he issued his Apology for Himself and His Writings, which was answered by Addison in The Old Whig. This incident led to the revocation of Steele’s Drury Lane patent, and to an estrangement from Addison. He established the Theatre, a bi-weekly paper, which continued until 1720, in which year he issued pamphlets against the South Sea mania (see SOUTH SEA COMPANY). His last comedy, *The Conscious Lovers, was produced in 1722. Money difficulties forced him to leave London in 1724, and he died at Carmarthen. His letters to Mary Scurlock were printed in 1787. Less highly regarded as an essayist than Addison, his influence was nevertheless great; his attacks on *Restoration drama (Spectator, No. 65, on *Etherege, ‘I allow it to be Nature, but it is Nature in its utmost Corruption and Degeneracy’); his approval of the 'sober and polite Mirth' of *Terence; his praise of tender and affectionate domestic and family life; and his own reformed and sentimental dramas (described by *Fielding's Parson Adams as 'almost solemn enough for a sermon') did much to create an image of polite behaviour for the new century. There is a life by George A. Aitken. (2 vols, 1889).

Steele Glas, The, a satire in verse by *Gascoigne, published 1576.

The poet's 'steele glas' reveals abuses and how things should be, whereas the common looking-glass only 'shewes a seemely shew', i.e. shows the thing much better than it is. Looking into his 'steele glas' the author sees himself with his faults and then successively the faults of kings; covetous lords and knights; greedy, braggart, and drunken soldiers; false judges; merchants; and lastly priests. Finally the ploughman is held up as a model:

Behold him (priests) & though he stink of sweat
Disdaine him not: for shall I tel you what?
Such clime to heaven, before the shaven crownes.

Steevens, George (1736–1800), Shakespearian commentator, who in 1766 issued in four volumesTwenty of the Plays of Shakespeare, Being the Whole Number Printed in Quarto during His Lifetime, or before the Restoration, and in 1773 a complete annotated edition (including notes by Dr *Johnson) in ten volumes, to which a supplementary volume of poems, together with seven plays ascribed to Shakespeare, was added in 1780. He constantly quarrelled with his literary associates and was called by *Gifford 'the Puck of commentators', but was befriended by Johnson and elected a member of the *Club in 1774. He was extremely widely read in Elizabethan literature, and supplied to his edition a vast range of illustrative quotations from other works, but was in other respects less scholarly, rejecting as inauthentic various scenes and plays which he appears merely to have disliked. He assisted *Tyrwhitt in his edition of the Rowley poems of *Chatterton, but declared his disbelief in them. He attacked W. H. *Ireland, and satirized literary crazes.

Stein, Gertrude (1874–1946), American author, born in Pennsylvania into a progressive and intellectual family of German–Jewish origin. She studied psychology at Radcliffe College, where she was a student of W. *James, and then studied the anatomy of the brain at Johns Hopkins. In 1902 she went with her brother Leo to Paris, where she settled; her home in the rue de Fleurs became a literary salon and art gallery and a home of the avant-garde, attracting painters (including *Picasso, Matisse, and Juan Gris) and writers (including *Hemingway, F. M. *Ford, and S. *Anderson, but not *Joyce, with whom she was not acquainted). Her friend, secretary, and companion from 1907 was San Francisco-born Alice B. Toklas (1877–1967), whom she made the ostensible author of her own memoir, The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas (1933). Her fiction includes Three Lives (1909), of which the second portrait, 'Melanchta,' was described by R. *Wright as the 'first long serious literary treatment of Negro life in the United States' (but see also under CULTURAL APPROPRIATION); The Making of Americans (written 1906–8, pub. 1925), an enormously long work intended as a history of her family; and A Long Gay Book (1932). Tender Buttons (1914) is an example of her highly idiosyncratic poetry, of which she said in her Lectures in America (1935), 'I struggled with the ridding myself of nouns. I knew that nouns must go in poetry as they had gone in prose if anything that is everything was to go on meaning something.' Her characteristic repetitions and reprises, her flowing, unpunctuated prose, and her attempts to capture the 'living moment' owe much to William James and to *Bergson's concept of time, and represent a highly personal but nevertheless influential version of the *stream-of-consciousness technique. Her many varied published works include essays, sketches of life in France, works of literary theory, short stories, portraits of her friends, a lyric drama called Four Saints in Three Acts (first published in *transition, 1929, and performed in the USA, 1934), and Wars I Have Seen (1945), a personal account of occupied Paris. For an influential early study of her work, see E. *Wilson, Axel's Castle (1931).

Steinbeck, John Ernst (1902–68), American novelist, born in California. He took his native state as the background for his early short stories and novels and described the lives of those working on the land with realism and understanding. Tortilla Flat (1935) was his first success, and he confirmed his growing reputation with two novels about landless rural workers, In Dubious Battle (1936) and Of Mice and Men (1937), the story of two itinerant farm labourers, one of huge strength and weak mind, exploited and protected by the other. His best-known work, The Grapes of Wrath (1939), is an epic account of the efforts of an emigrant farming family from the dust bowl of the West to reach the 'promised land' of California. Among his later novels are East of Eden (1952), a family saga, and The Winter of Our Discontent (1961). He was awarded the *Nobel Prize in 1962.

Steiner, (Francis) George (1929–), American critic and author, born in Paris, and educated at the Sorbonne, the University of Chicago, Harvard, and Oxford. His critical works include Tolstoy or Dostoevsky: An Essay in the Old Criticism (1959); The Death of Tragedy (1961); Language and Silence (1967); In Bluebeard's Castle: Some Notes towards the Re-definition of Culture (1971); and After Babel: Aspects of Language and Translation (1975). Steiner's criticism is wide-ranging and multicultural in its references and controversial in its content: one of his recurrent themes is the way in which the 20th-cent. experiences of totalitarianism and world war, and, more specifically, of the Holocaust, have destroyed the assumption (self-evident, he claims, to Dr *Johnson, *Coleridge, and M. *Arnold) that literature is a humanizing influence. Silence is the only appropriate response to 20th-cent. horrors. The Holocaust is also the subject of his novella The Portage to San Cristobal of A.H. (1979; dramatized by Christopher *Hampton, 1982), which puts in the mouth of Hitler (who is supposed to have survived the war and taken refuge in South America) the argument that the Jews (through monotheism, Christianity, and Marxism) had provoked their own destruction by offering ‘the blackmail of transcendence ... the virus of Utopia’. Other works: Real Presences: Is There Anything in What We Say? (1989), Proofs and Three Parables (fiction, 1992). Errata: An Examined Life (1997) is a memoir recalling his childhood, education, and intellectual development.

Stella, (1) the chaste lady loved by Astrophel in Sidney’s sonnet sequence Astrophel and Stella, based on Penelope *Rich; (2) Swift’s name for Esther Johnson; see Swift, and in particular the account there of the Journal to Stella.

Stendhal, pseudonym of Henri Beyle (1783–1842), French novelist, who spent his early years in his native Grenoble and later lived for long periods in Italy. His two recognized masterpieces, Le Rouge et le noir (1830) and La Chartreuse de Parme (1839), the first following the rise and fall of the young provincial Julien Sorel in the France of the Restoration (1814–30), the second chronicling the fortunes of Fabrice del Donga at a small Italian court during the same period, figure among the great French novels of the 19th cent. Each is remarkable for its political dimension, for the detail and variety of the experience portrayed, for the energy and passion of the principal characters, and for penetrating psychological analysis. Stendhal also wrote studies of music and musicians, and of Italian painting (Histoire de la peinture en Italie, 1817), travel books (Rome, Naples et Florence en 1817, 1817), and much occasional journalism. De l’amour (1822) considers the passion both psychologically and in relation to historical and social conditions. With the two pamphlets entitled Racine and Shakespeare (1823, 1825) he entered the classic–Romantic controversy on the side of the latter. Of his other novels, Armance (1823) and L’Abbesse de Castro (1839) appeared during his lifetime; the unfinished Lucien Leuwen (1894) and the fragmentary Lamiel (1889) were published posthumously. La Vie de Henri Brulard (1890), the Journal (1888) of, mainly, the years 1801 to 1815, and Souvenirs d’égotisme (1892), covering the years 1822–30, are all autobiographical.

Stephano, a drunken butler in Shakespeare’s The Tempest.

Stephen, Sir James (1789–1859), father of Sir J. F. *Stephen and Sir L. *Stephen. He was under-secretary of state for the colonies (1836–47) and professor of modern history at Cambridge (1849–59), meanwhile contributing articles to the Edinburgh Review including an admirable essay on Wilberforce. He is remembered as author of Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography (1849) and Lectures on the History of France (1851).

Stephen, Sir James Fitzjames (1829–94), son of Sir J. *Stephen and brother of Leslie *Stephen, a barrister, legal member of council in India (1869–72), and high court judge (1879–91). In 1861 he was counsel for Rowland Williams in the Essays and Reviews case. He was a member of the Apostles and the Metaphysical Society and vigorously contributed articles on social, moral, and controversial theological subjects to periodicals including Fraser’s Magazine and the Cornhill; he was chief writer for the Pall Mall Gazette for five years. Among his works were A History of the Criminal Law in England (1883), H Horace Sabbaticae (1892, collected articles from the Saturday Review), and Liberty, Equality, Fraternity (1873, repub. 1967) in which he criticized J. S. Mill’s utilitarian position in his essay On Liberty. There is a life by Leslie Stephen.

Stephen, James Kenneth (1859–92), younger son of Sir J. F. *Stephen and cousin of V. *Woolf, educated at Eton and King’s College, Cambridge. He was called to the bar but devoted most of his time to journalism and in 1888 began a weekly paper called the Reflector, chiefly written by himself. He was author (as ‘J. K. S.’) of highly successful parodies and light verse, collected as Lapsus Calami and Quo Musa Tendis (both 1891). His promising career ended as a result of an accident in 1886 which slowly drove him insane, and he has been suggested as a candidate for the role of Jack the Ripper. See M. Harrison, Clarence (1972).

Stephen, Sir Leslie (1832–1904), son of Sir J. *Stephen and brother of Sir J. F. *Stephen, educated at Eton and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he became tutor, having taken orders. From his family he inherited a strong tradition of evangelicalism and muscular Christianity, and he became a noted mountaineer: he edited the Alpine Journal, 1868–72, and the best of his Alpine essays were collected in 1871 as The Playground of Europe.

Stephen’s reading of J. S. *Mill, *Comte, and *Kant inclined him to scepticism, and by 1865 he had abandoned all belief in even the broadest of Broad Church doctrine. In 1864 he came to London and embarked on a literary career of prodigious industry and output, contributing articles to many periodicals. In 1871 he became editor of the Cornhill, a post he held until 1882 when he undertook the editorship of the Dictionary of National Biography (the DNB). During these years he published several volumes, some defining his position as an agnostic; his great work, History of English Thought in the 18th Century (1876), reviews the Deist controversy of that age, and the intuitional and utilitarian schools of philosophy. He also contributed several biographies to the English Men of Letters series, despite the amount of time consumed by the vast undertaking of the DNB, to which he himself contributed almost 400 entries, and from which strain and ill health forced him to resign in 1891. His last important volume was English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century (1904). Many of his literary judgements are now questioned, but he was one of the most prominent intellectuals of his day (portrayed by his friend *Meredith as Vernon Whitford, ‘a Phoebus Apollo turned fasting friar’, in *The Egoist) and his influence was great and lasting.

Stephen’s first wife was *Thackeray’s daughter ‘Minny’, who died in 1875. His acute grief, and his second marriage to Julia Duckworth, are both recorded in his autobiographical papers, written for their children (one of whom was V. *Woolf) and his stepchildren. Woolf portrays some aspects of his character in her portrait of Mr Ramsay in To the Lighthouse (1927). See also Noël Annan, Leslie Stephen: His Thought and Character in Relation to His Time

STEPHENS, James (1882-1950), Irish poet and story writer, born in poverty, whose best-known work, the prose fantasy The Crock of Gold (1912), has overshadowed much other less whimsical work. Insurrections (1909) was the first of many volumes of poetry;
the Collected Poems appeared in 1926, revised 1954.
His first novel, The Charwoman’s Daughter (1912), was followed by The Demi-Gods (1914) and Deirdre (1923).
Many volumes of stories include Irish Fairy Tales (1920, illustrated by A. *Rackham); and Etched in Moonlight (1928). Stephens became a widely known broadcaster, of stories and verses and conversation. A biography by

STERLING, John (1806-44), educated at Trinity College and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, a leading member of the *Apostles and a disciple of *Coleridge. With *Maurice he was briefly proprietor of the *Athenaeum (1828). He was offered in 1834 the curacy of Herstmonceux by his old tutor *Hare, who was vicar, but he resigned the following year. Sterling owes his fame to his close friendship with *Carlyle, whose vivid Life of Sterling (1851) reveals the tragic history of Sterling’s short life, interrupted by persistent ill health necessitating numerous voyages abroad. His monthly meetings of literary friends, from 1838, became known as the Sterling Club; among its members were Carlyle, Hare, J. S. *Mill, and *Tennyson. He contributed to various periodicals and among his few published works was a novel, Arthur Coningsby (1833), Poems (1839), and Essays and Tales (1848) collected and edited with a memoir by J. Hare, to whom with Carlyle his papers were entrusted.

STERNE, Laurence (1713-68), the son of an impoverished infantry ensign (who was, however, the grandson of an archbishop of York). He spent his early childhood in various barracks in Ireland and England, where he developed an affection for military men evident in his adult writings. At the age of 10 he was sent to school in Yorkshire, under the care of an uncle, and from there proceeded, on a scholarship founded by Archbishop Sterne, to Jesus College, Cambridge, where he encountered and embraced the philosophy of *Locke, and where he made a lifelong friend of *Hall-Stevenson, who was probably the model for *Eugeniuss. Sterne had by this time already contracted tuberculosis. He took holy orders and obtained the living of the Yorkshire parish of Sutton-on-the-Forest in 1738. In 1741 he became a prebendary of York Cathedral, and married Elizabeth Lumley, a cousin of Elizabeth *Montagu, but his domestic and family life was not happy, and of their several children all were stillborn but a daughter, Lydia. He became a JP, earned a reputation as a good country pastor, and his sermons at York Minster were eagerly attended. In 1744 the living of Stillington was added to that of Sutton. For recreation he played the violin, read widely, painted, dined with the local gentry, and, it seems, indulged his considerable interest in women. In 1759, in the course of an ecclesiastical quarrel, he wrote A Political Romance (later entitled The History of a Good Warm Watch Coat), a satire on local ecclesiastical courts so barbed that the authorities had it burned. In the same year he passed his parish over to the care of a curate and began Tristram Shandy. The first version of vols i and ii was rejected by the London printer *Dodsley. At the same time Sterne had to face the deaths of his mother and uncle, and the mental breakdown of his wife. The next version of vols i and ii was ‘written under the greatest heaviness of heart’, and published in York in 1759, with Dodsley agreeing to take half the printing for sale in London. While waiting for the public’s reception of his work, Sterne was enjoying a flirtation with Catherine Fourmantel, a singer then staying in York, who is traditionally (though uncertainly) supposed to be the ‘dear Jenny’ of Tristram Shandy.
Early in 1760 Sterne found himself famous. He went to London and (although his book was not liked by Dr *Johnson, *Goldsmith, *Richardson, and others) he was feted by society, had his portrait painted by *Reynolds, was invited to court, and saw published a second edition of vols i and ii. In the same year he was presented with a third Yorkshire living, that of Coxwold, where he happily settled himself into ‘Shandy Hall’. He published The Sermons of Mr Yorick, a volume whose title caused some scandal, and continued with Tristram Shandy. In 1761 four more volumes appeared and
Meanwhile Sterne’s health was deteriorating steadily.
In 1762 his voice was much affected, and in the hope of improvement he and his wife and daughter left for France, where they lived at Toulouse and Montpellier until 1764, when Sterne returned alone to England, and in 1765 published vols vii and viii of Tristram Shandy. In 1765 he returned to France, visited his family (who were to remain there permanently), and undertook an eight-month tour of France and Italy, which clearly provided him with much of the material for A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy. In 1766 he published two further volumes of sermons. The ninth and last volume of Tristram Shandy appeared in 1767. In the same year Sterne met and fell in love with Elizabeth *Draper, the young wife of an official of the East India Company, and after her enforced departure for India began his Journal to Eliza, which he did not publish. He finished and published A Sentimental Journey in the same year, but his health rapidly collapsed and he died in London in Mar. 1768. A Shandean fate overtook his body, which was taken by grave-robbers, recognized at an anatomy lecture in Cambridge, and secretly returned to its grave.

A spate of forgeries appeared after Sterne's death, including another volume of Tristram Shandy, Posthumous Works, and a continuation by 'Eugenius' (an author whose identity is not known, but who was not Hall-Stevenson) of A Sentimental Journey.

Sterne is generally acknowledged as an innovator of the highest originality, and has been seen as the chief begetter of a long line of writers interested in the stream of consciousness. He acknowledges in Tristram Shandy his own debt in this respect to Locke, whose Essay Concerning Human Understanding seemed to Sterne 'a history-book . . . of what passes in man's own mind'. Throughout his work he parodies, with a virtuosity that has proved inimitable, the developing conventions of the still-new 'novel', and its problems in presenting reality, space, and time. His sharp wit, often sly and often salacious, is balanced by the affection and tolerance he displays towards the delights and absurdities of life. The standard life is by A. H. Cash, Laurence Sterne: The Early and Middle Years (1975) and Laurence Sterne: The Later Years (1986). There is a scholarly edition of Tristram Shandy, ed. Melvin New et al. (3 vols, 1978–84); see also The Sermons of Laurence Sterne, ed. Melvin New (2 vols, 1992).

Sternhold, Thomas (d. 1549), and Hopkins, John (d. 1570), joint versifiers of the Psalms. A collection of 44 of these metrical Psalms appeared in 1549; music was first supplied in the Geneva edition of 1556, and by 1640 about 300 editions had been published. In 1562 The Whole Book of Psalms, by Sternhold, Hopkins, Norton, and others, was added to the Prayer Book. This version was ridiculed by Dryden in Absalom and Achitophel (II. 403), and it provoked Rochester's epigram 'Spoken Extempore to a Country Clerk after Having Heard Him Sing Psalms':

Sternhold and Hopkins had great qualms
When they translated David's psalms
To make the heart full glad;
But had it been poor David's fate
To hear thee sing, and them translate,
By God! 'twould have made him mad.

STEVENS, Wallace (1879–1955), American poet, born in Pennsylvania and educated at Harvard, where he met Santayana. He became a lawyer, and from 1916 worked at Hartford, Connecticut, on the legal staff of the Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company, where he remained until his death, becoming vice-president in 1934. Meanwhile, he had begun to publish poems in Poetry and elsewhere, and his first volume, Harmo nium, which contains 'Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird', was published in 1923. This was followed by other collections (including Ideas of Order, 1935; The Man with the Blue Guitar and Other Poems, 1937; Notes towards a Supreme Fiction, 1942; The Auroras of Autumn, 1950; Collected Poems, 1954) which slowly brought him recognition, but it was not until his last years that his enigmatic, elegant, intellectual, and occasionally startling meditations on order and the imagination, on reality, appearance, and art, gained the high reputation that they now enjoy. See Letters, ed. Holly Stevens (1996).

STEVENSON, John Hall-, see HALL-STEVenson.

STEVenson, Robert Louis (originally Lewis) Balfour (1850–94), son of Thomas Stevenson, joint engineer to the Board of Northern Lighthouses, born in Edinburgh. A sickly child, he was originally intended for his father’s strenuous profession, but ill health encouraged him to abandon the study of engineering at Edinburgh University for the law. He was admitted advocate in 1875, but had already determined to be a writer, and had published in periodicals. He was fascinated by Edinburgh low life, and cultivated a bohemian style, despite the constraint of financial dependence on his father. In 1875 L.* Stephen introduced him to W. E.* Henley, who became a close friend, and with whom he was to collaborate on four undistinguished plays (Deacon Brodie, 1880; Beau Austin, 1884; Admiral Guinea, 1884; Macaire, 1885). From this time on much of his life was spent travelling in search of health; he suffered from a chronic bronchial condition (possibly tuberculosis) and frequent haemorrhages. In France in 1876 he met his future wife, Mrs Fanny Osbourne: An Inland Voyage, describing a canoe tour in Belgium and France, appeared in 1878. Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes, the description of a tour taken with his donkey Modestine, appeared in 1879, where he consolidated a friendship with H.* James. Publication of The Strange Case of *Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (1886), his popular Scottish romances, *Kidnapped (1886), its sequel Catriona (1893), and *The Master of Ballantrae (1889).

In 1888 Stevenson had set out with his family entourage for the South Seas, becoming a legend in his lifetime. He visited the leper colony at Molokai, which inspired his celebrated defence of Father Damien (1841–89), the Belgian priest who had devoted his life to caring for 700 neglected lepers, himself finally dying of the disease (Father Damien: An Open Letter to the Reverend Dr Hyde of Honolulu, 1890). He finally settled in Samoa at Vailima, where he temporarily regained his health, and gained a reputation as ‘Tusitala’ or ‘The Story Teller’. He died there suddenly from a brain haemorrhage, while working on his unfinished masterpiece, *Weir of Hermiston (1896).

In addition to the titles mentioned above, Stevenson published many other volumes, including The Merry Men (1887, with ‘Markheim’ and his earliest Scottish story, ‘Thrawn Janet’); many travel books; The Black Arrow (1888), a historical romance; Island Nights’ Entertainments (1893), which includes ‘The Beach of Falesa’; and St Ives (1897, unfinished, completed by Quiller-Couch). With his stepson Lloyd Osbourne he wrote The Wrong Box (1889), The Wrecker (1892), and The Ebb-Tide (1894). He also published volumes of poetry, including A Child’s Garden of Verses (1885) and Underwoods (1887): his Collected Poems, ed. Janet Adam Smith, appeared in 1950. In them, as in many of his prose works, critics have detected beneath the lightness of touch a sense of apprehension, sin, and suffering; and biographers have attributed this darker side to the early influence of Calvinism, as well as to his ill health. The theme of dualism and the doppelganger recurs in his work, as does an admiration for morally ambiguous heroes or anti-heroes. Although his more popular books have remained constantly in print, and have been frequently filmed, his critical reputation has been obscured by attention to his vivid personality and adventurous life; also by his apparent refusal to take his art seriously. ‘Fiction is to grown men what play is to the child’, he stated, and his delight in storytelling, swashbuckling romances, and historical ‘tushery’, as he called it, gave him an audience of readers rather than critics. His weightier admirers include James, G. Greene, and *Borges. See Vailima Letters (to Sidney Colvin, 1895); Selected Letters, ed. Colvin (2 vols, 1899; 4 vols, 1911); lives by G. Balfour (1901); J. C. Furnas (1952); J. Calder (1980). Edinburgh edition of his collected works, ed. Colvin (28 vols, 1894–8); Pentland edition, ed. *Gosse (20 vols, 1906–7).

STEWART, Dugald (1753–1828), educated at Edinburgh High School and at Edinburgh and Glasgow universities. He was professor of mathematics at Edinburgh from 1775 to 1785, and then professor of moral philosophy from 1785 to 1810, in which post he exercised a powerful influence on Scottish thought, largely because of his brilliant pedagogy and his elegant prose. Although Stewart considered himself a disciple of T.* Reid, he was an eclectic thinker who borrowed from a wide range of sources. He was particularly indebted to the writings of Adam *Smith, and his lectures on political economy were eagerly attended by the coterie of young Whigs who founded the Edinburgh Review. However, in both his lectures and his publications Stewart was primarily concerned with the inculcation of virtue rather than with abstract theorizing, and it cannot be said that he was either an original or a profound thinker. His works, collected by Sir W. Hamilton (11 vols, 1854–60), include: Elements of the Human Mind (1792, 1814, 1827), Outlines of Moral Philosophy (1793), Philosophical Essays (1810), Biographical Memoirs (1810), consisting of lives of Adam Smith, W.* Robertson, and Reid, and his once influential Dissertation . . . Exhibiting a General View of the Progress of Metaphysical and Ethical Philosophy, Since the Revival of Letters in Europe (1815, 1821), written originally for the *Encyclopaedia Britannica.

STEWART, Johnnes Mackintosh (1906–94), novelist and critic, born in Edinburgh and educated at the Edinburgh Academy and Oriel College, Oxford. In 1949 he became a Student (i.e. a fellow) of Christ Church, Oxford, where he remained for over 20 years. Under the pseudonym Michael Innes he wrote a highly successful series of novels and stories featuring Inspector John Appleby which contributed greatly to the vogue for donnish detective fiction, rich in literary allusions and quotations. They include Death at the President’s Lodging (1936), Hamlet, Revenge! (1937), The Secret Vanguard (1940), The Daffodil Affair (1941), Appleby on Ararat (1941), A Private View (1952), The Long Farewell (1958), and Appleby at Allington (1968). Under his own name he wrote a quintet of novels (1974–8) about Oxford with the collective title A Staircase in Surrey.

Stewart of the Glens, James, a character in R. L. Stevenson’s Kidnapped and Catriona, a real character, who was executed in 1752 for a murder which he did not commit, after trial by a jury of Campbells (the foes of his clan).

Steyne, marquis of, a character in Thackeray’s Vanity Fair.

stichomythia, in classical Greek drama, dialogue in alternate lines of verse, employed in sharp disputation. The form is sometimes imitated in English drama, e.g. in the dialogue between Richard III and Elizabeth in Shakespeare’s Richard III (iv. iv).

Stiggins, Mr, a character in Dickens’s Pickwick Papers.

Stoicism a system of thought which originated in Athens during the 3rd cent. BC, flourished in Rome c. 100 BC–c. AD 200, and enjoyed a vigorous revival at the time of the Renaissance. The Stoics’ prime concern was ethics, but they held that right behaviour must be grounded on a general understanding of the universe, and their theories extended to cover the nature of the physical world, logic, rhetoric, epistemology, and politics. The founders held that to be virtuous consisted in following reason undeterred by pain, pleasure, desire, or fear, emotions which belonged to a lower level of existence: the pursuit of health, wealth, success, and pleasure had no real importance. Only fragments of these early founders have survived, and we know of their works through their followers, who included their disciple Cicero. The Stoics whose writings survive are those who lived under the Roman Empire: Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius.

Stoicism had much in common with Christianity, and a compilation of Stoic maxims, the Distichs of Cato, was the most popular of medieval schoolbooks. Petrarch in the 14th cent. expounded a Christian Stoicism in his De Remediis Fortunae, and in the 16th cent. a life of Marcus Aurelius, supposedly ancient but actually by the Spaniard Antonio de Guevara, proved enormously popular. Translated into French and English in the 1530s, it may have served to promote the Stoic revival which came at the end of the century with Montaigne’s Essais (1580) and Lipsius’ De Constantia (1585). In England the years 1595–1615 saw translations of Lipsius, Montaigne, his disciple Charron, Epictetus, and Seneca, and the influence of Stoicism can be traced in a great number of writers from Chapman and Sir William Cornwallis (d. ?1631) to Addison.

STOKER, Bram (Abraham) (1847–1912), born in Dublin. He gave up his career as a civil servant there in 1878 to become Sir H. Irving’s secretary and touring manager for the next 27 years, an experience that produced Personal Reminiscences of Henry Irving (1906). Stoker wrote a number of novels and short stories, as well as some dramatic criticism, but is chiefly remembered for Dracula (1897), a tale of vampirism influenced by ‘Carmilla’, one of the stories in Le Fanu’s In a Glass Darkly (1872).

STONE, Lawrence (1919–99), historian, born in Surrey and educated at Charterhouse School and Christ Church, Oxford; he was long associated with Princeton University, where he became a professor in 1963. His works include The Crisis of the Aristocracy 1588–1641 (1965) and The Causes of the English Revolution (1972). The Family, Sex and Marriage in England 1500–1800 (1977) is a study of the origins of the modern family and shifting attitudes towards sexual and domestic relationships, illustrated with much literary evidence from sources such as Boswell, Mrs Thrale, and Jane Austen; this was followed by Road to Divorce: England 1930–1987 (1990) and other studies of marital breakdown.

Stones of Venice, The, by Ruskin, was published in three volumes, the first in 1851, the second and third in 1853. It is an architectural study in which immense original scholarship is put to moralistic use.

Volume i sets out first principles for discrimination between good and bad architectural features; there follows, in this and volume ii, a criticism of the romantic, Byronic vision of Venice that blinds the traveller to present misery and disorder. From the remnants of the past Ruskin creates a myth of Venice, where power is decommercialized and desecularized, and religion pre-Catholic. The famous chapter ‘The Nature of Gothic’ contrasts feudal relations between authority and workman with those resulting from the division of labour and mechanical mass production in English manufacturing: Clark described it as ‘one of the noblest things written in the 19th cent.; even now, when the ideas it expresses are accepted, and the causes it advocates are dead, we cannot read it without a thrill, without a sudden resolution to reform the world’, a response which indicates the emotional force of Ruskin’s passionate plea for the liberty of the workman. Volume iii describes phases in Renaissance architectural history as illustrations of the gradual degradation of Europe.

STOPES, Marie Charlotte Carmichael (1880–1958), distinguished palaeobotanist and pioneer birth control campaigner, whose Married Love (1918) was published after the annulment of her first marriage, when, she alleged, she was still a virgin. With the help of her second husband she established the first birth control clinic in England in 1921, in Holloway, London, and she continued to write on such subjects as Wise Parenthood (1918, which appeared with a preface by Arnold Bennett), Radiant Motherhood (1920), and sexual fulfilment within marriage. She also published several volumes of plays and of poetry, mostly of a semi-mystical character.

STOPPARD, Tom (1937— ), dramatist, born in Czechoslovakia; his family moved to Singapore in 1939, where his father, Dr Eugene Straussler, was killed, and he subsequently, on settling in England after the war, took his English stepfather’s name. He left school at 17 and worked as a journalist before his first play, A Walk on the Water, was televised in 1963 (staged in London in 1968 as Enter a Free Man). He published a novel, Lord Malquist and the Moon (1965), and in 1966 his play Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead attracted much attention. This was followed by many witty and inventive plays, including The Real Inspector Hound (1968, a play-within-a-play which parodies the conventions of the stage thriller); Jumpers (1972); Travvesties (1974); Dirty Linen (1976, a satire of political life and parliamentary misdemeanours); Every Good Boy Deserves Favour (1977, about a political dissident in a Soviet psychiatric hospital); Night and Day (1978), about the dangers of the ‘closed shop’ in journalism; The Real Thing (1982), a marital tragi-comedy; Arcadia (1993), set in a country house in 1809; and Indian Ink (1995), an exploration of cultural identity. The Invention of Love (1997) presents, through the contrasted fates of A. E. *Housman and Oscar Wilde, the sexual complexities of the Aesthetic movement, and the conflicts between art and scholarship. Stoppard has also written many works for film, radio, and television, including Professional Foul (TV, 1977), set in Prague, which portrays the concurrent visits of an English philosopher and an English football team, and dramatizes the inner conflicts of the philosopher, caught between the abstractions of his own discipline and the realities of a regime which stifles free intellectual exchange. Stoppard’s work displays a semi-mystical character. However, Stoppard has also established himself as a playwright, with such works as In Celebration (1969), a play in which three educated sons return north to visit their miner father; The Contractor (1970), which presents the audience with the construction, then the dismantling, of a wedding marquee, a spectacle which forms the background for the presentation of the relationship of the contractor Ewbank (who had appeared in Radcliffe) with his university-educated son; Home (1970), set in a mental hospital; The Changing Room (1971), again using Rugby League as a setting; Life Class (1974), set in an art college; and Mother’s Day (1976), a violent black comedy set on a housing estate. Action, in Stoppard’s plays, tends to be offstage, obliquely presented through low-key, episodic encounters in a realistic setting; both plays and novels show a preoccupation with social mobility and the disturbance it frequently appears to cause, and combine documentary naturalism with the symbolic and unspoken. Later works include the plays Sister (1978), Early Days (1980), and The March on Russia (1989) and the novels A Prodigal Child (1982) and Present Times (1984). A collection of poems, Storey’s Lives: Poems 1957–1991, appeared in 1992.

Story of an African Farm, The, a novel by O. Schreiner.

Story of My Heart, The, a discourse by R. Jefferies, published 1883.

Tracing the course of his spiritual and imaginative growth from the age of 18, Jefferies describes his longing for harmony with ‘the visible universe’ and his sense of ‘the great earth speaking through me’. He feels the trees, the grass, the stars ‘like exterior nerves and veins’, yet acknowledges a frustrating inadequacy in expressing his experience. Long reading in philosophy and many branches of knowledge has convinced him that learning is an encumbrance, that causality and purposive evolution do not exist, that there is a soul-life (represented for him by the ocean) higher than any conception of a god, and that the orthodox Christian deity has no existence. His atheism caused considerable scandal, but the book soon established itself as a significant autobiography and has passed through innumerable editions.
Although of doubtful quality, the work, with its systematic study of public records. He was suspected of recusancy, and in 1569 and 1570 was charged with possessing popish and dangerous writings; he escaped without punishment. He is said to have been a schoolteacher in Cincinnati before marrying in 1816. The work (with which Hunt had assistance from *Byron) is based on *Dante's story of Paolo and Francesca.

On a fine May morning Francesca leaves Ravenna as a bride, and journeys in moonlight to Rimini. The events which overtake her, and the feelings which arise, lead to her adulterous love for Paolo. The lovers are discovered, and their deaths conclude the poem. Although of doubtful quality, the work, with its flexibility of couples, its use of common speech, and the luxuriance of its southern imagery, suggested new possibilities to the younger Romantic poets.

*Blackwood's Magazine, in attacking 'the Cockney School', derided Hunt's 'glittering and rancid obscenities'. (See Romanticism.)

STOW, John (1525–1605), chronicler and antiquary. He followed at first the trade of a tailor, and was admitted a freeman of the Merchant Taylors' Company in 1547. At first his interest was English poetry; then from about 1564 he began to collect and transcribe manuscripts and to compose historical works, the first to be based on systematic study of public records. He was suspected of recusancy, and in 1569 and 1570 was charged with possessing popish and dangerous writings; he was examined before the ecclesiastical commission, but escaped without punishment. He is said to have spent as much as £200 a year on books and manuscripts; he was patronized by the earl of *Leicester and received a pension from the Merchant Taylors. A fine effigy of Stow, based on one erected by his wife, survives in the church of St Andrew Undershaw, Leadenhall Street, London.

As well as assisting M. *Parker with editing historical texts, his chief publications were: The Works of Geoffrey Chaucer (1561)—his further notes on *Chaucer were subsequently printed by T. Speght (1598); Summarie of Englyshe Chronicles (1565), an original historical work; The Chronicles of England (1580), later entitled The Annales of England; the second edition of *Holinshed's Chronicles (1585–7); and lastly A Survey of London (1598 and 1603), invaluable for the detailed information it gives about the ancient city and its customs. It was brought down to his day by J. *Strype in 1720, and modernized and annotated editions have since been published. The fullest edition of the original work was C. L. Kingsford's of 1908.

STOWE, Mrs Harriet Elizabeth Beecher (1811–96), born in Connecticut, sister of Henry Ward Beecher (1813–87, divine, religious author, and journalist). She was a schoolteacher in Cincinnati before marrying in 1836 C. E. Stowe, a professor at her father's theological seminary. Her anti-slavery novel Uncle Tom's Cabin, which was serialized in the National Era in 1851–2 and published in book form in 1852, had a sensational success and stirred up great public feeling. A powerful if melodramatic tale, it describes the sufferings caused by slavery; pious old Uncle Tom, sold by his well-intentioned Kentucky owner Mr Shelby to meet his debts, is bought first by the handsome, idealistic, sensitive Augustine St Clair, in whose New Orleans household he becomes the favourite of the daughter, the saintly little Eva. But both Eva and St Clair die, and Tom is sold again, this time to a brutal cotton plantation owner, Simon Legree, who finally beats the unprotesting Tom to death just before Shelby's son arrives to redeem him. A parallel plot describes the escape to freedom in Canada of Shelby's slave, the beautiful (and almost white) quadroon Eliza, her child, and her husband George. Mrs Stowe's stress on the anguish of parted families was extremely telling, and her contrast between Southern, New England, and Kentucky ways is well observed, but the sensational religiosity of the story and its dubious conclusion (in which most of the survivors, including the once-irrepressible little slave *Topsy, disappear back to Africa to become missionaries) contributed to a shift of attitude which came to use the phrase 'Uncle Tom' pejoratively, to indicate a supine collaboration with the oppressor. The novel's success brought Mrs Stowe to England in 1853, 1856, and 1859, where she was rapturously received, and honoured by Queen *Victoria, although she later alienated British opinion by her Lady Byron Vindicated (1870), in which she charged *Byron with incestuous relations with his half-sister. Her other works include Dred: A Tale of the Dismal Swamp (1856), which also deals with slavery; The Minister's Wooing (1859), a protest against the doctrines of Calvinism; Old Town Folks (1869), set in New England; and Poganuc People (1878), another tale of New England family life with 'solidly remembered scenes—of candlemakings, quiltings and apple bees, chestnuttings and huckleberryings' praised by E. *Wilson in Patriotic Gore (1962).

STRACHEY, John St Loe, see Spectator.

STRACHEY, (Giles) Lytton (1880–1932), biographer and essayist, born in London; he was the 11th child of an eminent soldier and public administrator who had served for more than 30 years in India, and he was named after his godfather, the first earl of *Lytton, viceroy of India. After an unhappy and sickly childhood and a miserable year at Liverpool University, he found intellectual stimulus and liberation at Trinity College, Cambridge; he became a member of the *Apostles and a friend of G. E. *Moore, J. M. *Keynes and L. *Woolf. He was thereafter a prominent member of the *Bloomsbury Group, advocating both in words and life its faith in tolerance in personal relationships: he spent the last 16 years of his life in a ménage à trois with Dora *Carrington and her husband Ralph Partridge. He was also, in the First World War, a conspicuous conscientious objector. After an abortive attempt at an academic career, Strachey began to write extensively for periodicals (including the *Spectator, the *Edinburgh Review, the *Nation, and the *Athenaeum, and, later, *Life and Letters). His flamboyant
Landmarks in French Literature appeared in 1912, but he did not achieve fame until 1918, with the publication of *Eminent Victorians, itself a landmark in the history of *biography. This was a collection of four biographical essays, on Cardinal *Manning, F. Nightingale, T. *Arnold, and General Gordon; Strachey's wit, iconoclasim, satiric edge, and narrative powers captured a large (though at times hostile) readership, and *Connolly was later to describe the work as 'the first book of the twenties . . . the light at the end of the tunnel'. His irrevocent but affectionate life of Queen *Victoria (1921), which combined careful construction, telling anecdote, and an elegant mandarin style, was also highly successful. His last full-length work, *Elizabeth and Essex: A Tragic History (1928), is more lurid and pictorial; some critics found it erotic and salacious (E. *Wilson described it as 'slightly disgusting'), and its emphasis on Elizabeth's relationship with her father and its effect on her treatment of Essex shows a clear (and early) debt to *Freud. Various collections of Strachey's essays, on subjects ranging from *Voltaire to the *Muggeletonians, appeared during his life and posthumously, and a two-volume critical biography by M. *Holroyd was published in 1967–8.

Strafford, a tragedy in blank verse by R. *Browning, published 1837. It was written at the instigation of *Macready, who produced it at Covent Garden on the day of publication, with himself in the title role. The play received mixed notices and had only a brief run; it has never been professionally revived. Browning drew some of his material from the biography of *Strafford which he helped J. *Forster to write.

The action deals with the events surrounding the impeachment of Strafford; Browning's interest lies in the interplay of love and loyalty between Strafford and the three other main characters: King Charles I, whose weakness causes Strafford's downfall; John Pym, his closest friend until Strafford joined the Royalist party and 'betrayed' the people; and Lady Carlisle, whose love for him Strafford, blinded by his devotion to the king, does not perceive. As with his other historical works, Browning's speculations about the characters' motives are idiosyncratic, and the action of the play is only loosely related to the actual course of events.

Strafford, Sir Thomas Wentworth, first earl of (1593–1641), English statesman, and from 1639 chief adviser of Charles I. He was impeached by the Commons in 1640, but as it was manifestly impossible to convict him of high treason, a bill of attainder was substituted, and he was executed, after the king's assent, on Tower Hill. His death was the subject of many epitaphs, the best known of which (attributed to *Cleveland) contains the lines 'Strafford, who was hurried hence! Twixt Treason and Convenience'; also of a tragedy by R. *Browning (above).

Strahan, William (1715–85), born in Edinburgh. He was by 1738 apprenticed to a printer in London, and became established in the forefront of his trade, aided partly by the printing of *Johnson's Dictionary. He was a friend and correspondent of *Hume and of B. *Franklin, and printed work by the leading writers of the age, including *Gibbon, Adam *Smith, *Smollett, and *Warburton, with most of whom he maintained remarkably friendly personal relations. He became *King's printer in 1770. There is a life by J. A. Cochrane, *Dr Johnson's Printer (1964).

Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, The, see Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde.

Strange Story, A, a novel by *Bulwer-Lytton.

Strangford, Percy Clinton, sixth Viscount (1780–1855), born and educated in Dublin. He became a highly successful diplomat and public man. Profiting by his first posting to Lisbon, he published in 1803 Poems from the Portuguese of Camoens, which went into many editions. He was mocked as 'Hibernian' Strangford by Byron in English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809), but he was the friend of G. *Moore, *Croker, S. *Rogers, and other literary men, and a contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine.

Straparola, Gianfrancesco (c.1490–1557), Italian author of novelle entitled Piacevoli Notti (Pleasant Nights), published in two parts, 1550 and 1553. It enjoyed much popularity and introduced various folk tales to European literature, including the stories of Puss in Boots and *Beauty and the Beast. Painter, in his Palace of Pleasure, drew on Straparola among others.

Strauss, David Friedrich (1808–74), German biblical critic, who studied theology at Tübingen. He resigned his teaching post at Tübingen University in 1833, because of his unorthodox approach to biblical texts. His most famous work was Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet (The Life of Jesus, Critically Examined, 1835–6), in which Strauss subjected the Gospel accounts of the life of Jesus to close historical criticism, finding them based on myth rather than historical fact. G. *Eliot translated the work into English in 1846 (her first published work), and her study of it helped to confirm her break with Christianity.

Strauss, Richard (1864–1949), German composer, whose early rise to fame was based largely on the orchestral tone poems that he wrote in the last decades of the 19th cent. The first was Macbeth, completed in 1888 and later revised (though not performed until after its more famous successor, Don Juan, in 1890).
Stravinsky once more returned to Shakespeare, with the three Ophelia songs in the Sechs Lieder (1918). The vast majority of Strauss's song texts are German. He first triumphed as an opera composer with a German version of *Wilde's Salome (1905). There was an element of scandal in the success of this fin-de-siècle decadent piece but within two years Salome had been performed at 50 opera houses and has remained a staple of the repertoire. None of the operas Strauss wrote in collaboration with *Hofmannsthal had English sources, but after Hofmannsthal's death, his version of *Wilde's three Ophelia songs in the 975 STRAVINSKY | STRINDBERG element of scandal in the success of this fin-de-siècle triumphed as an opera composer with a German environment imposed by the *Hogarth drawings on which the tale was based, yet the result is not pastiche but rather a work of classical precision. In the period immediately following The Rake's Progress, Stravinsky's style underwent a profound change, absorbing aspects of the serial practice developed by Schoenberg; among the first works to adopt the new manner was the little Cantata (1952) made up of four late medieval English lyrics, and a year later the Three Songs from William Shakespeare. Auden offered Stravinsky another libretto (a masque entitled Delia) but Stravinsky turned to Dylan *Thomas, who proposed as a subject 'the rediscovery of our planet following an atomic misadventure'. The composer left a touching account of their one meeting in 1953, but the only music that resulted from it was In Memoriam Dylan Thomas (1954), a setting of 'Do not go gentle' for tenor, string quartet, and four trombones. Another 'in memoriam' piece is the miniature Elegy for J.F.K. (1964), for which he asked Auden to write 'a very quiet little lyric', which he set for baritone and three clarinets. The death of his friend T. S. *Eliot produced the short Introusit, first heard in Apr. 1965 together with the orchestral Variations dedicated to the memory of another close friend, A. *Huxley. His only setting of an Eliot text was the short polyphonic Anthem for unaccompanied chorus, The Dove descending breaks the air' (1962, 'Little Gidding', Four Quartets). Stravinsky's last work for the stage was the 'musical play' The Flood, a 24-minute version of part of the York miracle play. His actual last composition, at the age of 84, was a setting for soprano and piano of *Lear's The Owl and the Pussycat' which he dedicated to his wife.

Straw, Jack, see Jack Straw.

Strawberry Hill, near Twickenham, about 10 miles west of the centre of London. Horace *Walpole settled there in 1747, and with advice from his friends *Chute and Richard *Bentley transformed it into 'a little Gothic castle', housing in it his collection of articles of virtu, and establishing in 1757 a private press; its first printing was of *Gray's Odes. Walpole also printed many of his own works. (See also Gothic Revival.)

stream of consciousness, a term used variously to describe either the continuity of impressions and thoughts in the human mind, or a special literary method for representing this psychological principle in unpunctuated or fragmentary forms of *interior monologue. The term was coined in W. *James's Principles of Psychology (1890), in the first sense. The literary sense of the term was introduced in 1918 by May *Sinclair in a review of early volumes in D. *Richardson's novel sequence Pilgrimage (1915–38), which include the first notable English uses of the technique. As used by Richardson, and more famously by J. *Joyce in his novel *Ulysses (1922), the stream-of-consciousness style represents the 'flow' of impressions, memories, and sense-impressions through the mind by abandoning accepted forms of syntax, punctuation, and logical connection. Joyce himself attributed the origin of the technique to the little-known French novel Les Lauriers sont coupés (1888) by Édouard Dujardin (1861–1949). After Joyce's virtuoso demonstration of its possibilities in the unpunctuated final chapter of Ulysses, the stream-of-consciousness method of rendering characters' thought processes became an accepted part of the modern novelist's repertoire, used by V. *Woolf, W. *Faulkner, and others.

Strephon, the shepherd whose lament for his lost Urania forms the opening of Sidney's *Arcadia. 'Strephon' has been adopted as a conventional name for a rustic lover.

Strether, Lewis Lambert, a character in H. James's *The Ambassadors.

STRETON, Hesba, the *nom de plume of Sarah Smith (1832–1911), a prolific writer of tracts, pamphlets, stories, and booklets, largely published by the Religious Tract Society. Jessica's First Prayer (1867) was reprinted innumerable times, brought tears to the eyes of *Kelvert, and remained popular for many years. She also wrote three long novels, which were well received: Paul's Courtship (1867), The Clives of Burcot (1868), and Through a Needle's Eye (1879). She contributed to *Dickens's All the Year Round, and to other periodicals.

STRINDBERG, Johan August (1849–1912), Swedish playwright and author, born in Stockholm, the son of a steamship agent who married his housekeeper after she had already borne him three sons: hence the title of his autobiography, The Son of a Servant (1886).
Strindberg achieved theatrical success only after much difficulty and attempts at other careers, and his works, dramatic and non-dramatic, are marked by a deeply neurotic response to religion, social class, and sexuality; he married three times, gained a reputation for anti-feminism and misogyny, and was tried for blasphemy, though acquitted. His first important play, Master Olof (written 1872–7, performed 1881), was followed by others, including The Father (1887), Miss Julie (1888), and Creditors (1889), works which combine a highly aggressive and original version of naturalism with a sense of the extreme and pathological. His later works are tense, symbolic, psychic dramas, marked by a sense of suffering and a longing for salvation and absolution; they include To Damascus (1898–1901; 3 parts), The Dance of Death (1901), A Dream Play (1902), and The Ghost Sonata (1907), all distinctive and innovative works which influenced the psychological and symbolic dramas of O’Neill and the writers of the Theatre of the Absurd. G. B. Shaw, who met Strindberg in Stockholm in 1908 and saw a specially arranged performance of Miss Julie, was a generous advocate of his work, but it was nevertheless some years before his plays were performed and accepted in England.

Strindberg's non-dramatic works include a novel, The Red Room (1879), Getting Married (1884, 1885; 2 vols of short stories), and Inferno (written and published in French, 1898), an extraordinary account of his life in Paris after the collapse of his second marriage, when, tormented by loneliness and driven to the verge of insanity by guilt and a sense of failure, he studied Swedenborg, dabbled in alchemy, and suffered severe hallucinations. Many of Strindberg’s plays have been translated into English by Michael Meyer, who also published a biography in 1985, and several of his works have been translated by Mary Sandbach.

STRODE, Ralph (fl. 1350–1400), minor Scholastic philosopher and logician, fellow of Merton College, Oxford, where he was the colleague of Wycliff with whom he entered into controversy. As ‘philosophical Strode’ (V. 1857) he was the dedicatee of Chaucer’s Troilus and Criseyde, along with Gower.

STRODE, William (1600–45), poet and dramatist, educated at Oxford, where his tragi-comedy The Floating Island (pub. 1655) was performed before Charles I by the students of Christ Church in 1636, with songs set to music by H. Lawes. His poems were collected by Bertram Dobell from manuscript and published with the play as The Poetical Works of William Strode (1907), with a memoir of the author. The poems include some fine love lyrics and epitaphs.

Strong, Dr, in Dickens’s David Copperfield, an amiable old schoolmaster, who dotes on his young wife Annie and supports her worthless cousin Jack Maldon.

STRONG, Leonard (1896–1958), poet and novelist, born in Devon of half-Irish ancestry. He was educated at Wadham College, Oxford, and later taught for some years in Oxford, before becoming a full-time writer; during this period he befriended the young Day-Lewis. His many novels (which show a strain of the macabre and violent) include Dewer Rides (1929, set in Dartmoor) and Sea Wall (1933, set in Dublin). His autobiography of his early years, Green Memory, was published posthumously in 1961.

STUART, Joseph (1749–1802), author, artist, engraver, and antiquary, author of many works valuable for their research and engravings, including a Chronicle of England (1777–8), Dresses and Habits of the English People (1796–9), and Sports and Pastimes of the People of England (1801). An unfinished novel by Strutt was completed by Sir W. Scott (Queenhoo Hall, 1808), and suggested to him the publication of his own Waverley.

Struwwelpeter, a book of comic illustrated morality rhymes published in 1845 by Dr Heinrich Hoffmann (1809–94), a German physician, who wrote the book for the amusement of his children: its anti-hero, with his grotesquely sprouting hair and nails, became an internationally recognizable figure, and has appeared in several English versions, sometimes as Slovenly Peter, more often as Shock-Headed Peter. The macabre humour of Belloc’s Cautionary Tales (1907) owes much to him.

STRYE, John (1643–1737), ecclesiastical historian, educated at St Paul’s School, Jesus College and St Catharine’s Hall, Cambridge. He formed a magnificent collection of original documents, mostly of the Tudor period, now in the Harleian and Lansdowne manuscripts. He published lives of Cranmer (1694), Cheke (1705), Grindal (1710), M. Parker (1711), and Whitgift (1718). He corrected and enlarged Stow’s Survey of London (1720).

STUART, Daniel (1766–1846), journalist, and an early press baron, who in 1795 bought the Morning Post and increased its circulation fourfold, later amalgamating with it the Gazetteer and the Telegraph. In 1796 he bought the Courier and when he sold the Morning Post in 1803 he proceeded to do for the Courier what he had done for his earlier paper. He employed excellent journalists and writers, including Southey, Lamb, Wordsworth, and Coleridge. Between 1799 and 1802 Coleridge wrote many articles, both political and literary, for the Post.

STUBBES, or STUBBS, Philip (fl. 1583–91), a Puritan pamphleteer, author of The Anatomie of Abuses (1583), a denunciation of evil customs of the time which, in the author’s opinion, needed abolition. It contains a section on stage plays and is one of the principal sources of information on the social and economic conditions of the period. His account of his wife Katherine, A Christal Glasse for Christian Women (1591), was very popular.

STUBBS, George (1724–1806), the greatest of the English 18th-cent. animal painters. Stubbs was also a brilliant anatomist. His paintings of sporting and country pursuits, in which grooms feature as prominently as their noble employers, are realistic and honest. His pictures of horses attacked by lions, a theme which recurred in his work from 1763 when his Startled Horse moved Walpole to verse (Public Advertiser, 4 Nov. 1763), anticipated Romanticism. Reapers and Haymakers (1783, 1785; London, Tate Gallery), possibly painted to appeal to the taste for pastoral scenes inspired by Thomson’s The Seasons, proved too unsentimental to be widely popular.

STUBBS, John (c. 1541–90), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and Lincoln’s Inn. In August 1579 he published The Discoverie of a Gaping Gulf whereinto England Is Like to Be Swallowed against the queen’s marriage to the French king’s brother François, d’Alençon. For this he was imprisoned and had his right hand cut off, whereupon he ‘put off his hat with his left and said with a loud voice “God save the Queen”’. The pamphlet has been edited by L. E. Berry (1968).

STUBBS, William (1825–1901), historian. Educated at Ripon Grammar School and Christ Church, Oxford, he was elected a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, in 1848 but resigned in 1850 to take the living of Navenstoc, Essex; in 1866 he was appointed Regius professor of modern history at Oxford. He was the first substantial scholar to hold such a chair at either university, and may be said to have created the discipline of English medieval history single-handed. He showed his supreme professional skill, acquired by the study of contemporary German academic method, in the 18 volumes of medieval texts he edited for the Rolls Series, and this was the foundation for his great Constitutional History of [Medieval] England (3 vols, 1874–8), which has been described as ‘one of the most astonishing achievements of the Victorian mind’, fit to rank with Darwin’s Origin of Species. Together with his Select Charters and Other Illustrations of English Constitutional History to 1307 (1870), it imposed a pattern and a method on the teaching of history in all British universities which survived until the mid-20th cent. (in Oxford longer), though he published nothing more after his elevation to the bishopric of Chester in 1884 and subsequently (1888) Oxford. The chief criticism of his work was that it partook of the attitudes of his time: he assumed that medieval England was a unified nation with common ideals, that its better kings had a formed and consistent plan of constitutional action, and that the development of Parliament was inevitable and evolutionary—ideas which might have had a shorter life had they been put forward by a lesser man.

Stukeley, a character in George Peele’s Battle of Alcazar. The real Thomas Stukeley was said to be a natural son of Henry VIII. He was an adventurer, who entered the service of the French king, was sent on a spying expedition to England, and betrayed his employer to Cecil. He next entered the service of Charles V; then embarked on a privateering expedition, for which Queen Elizabeth provided one of his ships, till the remonstrances of foreign powers led to his arrest. He proceeded to Ireland, where his ambitious schemes were distrusted and discountenanced by Elizabeth, then escaped to Spain, having been in reasonable correspondence with Philip II. He joined the king of Portugal’s expedition against Morocco and was killed at the battle of Alcazar. Fuller in his Worthies of England gives an amusing account of a conversation between him and Queen Elizabeth.

STUKELEY, William (1687–1765), antiquary, who started life as a student of law, took a degree as doctor of medicine, and became secretary to the *Society of Antiquaries, which he shared in founding (1718). He wrote on many varied topics, ranging from flute music to earthquakes, but was particularly interested in Druidism, and his discussions of Stonehenge (Stonehenge: A Temple Restor’d to the British Druids, 1740) and Avebury (Abury, 1743) claimed (after *Aubrey) that they had been built by the Druids. He believed that the beliefs of the Druids were ‘near akin to the Christian doctrine’, that they believed in a Trinity, and that their alleged human sacrifices prefigured the Crucifixion; he defended them from the attacks of *Toland who had implied that they were superstitious, debauched, and corrupt. His views may have influenced *Blake’s vision of *Albion, and *Wordsworth was also familiar with them. See A. L. Owen, The Famous Druids (1962) and Stuart Piggott, William Stukeley: An Eighteenth Century Antiquary (1985). (See *PRIMITIVISM.

STURGIS, Howard Overing (1855–1920), American-born novelist who lived for many years in England. He is remembered for Belchamber (1904), a novel called after the country house that dominates the plot. The elder son, nicknamed Sainty, is frail, high-minded, clever, and lame from a childhood riding accident: his younger brother Edward is sporting and extrovert, and marries an actress. Sainty inherits house and title, and is wooed for them under pressure from her mother by the determined young Cissy Eccleston. She, as Lady Belchamber, refuses to consummate the marriage, and eventually gives birth to a bastard son, which Sainty agrees to recognize as his. The Jamesian undertones and Sturgis’s love of the English aristocracy are marked.
Structuralism and post-structuralism are broad schools of thought that arose in Paris from the 1950s to the 1970s, asserting a powerful influence across a range of different kinds of cultural analysis, from anthropology and psychoanalysis to literary criticism and the study of cinema. Structuralism had the ambition of bringing these various realms under a single general ‘science of signs’ called semiotics or semiology and thus of uncovering the basic codes or systems of meaning that underlie all human cultural activity. Post-structuralism tends to abandon such grand scientific ambitions, although it still roves freely among widely different cultural forms. Both currents share the same founding principle, which is the primacy of ‘Language’, conceived as an abstract system of differences, in all human activities. An important consequence is that the autonomous human mind, hitherto assumed to be the maker of all meanings and cultural artefacts, is demoted to a subordinate position, as ‘the subject’ generated by Language. This agreed, structuralism and post-structuralism disagree only on the question of whether Language is knowably fixed as an object of science, or unstably indeterminate and slippery. Diagonally opposed conclusions about the relations between literature and science ensue: for structuralism, fictional texts are to be seen as instances of scientific laws, while post-structuralism often regards scientific laws as instances of textual fictions.

The origins of these movements lie in the foundation of modern linguistics by the Swiss scholar Ferdinand de Saussure, who redirected the study of languages away from ‘diachronic’ questions of their historical development and towards ‘synchronic’ study of their workings at a given time. Structuralism and post-structuralism are inimical to historical enquiry into the origins of any phenomenon, and usually dismiss notions of evolution and progress as 19th-cent. superstitions. Saussure's second condition for the reconstruction of linguistics as a science was that its object of study should be, not individual utterances and their meanings (parole), but the system of rules and distinctions (the langue) that underlies them in a given language. Structuralism follows suit by showing less interest in what a cultural product (a poem, an advertisement, a culinary ritual) may mean than in the implicit rules that allow it to mean something. The key principle of Saussure's linguistic theory is that a word is an 'arbitrary sign': that is, its form and meaning derive not from any natural quality of its referent in the world outside language, but solely from its differences from other words. Saussure's general conclusion here is that 'in a language, there are only differences, without positive terms'. Meanings are, then, not to be found 'in' words but only through the differential relations between them, as conventionally established within a given language. Structuralism and post-structuralism alike are founded upon this principle of the 'relational' nature of signification and thus of all meanings. Abstracting from Saussure's work, which applies to the analysis of a given language such as English, they often invoke 'Language' as such, as a self-contained realm or general principle of differentiation. This permits the discovery of 'Language' at work in all kinds of activity not usually regarded as properly linguistic: cuisine, costume, dance, photography, and structures of kinship, for example, may all now be read as 'sign-systems'. Indeed, for the influential structuralist psychoanalyst Jacques Lacan (1901–81), it is Language that turns infants into human ‘subjects’, splitting their minds forever into conscious and unconscious levels as they enter its system of interchangeable pronouns.

After Saussure, the second founding father was the Russian linguist Roman Jakobson (1896–1982), whose career links his early work in the Russian *formalist school with full-blown structuralism in his later writings. Jakobson helped to shape the ideas of the leading French structuralists of the 1960s—*Lévi-Strauss, *Barthes, Lacan, and the Marxist philosopher Louis Althusser (1918–90)—with his claim that the basic principles by which all sign-systems combine their elements into meaningful compounds are those of *metaphor and *metonymy.

As applied to the analysis of particular literary works, the structuralist method is not concerned with critical evaluation, but with uncovering the basic 'binary oppositions' (nature/culture, male/female, active/passive, etc.) that govern the text. It rejects traditional conceptions in which literature is held to express an author's meaning or to reflect the real world; instead, it regards the 'text' as a self-contained structure in which conventional codes of meaning are activated. The most significant contribution it has made to literary study has been in the realm of *narratology, in the writings of A. J. Greimas, Gérard Genette, and Tzvetan Todorov. In the English-speaking world, some critics such as *Kermode, D. *Lodge in his *Modes of Modern Writing (1977), and Jonathan Culler in his Structuralist Poetics (1975) have adopted elements of structuralist analysis, albeit cautiously. The anglophone tradition of literary criticism was already partly inoculated against these influences, having developed its own conceptions of literary language in the work of the *New Critics, and of generic structures in the work of *Frye.

Post-structuralism cannot be disentangled fully from structuralism: some of its leading figures, notably Barthes, show a transition from one to the other. In general, post-structuralism pursues structuralist arguments about the autonomy of Language from the world, to the point at which structuralism’s own authority is undermined. The philosophical pioneer in this new phase is *Derrida, who began to unpick the logic of structuralism in 1966, pointing out certain basic instabilities in the founding concepts of ‘structure’ and ‘binary opposition’. Under his corrosive re-examination, fixed structures appear to dissolve, binary opposites appear to contaminate one another, and determinate meanings become indeterminate. Post-structuralism thus challenges the ‘scientific’ pretensions, not only of structuralism but of other explanatory systems (notably Marxism), by appealing to the inherent uncertainty of Language. In particular, it discards all ‘metalanguages’ (that is, uses of language that purport to explain other uses: linguistics, philosophy, criticism, etc.) by pointing out that they are just as unreliable as the kinds of language they claim to comprehend. Post-structuralism usually allows no appeal to a reality outside Language that could act as a foundation for linguistic meanings; instead, it sees every *discourse as circularly self-confirming. This is not quite the same as denying the existence of a real world outside Language, although Derrida’s notorious declaration that ‘il n’y a pas d’hors-texte’ (rather misleadingly Englished as ‘there is nothing outside the text’) has given this impression. The radical scepticism of this movement reflected in part the libertarian politics of the 1960s and in part the influence of *Nietzsche, in its rejection of ‘hierarchical’ and ‘totalitarian’ systems of thought, its denial of objectivity, and its hostility to the ‘grand narratives’ of historical explanation associated with the *Enlightenment.

In terms of linguistic theory, the distinctive view of post-structuralism is that the *signifier (a written word, for example) is not fixed to a particular ‘signified’ (a concept), and so all meanings are provisional. Derrida’s philosophical account of this idea found support in the psychoanalytic teachings of Lacan, which stress the instability of individual identity within Language. Lacan’s writings created an intersection of psychological, linguistic, and political concerns in which much post-structuralist theory operates, notably the work of Julia Kristeva, Gilles Deleuze, and Jean-François Lyotard. A similar conjunction characterizes the work of *Foucault, which examines the power of Language as revealed in institutionalized ‘discourses’ and intellectual systems. In the social sciences and beyond, this body of post-structuralist theory encouraged cultural relativism and the associated view that our models of reality are ‘constructed’ in Language or discourse. It also shaped the concept of *postmodernism.

In academic literary criticism, post-structuralism has won a greater influence than the more narrowly scientific propositions of structuralism, partly because it respects such literary values as verbal complexity and paradox. In some versions, indeed, it threatens to treat history, philosophy, anthropology, and even natural science merely as branches of literature or ‘text’. Many philosophers and social scientists regard Derrida and Lacan primarily as literary jesters, as both are noted for their elaborate punning and impenetrably dense style. Post-structuralist literary theory and criticism have assumed varied forms, from the kind of linguistic and rhetorical analysis inspired by Derrida and known as *deconstruction, to the *New Historicism inspired by Foucault. They include a version of *feminist criticism derived in part from Lacan and associated with the work of Kristeva. Another important figure is Barthes, whose writings of the 1970s present the process of reading less as a decoding of structures than as a kind of erotic sport. Both Barthes and Kristeva championed *Modernist literary experiment, in which they detected a politically liberating value opposed to the conservative implications of literary *realism. Post-structuralist criticism is in general more sympathetic to ‘open’, unstable, or self-referential writing than to what it regards as ‘closed’ literary forms; and it disparages realism in particular because it disguises the active power of Language in ‘constructing’ reality. See J. Sturrock (ed.), Structuralism and since (1979), and M. Sarup, An Introductory Guide to Post-structuralism and Postmodernism (1988).
STURLA THORDARSON (c.1214–84), nephew of Snorri Sturluson, Icelandic historian, author of the Sturlunga saga, or contemporary history of the house of Sturla, a vivid picture of old Icelandic life.

Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress), the name (taken from the title of a romantic drama of the American War of Independence by the German playwright Klinger, 1777) given to a period of literary ferment which prevailed in Germany during the latter part of the 18th cent. It was inspired by Rousseau’s fervent idealism and characterized by a revolt against literary conventions (particularly the unities in drama), by the cult of genius, and by a return to ‘nature’. The principal figures of the movement were the young Goethe, Herder, and Schiller. Many of the plays were translated and adapted for the English stage during the 1790s.

STURT, George (1863–1927), born in Farnham, Surrey, where in 1884 he inherited the long-established family business described in The Wheelwright’s Shop (1923), which records the traditions of and changes in local craftsmanship and relationships. Earlier works, published as ‘George Bourne’, include The Bettesworth Book (1901) and Change in the Village (1912). Selections from his journal were edited by G. Grigson (1941) and E. D. Mackerness (1967).

STYRON, William (1925–). American novelist, born in Virginia, whose works include Lie Down in Darkness (1951), The Long March (1953), and Set This House on Fire (1960). He is best known internationally for two controversial novels, both of which raised issues of cultural appropriation. The Confessions of Nat Turner (1967) is a work of historical fiction, narrated by the leader of a slave revolt in Virginia in 1831, and Sophie’s Choice (1979) deals with the Holocaust.

sublime, the, an idea associated with religious awe, vastness, natural magnificence, and strong emotion which fascinated 18th-cent. literary critics and aestheticians. Its development marks the movement away from the clarity of neo-classicism towards Romanticism, with its emphasis on feeling and imagination; it was connected with the concept of original genius which soared fearlessly above the rules.

Sublimity in rhetoric and poetry was first analysed in an anonymous Greek work, On the Sublime, attributed to Longinus, which was widely admired in England after Boileau’s French translation of 1674. The concept was elaborated by many writers, including Addison, Dennis, Hume, Burke, and H. Blair and the discussion spread from literature to other areas. Longinus had described the immensity of objects in the natural world, of the stars, of mountains and volcanoes, and of the ocean, as a source of the sublime, and this idea was of profound importance to the growing feeling for the grandeur and violence of nature. The most widely read work, and most stimulating to writers and painters, was Burke’s Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the *Sublime and Beautiful (1757). Burke put a new emphasis on terror: ‘Whatever is fitted in any sort to excite the ideas of pain, and danger... or is conversant about terrible objects, or operates in a manner analogous to terror, is a source of the sublime; that is, it is productive of the strongest emotion which the mind is capable of feeling.’ Burke saw the sublime as a category distinct from beauty. With the former he associated obscurity, power, darkness, solitude, and vastness and with the latter smoothness, delicacy, smallness, and light. These varied ideas were brought together, and discussed with greater philosophical rigour, by Kant in the Critique of Judgement (1790). Burke’s theory was popular, and stimulated a passion for terror that culminated in the Gothic tales of A. Radcliffe and the macabre paintings, crowded with monsters and ghosts, of Barry, Mortimer, and Fuseli. The cult drew strength from Macpherson’s Ossianic poems; Ossian took his place beside Homer and Milton as one of the great poets of the sublime, whose works were frequently illustrated by painters. The sublime of terror kindled the enthusiasm for wild scenery and cosmic grandeur already apparent in the writings of Addison and Shaftesbury, and of E. Young and James Thomson. Many writers making the Grand Tour dwelt on the sublimity of the Alps; they contrasted them with the pictures of Rosa, whose stormy landscapes provided a pattern for 18th-cent. descriptions of savage nature. By the 1760s, when picturesque journeys in England became popular, travellers sought out the exhilarating perils of the rushing torrent, the remote mountain peak, and the gloomy forest. Many published their impressions in Tours, and sublimity became a fashion, pandered to by the dramatic storms shown by de Loutherbourg’s Ediophusikon, a small theatre with lantern slides, and later by Martin’s vast panoramas of cosmic disaster.

The Romantic poets rejected the categories of 18th-cent. theorists and yet these writers on the sublime were moving, albeit clumsily, towards that sense of the mystery of natural forces that is so powerful in the poetry of Byron, Shelley, and Wordsworth, and in the paintings of Turner. See S. H. Monk, The Sublime: A Study of Critical Theories in XVIII Century England (1935).

Sublime and Beautiful, A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the, a treatise by E. Burke, published anonymously 1757, with an ‘Introduction on Taste’ added 1759.

This is one of the earliest of Burke’s publications, in which he discusses the distinctions between the sublime, with its associations of infinity, darkness, solitude, terror, and vacancy, and the beautiful, which consists in relative smallness, smoothness, and brightness of colour. There are interesting sections on pleasure gained from distress (as in tragedy, or in the sight of a conflagration), and his descriptions of a sort of delightful horror, a sort of tranquillity tinged with terror had much influence on the aesthetic theory of the later 18th cent. and in particular on G. E. *Lessing. Aphorisms like 'A clear idea is another name for a little idea' mark the transition from the lucidity admired by *Pope to the sublimity of writers like T. *Gray. Ed. J. T. Boulton (1958). See vol. i: Early Writings (1997) of The Writings and Speeches of Edmund Burke.

SUCKLING, Sir John (1609–42), of an old Norfolk family, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He inherited large estates, travelled on the Continent, and was knighted on his return in 1630. In 1631 he was in Germany, as a member of Sir Henry Vane’s embassy to Gustavus Adolphus. He returned to London in 1632 and lived at court in great splendour. He became a leader of the Royalist party in the early troubles, then fled to France and is said by *Aubrey to have committed suicide in Paris. His chief works are included in Fragmenta Aurea (1646) and consist of poems, plays, letters, and tracts, among them the famous ‘Ballad upon a Wedding’. His ‘Sessions of the Poets’, in which various writers of the day, including *Jonson, *Carew, and *D’Avenant, contend for the laurel, was written in 1637, and is interesting as an expression of contemporary opinion on these writers. Suckling’s play Aglaura (with two fifth acts, one tragic, the other not) was lavishly staged and printed in 1638 at his own expense. The Goblins (1646), a romantic drama in which outlaws disguise themselves as devils, was said by *Dryden to illustrate Suckling’s professed admiration for Shakespeare, ‘his Reginella being an open imitation of Shakespeare’s Miranda; his spirits, though counterfeit, yet are copied from Ariel.’ Brennoralt (1646), an expansion of the Discontented Colonel (1640), a tragedy, is interesting for the light which the melancholy colonel throws on the author himself. The plays are, however, chiefly valuable for their lyrics, and Suckling has enjoyed a steady reputation as one of the most elegant and brilliant of the Cavalier poets. D’Avenant speaks of his sparkling wit, describing him further as the greatest gallant and gamester of his day. According to Aubrey, he invented the game of cribbage. A two-volume edition of his works, ed. T. Clayton and L. A. Beaurlne, appeared in 1971. (See also Falkland)

SUE, Eugène (1804–57), French novelist, a prolific writer of novels of the Parisian underworld. The best known include Les Mystères de Paris (1842–3) and Le Juif errant (1844–5): see WANDERING JEW.

SUETONIUS (Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus) (AD c.70–c.140), Roman biographer whose major surviving work, The Lives of the Caesars, was composed in part while he was in charge of the imperial archives. Suetonius, writing about the Julio-Claudian and Flavian emperors under a new dynasty, saw no reason to treat them as heroes. His aim was to bring out the moral character of his subjects, and for this purpose (and also because he was an inveterate gossip) he paid attention to their private habits as well as to their imperial policy. His method was adopted by later Roman biographers and may be said to have paved the way for the intimate biographies that began to appear in the second half of the 17th cent. But the flavour of his writing has been best caught by Robert *Graves in I, Claudius and Claudius the God.

Sullen, Squire and Mrs, characters in Farquhar’s The Beaux’ Stratagem.

SULLIVAN, Sir Arthur (1842–1900), English composer. Such is the popularity of the *Gilbert and Sullivan operas that it is often forgotten that Sullivan made a distinguished career as a composer in his own right, and was considered the leading musician in the period preceding *Parry and *Stanford.

Sullivan’s Op. 1, written when he was a 19-year-old student at Leipzig, was a group of 12 pieces of incidental music for *The Tempest: they seem never to have been used in the theatre, though their first performance in London made Sullivan famous and later, in Paris, he played them in a piano duet version with *Rossini, who apparently liked them very much. He subsequently wrote successful incidental music for other Shakespeare plays—The Merchant of Venice (1871), Henry VIII (1877), Macbeth (1888)—and there are a number of Shakespeare settings in the cantata Kenilworth (1865). His Five Shakespeare Songs (1866) include the famous setting of ‘Orpheus with his lute’, and were among the earliest of an enormous number of songs and ballads written for the Victorian drawing room, and he also collaborated with Tennyson on a song cycle, The Window, or The Songs of the Wrens (1871).

The bigger choral works tend to be on sacred subjects, though The Golden Legend, which Sullivan himself regarded as his masterpiece, is based on Longfellow. His one attempt at serious opera, Ivanhoe (after Sir W. *Scott, 1891), opened with much publicity but did not last, and certainly could not compare with the brilliance of the comic operas, for which (and perhaps, less happily, for the hymn tune ‘Onward, Christian soldiers’) he is remembered today.

‘Sumer is icumen in,’ one of the earliest known English lyrics, found in BL MS Harley 978, a miscellany of Reading Abbey from the first half of the 13th cent. The music, and Latin instructions for singing it, are also in the manuscript.

SUMMERS, Montague (1880–1948), vampiroligist and man of letters. He was born in Clifton, Bristol, and attended Clifton College and Trinity College, Oxford. An admirer of *Wilde and *Symons, he was unsuccessful both as a ‘Decadent’ poet and as an Anglican priest, and so turned to schoolteaching.
Roman Catholicism, collecting rare books, and exploring the less reputable byways of literature and superstition. An energetic champion of the Restoration dramatists, he edited the works of *Behn, *Congreve, *Wycherley, *Otway, *Shadwell, and *Dryden, but was condemned by better scholars for inaccuracy and plagiarism. Another literary hobby was *Gothic fiction: his projected history of this tradition began with the prolix *The Gothic Quest (1938), but was never completed. His reputation as an authority on occult practices and legends rests upon his *History of Witchcraft and Demonology (1926), *The Geography of Witchcraft (1927), *The Vampire (1928), and *The Werewolf (1933). He also edited a number of ghost story anthologies.

Summers Last Will and Testament, a play by T. *Nashe, published 1600, but written in the autumn of 1592 or 1593. It is framed by the jocular comments of Will Summers, *Henry VIII’s jester (who died c.1560), and is an allegorical pageant in which Summer, personified as a dying old man, decides to whom to leave his riches. The play reflects fear of the plague, of treachery and betrayal. The best part is the opening description of the home of Dr Gideon Gray, where the orphaned Richard Middlemas is reared with the surgeon’s daughter, Menie, whom he later lures out to India to be sold as a concubine to Tippoo Sahib. Menie is rescued but dies single; Richard is killed on the order of Hyder Ali by being trampled to death by an elephant.

‘Surprised by Joy—Impatient as the Wind’, a sonnet by *Wordsworth, first published in 1815, suggested by the death of his daughter Catherine in 1812, but written, by his own account, ‘long after’.

Surrealism, a movement founded in Paris in 1924 with the publication of A. *Breton’s first Surrealist Manifesto. It was conceived as a revolutionary mode of thought and action, concerned with politics, philosophy, and psychology as well as literature and art. The Manifesto attacked rationalism and narrow logical systems; drawing on *Freud’s theories concerning the unconscious and its relation to dreams, it called for the exploration of hidden and neglected areas of the human psyche, not necessarily from the standpoint of psychoanalysis, and the resolution ‘of the apparently contradictory states of dream and reality’. The group of writers and painters that gathered round Breton experimented with automatic processes, which were considered the best means of producing the surreal poetic image: the spontaneous coupling of unrelated objects. An extended conception of poetry, which was to be part of, not separate from, life, was central to Surrealism. A great variety of poetry was published by, for example, Breton, *Aragon, *Éluard, Robert Desnos, Benjamin Péret, René Crevel; but much surrealist writing falls outside conventional literary categories, e.g. Aragon’s *Paris Peasant (1926) or Breton’s *Communicating Vessels (1932). Breton’s *Nadja (1928), for instance, both records an intense personal relationship and challenges socially determined definitions of sanity and insanity. Surrealist artists in the 1920s sought equivalents to automatic writing, e.g. André Masson’s free ink drawings, Max Ernst’s *frottages, or Joan Miró’s field painting. In 1929 *Dali joined the movement, introducing a more illusionistic ‘dream’ imagery heavily indebted to Freud. In the 1930s writers and artists alike collected or fabricated surrealist objects (often relying on chance), and Breton mixed words and images in his poem-objects. Several surrealists joined the Communist Party and theoretical texts, including Breton’s *Surrealist Manifesto of 1930, try to reconcile Freud and *Marx.

Surrealism was a major intellectual force between the wars, although as it spread internationally in the 1930s interest tended to concentrate on surrealist art.
In England the movement attracted some attention among literary circles, but it was only after the International Surrealist Exhibition of 1936 that a surrealist group was established, its members including D. *Gascoyne, H. *Read, Roland Penrose (1900–84), the documentary film-maker Humphrey Jennings (1907–50), and Hugh Sykes Davies (1909–84).

SURREY, Henry Howard, (by courtesy) earl of (?1517–47), poet, the son of Thomas Howard (afterwards third duke of Norfolk). He married Frances Vere in 1532. He was with the army during the war with France (1544–6), being wounded before Montreuil, and was commander of Boulogne, 1545–6. He was accused of various minor offences, but tried and executed on the charge of treasonably quartering the royal arms. His works consist of sonnets and poems in various metres notable for their elegance of construction. Like *Wyatt he studied Italian models, especially *Petrarch, but his sonnets were predominantly in the 'English' form (ababcdcdefefgg), later to be used by Shakespeare, which appears to have been his invention. (See sonnet.) A still more durable innovation was his use of blank verse in his translation of the *Aeneid, Bks 2 and 4. Forty of his poems were printed by *Tottel in his Miscellany (1557). *Nashe and *Drayton built up a picture of Surrey as the languishing lover of 'Geraldine' (Elizabeth, daughter of the ninth earl of Kildare); but he seems to have done no more than address a single sonnet to this lady, possibly when she was as young as 9.

Surrey’s poems were edited together with those of Wyatt by G. F. Nott, 1815–16; and, in selection, by Emrys Jones in 1964.

SURRETSES, Robert (1779–1834), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, an antiquary and topographer. He spent his life in collecting materials for his History of Durham (1816–40). He is commemorated in the Surtees Society, which publishes original materials relating to the history of the region constituting the old kingdom of Northumbria. Sir W. Scott included in his *Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border a spurious and spirited ballad by him, 'The Death of Featherston-haugh'. 'Barthram's Dirge' in the same collection is suspected of being also by Surtees (J. H. Burton, The Book-Hunter, 1862).

SURRETSES, Robert Smith (1805–64), born in Durham, the son of a country squire. After attending Durham Grammar School he became articled to a solicitor and practised as a lawyer. From 1830 he built up a reputation as a sporting journalist, contributing to the Sporting Magazine, and in 1831 founded, with R. Ackermann the younger, and edited the New Sporting Magazine to which he contributed his comic sketches of Mr Jorrocks, the sporting cockney grocer, later collected as Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities (1838, illustrated by 'Phiz', H. K. *Browne, and later by H. T. Alken). Jorrocks, whose adventures to some extent suggested the original idea of *Pickwick Papers, re-appears in Handlev Cross (1843; expanded and illustrated by *Leech, 1854), one of Surtees’s most successful novels, and in the less popular Hillingdon Hall (1845). His second great character, Mr Soapey Sponge, appears in Mr Sponge's Sporting Tour (1853, illustrated by Leech), which is probably his best work; another celebrated character was Mr Facey Romford, who appears in his last novel, Mr Facey Romford's Hounds (1865). Surtees had abandoned his legal practice in 1835, resigned his editorship in 1836, inherited his father's Hamsterley estate in 1838, and thereafter devoted his time to his favourite pursuits of hunting and shooting (he became high sheriff of Durham in 1856) while continuing his literary work. His eight long novels deal mainly with the characteristic aspects of English fox-hunting society, but his vivid caricatures, the absurd scenes he describes, the convincing dialect and often repeated catchphrases, and perceptive social observation distinguish him from other writers of this genre and won him praise from *Thackeray and others; the illustration of his novels by Leech, Alken, and Phiz also contributed to their success. Young Tom Hall, originally serialized in the New Monthly Magazine in 1853, remained unfinished and was first published in book form in 1926.

Surly of London, A, see Stow.

Suspicious Husband, The, a comedy by Dr B. *Hoadly and his brother John 'Chancellor' Hoadly, produced 1747 at Covent Garden, *Garrick taking the part of Ranger.

Strictland, the suspicious husband of a young wife, is guardian of the wealthy Jacintha. She and Bellamy are in love, but Strictland will not hear of the match. So Jacintha, a young lady of spirit, decides to run away with her lover, who provides a rope ladder for the purpose. Clarinda, a sprightly young friend of Mrs Strictland, is staying in her house. Frankly, a friend of Bellamy, who has fallen in love with her at Bath, pursues her to London. Frankly and Bellamy meet outside the house at night, just when Jacintha is about to escape and when Clarinda, after a late whist party, is coming home. A general imbroglio ensues. Bellamy suspects Frankly of an intrigue with Jacintha; Strictland, discovering the latter’s attempted flight, goes off in pursuit. Meanwhile Ranger, an adventurous rake and friend of Bellamy and Frankly, happening to pass the room where it is discovered by her husband, who is now convinced that his suspicions were well founded and sentences his wife to banishment to the country. Meanwhile Ranger, who has taken refuge in another room, discovers Jacintha, and enables her to escape, this time successfully. On the morrow there is a general confrontation and explanation, and all ends happily.

Svevo, Italo (Ettore Schmitz) (1861–1928), Italian novelist, who also wrote plays, short stories, and criticism, born in Trieste from a Jewish Italo-German background (indicated by his pen-name). His novels are: Una vita (A Life, 1893), Senilità (a title translated by *Joyce as As a Man Grows Older, 1898), La coscienza del Zeno (Confessions of Zeno, 1923), La novella del buon vecchio e della bella fanciulla (The Tale of the Good Old Man and of the Lovely Young Girl, 1929). He was working on a fifth novel, Il vecchione (The Grand Old Man, 1967), when he died in a car crash. Svevo’s work was unknown until Joyce met him in Trieste and helped him to publish his masterpiece, Confessions of Zeno. Svevo’s style stood out against prevailing trends based on *d’Annunzio and *Fogazzaro. Zeno is a complex and delicately balanced novel in which time and point of view are relative. Arguing with his psychoanalyst, Zeno struggles with chance, time, marriage, and tobacco, disclosing the source of his malady as the Oedipus complex.

Swan Theatre, built by Frances Langley on the Bankside in London in 1595, and closed down temporarily in 1597, following a performance by Lord Pembroke’s Company of *Nashe’s controversial play The Isle of Dogs. The Lady Elizabeth’s Company is believed to have performed *A Chaste Mayd in Cheapside there around 1613. Johannes de Witt’s sketch (c.1596) of the theatre is believed to be the only surviving representation of the interior of an Elizabethan playhouse. The name was adopted by the Royal Shakespeare Company for its galleryed playhouse, which opened in Stratford in 1986.

Swedenborg, Emanuel (1688–1772), born Sweden, Swedish philosopher, scientist, and mystic, the son of a professor of theology at Uppsala. He studied at Uppsala, and travelled extensively in England, where he was influenced by Henry More, J. *Locke, and I. *Newton. He was appointed to a post on the Swedish board of mines in 1716, and in his capacity as scientist and engineer anticipated many subsequent hypotheses and inventions. He was gradually led to seek a comprehensive scientific explanation of the universe, attempting to demonstrate that it had, essentially, a spiritual structure, and in his later years he began to experience visions and to converse with angels, not only in his dreams, but, he claimed, in his waking life. According to his theosophic system, God, as Divine Man, is infinite love and infinite wisdom, from whom emanate the two worlds of nature and spirit, distinct but closely related. God is not a ‘windy or ethereal spirit’, but ‘very Man. In all the Heavens, there is no other idea of God, than that of a Man’ (Divine Love and Wisdom, 1763). The end of creation is the approximation of Man to God; this end having been endangered by evil spirits, Jehovah descended into nature, restored the connection between God and Man, and left the Scriptures as his testimony, with Swedenborg as his appointed interpreter. Swedenborg died in London, and his followers there organized themselves into the New Church, of which *Blake was for a while an active member. Blake was deeply influenced by Swedenborg’s writings, which began to appear in English from 1750, a printing society being founded in Manchester in 1782 to propagate his works; Blake’s pencilled annotations to Swedenborg’s Wisdom of Angels Concerning Divine Love and Divine Wisdom, written c.1789, survive. See J. G. Davies, The Theology of William Blake (1948) and K. *Raine, Blake and Tradition (2 vols, 1969). Swedenborg also had a considerable influence on other writers, including *Strindberg and the French *symbolists.

Sweeney, Matthew (1952– ), Irish poet, born in Co. Donegal. He moved to England in 1973, where he now lives. His six collections include A Dream of Maps (1981), A Round House (1983), The Lame Walitzer (1985), Blue Shoes (1989), and Cacti (1992). Early influences from *Kafka and *Simic are detectable in the development of Sweeney’s strange, often sinister, territory. His storytelling gifts, however, are firmly rooted in the Irish tradition, and the narrative voice, at once disquieting and seductive, is highly original. The Bridal Suite (1997) is laced with an obsession with mortality, to which his work almost inevitably returns.

Sweet, Henry (1845–1912), a great phonetician and (after A. J. Ellis) one of the founders of that study in England, educated at Heidelberg University and Balliol College, Oxford, where he got a fourth class in Lit. Hum. (1873). He lived in Oxford from 1895 until his death, but he never fully received the recognition there that his eminence warranted; the readership in phonetics he was accorded in 1901 was a poor compensation for his failure to gain a number of chairs, especially the chair of comparative philology on the death of *Max Müller in 1901. He is said to be the inspiration for Shaw’s Henry Higgins in *Pygmalion, though Higgins’s hypersensitivity about judgements on him is lighter than the original’s. His works are still a staple of the study of Old English and the philology of English; the most celebrated are History of English Sounds (1874, 1888); Anglo-Saxon Reader (1876); Anglo-Saxon Primer (1882); A New English Grammar (1892, 1898); The History of Language (1900); and The Sounds of English: An Introduction to Phonetics (1908).
SWIFT, Graham (1949– ), English novelist, born in London. He studied at Queens’ College, Cambridge, and worked as a part-time teacher in and around London for much of the 1970s. There is a didactic strain in many of Swift’s novels, and their themes frequently pertain to history and its bearing upon the present lives of his troubled and questioning characters. His first novel, The Sweet Shop Owner (1980), was a low-key and melancholy portrait of an emotionally unfulfilled shopkeeper in the last few hours of his life. It was followed by Shuttlecock (1981), which features an archetypal Swift protagonist: a police archivist whose work leads him to dig up wartime secrets which cast doubt on the integrity of his father and also, by extension, himself. Learning to Swim (1982) was a versatile collection of short stories. With Waterland (1984), Swift produced what many consider to be his finest book: a dense, multi-layered narrative which is at once a history of domestic upheaval and of the English fen country. The novel attempted to integrate a meditation on the nature of history (its hero is a schoolteacher specializing in that subject) with touches of the whodunnit, but it was Swift’s vivid and precise sense of landscape that drew comparisons with Thomas Hardy. His next two novels allowed their main characters similar scope for excavating the past: Harry Beech in The Sweet Shop Owner from his embittered daughter, while Bill Unwin in Ever after (1992) is a university professor burying himself in ancestral research while recovering from a suicide attempt. Death also hangs over Last Orders (1996), which tells the story of four south Londoners who make a pilgrimage to the coast to scatter the ashes of a lifelong friend. The working-class demotic in which the novel is narrated is a highly literary construct, just like the Glaswegian dialect of James Kelman, but this takes nothing away from the book’s compassion or bruising emotional force. It was a popular winner of the 1996 Booker Prize.

SWIFT, Jonathan (1667–1745), born in Dublin after his father’s death. He was son of Jonathan Swift by Abigail (Erick) of Leicester, and grandson of Thomas Swift, the well-known Royalist vicar of Goodrich, descended from a Yorkshire family. He was a cousin of Dryden. He was educated with Congreve, at Kilkeny Grammar School, then at Trinity College, Dublin, where he was censured for offences against discipline, obtaining his degree only by ‘special grace’. He was admitted to the household of Sir W. Temple, and there acted as secretary. He was sent by Temple to William III to convince him of the necessity of triennial parliaments, but his mission was not successful. He wrote Pindaric odes, one of which, printed in the Athenian Mercury (1692), provoked, according to Dr Johnson, Dryden’s remark, ‘Cousin Swift, you will never be a poet.’ Chafing at his position of dependence, and indignant at Temple’s delay in getting him preferment, he returned to Ireland, was ordained (1694), and received the small prebend of Killroot. He returned to Temple at Moor Park in 1696, where he edited Temple’s correspondence, and in 1697 wrote The Battle of the Books, which was published in 1704 together with A Tale of a Tub, his celebrated satire on ‘corruptions in religion and learning’. At Moor Park he first met Esther Johnson (‘Stella’), the daughter of a servant or companion of Temple’s sister. On the death of Temple in 1699, Swift went again to Ireland, where he was given a prebend in St Patrick’s, Dublin, and the living of Laracor. He wrote his Discourse of the Contests and Dissensions between the Nobles and the Commons in Athens and Rome, with reference to the impeachment of the Whig lords, in 1701. In the course of numerous visits to London he became acquainted with Addison, Steele, Congreve, and Halifax. He was entrusted in 1707 with a mission to obtain the grant of Queen Anne’s Bounty for Ireland, and in 1708 began a series of pamphlets on church questions with his ironical Argument against Abolishing Christianity, followed in the same year by his Letter Concerning the Sacramental Test, an attack on the Irish Presbyterians which injured him with the Whigs. Amid these serious occupations, he diverted himself with the series of squibs upon the astrologer John Partridge (1708–9, see Bickerstaff), which have become famous, and his ‘Description of a City Shower’ and ‘Description of the Morning’, poems depicting scenes of London life, which were published in the Tatler (1709). Disgusted at the Whig alliance with Dissent, he went over to the Tories in 1710, joined the Brothers’ Club, attacked the Whig ministers in the Examiner, which he edited, and in 1711 wrote The Conduct of the Allies and Some Remarks on the Barrier Treaty, pamphlets written to dispose the mind of the nation to peace. He became dean of St Patrick’s in 1713. He had already begun his Journal to Stella, a series of intimate letters (1710–13) to Esther Johnson and her companion Rebecca Dingley, who had moved to Ireland in 1700; it is written partly in baby language, and gives a vivid account of Swift’s daily life in London where he was in close touch with Tory ministers. Swift’s relations with Stella remain obscure; they were intimate and affectionate, and some form of marriage may have taken place. Another woman, Esther Vanhomrigh (pron. ‘Vanummery’), entered his life in 1708; his poem Cadmus and Vanessa suggests that she fell deeply in love with him (‘She wished her Tutor were her Lover’) and that he gave her some encouragement. She is said to have died of shock in 1723 after his final rupture with her, inspired by her jealousy of Stella. Stella died in 1728.

Swift wrote various political pamphlets, notably The Importance of the Guardian Considered (1713) and The Public Spirit of the Whigs (1714), in reply to Steele’s Crisis; and about the time of the queen’s death in 1714 and the fall of the Tory ministry, several papers (published much later) in defence of the latter. In the same year he joined Pope, Arbuthnot, Gay, and others in the celebrated *Scriblerus Club. He returned to Ireland in Aug. 1714 and occupied himself with Irish affairs, being led by his resentment of the policy of the Whigs to acquire a sense of their unfair treatment of Ireland. By his famous *Drapier's Letters (1724) he prevented the introduction of 'Wood's Half-pence' into Ireland. He came to England in 1726, visited Pope and Gay, and dined with Sir R. *Walpole, to whom he addressed a letter of remonstrance on Irish affairs with no result. He published *Gulliver's Travels in the same year, and paid a last visit to England in 1727, when the death of George I created for a moment hopes of dislodging Walpole. He wrote some of his most famous tracts and characteristic poems during his last years in Ireland, *The Grand Question Debated (1729); Verses on the Death of Dr Swift (1731, pub. 1739), in which mingled pathos and humour he reviews his life and work; *A Complete Collection of Politic and Ingenious *Conversation (1738); and the ironical Directions to Servants (written about 1731 and published after his death). He kept up his correspondence with *Bolingbroke, Pope, Gay, and Arbuthnot, attracted to himself a small circle of friends, and was adored by the people. He spent a third of his income on charities, and saved another third to found St Patrick's Hospital for Imbeciles (opened 1757). The symptoms of the illness from which he suffered for most of his life (now thought to have been Ménière's disease) became very marked in his last years, and his faculties decayed to such a degree that many considered him insane, though modern biographical opinion rejects this view. He was buried by the side of Stella, in St Patrick's, Dublin, his own famous epitaph 'ubi saeva indignatio ulcerius cor lacerae nequit' (where fierce indignation cannot further tear apart the heart) being inscribed on his tomb. Nearly all his works were published anonymously, and for only one, *Gulliver's Travels, did he receive any payment (£200). Dr Johnson, *Macaulay, and *Thackeray, among many other writers, were alienated by his ferocity and coarseness, and his works tended to be undervalued in the late 18th–19th cents. The 20th cent, has seen a revival of biographical and critical interest, stressing whether the incurable disease were knavery, folly, lying, or, infidelity (1733); On Poetry, a Rhapsody (1733), satirical advice to a poet; *A Beautiful Young Nymph Going to Bed; and *Strephon and *Chloe (1734).

The Prose Works have been edited by Herbert Davis (16 vols, 1939–74); *Journal to Stella by H. Williams (2 vols, 1948); Poems by H. Williams (1937); Correspondence by H. Williams (5 vols, 1963–5); Complete Poems ed. P. Rogers (Penguin, 1983), with an important commentary. See also Irvin Ehrenpreis, *Swift: The Man, His Works and the Age (3 vols, 1962–83) and a useful short study by R. Quintana, *Swift: An Introduction (1955).

SWINBURNE, Algernon Charles (1837–1909), of an old Northumbrian family. He spent much of his childhood in the Isle of Wight, where he acquired a lasting love of the sea, reflected in much of his work. He was educated at Eton, where he developed an equally lasting interest in flagellation, and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he was associated with *Rossetti and the *Pre-Raphaelite circle. His first published volume, *The Queen-Mother: Rosamund (1860), shows the influence of Elizabethan dramatists, notably of *Chapman, and attracted little attention, but *Atalanta in Calydon (1865), a drama in classical Greek form, with choruses (e.g. 'When the hounds of spring are on winter’s traces’) that revealed his great metrical skills, brought him celebrity; *Tennyson wrote praising his ‘wonderful rhythmic invention’. Chastelard, the first of three dramas on the subject of *Mary Queen of Scots, which appeared the same year, raised some doubts about the morality of Swinburne’s verse, doubts reinforced by the first series of Poems and Ballads (1866), which brought down a torrent of abuse from R. *Buchanan, J. Morley, and others. The volume contains many of his best as well as his most notorious poems (’Dolores’, ‘Itylus’, ‘Hymn to Proserpine’, ‘The Triumph of Time’, ‘Faustine’, ‘Laus Veneris’, etc.) which clearly demonstrate the preoccupation with de *Sade, masochism, and femmes fatales which he shared with a circle of friends which by now included M. *Milnes and Richard *Burton: also his outspoken repudiation of Christianity, which was to impress *Hardy and his heroine Sue Bridehead (in *Jude the Obscure). A Song of Italy (1867) and Songs before Sunrise (1871) express his support for Mazzini in the struggle for Italian independence, and a hatred of authority which owes much to *Blake. Bothwell (1874) and a second Greek drama, Erechtheus (1876), were followed by the more subdued Poems and Ballads: Second Series (1878), which contains ‘A Forsaken Garden’. By this time Swinburne’s health, always delicate and subject to fits of intense nervous excitement, was seriously undermined by heavy drinking and other excesses. In 1879 he moved to Putney with his friend *Watts-Dunton, who gradually weaned him from drink and restored his health. He published many more volumes, including Mary Stuart (1881), *Tristram of Lyonesse and Other Poems (1882), *Marino Faliero (1885, a tragedy on the same subject as Byron’s of the same title), and Poems and Ballads: Third Series (1889), but they lack the force of his earlier work, and often fall into a kind of self-parody which he himself referred to as ‘a tendency to the dulcet and luscious form of verbosity which has to be guarded against’.

Swinburne commanded an impressive variety of verse forms, writing in classical metres, composing burlesques, modern and mock-antique ballads, roundels, etc.; he also translated the ballads of *Villon. His published prose works include two novels, A Year’s Letters (serialized pseudonymously 1877, repub. 1905 as Love’s Cross Currents) and Lesbia Brandon (ed. R. Hughes, 1952). His influence on fellow aesthetes like *Pater and a later generation of poets was considerable, and was deplored by T. S. *Eliot and *Leavis. Swinburne himself was a critic of perception and originality; his studies of Chapman (1875), *Marlowe (1883, *Encyclopaedia Britannica), *Middleton (1887), *Tourney (1889, EB), and others were the first important successors to *Lamb in the revival of interest in Elizabethan and Jacobean drama, and those of Blake (1868) and the *Brontës (1877, 1883, etc.) in many ways laid the foundation of modern appreciation.

His letters were edited in six volumes, 1959–62, by C. Y. Lang, and the most recent of several biographies is by P. Henderson (1974). Many of his writings remain unpublished, presumably unpublishable.

SWINNERTON, Frank (1884–1982), critic and prolific novelist. He left school at 14 and worked as office boy, proof-reader, then editor at Chatto and Windus. His novels, often set in contemporary London, include Nocturne (1917, his greatest success) and Harvest Comedy (1937). He was literary critic of Truth and Nation, the evening News, and the *Observer and a familiar figure in the literary life of the first half of the 20th cent., Arnold *Bennett and *Galsworthy being among his friends. His knowledge of the period provided material for his literary reminiscences, notably The Georgian Literary Scene (1935), and two autobiographical works, Swinnerton: An Autobiography (1937) and Reflections from a Village (1969). Arnold Bennett: A Last Word (1978) appeared in his 94th year. He was president of the *Royal Literary Fund (1962–6).

Swiss Family Robinson, The, the romance of a family wrecked on a desert island, written in German by Johann David Wyss (1743–1818), a Swiss pastor. It was published in two parts in Zurich in 1812–13 and the first English translation was a year later.

sword-dance, a medieval folk custom, of ritual origin, probably symbolizing the death and resurrection of the year. The stock characters were the fool, dressed in the skin of an animal, and the ‘Bessy’, a man dressed in woman’s clothes. In many of the extant dances one of the characters is surrounded with the swords of the other dancers or slain. The characters were introduced in rhymed speeches. The sword-dance is one of the origins of the *mummers’ play and so of English drama. See also Revesby Play.

Sword of Honour, a trilogy by W. *Waugh, published under this title in 1965.

Men at Arms (1952) introduces 35-year-old divorced Catholic Guy Crouchback, who after much effort succeeds in enlisting in the Royal Corps of Halberdiers just after the outbreak of the Second World War. Much of the plot revolves around his eccentric fellow officer Apthorpe, an old Africa hand who suffers repeatedly from ‘Bechuana tummy’, is deeply devoted to his ‘thunder box’ (or chemical closet), and dies in West Africa at the end of the novel of some unspecified tropical disease, aggravated by Guy’s thoughtful gift of a bottle of whisky. Other characters include Guy’s ex-wife, the beautiful socialite Virginia Troy, her second (but not her final) husband Tommy Blackhouse, and the ferocious one-eyed Brigadier Ritchie-Hook, who involves Guy in a near-disastrous escapade.

Officers and Gentlemen (1955) continues Waugh’s semi-satiric, semi-emotional portrayal of civilian and military life with an account of Guy's training on the Hebridean island of Mugg with a commando unit, and of the exploits of ex-hairdresser Trimmer, now Captain McTavish, which include an affair with Virginia and the blowing up of a French railroad; the action moves to Alexandria, then to the withdrawal from Crete, with all but four of 'Hookforce' taken prisoner.

Unconditional Surrender (1961) opens with a frustrated and disillusioned Captain Guy Crouchback in London, working at Hazardous Offensive Operations Headquarters: he then injures himself learning to parachute, and on his sickbed is wooed by Virginia, now pregnant by Trimmer, and conscious that Guy has inherited his father's fortune. He remarries her out of a sense of chivalry and compassion, is transferred to the chaos and conflicts of Yugoslavia as a liaison officer with the Partisans, and there learns that Virginia has given birth to a son, then that she has been killed in an air raid. The baby survives, and an epilogue informs us that Guy marries again, and has more children of his own. Waugh revised this ending for the 1965 recension of the three works, and decided that Guy and his new wife Domenica should be childless.

Sybil, or The Two Nations, a novel by B. *Disraeli, published 1845.

This is the second book of the trilogy *Coningsby—Sybil—*Tancred. It was written, like Coningsby, to celebrate the ideas of the 'Young England' Tories and was designed to describe 'the Condition of the People' and of the 'Two Nations of England, the Rich and the Poor'. An ambitious, crowded book, it points to reforms that were designed to describe 'the true condition of the People'. A generation before Disraeli's government was able to introduce them. Poverty and oppression are described with feeling, and the radical Chartist spirit is sympathetically shown in Gerard, Morley, and others; aspects of the wealthy social and political world, particularly as seen in Mowbray Castle, are described with irony and contempt.

After a long historical introduction, setting the background in the prime ministership of *Wellington, the story of the Marneys begins. Charles Egremont, the younger brother of the pitiless landowner Lord Marney, master of splendid Marney Abbey, meets in the starlit ruins of the old abbey the beautiful young novice Sybil. She is the daughter of the Chartist Walter Gerard (who becomes Egremont's friend) and is beloved by Stephen Morley, a radical and atheist; all three live in the opressed industrial town of Mowbray some miles away. Egremont falls in love with Sybil, and when she refuses him because of his rank, begins to live a life painfylly divided between the poverty-stricken town of Mowbray, the glittering life of his brother's abbey, and his parliamentary life in London. His brother's plan to marry him into the Fitzwarene family, which owns Mowbray Castle and most of Mowbray, is indignantly resisted, as he sets himself to discover the true condition of the poor in Mowbray and to understand the feelings of the Chartists and incendiaries. Events of the present are seen in a long historical perspective. The plight of the poor, whose land has been taken by the rich, is compared with that of the Saxons despoiled by the Normans, and Sybil's ancestry provides her with rights to the lands of Marney which had been confiscated from her family at the Reformation. Much of the narrative is concerned with the development of the Chartist rising, Gerard's imprisonment, the activities of Morley, the radical parson St Lys, the good employer Trafford, and many others less principled; and with Egremont's struggle in the House of Commons to secure reforms and his failure to win Sybil. Five years pass of increasing poverty and unrest. The riots in which they culminate are of great violence; Sybil and St Lys, in Mowbray Castle, fail to persuade the mob to disperse, while Morley searches for the Marney deeds which are rightfully Sybil's. The yeomanry arrive, Gerard is killed, Lord Marney stoned to death by rioters, Morley shot, and the castle burned down. Egremont rescues Sybil and the true heir marries the new earl of Marney.

Sycorax, in Shakespeare's *The Tempest, the mother of Caliban; she does not appear in the play.

Sylepsis, a figure of speech by which a word, or a particular form or inflection of a word, is made to refer to two or more words in the same sentence, while properly applying to them in different senses: e.g. 'Miss Bolo...went home in a flood of tears and a sedan chair' (Dickens, *Pickwick Papers, ch. 35). Cf. *zeugma.

SYLVESTER, Josuah (c.1563–1618), a London merchant, whose translation into rhyming couplets of The Divine Weeks and Works of *Du Bartas was, according to John Davies of Hereford, 'admir'd of all'. The first instalment appeared in 1592, more in 1598, further parts in 1605-7, and a complete translation in 1608, which was reprinted for the fifth time in 1641. The edition of 1621 contained many of Sylvester's other works, including his poems in the important collection Lachrymae Lachrymarum (1613). This contained elegies by Joseph *Hall and *Donne, among others, on Prince Henry, to whom Sylvester had attached himself. His translation of Du Bartas has been edited by Susan Snyder (2 vols, 1973).

SYLVA'S LOVERS, a novel by Mrs *Gaskell, published 1863.

The scene is the whaling port of Monkshaven (based on Whitby in Yorkshire) during the Napoleonic wars, and the plot hinges on the activities of the press-gangs whose seizure of Monkshaven men to man naval warships provokes bitter resentment. Sylvia's father, the farmer Daniel Robson, leads a mob attack on the press-gang's headquarters, and he is tried and hanged for this. Her lover, the 'speckioneer' (harpooner) Charley Kinraid, is carried off by the press-gang, but sends her a message promising constancy and return by Sylvia's cousin, the pedantic, hard-working shopkeeper Philip Hepburn, who has long loved Sylvia. Philip yields to the temptation of concealing the message, and Sylvia, believing Charley dead, and despairing of his being found, swears never to forgive him. He flees from Monkshaven and enlists, but eventually returns disfigured and beggared, and—recognized on his deathbed—dies in the arms of the now repentant Sylvia. The last few chapters of the book, full of heroic rescues, improbable encounters, and deathbed reunions, are notably inferior to the vivid reconstruction of life in the little town dominated by the whaling industry (which Mrs. Gaskell carefully researched) and at the farm where noisy, unreasonable Daniel Robson, his quiet, devoted wife, and their sturdy old servant Kester combine to cherish the much-loved and lovely but hapless Sylvia.

Symbolism, symbolists (Symbolisme, les symbolistes), a group of French writers of the 19th cent. The term is widely applied, but in its most useful and restricted sense refers to the period c.1880–95. The movement may be seen as a reaction against dominant *realist and *naturalist tendencies in literature generally and, in the case of poetry, against the descriptive precision and ‘objectivity’ of the *Parnassians. The symbolists stressed the priority of suggestion and evocation over direct description and explicit analogy (cf. *Mallarmé’s dictum, ‘Peindre, non la chose, mais l’effet qu’elle produit’), and to the symbol was ascribed a preeminent function in the effort to distil a private mood or to evoke the subtle affinities which were held to exist between the material and spiritual worlds. Symbolist writers were particularly concerned to explore the musical properties of language, through the interplay of connotative sound relationships, but were deeply interested in all the arts and much influenced by the synthesizing ideals of *Wagner’s music dramas. Other influences on the movement were the mystical writings of *Swedenborg, and the poetry of *Nerval, *Baudelaire (see the sonnet ‘Correspondances’), and *Poe.

Generally associated with the symbolist movement are: the poets Mallarmé, *Verlaine, *Rimbaud, and *Laforgue; the dramatists *Villiers de l’Isle-Adam (Axel, 1890) and *Maeterlinck, whose Pelléas et Mélisande (1892) was the source of Debussy’s opera of that name; and the novelists *Huysmans (A rebours, 1884) and Édouard Dujardin, whose Les Lauriers sont coupés (1888) influenced *Joyce. The movement exercised an influence on painting (Odilon Redon, Gustave Moreau) and on a wide range of 20th-cent. writers, including *Pound, T. S. *Eliot, W. *Stevens, *Yeats, *Joyce, V. *Woolf, *Claudel, *Valéry, Stefan George, and *Rilke. It was the subject of A. W. *Symons’s The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) and played a part in the development of the Russian symbolist movement and of the modernista movement in Latin America.

Symkyn, or Symond, the miller of Trumpington in *Chaucer’s The Reeve’s Tale (see Canterbury Tales, 3).

SYMONDS, John Addington (1840–93), born in Bristol, the son of an eminent physician, educated at Harrow and Balliol College, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate Prize, and became a fellow of Magdalen. He suffered from tuberculosis, and spent much of his life in Italy and Switzerland. He was much attracted by the Hellenism of the Renaissance, and both his prose and poetry are coloured by his concept of *platonic love and his admiration for male beauty. His largest work, Renaissance in Italy (1875–86), is more picturesque than scholarly, and at times overburdened with detail and anecdote, but remains a valuable source of information. His works include volumes on *Jonson, *Sidney, *Shelley, *Whitman, and *Michelangelo; collections of travel sketches and impressions; several volumes of verse (including Many Moods, 1878; New and Old, 1880); a translation of the autobiography of *Cellini (1888); and translations of Greek and Italian poetry. He had a wide circle of literary friends (among them *Lear, *Swinburne, L. *Stephen, and R. L. *Stevenson), and his aesthetic prose had its admirers, but his life was marked by physical and mental stress. He married in 1864, but acknowledged increasingly his own homosexuality, and campaigned, albeit discreetly, for legal reform and more outspoken recognition of inversion, which he saw as a congenital condition. His privately printed pamphlets A Problem in Greek Ethics (1883) and A Problem in Modern Ethics (1891) were reproduced in part by H. *Ellis in Sexual Inversion (1897), a work originally planned as a collaboration. See Phyllis Grosskurth, John Addington Symonds (1964).

SYMONS, Alphonse J(ames) A(lbert) (1900–41), bibliographer, bibliophile, dandy, and epicure, who became an authority on the literature of the 1890s and published An Anthology of Nineties’ Verse in 1928. He wrote several biographies, but is best remembered for The *Quest for Corvo: An Experiment in Biography (1934), a life of F. W. *Rolfe. A. J. A. Symons: His Life and Speculations (1950), by his brother Julian *Symons, is a vivid evocation of his paradoxical personality, diverse interests, and social ambitions.

SYMONS, Arthur William (1865–1945), son of a West Country Methodist minister. He moved to London when a young man and quickly abandoned his narrow upbringing for city life. He became a friend of *Yeats, G. A. *Moore, and H. *Ellis, and attended the *Rhymers Club; his early volumes of poetry (Days and Nights, 1889; London Nights, 1895) were very much of their time in their celebration of decadence and the demimonde of stage, street, and *Café Royal. He was editor of the *Savoy, 1896, and published *Beardsley, *Conrad, *Dowson, L. P. *Johnson, etc. His The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) was an attempt to introduce French *Symbolism to England, and he wrote many other critical studies, of *Blake, *Baudelaire, *Pater, *Wilde, and others; but his fascination with the morbid and the extreme took its revenge when, in 1908–9, he suffered a complete nervous collapse, from which he largely recovered through the ministrations of his friends (including *Gosse and Augustus *John) and the help of the *Royal Literary Fund. He is largely remembered as a leading spirit in the Decadent movement, a defender of art for art’s sake, although his biographer Roger Lhombreaud (Arthur Symons: A Critical Biography, 1963) argues for a more modest but wider role.

Symposium, The, or ‘The Banquet’, the title of a dialogue in which *Plato describes a drinking party where *Socrates, *Aristophanes, and others propound their views of love and distinguish three forms of the emotion: the sensual, the altruistic, and the wisdom-oriented. Written soon after 371 BC, the dialogue appears to have had for its aim the rehabilitation of Socrates against the charge of corrupting the young, but its influence, once it had been translated into Latin by *Ficino (1482), had a far wider scope. It popularized the identification of love with a quest for the highest form of spiritual experience, and although the love discussed in Plato’s dialogue was primarily a homosexual one, the exalted claims made on its behalf were easily transferred to heterosexual relationships and came to be linked with the conventions of *courtly love. Another idea in the Symposium that gained wide currency was the fanciful notion advanced by Aristophanes in his speech that each human being is a male or female half of a whole which was originally hermaphrodite, and that every person necessarily seeks his or her lost half. The belief that every person has a single predestined mate was to become a romantic commonplace. (See also Platonic Love.

synecdoche (pron. sinekdki), a figure of speech by which a more comprehensive term is used for a less comprehensive or vice versa, as whole for part or part for whole, e.g. ‘There were six guns out on the moor’ where ‘guns’ stands for shooters; and ‘Oxford won the match’, where ‘Oxford’ stands for ‘the Oxford eleven.’

synesthesia, or syneesthesia, a rhetorical figure in which one kind of sense impression is rendered by using words that normally describe another, as in *‘loud perfume’, ‘warm colour’, or ‘delicious sight’.

SYNGE, (Edmund) John Millington (1871–1909), Irish playwright, born near Dublin; his father was a barrister, and died when Synge was an infant. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and then spent some years in Paris, where he met W. B. *Yeats in 1896. Following a suggestion from Yeats, he went to the Aran Islands in order to write of Irish peasant life, and stayed there annually from 1898 to 1902; his description, The Aran Islands, was published in 1907. The first of his plays, In the Shadow of the Glen, was performed in 1903; it is a grim one-act peasant comedy, in which an elderly husband feigns death to test his wife’s fidelity. Riders to the Sea, an elegiac tragedy in which an elderly mother, Maurya, stoically anticipates ‘a great rest’ after the death of the last of her six sons, followed in 1904; both were published, as was The Well of the Saints, in 1905. His best-known play, and in its time the most controversial, *The Playboy of the Western World, was performed in 1907; the anticlerical The Tinker’s Wedding was published in 1908. All except the last were performed at the *Abbey Theatre, of which Synge became a director in 1906. His Poems and Translations (many of which foreshadow his imminent death) appeared in 1909. From 1897 Synge had suffered from Hodgkin’s disease, and he virtually completed his last play, Deirdre of the Sorrows, as he was dying; it was performed and published posthumously, in 1910. In this, as in his other work, Synge uses a spare, rhythmic, lyric prose to achieve effects of great power and resonance; both tragedies and comedies display the ironic wit and realism which many of his countrymen found offensive. Yeats commented in his preface to Poems and Translations, ‘He was but the more hated because he gave his country what it needed, an unmoved mind’, and described him in ‘In Memory of Major Gregory’ as one who had come ‘Towards nightfall upon certain set apart \(\ldots\) In a most desolate stony place, \(\ldots\) Towards nightfall upon a race \(\ldots\) Passionate and simple like his heart’. The authorized biography is J. M. Synge 1871–1909 (1959) by D. H. Greene and E. M. Stephens, and the Collected Works (4 vols, 1962–8) were edited by Robin Skelton; his Collected Letters, edited by Ann Saddlemeyer, appeared 1983–4.

Syntipas, the Greek form of the name Sindabar, Sandabar, or Sindibad, an Indian philosopher, said to have lived about 100 BC, the supposed author of a collection of tales generally known as The Seven Wise Masters. Their main outline is the same as that of The Seven Sages of Rome, though details of the several stories vary. ‘Syntipas’ was translated from Greek into Latin (under the title ‘Dolopathos’) in the 12th cent., and thence into French. The names Syntipas, Sindabar, etc., are probably corruptions of the original Sanskrit word from which Bidpai and Pilpay are derived.
SZYMBORSKA, Wisława (1923– ), Polish poet. After completing her studies at the University of Cracow, in 1953 she joined the staff of the literary journal Życie Literackie, where she was to work as poetry editor for almost 30 years. During this time she published six collections of poetry. People on a Bridge (1986) has been most widely translated: there is an English translation (1990) by Adam Czerniawski. She was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1996.

TACITUS, Cornelius (c. AD 55—after 115), the greatest historian of imperial Rome. His first work was a dialogue that discussed the shortcomings of contemporary oratory. He followed this by a biography of his father-in-law Julius Agricola (c.98) and by an ethnographical account of the German tribes. The former provides a useful description of Roman Britain, the latter contains one of the earliest representations of the Noble Savage (see PRIMITIVISM). His fame rests on his Annals and his Histories which related events from the death of Augustus to the Flavian period. Tacitus’ avowed aim was to keep alive the memory of virtuous and vicious actions so that posterity could judge them, and his great achievement was to have drawn a picture of how men must live under tyranny. Little known in the Middle Ages, Tacitus was rediscovered by *Boc­caccio in the 14th cent. The *Agricola and the Histories were translated into English by Sir H. *Savile (1591), the Germania and Annals by R. Grenewey (1598); and after this Tacitus became in *Donne’s phrase the ‘Oracle of Statesmen’ or at any rate the model for historians like F. *Bacon in his History of *Henry VII (1622) and Sir John *Hayward. He was also influential as a stylist in the 17th cent., when attempts were made to imitate his concision and trenchancy.

Tadpole and Taper, in Disraeli’s *Coningsby and *Sybil, typical party wire-pullers. ‘Tadpole worshipped registration; Taper adored a cry.’

TAGORE, Rabindranath (1861–1941), most eminent modern Bengali poet. He was also critic, essayist, composer, and author of short fiction innovative in Bengali literature. He is known outside India principally in English translation. Gitanjali: Song Offering (1912), his free verse re-creations of his Bengali poems modelled on medieval Indian devotional lyrics, won him the *Nobel Prize for literature in 1913, its first award to an Asian. Representative translations followed, of philosophical plays such as Chitra (1913) and The King of the Dark Chamber (1914), and of his novels The Home and the World (1919) and Gora (1924). His short fiction often comments powerfully and courageously on Indian national and social concerns, in the collections Hungry Stones (1916), Broken Ties (1925), and The Housewarming (1965), and in the novella The Broken Nest (1971). Tagore had an excellent command of English, but he wrote primarily in Bengali and tirelessly encouraged writers of the Indian vernaculars.

TAILLEFER (Incisor Ferri), a minstrel in the army of William the Conqueror who (according to the Carmen de Hastingiae Proelio and to *Henry of Huntingdon and *Gaimar) marched in front of the army at Hastings, singing of the deeds of *Roland to encourage the Normans.

tail-rhyme, translated from the Latin rhythmus caudatus, the measure associated in particular with a group of Middle English romances in which a pair of rhyming lines is followed by a single line of different length and the three-line pattern is repeated to make up a six-line stanza. Chaucer’s ‘Sir Thopas’ (see CANTER­BURY TALES, 17) is an example; six are edited by M. Mills in Six Middle English Romances (1973).

Tain-Bo-Cuailgne, the chief epic of the Ulster cycle of Irish mythology, the story of the raid of Queen *Maeve of Connaught to secure the Brown Bull of Cuailgne (pron. ‘Cooley’), and her defeat by *Cuchulain. There is a modern translation by T. Kinsella (1969).

TAINE, Hippolyte (1828–93), French philosopher, historian, and critic, the leading exponent in his age of the view that historical and artistic phenomena are susceptible of explanation by the application of the methods of natural science. Taine’s determinist and mechanistic theory of mental activity is fully set out in De l’intelligence (1870). Its moral corollary was given a provocative formulation in the introduction to his Histoire de la littérature anglaise (3 vols, 1863; trans. H. Van Laun, 1871): ‘vice and virtue are products like vitriol and sugar’. In the same introduction he laid down the principle that hereditary, environmental, and historical factors (‘la race, le milieu, le moment’) could sufficiently account for the entire range and character of a national literature. Taine wrote widely on art and aesthetics, e.g. Philosophie de l’art (1865), De l’idéal dans l’art (1867), as well as books on the art of Italy, Greece, and the Low Countries. Les Origines de la France contemporaine (6 vols, 1875–94) is a history of France in the late 18th and early 19th cents, centring on the revolutionary period and deplo…
ing tendency of which, to his mind, the revolution was an expression. Taine's numerous travel books include Notes sur l'Angleterre (1872), impressions of the country and of life and manners gathered during his stays in England, together with reflections on the English mind, system of government, etc.

It concerns the attempts, in the course of St Valentine's day, of various suitors to marry Audrey, the daughter of Toby Turf, high constable of Kentish Town. Her father wishes to marry her to John Clay, tile-maker, and he and the wedding party set off for the church. But his intention is defeated by Squire Tub and Tub's desire to marry Audrey is in turn frustrated by Martin, as representing the Church to the arrogant Peter, then with each other, and finally carried off and married out of hand by Pol Martin, usher to Tub's mother, 'a groom was again (together with £100) by the justice, is intercepted with contempt. Martin, and Jack a coat apiece, with directions that on the wits of the age from picking holes in the weak sides of religion and government. The author proceeds to tell the story of a father who leaves as a legacy to his three sons Peter, Martin, and Jack a coat apiece, with directions that on no account are the coats to be altered. Peter symbolizes the Roman Church, Martin (from Martin Luther) the Anglican, Jack (from John Calvin) the Dissenters. The sons gradually disobey the injunction, finding excuses for adding shoulder-knots or gold lace according to the prevailing fashion. Finally Martin and Jack quarrel with the arrogant Peter, then with each other, and separate. The satire is directed with especial vigour against Peter, his bulls and dispensations, and the doctrine of transubstantiation. But Jack is also treated with contempt. Martin, as representing the Church to which Swift himself belonged, is spared, though not very reverently dealt with. The narrative is freely interspersed with digressions, on critics, on the prevailing dispute as to ancient and modern learning, and on madness—this last an early example of Swift's love of paradox and of his misanthropy.

Prince Genji is an illegitimate son of the emperor, living about the time of the author's childhood, and volumes i–iv are mainly concerned with the rivalry between the various women whom he loved. Between volumes iv and v there is a gap in the narrative of eight years, during which time Genji has died, and the last two volumes deal with the rivalry in love between Kaoru, Genji's supposed son, and Nio, Genji's grandson.

The author, who became lady-in-waiting to the empress c.1005 and spent a certain amount of her time at court, was nicknamed 'Murasaki' in allusion to the heroine of her book: her real name remains unknown. A fuller translation by E. G. Seidensticker appeared in 1976.

Tale of Two Cities, A, a novel by Dickens, published 1859.

The 'two cities' are Paris, in the time of the French Revolution, and London. Dr Manette, a French physician, having been called in to attend a young peasant and his sister in circumstances that made him aware that the girl had been outrageously treated and the boy mortally wounded by the marquis de St Évremonde and his brother, has been confined for 18 years in the Bastille to secure his silence. He has just been released, demented, when the story opens; he is brought to England, where he gradually recovers his sanity. Charles Darnay, who conceals under the name the fact that he is a nephew of the marquis, has left France and denounced his heritage from detestation of the cruel practices of the old French nobility; he falls in love with Lucie, Dr Manette's daughter, and they are happily married. During the Terror he goes to Paris to try to save a faithful servant, who is accused of having served the emigrant nobility. He is himself arrested, condemned to death, and saved only at the last moment by Sydney Carton, a reckless wastrel of an English barrister, whose character is redeemed by his generous devotion to Lucie. Carton, who strikingly resembles Darnay in appearance, smuggles the latter out of prison, and takes his place on the scaffold.

The book gives a vivid picture (modelled on Carlyle's The French Revolution) of Paris at this period. Critics complained on publication of its lack of humour, but it later achieved wide popularity, partly through successful dramatizations and film adaptations.

Tales in Verse, a collection of poems by Crabbe, published 1812.

There is humour and tenderness, as well as horror, in these 21 tales, whose object is largely to reveal the destruction of happiness by uncontrolled passions.

Tales of a Grandfather, The, a history of Scotland from the Roman occupation to the close of the 1745 Jacobite rebellion, by Sir W. *Scott, published in 1827–9. A later series (1831) deals with the history of France. They were written for Scott's first grandchild, John Hugh Lockhart, who died in 1831, aged 10.

Tales of My Landlord, four series of novels by Sir W. *Scott: *The Black Dwarf, *Old Mortality (1st series); *The Heart of Midlothian (2nd series); *The Bride of Lammermoor, *A Legend of Montrose (3rd series); *Count Robert of Paris, *Castle Dangerous (4th series). Jedediah Cleishbotham, schoolmaster and parish clerk of Gandercleugh, by a fiction of Scott, sold these tales to a publisher. They were supposed to be compiled by his assistant Peter Pattieson. The title of the series is a misnomer as Scott himself admitted, for the tales were not told by the landlord; nor did the landlord have any hand in them at all.

Tales of the Genii, see Ridley, J.

Tales of the Hall, a collection of poems by *Crabbe, published 1819.

The work shows a falling off in care and skill, but is otherwise very similar in character to Tales in Verse.

Talfourd, Sir Thomas Noon (1795–1854), son of a Reading brewer, a judge and member of Parliament but also a literary critic and author of Ion (1836), The Athenian Captive (1838), and other lifeless tragedies in insipid blank verse, for which only *Macready’s acting secured momentary celebrity. Talfourd is, however, remembered for his editing of the letters of his friend Charles *Lamb, and for having introduced an Act securing real legal protection for authors’ copyright. The friendships of this warm-hearted though excessively loquacious man spanned the literary generation in which he dispatches criminals.

Talisin (fl. 550), a British bard, perhaps a mythic personage, first mentioned in the Saxon Genealogies appended to the Historia Britonum (c.690). A mass of poetry, probably of later date, has been ascribed to him, and the Book of Taliesin (14th cent.) is a collection of poems by different authors and of different dates. The village of Tre-Talisin in Cardiganshire sprang up near the supposed site of his grave. Taliesin figures prominently in Peacock’s The Misfortunes of Elphin, and he is mentioned in Tennyson’s Idylls of the King as one of the Round Table.

Talismam, The, a novel by Sir W. *Scott, published 1825, forming part of the Tales of the Crusaders. The novel is set in the army led to the Crusades by Richard I of England. It chronicles the adventures of a poor but valiant Scottish knight, Sir Kenneth, who is caught up in the intrigues between Richard, the king of France, the duke of Austria, and the Knights Templar and is eventually discovered to be Prince David of Scotland. The most striking portrait in the novel is that of Saladin, whose wisdom and chivalry is contrasted throughout with the scheming and corruption of the Christian leaders.

Tallis, Thomas (c.1505–85), composer and organist and colleague of W. *Byrd, largely known for his church music and for the tune known as ‘Tallis’s Canon’ which he composed for M. Parker’s Whole Psalter (?1567).

Talus, a character in Spenser’s Faerie Queene. When Astraea left the world and returned to heaven, she left her groome An yron man, which did on her attend Always to execute her steadfast doome. (v. i. 12)

He thus represents the executive power of government. He attends on Artegall, wielding an iron flail, with which he dispatches criminals.

Tambimuttu, see Poetry London.

Tamburlaine the Great, a drama in blank verse by *Marlowe, written not later than 1587, published 1590. It showed an immense advance on the blank verse of Gorboduc and was received with much popular approval. The material for it was taken by the author from Pedro Mexia’s Spanish Life of Timur, of which an English translation had appeared in 1571.

Pt I of the drama deals with the first rise to power of the Scythian shepherd-robber Tamburlaine; he allies himself with Cosroe in the latter’s rebellion against his brother, the king of Persia, and then challenges him for the crown and defeats him. Tamburlaine’s unbounded ambition and ruthless cruelty carry all before him. He conquers the Turkish emperor *Bajazet and leads him about, a prisoner in a cage, goading him and his empress *Zabina with cruel taunts till they dash out their brains against the bars of the cage. His ferocity is softened only by his love for his captive Zenocrate, the daughter of the soldán of Egypt whose life he spares in deference to the pleadings of Zenocrate when he captures Damascus.

Pt II deals with the continuation of his conquests, which extend to Babylон, whither he is drawn in a chariot dragged by the kings of Trebizond and Soria, with the kings of Anatolia and Jerusalem as relay, ‘pampered Jades of Asia’ (a phrase quoted by Pistol in *Shakespeare, 2 *Henry IV, ii. iv); it ends with the death of Tamburlaine himself.

Tamerlane, a tragedy by *Rowe, produced 1701, of some historical interest because under the name of Tamerlane the author intended to characterize William III, while under that of Bajazet he held up Louis XIV to detestation. The play was, for more than 100 years, annually revived on 5 Nov., the date of William III’s landing in England.

Taming of the Shrew, The, a comedy by *Shakespeare, first printed in the *Folio of 1623, probably written c.1592 or earlier and based in part on the *Supposes adapted by G. Gascoigne from *Ariosto. In 1594 a quarto text called ‘The Taming of a Shrew’ was published; this was once thought to be Shakespeare’s source, but its exact relationship with Shakespeare’s play is uncertain: it may represent in part a reported version of it.

The play begins with an induction in which Christopher Sly, a drunken Warwickshire tinker, picked up by a lord and his huntsmen on a heath, is brought to the castle, sumptuously treated, and in spite of his protestations is assured that he is a lord who has been out of his mind. He is set down to watch the play that follows, performed solely for his benefit by strolling players. Sly appears again at the end of I. ii, but disappears after that in the Folio text; in the bad quarto he is given five more short scenes throughout the play.

Baptista Minola of Padua has two daughters, Katherina the Shrew, who is the elder of the two, and Bianca, who has many suitors, but who may not marry until a version of it. Katherina has been out of her mind. He is given five more short scenes throughout the play.

Baptista Minola of Padua has two daughters, Katherina the Shrew, who is the elder of the two, and Bianca, who has many suitors, but who may not marry until a husband has been found for Katherina. Petruchio, a gentleman from Verona, undertakes to woo the shrew to gain her dowry and to help his friend Hortensio win Bianca. To tame her he pretends to find her rude behaviour courteous and gentle and humiliates her by being late for their wedding and appearing badly dressed. He takes her off to his country house and, under the pretext that nothing there is good enough for her, prevents her from eating or sleeping. By the time they return to Baptista’s house, Katherina has been successfully tamed, and Lucentio, a Pisan, has won Bianca by disguising himself as her schoolmaster, while the disappointed Hortensio has to console himself with marriage to a rich widow. At the feast which follows the three bridegrooms wager on whose wife is the most docile and submissive. Katherina argues that ‘Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper, / Thy head, thy sovereign’ and Petruchio wins the bet.

A play by J. Fletcher, *The Woman’s Prize, shows Petruchio tamed in a second marriage after Kate’s death. Petruchio’s three times repeated request ‘kiss me, Kate’ supplied the title for Cole Porter’s popular musical of 1948.

Tam Lin, the subject of an old *ballad. Janet wins back to mortal life her elfin lover, Tam Lin, from the queen of the fairies, who has captured him.

Tamora, queen of the Goths in Shakespeare’s *Titus Andronicus.

‘Tam o’ Shanter’, a narrative poem by *Burns, published 1791.

Tam, a farmer, spends the cold evening of Ayr’s market-day in a snug alehouse, where he becomes tipsy and amorous (‘Tam was glorious’). Eventually riding home, he passes the kirk of Alloway. Seeing it mysteriously lighted, he stops and looks in. Weird warlocks and witches are dancing to the sound of the bagpipes, played by Old Nick, the devil. Roused by the sight of one ‘winsome wench’ among the old beldams, Tam shouts to her. At once the lights go out and the horde of witches rush out in pursuit of Tam. Terrified, he wildly spurs his grey mare, Meg, and just reaches the middle of the bridge over the Doon before the girl catches him. Once over the middle of the bridge he is out of her power, but his mare’s tail is still within the witches’ jurisdiction, and this the girl pulls off. The narrative is swift, and both the humour and the horror are effectively conveyed.

Tanaquil, in Roman legend, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus, the first of the Tarquin (Etruscan) kings of Rome. Spenser uses the name to signify Queen Elizabeth in the introduction to Book I of *The Faerie Queene.

Tancred, one of the Norman heroes of the First Crusade, figures in Tasso’s *Jerusalem Delivered as one of the principal knights serving under Godfroi de *Bouillon.

Tancred, or The New Crusade, a novel by B. *Disraeli, published 1847.

This is the last of the trilogy *Coningsby—*Sybil—*Tancred. Much of the novel is devoted to an attempt to resolve the antagonism between Judaism and Christianity and to establish a role for a reforming faith and revitalized Church in a progressive society. Tancred, whose brilliant social and political future is assured, declares to his bewildered parents, Lord and Lady Montacute, that he must reject their plans for him and seek a faith and philosophy for himself in the Holy Land, where the secrets of the ‘Asian mystery’ may be revealed to him. He abandons the London of society hostesses and the young bloods of White’s, travels to Jerusalem, and thence to Sinai, where he receives a revelation from the Angel of Arabia of ‘a common Father’. But he soon becomes embroiled in war and intrigue between the Druses and the Maronites, and is used as a pawn to increase the power and prestige of the fiery Fakredeen, a dissembling and brilliant emir, who manoeuvres Tancred into battle. Tancred, wounded and captured, is saved by a potion given him by the beautiful Jewess Eva, with whom he falls in love. This, and his conviction that Christianity owes everything to the Jews, leads him to beg her to marry him. But his parents, the duke and duchess, arrive at Jerusalem to claim him.

Tancred and Gismund, The Tragedie of, or Gismond of Salerne, a play by R. Wilmot (fl. c.1566–1608) and others, published 1591 but dating from 1566 or 1568. Act II is by Henry Noel, Act IV by *Hatton. The play is founded on a tale by *Boccaccio (see SIGISMUNDA).

Tancred and Sigismunda, a tragedy by J. *Thomson, published 1745, produced (with *Garrick as Tancred) 1752.

It is based on the story inserted in *Lesage’s Gil Blas, iv, iv, in which Tancred, the heir to the kingdom of Sicily, is lured by the cunning Siffredi into accepting with the throne a bride, Constantia, whom he does not love, and abandoning Siffredi’s daughter Sigismunda, whom he does. The latter, in despair at her desertion, consents to marry Osmond, her father’s choice. But Tancred does not give up his lady-love so easily. He kills Osmond, but not before the latter has fatally stabbed Sigismunda.

Tanglewood Tales, see Hawthorne.

Tanizaki, Jun’ichiro (1886–1965), Japanese novelist, whose early work is marked by a conscious air of fin-de-siècle French decadence. After moving to Osaka in 1923, in the wake of the Tokyo earthquake, he explored the tensions between modern, Westernized life and classical Japanese culture. His most famous novels in the West are Makiko Sisters (1943–8), The Key (1956), and his masterpiece of erotic obsession, Diary of a Mad Old Man (1961–2).

Tannahill, Robert (1774–1810), born in Paisley. He became an apprenticed handloom weaver to his father at the age of 12 and showed signs of talent in poetic composition. At 17 he paid homage to Burns in Ayrshire and was inspired to write his first song ‘My Ain Kind Dearie O’. From 1805 his work began to appear in newspapers and journals and in 1807 he published by subscription a volume of Poems and Songs, some of which were harshly criticized. Bitterly grieved on having a revised edition declined by a publisher, he burnt his manuscripts and drowned himself in a culvert near Paisley.

Tannhäuser, a German minnesinger of the 13th cent. and the subject of the legend embodied in the 16th-cent. ballad, the Tannhäuserlied, in which he becomes enamoured of a beautiful woman who beckons him into the grotto of Venus in the ‘Venusberg’ (located in Thuringia), where he spends seven years in revelry. When he emerges he goes to Rome to seek absolution from the pope, who replies that it is as impossible for Tannhäuser to be forgiven as for his dry staff to burgeon. Tannhäuser departs in despair. After three days the pope’s staff breaks into blossom, and he urgently sends for Tannhäuser, but he is not to be found, having returned to Venus. The story is the subject of an opera by Wagner (perf. 1845), and of Swinburne’s poem ‘Laus Veneris’ (1866), a characteristically overheated dramatic monologue of guilt, passion, and sensual abandon, which provided the basis for some of Beardsley’s best-known illustrations.

Tappertit, Simon, in Dickens’s Barnaby Rudge, Gabriel Varden’s apprentice.

Tarkington, (Newton) Booth (1869–1946), American novelist, whose works include The Gentleman from Indiana (1899), Monsieur Beaucaire (1900, a historical romance which first won him popularity), The Magnificent Ambersons (1918, a chronicle of the Midwest), The Plutocrat (1927, a study of a self-made businessman abroad), and The Heritage of Hatcher Ide (1941), portraying the Depression in the Midwest. He also wrote for children; Penrod (1914) and its sequels describe the adventures of an American boy and his gang of friends in a small Midwestern city.

Tarlton, Richard (fl. 1570–88), actor, a man of humble origin and imperfect education, who attracted attention by his ‘happy unhappy answers’ and was introduced to Queen Elizabeth through the earl of Leicester. He became one of the queen’s players in 1583, and attained an immense popularity by his jests, comic acting, and improvisations of doggerel verse. He led a dissipated life and died in poverty. He is perhaps to be identified with Spenser’s ‘Pleasant Willy’ (see ‘Tears of the Muses’) and Shakespeare’s Yorick. Many fictitious anecdotes connected with him were published, notably Tartlons Jests, in three parts (1613) and Tartlons News out of Purgatorie (1590). See also fool.

Tartar, Mr, a character in Dickens’s Edwin Drood.

Tartuffe, Le, in Molière’s comedy of that name, an odious hypocrite, who, under an assumption of piety, introduces himself into the household of the credulous Orgon, attempts to seduce his wife, and being repulsed, endeavours to ruin the family. The normal spelling of the word (= hypocrite) is tartuf.

Tarzan, see Burroughs, E. R.

Task, The, a poem in six books by Cowper, published 1785.

When Cowper’s friend Lady Austen (whom he met in 1781) suggested to him the sofa in his room as the subject of a poem in blank verse, the poet set about ‘the task’. Its six books are entitled ‘The Sofa’, ‘The Time-Piece’, ‘The Garden’, ‘The Winter Evening’, ‘The Winter Morning Walk’, and ‘The Winter Walk at Noon’. Cowper opens with a mock-heroic account of the evolution of the sofa (‘I sing the sofa’) and thence digresses to description, reflection, and opinion. The poem stresses the delights of a retired life (‘God made the country, and man made the town’, Bk I, 749); describes the poet’s own search for peace (‘I was a stricken deer, that left the herd’, Bk III, 108); and evokes the pleasures of gardening, winter evenings by the fire, etc. The moral passages condemn blood sports, cards, and other diversions; the poet manifests tenderness not only for his pet hare, but even for worms and snails. The poem was extremely popular: Burns found it ‘a glorious poem’ that expressed ‘the Religion of God and Nature’, and it helped to create and supply the growing demand for natural description and tender emotion that found a fuller expression in Wordsworth’s * Prelude*, a poem which contains many echoes of Cowper.

Tasso, Torquato (1544–95), son of Bernardo Tasso (author of an epic on Amadis of Gaul). He was born at Sorrento and spent many years at the court of Ferrara. He was from early life in constant terror of persecution and adverse criticism, and his conduct at Ferrara was such as to make it necessary for the duke, Alphonso II of Este, to lock him up as mad from 1579 to 1586. The legend of his passion for Leonora d'Este, the duke's discovery of it, and his consequent imprisonment was for long widely believed; Milton refers to it (in a Latin poem), Byron's *The Lament of Tasso is based on it, and Goethe's play Torquato Tasso (1790) supports it, as does Donizetti's opera (1833) of the same title. Tasso was released on condition that he would leave Ferrara, and he spent the rest of his life wandering from court to court, unhappy, poverty-stricken, and paranoid, though widely admired. He died in Rome.

His chief works were Rinaldo, a romantic epic (1562); a pastoral play, Aminta (1573), which had a great success; *Jerusalem Delivered (1580–1); and a less successful tragedy, Torrismondo (1586). He also wrote Pindaric *odes, and Spenser used his sonnets in many of his *Amoretti. Tasso's epics and his critical works (Discorsi dell'arte poetica, Discorsi del poema eroico) had a great influence on English literature, displayed in the works of *Daniel, Milton, Giles and Phineas *Fletcher, *Cowley, *Dryden, and others; Milton refers to his theory of the epic in *The Reason of Church Government and Of Education. *Fairfax's translation of Jerusalem Delivered (1600) also had an influence in its own right; according to Dryden, *Waller said that he 'derived the harmony of his numbers' from it. In the following century, *Gray translated a passage (Bk XIV, 32–9), and *Collins recorded ('Ode on the Popular Superstitions of the Highlands') his great admiration for both Tasso and Fairfax: 'How have I trembled, when at Tancred's stroke / Its gushing blood, the gaping Cypress pour'd.'

TATE, (John Orley) Allen (1809–1979), American poet and critic, born in Kentucky; who began his literary career as editor of the little magazine the Fugitive (1922–5), published at Nashville, Tennessee, which published work by J. C. *Ransom, L. *Riding, R. P. *Warren, and others and supported a sense of re­

C. *Ransom, L. *Riding, R. P. *Warren, and others and supported a sense of renomics, becoming professor of economic history in 1931. His works include The Acquisitive Society (1921), Religion and the Rise of Capitalism (1926), and Land and Labour in China (1932).

TAYLOR, Alan (1906–90), historian, educated at Bootham School, York, and Oriel College, Oxford. His many publications include The Habsburg Monarchy (1941), The Troublemakers (1957, from his Ford lectures), The Origins of the Second World War (1961), and a life of Beaverbrook (1972). He also became widely known as a journalist and television personality, and his autobiography, A Personal History (1983), gives a lively and frequently iconoclastic account of his colleagues and acquaintances (including a hostile portrait of Dylan Thomas), and traces the evolution of his political sympathies from his support of the workers in the General Strike to his support of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

TAYLOR, Edgar, see CHILDREN'S LITERATURE.

TAYLOR, Edward (c.1644–1729), American poet and divine, born in England. He emigrated to Boston in 1668, and was educated at Harvard. His devotional poems remained in manuscript, at his own request, and were not published until 1637, when their importance to the history of early American letters, and their own considerable quality, were at once recognized. He belongs to the metaphysical tradition of G. *Herbert and *Quarles. A full edition of his works, ed. D. E. Stanford, was published in 1960.

TAYLOR, Elizabeth (1912–75), novelist and short story writer. She was educated in Reading, then worked locally as tutor and librarian until she married in 1936. Her first novel, At Mrs Lippincote's (1945), was followed by 11 more: shrewd observations of middle-class life in which self-deception is always exposed, while compassion is afforded to loneliness and vulnerability. Unobtrusively crafted, underpinned by wit, her work is concerned with moments that detonate understanding. Among the best known of her novels are A Wreath of Roses (1950), in which Camilla Hill, a reserved school secretary on the brink of middle age, becomes involved with a handsome but suspect young man, and Mrs Palfrey at the Claremont (1971), a study of the pathos of impoverished but genteel old age. Her collections of short stories, Hester Lilly (1954), The Blush (1958), A Dedicated Man (1965), and The Devastating Boys (1972), are also much admired for what Angus Wilson described as her 'warm heart and sharp claws'. Dangerous Calm, a selection of her stories (including two previously uncollected) ed. Lynn Knight, appeared in 1995.

TAYLOR, Sir Henry (1800–86). He held an appointment in the colonial office from 1824 to 1872, during which time he published a number of verse dramas which had a considerable vogue in their day, but are now largely forgotten. The most admired was Philip van Artevelde (1834), a lengthy work set in Flanders in the 14th cent.; he describes its hero, a retiring citizen raised to prominence during the power struggles between Ghent and Bruges, as 'a statesman and a man of business'. His only work with any lasting reputation is The Statesman (1836), an ironical exposition of the arts of succeeding as a civil servant; its apparent cynicism shocked many of its readers, but 20th-cent. editors (H. J. Laski, 1927; L. Silberman, 1957) found it a shrewd and interesting commentary on the changing and expanding role of the civil service. Taylor was a friend of Soutey and his literary executor. His Autobiography 1800–75 was published in 1885 (privately printed 1877) and his complete works in five volumes appeared in 1877–8.

TAYLOR, Jane (1783–1824) and Ann (1782–1866), authors of books for children. In 1804 they published Original Poems for Infant Minds, which was translated into German, Dutch, and Russian, and ran into 50 editions in England alone. In 1806 followed Rhymes for the Nursery, which included one of the most famous poems in the English language, 'Twinkle, twinkle little star'. Other nursery rhymes and stories followed, and in 1810 Hymns for Infant Minds. In 1816 Jane produced Essays in Rhyne, and until 1822 contributed regularly to Youth's Magazine. Both Sir W. *Scott and R. *Browning expressed admiration for the Taylors' work.

TAYLOR, Jeremy (1613–67), born at Cambridge, the son of a barber. He was educated at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Having attracted Laud's attention as a preacher, he was sent by him to Oxford and became a fellow of All Souls College. He was chaplain to Laud and Charles I, and was appointed rector of Uppingham in 1638. He was taken prisoner in the Royalist defeat before Cardigan Castle in 1645, and retired to Golden Grove, Carmarthenshire, where he wrote most of his greater works. After the Restoration he was made bishop of Down and Connor, and subsequently of Dromore. He died at Lisburn and was buried in his cathedral of Dromore. His fame rests on the combined simplicity and splendour of his style, of which The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living (1650) and The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying (1651) are perhaps the best examples. Among his other works, The Liberty of Prophesying, an argument for toleration, appeared in 1647; his Eniautos, or series of sermons for the Christian Year, in 1653; The Golden Grove, a manual of daily prayers, in 1655; his Doctor Dubitantium, 'a general instrument of moral theology' for determining cases of conscience, in 1660; and The Worthy Communicant in the same year.

TAYLOR, John (1580–1653), the 'water poet', born of humble parentage in Gloucester. He was sent to Gloucester Grammar School, but becoming 'mired' in his Latin accidence was apprenticed to a waterman, pressed for the navy, and was present at the siege of Cadiz. He then became a Thames waterman, and increased his earnings by writing rollicking verse and prose; he obtained the patronage of *Jonson and others, and diverted both court and city. He went on foot from London to Braemar, visited the Continent, started from London to Queenborough in a brownpaper boat and narrowly escaped drowning, and accomplished other journeys, each one resulting in a booklet with an odd title. He published in 1630 a collective edition of his works, All the Works of John Taylor, the Water-Poet (reprinted, with other pieces, by the Spenser Society, 1868–78), but continued to write a good deal after this, notably royalist ballads and newsheets.

TAYLOR, John (1781–1864), publisher, who first distinguished himself, amid much controversy, by identifying *'Junius’ as Sir P. *Francis in 1813. After the death of J. *Scott, he became the editor of the *London Magazine, 1821–4, and he became a very perceptive partner in the publishing firm of Taylor and Hessey. He published the work of *De Quincey, *Lamb, *Hazlitt, *Keats, *Clare, *Carey, and others, many of whom had already appeared in the *London Magazine. He greatly encouraged and assisted Clare, published his first volume of Poems in 1820, and raised a subscription, to which he contributed generously himself, for the joint benefit of the indigent Clare and Keats. But Clare felt that the comparative failure of The Shepherd's Calendar in 1827 was Taylor's fault, and although Taylor offered Clare all the remaining copies to sell for his own benefit, he advanced no more money to the poet and was not the publisher of The Rural Muse (1835). He caused some offence to Keats, and to other writers, by his occasional 'revisions' of their works. He held regular dinners for writers, lent money to Keats to travel to Italy, and seems generally to have happily combined the qualities of businessman and friend.

TAYLOR, Philip Meadows (1808–76), Anglo-Indian novelist and historian, born in Liverpool. He joined the Indian army and became a correspondent for The Times from 1840 to 1853. He was author of the successful Confessions of a Thug (1839), a result of his investigation into Thuggism, the secret terrorist movement in India. His reputation rests mainly on stories written after his retirement to England in 1860, notably the trilogy Tara: A Maharatta Tale (1843), Ralph Darnell (1865), and Seeta (1872), which delineate epochs of Indian history from the 17th cent. to his own time. His autobiography, edited by his daughter, appeared in 1877.

TAYLOR, Thomas (1758–1835), classical scholar, mathematician, and *Neo-Platonist, the friend of T. L. *Peacock and other literary men and painters. He was the first to embark on a systematic translation and exposition of Orphic and Neoplatonic literature, and he also devoted himself to the metaphysical aspect of mathematics. He published a great many works covering these interests.

TAYLOR, Tom (1817–80), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, editor of *Punch, 1874–80. He produced a number of successful plays (some in collaboration with C. *Reade), most of them adaptations. His comedy Our American Cousin (1858) contained the character of the brainless peer Lord Dundreary, who was played with great panache by E. A. Sothern. He edited Haydon's autobiography in 1853.

TAYLOR, William (1765–1836), born in Norwich, author and translator, who did much to popularize German literature through his translations of Bürger's ballads (see Lenore), and of G. E. *Lessing's Nathan der Weise (1791) and *Goethe's Iphigenia in Tauris (1793): also through his Historic Survey of German Poetry (3 vols, 1828–30) and many contributions on the subject to the Monthly Magazine, for which he wrote over 800 reviews, essays, and translations. He was a friend of Soutey, his correspondence with whom is printed in a Memoir by J. W. Robberds (1843).

Tchaikovsky, Peter Ilich (1840–93), Russian composer, whose fantasy overture Romeo and Juliet (1869) has reached out to a wide audience—perhaps wider than any other Shakespeare-inspired musical work—and yet retains its qualities as a serious work of art. It was his first masterpiece (rev. 1870, and again in 1886), brilliantly integrating the dramatic and passionate elements of the play into the requirements of a compact musical structure. In the last months of his life Tchaikovsky used the love theme (one of the most ravishing of his melodic ideas) as the basis for a duet version of the opening of Shakespeare's III. v, but there is no evidence that he considered making an opera out of the play. There are two other important Shakespearian orchestral works: the symphonic fantasia The Tempest (1873) and the fantasy overture Hamlet (1888).

The Manfred Symphony (1885), after *Byron, is usually regarded, with the Sixth Symphony, as his finest orchestral work: 'the symphony has turned out to be huge, serious and difficult,' he wrote, 'absorbing all my time, sometimes to my utter exhaustion,' yet rarely did he realize so large a musical form with such success.

Tearsheet, Doll, *Falstaff's mistress in Shakespeare's 2 *Henry IV.

'Tears of the Muses, The', a poem by *Spenser, included in the Complaints, published 1591. In this the poet deplors, through the mouth of several Muses, the decay of literature and learning.

Teazle, Sir Peter and Lady, characters in Sheridan's *The School for Scandal.

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre (1881–1955), French palaeontologist and Jesuit priest, author of a series of posthumously published works, notably Le Phénomène humain (1955), in which he elaborated a system of cosmic evolution. In Teilhard’s conception, every physical being was endowed with an inner consciousness whose concentration varied in direct proportion to its material complexity. All matter and material systems were continually and irreversibly evolving along related and converging paths towards physical synthesis and spiritual perfection. The appearance of man in evolutionary history marks the emergence of self-consciousness and has added to the earth, superimposed as it were upon the biosphere, a new dimension, the noosphere, or domain of thought. The development of this specifically human sphere of activity initiates a critical phase in the process of simultaneous complexification and integration, which is to attain its natural term in the unification of cultures, together with a concomitant intensification of collective consciousness to a ‘hyperpersonal’ level. Evolutionary integration thus reaches its ultimate stage, the point of maximum differentiated unity, which is designated as Omega, and which is arrived at simultaneously with a full realization of the principle of love inherent in the universe.

TELFORD, Thomas (1757–1834), civil engineer and architect, who loved literature and versifying. He was interested in Goethe and Kotzebue and was a close friend of Southey and Campbell. He is said to have assisted Campbell in the composition of ‘Hohenlinden’, and he travelled in Scotland with Southey. He built over 1,000 miles of road, 1,200 bridges, churches, docks, aqueducts, and canals, notably the Caledonian. His Life, a long and detailed autobiography, was published in 1838.

Temora, see Fingal.

Tempest, The, a romantic drama by Shakespeare probably written in 1611, when it was performed before the king at Whitehall; in 1613 it was included in the wedding celebrations for the Princess Elizabeth and the elector palatine. It was not printed until 1623 when it appeared as the first play in the First Folio. It is usually taken to be his last play written without a collaborator for the London stage before his retirement to Stratford. Although there are several analogues for the story of The Tempest, and contemporary accounts of the shipwreck of the Sea-Venture in 1609 on the Bermudas and passages from Golding’s Ovid and Florio’s Montaigne contribute details to the play, no single source for it is known. As Dr Johnson observed, The Tempest’s ‘plan is regular’, that is, it conforms to the unities.

Prospero, duke of Milan, ousted from his throne by his brother Antonio, and turned adrift on the sea with his child Miranda, has been cast upon a lonely island. This had been the place of banishment of the witch Sycorax. Prospero, by his knowledge of magic, has released various spirits (including Ariel) formerly imprisoned by the witch, and these now obey his orders. He also keeps in service the witch’s son Caliban, a misshapen monster, formerly the sole inhabitant of the island. Prospero and Miranda have lived thus for 12 years. When the play begins a ship carrying the usurper, his confederate Alonso, king of Naples, his brother Sebastian and son Ferdinand, is by the art of Prospero wrecked on the island. The passengers are saved, but Ferdinand is thought by the rest to be drowned, and he thinks this is their fate. According to Prospero’s plan Ferdinand and Miranda are thrown together, fall in love, and plight their troths. Prospero appears to distrust Ferdinand and sets him to carrying logs. On another part of the island Sebastian and Antonio plot to kill Alonso and Gonzalo, ‘an honest old Councillor’ who had helped Prospero in his banishment. Caliban offers his services to Stephano, a drunken butler, and Trinculo, a jester, and persuades them to try to murder Prospero. As their conspiracy nears him, Prospero breaks off the masque of Iris, Juno, and Ceres, which Ariel has presented to Ferdinand and Miranda. Caliban, Stephano, and Trinculo are driven off and Ariel brings the king and his courtiers to Prospero’s cell. There he greets ‘My true preserver’ Gonzalo, forgives his brother Antonio, on the condition that he restores his dukedom to him, and reunites Alonso with his son Ferdinand, who is discovered playing chess with Miranda. While Alonso repents for what he has done, Antonio and Sebastian do not speak directly to Prospero, but exchange ironical and cynical comments with each other. The boatswain and master of the ship appear to say that it has been magically repaired and that the crew is safe. Before all embark for Italy Prospero frees Ariel from his service, renounces his magic, and leaves Caliban once more alone on the island.

The Tempest has inspired numerous other works of art, including Milton’s Comus, an incomplete opera by Mozart, Shelley’s ‘Ariel to Miranda’ (see also under Ariel), *Browning’s ‘Caliban upon Setebos’, music by Berlioz and Tchaikovsky, and more recently W. H. Auden’s series of poetic meditations The Sea and the Mirror and an excellent science fiction film, Forbidden Planet (1954).

Templars, Knights, an order founded about 1118, consisting originally of nine knights whose profession was to safeguard pilgrims to Jerusalem, and who were granted by Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, a dwelling-place in his palace near the temple. Many noblemen joined the order, and it acquired great wealth and influence in France, England, and other countries. Active always in the field, they were really a source of weakness to the Christian king of Jerusalem from their direct dependence on the pope and their constant violation of treaties with the Muslim powers. After the battle of 1187 Saladin made an example of the Templars and the (much less guilty) Hospitalers who became his prisoners, and beheaded them all, about 200 in number, while sparing nearly all his other prisoners. From a state of poverty and humility they became so insolent that the order was suppressed by the kings of Europe in their various dominions with circumstances, especially in France, of great cruelty. It was also officially suppressed by the pope and the Council of Vienne (1312). *Browning's poem 'The Heretic's Tragedy' alludes to the burning of Jacques de Bourg-Molay, the grand master, in 1314.

Temple, Miss, a character in C. Brontë's *Jane Eyre.

TEMPLE, Sir William (1628–99), educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He was envoy at Brussels in 1666, and visited The Hague, where he effected the triple alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden, aiming at the protection of Spain from French ambition. He went again to The Hague in 1674, where he brought about the marriage between William of Orange and Mary. In 1654 he married Dorothy Osborne, whose letters to him give a vivid picture of the times. He settled first at Sheen, then at Moor Park, near Farnham, where he was much occupied with gardening, and where *Swift was a member of his household. His principal works include Observations upon . . . the Netherlands (1672), an essay upon The Advancement of Trade in Ireland (1673), and three volumes of Miscellanea (1680, 1692, 1701). The second of these contains 'Of Ancient and Modern Learning', an essay which, by its uncritical praise of the spurious epistles of *Phalaris, exposed Temple to the censure of *Bentley and led to a vigorous controversy. The Miscellanea also include 'Upon the Gardens of Epicharis', 'Of Health and Long Life', 'Of Heroic Virtue', and 'Of Poetry'. Temple's letters were published by Swift, 1700–3, after Temple's death. His Memoirs, relating to the period 1672–9, published in 1692, are an interesting blend of public and private affairs.

Written in the first person with a male narrator, Gilbert Markham, it has an ambitious and complex epistolary and diary structure. Markham, a young farmer, falls in love with Helen Graham, a young widow and talented painter newly arrived in the neighbourhood with her son Arthur, and the tenant of the title. Her youth, beauty, and seclusion, and her mysterious relationship with her landlord Lawrence, give rise to local gossip, which Markham refuses to credit until he himself overhears Helen and Lawrence in intimate conversation. He violently assaults Lawrence, and Helen, distressed at the threatened rupture of their friendship, reveals the truth of her past to him through a lengthy document. Despite the warnings of her family, she had married Arthur Huntingdon, who, after a period of initial happiness, had relapsed, despite her efforts, into a life of drinking, debauchery, and infidelity. She had fled, to protect her child, to Wildfell Hall, provided for her by Lawrence, who is in fact her brother. Shortly after the revelation of this secret, Helen returns to nurse her husband through a fatal illness, his death hastened by his intemperance, and the way is left clear for Markham successfully to renew his suit. In her 'Biographical Notice' (1850) Charlotte *Brontë suggested that the portrait of the dissolute Huntingdon was based on their brother Branwell, in whom Anne Brontë had had ample opportunity to observe 'the terrible effects of talents misused and faculties abused', and the novel was generally considered 'coarse', 'brutal', and excessively morbid. The author defended it in a preface to the second edition: 'I am at a loss to conceive how a man should permit himself to write anything that would be really disgraceful to a woman, or why a woman should be censured for writing anything that would be proper and becoming for a man.'

TENNANT, Emma (1938– ), novelist, born in London but brought up largely in Scotland. She founded and edited the literary review Bananas, and her novels (which have been variously described as neo-*Gothic and *magic realist, and which are written in a powerful poetic prose) include Hotel de Dream (1976); The Bad Sister (1978); Wild Nights (1979); Alice Fell (1980); Woman Beware Woman (1983); The House of Hospitality (1987); A Wedding of Curiosity (1988); Sisters and Strangers: A Moral Tale (1990); Faustine (1992); and Tess (1993). Pemberley, her sequel to Jane Austen's *Pride and Prejudice, was published in 1993 and its continuation, An Unequal Marriage, in 1994. Strangers (1998) is an autobiographical novel, blending real characters from the author's ancestry and childhood with fictionalized incident.

TENNANT, William (1784–1848), educated at St Andrews University, a parish schoolmaster (at Anstruther in Fife) learned in oriental languages, of which he became professor at St Andrews. He is remembered in a literary connection for his poem in six cantos Anster Fair (1812), a mock-heroic description of the humours of the fair (in James V's reign) and of the courting, with fairy interposition, of Maggie Lauder by Rob the Ranter.

TENNIEL, Sir John (1820–1914), illustrator. He worked for Punch from 1850, and from 1864 succeeded *Leech as its chief cartoonist; 'Dropping the Pilot' (1890), referring to Bismarck's resignation, is one of his best-known cartoons. His illustrations for Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (1865) and Through the Looking Glass (1871) are perfect examples of the integration of illustration with text.

TENNYSON, Alfred, first Baron Tennyson (1809–92), born at Somersby, Lincolnshire, the third surviving son of the rector, George Tennyson. He was educated partly by his father, then at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he joined the *Apostles and became acquainted with A. H. *Hallam. In 1829 he won the chancellor's medal for English verse with 'Timbuctoo', the first poem in blank verse to win. Poems by Two Brothers (1827) contains some early work that he chose not to reprint even in his Juvenilia, as well as poems by his brothers Charles and Frederick (below). Poems Chiefly Lyrical (1830, including Mariana) was unfavourably reviewed by *Lockhart and John *Wilson. In 1832 he travelled with Hallam on the Continent, visiting among other places Cauteret, a landscape that was to be a lasting inspiration. Hallam died abroad in 1833, and in that year Tennyson began In Memoriam, expressive of his grief for his lost friend.

He became engaged to Emily Sellwood, to whom, however, he was not married until 1850; poverty caused by the disinheritance of the Somersby Tennysons in favour of his socially ambitious uncle Charles Tennyson (D'Eyncourt) was long accepted as the principal reason for this delay, but R. B. Martin suggested (Tennyson: The Unquiet Heart, 1980) that Alfred feared the ‘black blood’ of the Tennysons, a notoriously melancholic and unstable family, and suspected that he, like his father, suffered from epilepsy. (George Tennyson, a violent alcoholic, had died in 1831.) In Dec. 1832 he published a further volume of Poems (dated 1833), which included ‘The Two Voices’, ‘Onone’, ‘The Lotos-Eaters’, and ‘A Dream of Fair Women’; *’Tithonus’, published 1860, was composed 1833–4. In 1842 appeared a selection from the previous two volumes, many of the poems much revised, with new poems, including Morte d’Arthur (the germ of the Idylls), Locksley Hall, *’Ulysses’, and ‘St Simeon Stylites’. From 1845 until his death he received a civil list pension of £200 per annum. In 1847 he published The Princess and in 1850 In Memoriam, and in the latter year he was appointed poet laureate in succession to *Wordsworth. He wrote his ‘Ode’ on the death of Wellington in 1852 (see ode) and ’The Charge of the Light Brigade’ in 1854, having at this time settled in Farringford on the Isle of Wight.

Tennyson’s fame was by now firmly established, and Maud, and Other Poems (1855, see MAUD) and the first four Idylls of the King (1859) sold extremely well. Among the many friends and admirers who visited Farringford were E. *FitzGerald, who had helped him financially in early years, *Lear, *Patmore, *Clough, F. T. *Palgrave, and *Allingham. Prince Albert called in 1856, but despite the high esteem with which she regarded him Queen *Victoria never visited him, preferring to summon him to Osborne or Windsor. Although suspicious of unknown admirers, Tennyson was a sociable man, with a fondness for declaiming his work to a respectful audience; his wife and his son Hallam protected him from hostile criticism, to which he was highly sensitive. In London he frequented the literary and artistic salon of Mrs Prinsep at Little Holland House; her sister, the photographer Julia Margaret *Cameron, moved to the Isle of Wight in 1860, where she frequently used Tennyson and his family as subjects. Enoch Arden Etc. (see ENOCH ARDEN) appeared in 1864, The Holy Grail and Other Poems (including ‘Lucretius’) in 1869 (dated 1870), ‘The Last Tournament’ in the Contemporary Review in 1871, and Gareth and Lynette, etc. in 1872. Tennyson began building his second residence, Aldworth, near Haslemere in Surrey, in 1868. His dramas Queen Mary and Harold were published in 1875 and 1876, and The Falcon, The Cup, and Becket in 1884, in which year he was made a peer. H. *Irving and Ellen *Terry appeared in The Cup in 1881 and, with much success, in Becket in 1893. In 1880 appeared Ballads and Other Poems, including ‘The Voyage of Maeldune’, ‘*Rizpah’, and ‘The Revenge’. He published Tiresias, and Other Poems (see TIRESIAS) in 1885, and The Foresters appeared in 1892. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, and a life by his son Hallam appeared in 1897.

In his later years there were already signs that the admiration Tennyson had long enjoyed was beginning to wane; the Idylis, although admired by readers as various as *Longfellow, Clough, *Macaulay, *Thackeray, *Gladstone, and Queen Victoria, were found by *Carlyle, despite their ‘finely elaborated execution’ to express ‘the inward perfection of vacancy’, and *Swinburne referred to them as ‘Morte d’Albert, or Idyls of the Prince Consort’. *Bagehot found ‘Enoch Arden’ ‘ornate’ and G. M. *Hopkins found it ‘Parnassian’. In 1870 A. *Austin described Tennyson’s work as ‘poetry of the drawing room’. Critical opinion has tended to endorse *Auden’s view that ‘his genius was lyrical’, and that he had little talent for the narrative, epic, and dramatic forms to which he devoted such labour. T. S. *Eliot called him ‘the great master of metric as well as of melancholia’, who has ‘the finest ear of any English poet since Milton’, and *Leavis suggested that his influence, like *Milton’s, was unfortunate. More recently there has been a revival of interest in some of the longer poems, e.g. ‘Locksley Hall’, *’The Princess, and ‘Enoch Arden’. There is an excellent annotated edn by C. Ricks (1969); see also his Tennyson (1972). There is a life by Robert Martin, Tennyson: The Unquiet Heart (1980).

TENNYSON, Frederick (1807–98), elder brother of A. *Tennyson. He contributed to the Poems by Two Brothers (1827), and published Days and Hours (1854), The Isles of Greece (1890), and other volumes of verse.

TENNYSON TURNER, Charles (1808–79), elder brother of A. *Tennyson. He contributed to Poems by Two Brothers (1827) and published from time to time volumes of sonnets (1830–80), simple and restrained in manner, some of them depicting the rustic aspects of the Lincolnshire wolds.

TERENCE (Publius Terentius Afer) (c.190 or c.180–159 BC), Roman comic poet. He was born in North Africa and came as a slave to Rome, where he was eventually freed by his master, whose name he adopted. Four of his plays, Andria, Adelphi, Eunuchus, and *Heautonti-morumenos, are adaptations of *Menander; his other two plays, *Hecyra and *Phormio, are imitations of Greek plays by Menander’s imitator Apollodorus of Carystus. Although he employs the same limited range of characters that is found in *Plautus, he gives them greater depth and presents a world of genuine relationships. He was famed already in antiquity for the relationships. He was famed already in antiquity for the elegance and colloquial character of his Latin. It was as a stylist that he was studied in the Middle Ages and figured in the curriculum of most Tudor schools: there is an early translation of the Andria, probably by *Rastell (c.1520), a later one specifically for schools by M. Kyffin (1588), and an English version of all the six comedies by R. Bernard (1598). But Terence was known more through imitations than through translations. Along with Plautus, he contributed plots, characters, and tone to the mainstream of Renaissance comedy in 16th-cent. Italy, then (with original features) in the France of *Corneille and *Molière, from where it spread to Restoration London.

TERESA, or THERESA, St (Teresa of Ávila) (1515–82), a Spanish saint and author, who entered the Carmelite sisterhood and became famous for her mystic visions. Her works include El castillo interior (The Interior Castle, written 1577, pub. 1588), an account of her visions, and El camino de la perfección (The Way of Perfection, written 1563–73, pub. 1583), a book of counsel for the ascetic life. Her Libro de las fundaciones (Book of the Foundation, 1610) narrates her ceaseless journeys as an energetic reformer of the Carmelite order and a foundress of new convents. She is the subject of Crashaw’s ‘Hymne to Sainte Teresa, which relates her childish attempt to court martyrdom by preaching to the Moors (an incident taken from her own spiritual autobiography) and her progress towards a state of mystic ecstasy or spiritual marriage. She is also the subject of Bernini’s celebrated erotic masterpiece, the Ecstasy of Saint Teresa (1645) in S. Maria della Vittoria, Rome.

TERRY, Ellen Alice* (1847–1928), celebrated actress, and member of a distinguished theatrical family. She married the painter G. F. Watts in 1864, when only 16, a union that soon ended, and had two children by E. W. Godwin (1833–86), the architect and theatrical designer, one of whom was Gordon *Craig. She was H. *Irving’s leading lady during his brilliant management of the Lyceum Theatre.

Terson, Peter, the pseudonym of Peter Patterson (1932– ), playwright, born in Newcastle upon Tyne; he was associated with the Victoria Theatre, Stoke-on-Trent, with its tradition of social documentary and theatre-in-the-round, then with the National Youth Theatre, where he excelled in writing for large casts. His works include Mooney and His Caravans (TV 1966, pub. 1970), a poignant play about a young and inadequate couple victimized by the owner of a caravan site; Zigger Zagger (1967, pub. 1970), about a football fan, which skilfully incorporates the drama of the football terraces; and Good Ladies at Heart (1971), set in a Borstal. Later works include Geordie’s March (1979) and Strippers (1984), about a group of working-class women forced to take up stripping to support themselves.

TERTULLIAN (b. c.150), one of the greatest of the early Christian writers in Latin, author of the Apologeticus (197), an eloquent appeal to Roman governors on behalf of the Christians, and of many treatises on the Christian life. He was opposed to the introduction of classical authors into Christian schools, and posed the famous question adapted by St *Jerome and *Alcuin: ‘What has Athens to do with Jerusalem?’ (De Spectaculis).

terza rima, the measure adopted by Dante in the Divina commedia, consisting of lines of five iambic feet with an extra syllable, in sets of three lines, the middle line of each rhyming with the first and third lines of the next set (a b a, b c b, c d c, etc.).

Tess of the D’Urbervilles: A Pure Woman, a novel by T. *Hardy, published 1891. The subtitle was important to Hardy’s purpose. Tess Durbeyfield is the daughter of a poor villager of Blackmoor Vale, whose head is turned by learning that he is descended from the ancient family of D’Urberville. Tess is cunningly seduced by Alec, a young man of means, whose parents, with doubtful right, bear the name of D’Urberville. Tess gives birth to a child, which dies after an improvised midnight baptism by its mother. Later, while working as a dairymaid on a prosperous farm, in a beautiful summer, she becomes blissfully engaged to Angel Clare, a clergyman’s son. On their wedding night she confesses to him the seduction by Alec; and Angel, although himself no innocent, cruelly and hypocritically abandons her. Misfortunes and bitter hardships come upon her and her family, and accident throws her once more in the path of Alec D’Urberville. He has become an itinerant preacher, but his temporary religious conversion does not prevent him from persistently pursuing her. When her pathetic appeals to her husband, now in Brazil, remain unanswered, she is driven for the sake of her family to become the mistress of Alec. Clare, returning from Brazil and repenting of his harshness, finds her living with Alec in Sandbourne. Maddened by this second wrong that has been done her by Alec, Tess stabs and kills him to liberate herself. After a brief halcyon period of concealment with Clare in the New Forest, Tess is arrested at Stonehenge, tried, and hanged. Hardy’s closing summary reads: ‘Justice was done, and the President of the Immortals (in Aeschylean phrase) had ended his sport with Tess.’

The publication of the novel created a violent sensation (see also Jude the Obscure). Some reviewers were deeply impressed, but most considered the work immoral, pessimistic, extremely disagreeable, and, as H. *James wrote, ‘chockfull of faults and falsity’.

Testament of Cresseid, The, a poem in 616 lines of rhyme-royal by Henryson. The poet describes in the prologue how he took up Chaucer’s Troilus and Criseyde and proceeded to tell of the retribution that came upon Cresseid. Diomede grows tired of Cresseid and leaves her; she takes refuge with her father Calchas and bitterly reproaches Venus and Cupid. A council of the gods discusses the punishment for her blasphemy; Saturn deprives her of joy and beauty, and the Moon strikes her with leprosy. As she sits by the roadside with her leper’s cup and clapper, Troilus rides by with a party of victorious Trojans and, though the leper brings Cresseid to his mind, he does not recognize her. Neither does she recognize him, but she receives alms from him and then learns who he is. She dies after sending him a ring he had once given her.

Tetrachordon, the third of Milton’s pamphlets on divorce, published 1645, a substantial work of 110 pages. It deals with four sets of passages on marriage and nullities in marriage from Genesis, Deuteronomy, St Matthew, and the First Epistle to the Corinthians. Milton seeks to reconcile the passages and to prove their essential harmony. (A tetrachordon was a four-stringed Greek lyre.) Milton wrote two sonnets in defence of his views on divorce, attacking his detractors; one is specifically related to Tetrachordon, which, he says, ‘walk’d the Town a while, I Numbring good intelligents; now seldom por’d on’.

Teufelsdröckh, Herr Diogenes, the fictitious mystical German philosopher from the University of Weis­nichtwo whose life and opinions are described in Carlyle’s Sartor Resartus.

TEY, Josephine (1896–1952), the pen-name of Elizabeth Mackintosh, detective story writer, born in the Highlands. Her best-known works include The Franchise Affair (1948), in which two sisters are falsely accused of abduction, and Brat Farrar (1949), a mystery in which a young man presumed to have committed suicide as a child returns to claim an inheritance to which the reader knows he has no right. The Daughter of Time (1951) is an investigation of the murder of the Princes in the Tower. Under the name of Gordon Daviot she wrote Richard of Bordeaux (1933), a historical drama based on the life of Richard II.

THACKERAY, Anne Isabella, see Ritchie.

THACKERAY, William Makepeace (1811–63), born in Calcutta, the son of Richmond Thackeray, a collector in the East India Company’s service. His father died when he was 3, and Thackeray was sent home to England in 1817, to be rejoined by his mother, who had married again, in 1820. Thackeray was educated at Charterhouse, where he was not happy, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a close friend of E. Fitzgerald. He left Cambridge in June 1830 without taking a degree, having lost some of his inheritance through gambling. He visited Paris, and spent the winter of 1830–1 in Weimar, where he met Goethe. He entered the Middle Temple, but he had little enthusiasm for the law, and never practised as a barrister. He began his career in journalism by becoming the proprietor of a struggling weekly paper, the National Standard, in 1833. It ceased publication a year later, but the experience had given Thackeray an entrée to the London literary world. He also pursued his other enthusiasm, for art, and studied in a London art school and a Paris atelier. By the end of 1833 virtually all his inherited money had been lost, probably in the collapse of the Indian agency-houses. Thackeray lived in Paris from 1834 until 1837, making a meagre living from journalism. For a short while he had a regular income as Paris correspondent of the Constitutional, a newspaper bought by his stepfather, and he married Isabella Shawe in 1836, the year in which his first publication in volume form, Flore et Zephyr, a series of ballet caricatures, appeared. The Constitutional failed, and the Thackerays returned to London, where their first child Anne (Anne Thackeray Ritchie) was born in 1837. Thackeray began to contribute regularly to Fraser’s Magazine, and also wrote for many other periodicals, including the Morning Chronicle, the New Monthly Magazine, and The Times. A second daughter born in 1839 did not live long, and after the birth of their third child, Harriet Marian (later the first wife of Leslie Stephen), in 1840 Isabella Thackeray suffered a mental breakdown which proved permanent. Thackeray was forced to place her first in the care of a French doctor, later in a private home in England, and to send his children to live with his mother in Paris.

During the 1840s Thackeray began to make a name for himself as a writer. He first came to the attention of the public with The Yellowplush Papers, which appeared in Fraser’s Magazine in 1837–8: these were a critique of what Carlyle called ‘flunkeyism’, delivered through the device of a footman-narrator. These were followed by Catherine, narrated by ‘Ikey Solomon’ (1839) and ‘A Shabby Genteel Story’ (1840). His first full-length volume, The Paris Sketch Book, containing miscellaneous early journalism, appeared in the same year, and in 1841 appeared *The Great Hoggarty Adversity brings bad luck to Samuel Titmarsh, an amiable young clerk who inherits the gem; this is narrated by Sam's cousin, Michael Angelo Titmarsh, who provided Thackeray with his most familiar pseudonym. Other pseudonyms included 'George Savage FitzBoodle', a bachelor clubman, 'author' of The FitzBoodle Papers (1842–3), narrator of Men's Wives (1843) and 'editor' of The Luck of Barry Lyndon (1844); James de la Pluche, and 'Our Fat Correspondent'. The Irish Sketch Book of 1843 (a personal, impressionistic and prejudiced account of an 1842 tour of Ireland) has a preface signed, for the first time, with Thackeray's own name.

Thackeray began his association with Punch in 1842, and contributed to it caricatures as well as articles and humorous sketches. The Snobs of England, by One of Themselves (later published as The Book of Snobs, 1848), narrated by 'Mr Snob', appeared there 1846–7; this constitutes his great anatomy of the English vice of snobbery, a term he invented. Mr Punch's Prize Novellists (1847) parodies the leading writers of the day. His children returned to live with him in 1846. In 1847 his first major novel, Vanity Fair, began to appear in monthly numbers, with illustrations by the author. Pendennis followed in 1848–50. In 1841 Thackeray's increasing love for Jane Brookfield, the wife of an old Cambridge friend, led to a rupture in their friendship, and his next novel The History of Henry Esmond shows signs, as Thackeray confessed, of his melancholy at this time. It was published in three volumes in 1852, and was followed by The Newcomes, published in numbers in 1853–5.

As well as the major novels, Thackeray continued to produce lighter work; he wrote for Punch until 1854, and produced a series of 'Christmas Books' which he illustrated himself: The Rose and the Ring (by 'Mr M. A. Titmarsh'), a delightful children's story, was published in 1855. In 1851 he gave a series of lectures on The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century, and in 1855–7 he lectured on The Four Georges. He twice visited the United States to deliver his lectures, in 1852–3 and 1855–6. The Virginians, set partly in America, appeared in numbers in 1857–9. In 1860 he became the first editor of the Cornhill Magazine, for which he wrote his delightfully casual improvisations, the Roundabout Papers. Lovel the Widower, The Adventures of Philip, and the unfinished Denis Duval all first appeared in the Cornhill. Thackeray died suddenly on Christmas Eve 1863.

There is an authoritative biography of Thackeray by Gordon Ray in two volumes: Thackeray: The Uses of Adversity (1955) and Thackeray: The Age of Wisdom (1958). Ray also edited Thackeray's Letters and Private Papers (1945–6), and his study of the relation between Thackeray's fiction and his life, The Buried Life, was published in 1952. Anne Thackeray Ritchie published * Chapters from Some Memoirs* in 1894, and her introductions to the Biographical Edition (1899) of her father's works contain many anecdotes about his life.

Theatre criticism, in the journalistic sense, began in Britain in the early 18th cent. Despite earlier attempts by Dryden in his prefaces and Thomas Rymer in A Short View of Tragedy to uphold French neo-classical principles, it was not governed by a continental adherence to aesthetic rules. Its emergence was determined by pragmatic factors: the rise of the opinionated essayist, the strength of Restoration acting, and the need to protect the stage from moral censure. All three converge in Steele who, writing on the death of Bettenor in 1710, claims, 'There is no human invention so aptly calculated for the forming a free-born people as that of the theatre.' But while Steele and Addison were occasional commentators, Hill and Popple in The Prompter (1734–6) became the first professional theatre critics pursuing a campaign for realistic acting that paved the way for Garrick.

The proliferation of late 18th-cent, journalism, the centrality of the stage in London life, and the presence of great actors all promoted a lively criticism based on personal observation. But it was Leigh Hunt and Hazlitt who transformed dramatic criticism from a transient record into a durable art. Both were writing, between 1805 and 1830, in the period Shaw called 'the winter solstice of English drama': both, however, were witness to legendary performances. Hunt was often at his best writing about comic actors such as Charles James Mathews or Robert William Elliston: Hazlitt was inspired by the demonic genius of Edmund Kean. His reviews of Kean's Shakespearian performances combine astute technical analysis with vivid impressionistic images: describing the battle scenes in Richard III, he writes that Kean 'fought like one drunk with wounds'.

Hazlitt argued that Shakespeare's best commentators were his actors; and actor-led criticism continued in the later 19th cent. with G. H. Lewes and Joseph Knight. But, with the emergence of Ibsen and the new drama, the rules changed. Shaw used his coruscating columns in the Saturday Review in the 1890s to attack the reigning actor-manager Henry Irvings, and to endorse a drama that addressed social and moral issues: he was keenly supported by William Archer who was both an advocate of Shaw and translator of Ibsen. Shaw's successor, Max Beerbohm, was more a whimsical essayist than an embattled campaigner and James Agate, who wrote for the Sunday Times from 1923 to 1947, was a distinguished connoisseur of acting rather than a reliable analyst of plays. But the separate traditions of graphic reporter and militant enthusiast converged in Kenneth Tynan, who both enshrined legendary performances, particularly those of Olivier, and used his Observer columns to champion Brecht and Osborne. Harold Hobson, his opposite number on the Sunday Times, was equally persuasive about the work of Beckett, Pinter, and works. His Shakespeare Restored powerful spectacle of post-war nightmare, revenge, and materialism. The Street of Crocodiles (1992) and Out of a House Walked a Man (1994), both co-produced with the Royal *National Theatre, gave stunning new articulation to the forgotten absurdists Bruno Schulz and Daniel Kharms. Complicité helped to redraw the map of British theatre in the 1980s, raising the ensemble performance stakes alongside the continuing wealth of new playwriting. Their version of John *Berger’s The Three Lives of Lucie Cabrol (1994) combined the best of both worlds in a work of intellectual passion and physical distinction.

THELWALL, John (1764–1834), English radical, who in 1794 was arrested with *Tooke for his revolutionary views, and subsequently tried and acquitted. He published several volumes of verse, political essays, tracts on elocution, etc. He was an acquaintance of *Wordsworth and *Coleridge, whom he visited in Somerset in 1797, having walked on foot from London, a journey described in part (although anonymously) in the *Monthly Magazine, 1799.

Thenot, (1) a shepherd in Spenser’s *The Shepheardes Calender; (2) a character in Fletcher’s *The Faithful Shepherdess.

THEOBALD, Lewis (1688–1744), Shakespearian scholar and author of poems, essays, and dramatic works. His Shakespeare Restored (1726) exposed *Pope’s incapacity as an editor of Shakespeare; Pope retaliated with his devastating portrait of Theobald as hero of his *Dunciad. Nevertheless Pope incorporated many of Theobald’s corrections in his second edition, and Theobald’s 1733–4 edition of Shakespeare surpassed that of his rival. Over 300 emendations made to the texts by Theobald are still accepted by most modern editors and he was a pioneer in the study of Shakespeare’s sources. Double Falsehood (1728), a dramatization of *Cardenio, bears the inscription on the title-page: ‘Written Originally by W. Shakespeare; and now Revised and Adapted to the Stage By Mr. Theobald.’ ‘Cardenio, a lost play, had been entered in the Stationers’ Register in 1653 as ‘by Mr Fletcher & Shakespeare’ and it is likely that Double Falsehood is Theobald’s attempt at establishing a vital relationship between Shakespeare and *Cervantes. The fact that Theobald failed to publish the original or comment on it in any detail in his 1733–4 edition subjected him to further ridicule by, among others, *Fielding in his *A Journey from This World to the Next.

THEOCRITUS (c.308–c.240 BC), a native of Sicily who lived in Cos and Alexandria. He was the most important of the Greek bucolic poets and the one who established for the *pastoral the formal characteristics, setting, and tone which it was to retain for centuries. His most distinctive poems evoke the life and rustic arts of the shepherds on his native island, maintaining a successful balance between idealization and realism. Remembered primarily as a pastoral poet, he was in fact a most versatile writer, and a bridal hymn, a panegyric, and a mime describing two middle-class women at a showy religious ceremony are among his best pieces. Theocritus wrote in the Doric dialect, and the difficulties this produced for his readers led to his comparative neglect during the Renaissance. Editions of his text did not appear in substantial numbers until the end of the 18th cent., and modern writers of pastoral from *Petrarca to *Pope tended rather to take *Virgil for a model. There was however an excellent anonymous translation of six of Theocritus’ idylls in 1588, and in 1684 Thomas Creech put all his works into English, a year before *Dryden (whose preface praised Theocritus’ ‘tenderness and naturalness’) contributed some translations to *Tonson’s Miscellany. Victorian imitators, such as *Tennyson in *The Lotos-Eaters’ (1833), delighted in the sensuality of Theocritus’ world of pastoral delights.

THEODORE (602–90), archbishop of Canterbury, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia. He studied at Athens, and was well versed in Greek and Latin literature. He was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalius in 668. He imposed the Roman order and was the first archbishop to whom (according to *Bede) the whole English Church agreed in submitting after the divisions leading up to the Synod of Whitby (663/4). He founded a school of learning at Canterbury, and created many new bishoprics. Theodore was a great organizer, the effects of his work surviving to the present day; and was author, at least in part, of the Poenitentiale, of considerable ecclesiastical and historical interest. See Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, ed. A. W. Haddan and W. Stubbs (1871), iii. 173–204.

THEODORIC, see DIETRICH OF BERN.

THEOPHRASTUS (c.372–287 BC), Greek philosopher, head of the Peripatetic school after *Aristotle. He is reputed to have written on style, and two of his works on plants survive. But his interest for English literature derives from his Characters, brief sketches of human types embodying particular faults: the toady, the overpride, the churlish. The popularity of Theophrastus in modern times dates from the edition of his Characters with Latin translations by I. *Casaubon in 1592. An English rendering by John Healey appeared in 1616, but before then J. *Hall enlarged Theophrastus' scope, adding good qualities to bad in his Characters of Vertues and Vices (1608), and Sir T. *Overbury produced, in collaboration with J. *Webster, *Dekker, and *Donne, a volume of Characters that, enlarged after his death, ran into a great number of editions (1614). The genre remained popular throughout the century. (See also character-writing.)

Theory of Moral Sentiments, The, a philosophical work by Adam *Smith, published 1759, and originally delivered in the form of lectures at Glasgow.

The author advances the view that all moral sentiments arise from sympathy, the principle which gives rise to our notions of the merit or demerit of the agent. The basis of morality is pleasure in mutual sympathy, which moderates our natural egocentricity. The desire for such pleasure requires us to see ourselves 'in the light in which others see us', a thought quoted admiringly by *Burns ("To a Louse"):

O wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us
To see ourselvs as others see us.

Smith's account of the role of the imagination in the operation of sympathy influenced *Sterne, in *A Sentimental Journey, and other contemporary writers.

THEROUX, Paul Edward (1941- ), travel writer, novelist, and short story writer, born in Medford, Massachusetts, and educated at Medford High School and the University of Massachusetts. He spent some time teaching in Africa, and then, through D. J. *Enright, secured an appointment to teach at the University of Singapore. His time there provided inspiration for a collection of stories, Sinning with Annie (1972), and a novel, Saint Jack (1973). His first novel Waldo, a surreal comedy, had been published in 1966. Then came Fong and the Indians (1968), a satire set in east Africa; Girls at Play (1969), set in Kenya; and Jungle Lovers (1971), set in Malawi (the former Nyasaland, where Theroux had served in the Peace Corps). His name was made, however, by a series of vivid travel books, written with all the instincts of a novelist, about epic railway journeys: The Great Railway Bazaar (1975), describing a journey across Europe and Russia to Japan; The Old Patagonian Express (1978), depicting travels in South America; and Riding the Iron Rooster (1988), an account of a journey through China. In The Kingdom by the Sea (1983) he turned his attention to the coastline of Britain, his adopted home for many years, while The Happy Isles of Oceania (1992) describes a voyage across the South Pacific. At the same time he continued to produce a steady stream of novels, including The Black Horse (1974), about an English anthropologist returning from Africa; The Family Arsenal (1976), a thriller set in the London underworld; Doctor Slaughter (1984); The Mosquito Coast (1982), one of his finest novels, subsequently filmed, in which an American engineer seeks a new life in Honduras; My Secret History (1989); O-Zone (1986), a dystopian fantasy; Millroy the Magician (1993); The Pillars of Hercules (1995); and My Other Life (1996), an 'imaginary memoir' which disconcertingly mixes fact and fiction. Both The Consul's File (1977) and The London Embassy (1982) are collections of episodic short stories dealing with expatriate communities. A volume of Collected Stories was also published in 1995. Sir Vidia's Shadow: A Friendship across Five Continents (1998) charts the decline of his personal relationship with V. S. Naipaul, a writer he much admires.

Thersites, the most querulous and ill-favoured of the Greek host in the Trojan War. He was killed by Achilles for laughing at the latter's grief over the death of Penthesilea, the queen of the Amazons. He figures in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida as a scabrous cynic.

Theseus, a son of Poseidon, or, according to later legend, of Aegeus, king of Athens. His exploits (in association with Medea, the Minotaur, Ariadne, Phedra, etc.) form the basis of many literary works, and he appears as the duke of Athens in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, with his newly won bride Hippolyta, and also in Fletcher's The Two Noble Kinsmen.

THESIGER, Sir Wilfred (Patrick) (1910- ), travel writer, explorer, soldier, and photographer, born in the British legation in Addis Ababa (Abyssinia, now Ethiopia) where his father was British minister. He was educated at Eton and Oxford. In 1933–4 he explored the little-known territories of the Danakil people (see his Danakil Diary, pub. 1998) and became increasingly taken with a desire to live among herdsmen, hunters, and swamp-dwellers, far from the Europeanized capitals of Addis Ababa and Khartoum. Arabian Sands (1959) is a solemn epitaph for traditional Arabia, based on the years he spent in the Empty Quarter with the Bedu, and The Marsh Arabs (1964) describes the years he spent in the marshes of southern Iraq. In 1960 he moved to the northern highlands of Kenya. His autobiographical works are Desert, Marsh and Mountain (1979, which includes accounts of travels in Persia and Iraqi Kurdistan as well as many photographs); The Life of My Choice (1987); and My Kenya Days (1994).

Thierry King of France, and His Brother Theodoret, The Tragedy of, a play by J. *Fletcher, with the collaboration probably of *Massinger and possibly of Theodoret, king of Austrasia, reproves his mother Brunhalt for her licentiousness, and to revenge herself she attempts to sow enmity between him and his younger brother Thierry, but fails. With the assistance of her lover Protaldy, and a physician, specialist in poisons, she destroys the happiness of Thierry and his young bride Ordella, then has Theodoret assassinated, then attempts to procure the death of Ordella, and finally poisons Thierry. Vengeance then falls upon Brunhalt and her accomplices. There are incidents in the play which may be allusions to the queen regent of France, Marie de Médicis, and her favourite Concini (murdered in 1617).

THIONG'O, Ngugi Wa, formerly known as James T.
Ngugi (1938– ), Kenyan novelist, born at Limuru, Kenya, and educated at the University of Makerere and at Leeds University. Weep Not, Child (1964), a novel of childhood that draws largely from his own upbringing and mission-school education, ends by rejecting the romantic individualism of its protagonist. The River between (1965; the first written, though the second to be published, of his novels) also ends with a reversal, in which Waiyaki recognizes on his deathbed the need for political activity if clannish divisions and cultural fragmentation are to be overcome; education can bring individual but not national advancement. A Grain of Wheat (1967) blends the realism and compassion of his undergraduate short stories with the messianic political search of his first two novels. When Ngugi took to writing in his own language, Gikuyu, his government arrested him in 1977, and he wrote his first Gikuyu novel largely in prison; it was translated as Devil on the Cross (1982), after being published in Nairobi in 1980 in its original version. Detained: A Prison Writer’s Diary (1981) was, however, written in English. Several extracts from works banned in Kenya have appeared in *Index on Censorship. See also POST-COLONIAL LIT-ERATURE.

THIRKELL, Angela Margaret, née Mackail (1890–1961), prolific writer who enjoyed great popularity in the 1930s with novels, many set in a rural Barsetshire borrowed from *Trollope (Ankle Deep, 1933, August Folly, 1936, The Brandons, 1939, Peace Breaks Out, 1945, etc.). She was a granddaughter of *Burne-Jones and her son (by her first marriage) was the writer Colin MacInnes: her second husband George Thirkell was an Australian engineer, but the marriage failed, and having spent some ten years in Australia (which she disliked) she returned to England to earn her living, very successfully, as a writer of idealized English country life.

THIRLWALL, Connop (1797–1875), educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1818. He was ordained priest in 1828. He translated Schleiermacher’s Essay on the Gospel of St Luke (1825) and his introduction to this work was remarkable for its acquaintance with German theology. This was followed by a translation with *Hare of *Niebuhr’s History of Rome (1828–42) and their Vindication of Niebuhr’s History (1829). Also with Hare he edited the Philological Museum (1832–3) which contained Thirlwall’s important essay on ‘The Irony of Sophocles’.

In 1832 he was appointed assistant tutor at Trinity College but was forced to resign his university posts in 1834 owing to his denunciation of compulsory attendance in chapel in the controversy over the admission of Dissenters to the universities. He was immediately offered the living of Kirby Underdale where he wrote his chief work, the History of Greece (1835–44, for Lardner’s Cyclopaedia, rev. 1847–52). In 1840 Lord Melbourne appointed him bishop of St David’s. He supported the admission of Jews to Parliament, the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and allowed Bishop *Colenso to preach in his diocese. These subjects and the *Essays and Reviews controversy are dealt with in his ‘Charges’ ( published in Remains, Literary and Theological, 1877– 8).

THOMAS, (Walter) Brandon, see CHARLEY’S AUNT and FARCE.

THOMAS, D(onald) M(ichael) (1935– ), poet, novelist, and translator, was born in Cornwall and educated there, in Australia, and at New College, Oxford; he learned Russian while doing his National Service, and his work has been much influenced by his familiarity with Russian literature. His translations include two volumes of the poems of *Akhmatova (1976, 1979) and *Pushkin’s The Bronze Horseman and Other Poems
(1982); his own volumes of poetry include Two Voices
(1968), Logan Stone (1971), Love and Other Deaths (1975), The Honeymoon Voyage (1978), Dreaming in Bronze (1981), and Selected Poems (1983). His first novel, The Flute-Player (1979), is a surreal fantasy set in a totalitarian state, in which flute-player Elena represents in part the persecuted creative spirit of the Russian poets (*Mandelstam, *Pasternak, *Tsve-yeva, and Akhmatova) to whom the book is dedicated.

Birthstone (1980), set in Cornwall, is an idiosyncratic blend of fantasy, comedy, realism, eroticism, and magic. With The White Hotel (1981) he achieved international success. The novel combines an invented but carefully documented case history of one of *Freud’s patients, Russian-Jewish Lisa Erdman, with her erotic and nightmare fantasies in prose and verse, a realistic account of her cure, her career as opera singer and subsequent marriage, and the steps that lead her and her stepson Kolya to her dreamforeseen death in the 1941 massacre at Babiy Yar. Ararat (1983) shows a similar brooding on the theme of holocaust (this time of the Armenians) and on the relationship between sex and death, and a similar narrative complexity: Russian poet Sergei Rozahov, grandson of an Armenian storyteller, improvises one night in Gorky to a blind admirer a tale of improvisation within improvisation, with a central section inspired by Pushkin's unfinished Egyptian Nights, in which Cleopatra offers a night of love in exchange for death. This was followed by Swallow (1984); Sphinx (1986); Summit (1987); Lying Together (1990); and Flying into Love (1992), based on the assassination of John F. Kennedy; Pictures at an Exhibition (1993), and Eating Pavlova (1994). A frank volume of autobiography, Memories and Hallucinations, was published in 1988. Alexander Solzhenitsyn: A Century in His Life (1997) is a biography.

THOMAS, Dylan Marlais (1914–53), poet, born in Swansea, the son of the English master at Swansea Grammar School, where he himself was educated; he knew no Welsh. He began to write poetry while still at school, and worked in Swansea as a journalist before moving to London in 1934; his first volume of verse, 18 Poems, appeared in the same year. He then embarked on a Grub Street career of journalism, broadcasting, and film-making, spending much time in the flourishing afternoon drinking clubs of the era, and rapidly acquiring a reputation for exuberance and flamboyance, as both poet and personality. In 1937 he married Caitlin Macnamara; they settled for a while at Laugharne in Wales, returning there permanently after many wanderings in 1949. Despite some allegations of deliberate obscurity, Thomas's romantic, affirmative, rhetorical style gradually won a large following; it was both new and influential (and much imitated by his contemporaries of the New Apocalypse movement), and the publication of Deaths and Entrances (1946), which contains some of his best-known work (including ‘Fern Hill’ and ‘A Refusal to Mourn the Death by Fire of a Child in London’) established him with a wide public: his Collected Poems 1934–1952 (1952) sold extremely well. His work sheets, minutely and continually laboured over, reveal him as an impassioned, even obsessive, craftsman; a great part of his mature work consists of the reworking of the early poetic outbursts of his youth, controlled by a strict discipline.

Thomas also wrote a considerable amount of prose. The Map of Love (1939) is a collection of prose and verse; Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog (1940) is a collection of largely autobiographical short stories; Adventures in the Skin Trade (1955) is a collection of stories, including the unfinished title story (also edited separately by his friend V. *Watkins, 1955); A Prospect of the Sea (1955) is a collection of stories and essays. He was a popular entertainer on radio and with students; in 1950 he undertook the first of his lecture tours to the United States, and he died there on his fourth visit, as legend grew about his wild living and hard drinking. Shortly before his death he took part in a reading in New York of what was to be his most famous single work, Under Milk Wood. His Notebooks (ed. R. N. Maud) were published in 1968, and a new edition of The Poems of Dylan Thomas (1971) is enriched by authoritative critical notes and personal comments by his friend and early collaborator, the composer Daniel Jones (1912– ). See also a life by C. Fitzibbon (1965), who also edited his Selected Letters (1960).

THOMAS, (Philip) Edward (1878–1917), poet, born in Lambeth and educated at St Paul's and Lincoln College, Oxford. He married young and moved to Kent, supporting his family by producing many volumes of prose, much of it topographical and biographical, including a biography of R. Jefferies (1909), who profoundly influenced him. In 1913 Hodgson introduced him to Frost, with whose encouragement he turned to poetry. In 1915 Frost returned to America and Thomas enlisted in the army. He was killed at Arras. Most of his poetry was published posthumously, though a few pieces appeared under the pseudonym ‘Edward Eastaway’ between 1915 and 1917. Various collections followed, the fullest, Collected Poems, edited by R. George Thomas, 1978. His work shows a loving and accurate observation of the English pastoral scene, combined with a bleak and scrupulous honesty and clarity. Both he and Frost advocated the use of natural diction, and of colloquial speech rhythms in metrical verse. Leavis singled him out as ‘an original poet of rare quality, who has been associated with the Georgians by mischance’ and his work is now highly regarded. There are memoirs by his widow Helen Thomas, As It Was (1926) and World without End (1931), and by E. Farjeon. See also A. Motion, The Poetry of Edward Thomas (1980).

THOMAS, R(onald) S(tuart) (1913– ), poet and clergyman, born in Cardiff, and educated at St Michael's College, Llandaff, and University College, Bangor; he was ordained as clergyman in the Church of Wales in 1936. From 1942 to 1954 he was rector of Manafon, Montgomeryshire, and subsequently was vicar of Eglwysfach, then of St Hywyn, Aberdaron, with Y Rhiw and Llanfaelrhys; he retired in 1978. His first volume of poems, The Stones of the Field (1946), was followed by many others, including Song at the Year's Turning (1955), Tares (1961), Pietà (1966), Not that He Brought flowers (1968), and Laboratories of the Spirit (1975); his Selected Poems 1946–68 was published in 1973. His poetry is deeply coloured by his experience of working in remote rural communities, where some of the churches had tiny congregations and where life was harsh and the landscape bleak; he has created his own form of bleak Welsh pastoral, streaked with indignation over the history of Wales and the Welsh—‘an impotent people, I Sick with inbreeding I Worrying the carcase of an old song’ (Welsh Landscape, 1955). The poet's invocation of his peasant parishioners (who are frequently portrayed as vacant, sullen, miserly, mean-spirited) is unspiring: 'There is no love I For such, only a willed gentleness' (They). Many of the poems unite religious and rural imagery (see the title poem of Pietà), but the religious affirmation is always hard won. Later volumes include Experimenting with an Amen which is probably to be included the famous De Imitatione Christi, which has been translated from the Latin into many languages (into English in the middle of the 15th cent.). This work was at one time attributed to Jean Charlier de Gerson, a French theologian. It traces in four books the gradual progress of the soul to Christian perfection, its detachment from the world, and its union with God; and obtained wide popularity by its simplicity and sincerity and the universal quality of its religious teaching.

THOMASON, George (d. 1666), a London bookseller and publisher and friend of *Pryne and *Milton; Milton's sonnet 'When Faith and Love which parted from thee never' was written in 1646 on the death of Thomason's wife Katherine. Thomason's collection of political tracts and broadsides published between the outbreak of the Civil War and the Restoration was presented to the *British Museum in 1762; it includes four items donated by Milton personally. The tracts were catalogued in 1908 by George Fortescue.

Thomist (pron. 'Tomist'), a follower of the *Scholastic philosopher St Thomas *Aquinas.

THOMPSON, E(dward) P(almer) (1924–93), historian, educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and for many years (1948–65) an extramural lecturer at Leeds University. His works include a study of W. *Morris (1955) and The Making of the English Working Class (1963), a work in which he sought 'to rescue the poor stockinger, the Luddite cropper, the “obsolete” handloom weaver, the “utopian” artisan, and even the deluded follower of Joanna Southcott, from the enormous condescension of posterity'. He also wrote and lectured in support of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. Witness against the Beast, a study of William *Blake, was published posthumously in 1993.

THOMPSON, Hunter S(tockton) (1939– ). American journalist and writer, born in Louisville, Kentucky. He spent many years writing for Rolling Stone magazine, in which the two works for which he is best known first appeared. Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas (1972), subtitled 'a savage journey to the heart of the American Dream', is an account of a heavily drugged visit to Las Vegas, offering a brutal, funny, and often horrifying dissection of American culture. No less provocative was Fear and Loathing on the Campaign Trail '72 (1973), his coverage for Rolling Stone of the 1972 American presidential campaign. He spent a year riding with the Hell’s Angels, ran for sheriff of Aspen, Colorado, in 1970, and subsequently awarded himself a doctorate. With Tom *Wolfe and Joan *Didion a pioneer of New Journalism, his own irreverent political and cultural writing (‘Gonzo Journalism’) has been collected into four volumes. Proud Highway, the first volume of his Letters, was published in 1997, and a novel The Rum Diary (written in 1959) in 1998.

THOMS, William John (1803–85), antiquary, who became successively clerk and deputy librarian to the House of Lords. He was author of several works including The Book of the Court (1838), and edited a number of volumes including a collection of Early Prose Romances (1827–8) and The History of Reynard the Fox (1844) for the *Percy Society. He was secretary of the *Camden Society from 1838 to 1873. In 1846, in an article in the *Athenaeum headed ‘Folk Lore’ he introduced this term into the English language. Encouraged by *Dilke he founded *Notes and Queries in 1849.

THOMSON, James (1834–82), born in Scotland, the son of a poor merchant seaman. He attended the Royal Caledonian Asylum school when the family moved to London. He was trained as an army schoolmaster, in which capacity he was sent in 1851–2 to Ireland, where he met *Bradlaugh, who became his staunch friend, and also a young girl, Matilda Weller, who died in 1853 but who became an important symbolic figure in Thomson’s later poetry. Between 1852 and 1862 he worked at army stations in England and Ireland and wrote much poetry, some of which was accepted by various journals, including Bradlaugh’s National Reformer. For his early work he used the pseudonym ‘B.V.’, representing his admiration for *Shelley with ‘Bysshe’ and for the German poet *Hardenberg (‘Novalis’) with ‘Vanolis’. Signs of growing alcoholism appeared in the late 1850s and in 1862 Thomson was discharged from the army, probably for drunkenness. He came to London, and until 1868 lodged with the Bradlaughs. He took various jobs and wrote poems, essays, and translations for several magazines, publishing among other work ‘Vane’s Story’, ‘Sunday up the River’, and ‘Sunday at Hampstead’. ‘Weddah’, a long poem relating a tragic Arabian love story, appeared in 1871, and led to friendship with W. M. *Rossetti. For part of 1872 Thomson was with a gold company in Colorado, and in 1873 in Spain as a war reporter; on his return he completed his best-known poem, The City of Dreadful Night, which appeared in the National Reformer in 1874, and received some favourable notice, including encouragement from G. *Eliot and later from *Meredith. This long poem, which much influenced the mood of fin de siècle poetic pessimism, is a powerful evocation of a half-ruined city, a ‘Venice of the Black Sea’, through which flows the River of the Suicides; the narrator, in vain search of ‘dead Faith, dead Love, dead Hope’, encounters tormented shades wandering in a Dantesque vision of a living hell, over which presides the sombre and sublime figure of Melancolia (based on *Dürer’s engraving of 1514). In 1880 his first volume of verse, The City of Dreadful Night and Other Poems, and a second volume later in the same year, were well received. Essays and Phantasies appeared in 1881. But his alcoholism was by now out of control; Satires and Profanities was published posthumously in 1884. There is a life by H. S. Salt, 1889; see also Poems and Some Letters of James Thomson (1963) edited with a biographical introduction by Anne *Ridler. See also...

THOMSON, Rupert (1955— ), novelist, born in Eastbourne. His first novel, Dreams of Leaving (1987), an ambitious mix of fantasy and realism, was followed by The Five Gates of Hell (1991), set in a surreal, Gothic landscape reminiscent of Miami, and Air and Fire (1993), a historical tale set in Central Europe. Playful and sinister, The Insult (1996) took Thomson to another invented territory, a conflation of Edward Hopper's lonely cityscapes and the myth of Central Europe: Martin Blom may or may not have problems with his eyesight, but he can definitely see that something is going on. Is his doctor trying to pull the wool over his eyes or is Blom really blind? You decide. In Soft (1998), three main characters are linked by an innovative marketing strategy for a new soft drink. The title pertains as much to the novel's structure—the construction folding in on itself like one of Dali's soft clocks—as it does to 'Kwench!'.

THOMSON, Sir William, first Baron Kelvin (1824—1907), educated at Glasgow, where he later became professor of natural philosophy, and at Peterhouse, Cambridge. His formulation of the second law of thermodynamics, predicting that the world would sooner or later suffer a heat death as a result of entropy, contributed significantly to late 19th-cent. pessimism. The ignorance of this law displayed by most 20th-cent. literary intellectuals was used as an illustration of the gap between the *'Two Cultures' by C. P. *Snow.

THOREAU, Henry David (1817—62), American author, born in Concord, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard. He became a follower and friend of *Emerson, and was, in his own words, 'a mystic, a transcendentalist, and a natural philosopher to boot'. He supported himself by a variety of occupations, as lead pencil-maker (his father's trade), as schoolteacher, tutor, and surveyor; a few of his poems were published in the *Dial, but he made no money from literature, and published only two books in his lifetime. The first, A Week on the Concord and Merrimack River (1849), described a journey undertaken in 1839 with his brother; the second, Walden, or Life in the Woods (1854), attracted little attention, but has since been recognized as a literary masterpiece and as one of the seminal books of the century. It describes his two-year experiment in self-sufficiency (1845—7) when he built himself a wooden hut on the edge of Walden Pond, near Concord; he describes his domestic economy, his agricultural experiments, his visitors and neighbours, the plants and wildlife, and his sense of the Indian past, with a deeply challenging directness that questions the materialism and the prevailing work ethic of the age. Yet he is constantly aware of the surrounding world, to which he eventually returns; he can hear from his hut 'the rattle of railroad cars, now dying away and then reviving like the beat of a partridge'. The work is studded with apparently casual illuminations ('The mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation') and with lines of poetic sensibility ('A field of water betrays the spirit that is in the air'). Equally influential in future years was his essay on 'Civil Disobedience' (1849; originally entitled 'Resistance to Civil Government'), in which he argues the right of the individual to refuse to pay taxes when conscience dictates, as he and Bronson Alcott had done in 1843, in protest against the Mexican War and slavery, for which he had in 1845 been briefly imprisoned. Thoreau's reputation as philosopher and political thinker, as well as naturalist, was strengthened by a biography (1890) by the British socialist Henry S. Salt, and by the admiration of E. *Carpenter and H. *Ellis in Britain; his technique of passive resistance, as described in *'Civil Disobedience', was adopted by Gandhi. He has also been hailed as a pioneer ecologist. His Journal (14 vols) was published in 1906, his collected Writings (20 vols) also in 1906, and a new scholarly edition of works began publication in 1971.

THORPE, Adam (1956— ), novelist and poet, born in Paris and brought up in India, Cameroon, and England. Educated at Marlborough and Magdalen College, Oxford, he subsequently worked in drama, both performing and teaching, before leaving England in 1990 to live in France. His novels are Ulverton (1992), Still (1995), and Pieces of Light (1998) and he has published three books of poetry, most recently From the Neanderthal (1999). He rose to prominence with his first novel, a dense subversive tour de force which places Ulverton, a fictional Wessex village, at the still centre of three centuries of social, linguistic, and historical flux, with each chapter narrated in a different but appropriate style. All his work is in some way connected with the continuum of history and an exploration of Englishness.

THRALE, Hester Lynch, Mrs, née Salusbury (1741—1821), married against her inclinations in 1763 to Henry Thrale, the son of a wealthy brewer. The following year they met Dr *Johnson, who became very friendly with both. He wrote election addresses for Thrale, and spent much time in their company, at one period becoming almost domesticated at their house in Streatham Place. Mrs Thrale, a lively and intelligent woman, bore several children, of whom only four daughters survived to maturity. Three years after Thrale's death in 1781, and amid much opposition from family and friends (including F. *Burney), she married Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian musician; this drew from Johnson a letter of anguished protest, which he regretted, but their intimacy was at an end, and there is evidence that Mrs Thrale had already begun to find him a demanding guest. She published several works, including Anecdotes of the Late Samuel Johnson (1786); Thraliana, a mixture of diary, anecdotes, poems, and jests, covering the period 1776–1809, was edited in 1942, 2 vols, by K. C. Balderston.

Three Clerks, The, a novel by A. Trollope, published 1858.

The three clerks are Harry Norman, Alaric Tudor, and Alaric’s gauche cousin Charley. In the course of the novel each marries one of the daughters of Mrs Woodward, a widow living near Hampton Court. At first Harry and Alaric vie for the attentions of the eldest daughter Gertrude, and in this, as in every other matter where the two come into competition, Alaric gets his way. Alaric, clever and dynamic, profits from the new system of promotion by examination in the civil service; but with responsibility comes temptation, and Alaric falls. He is arrested for the abuse of a trust fund, is tried, and, despite the best efforts of his counsel, Chaffanbrass, imprisoned. His wife Gertrude, and the dependable Harry Norman, help him through the ordeal and into Australian exile.

Meanwhile Charley has built up a literary reputation, won promotion, and settled down to married life. Charley’s experiences reflect Trollope’s own in his early days as a clerk at the Post Office.

Three Hours after Marriage (1717), a comedy by *Arbuthnot, *Gay, and *Pope.

Three Men in a Boat, see Jerome, J. K.

Threepenny Opera, The (Die Dreigroschenoper), *Brecht’s updated version of The Beggar's Opera.

Three Weeks after Marriage, a comedy by *Murphy, performed 1764. It satirizes the parvenu tastes of a rich retired tradesman, Mr Drugget, who has married his eldest daughter to another penniless man of fashion, Lovelace. But his experiences with the recently wedded couple resolve him to abjure all dealings with fashionable society.

Thrie Estaitis, Satyre of the; see Pleasant Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis, Ane.

Through the Looking-Glass and What Alice Found There, a book for children by Lewis Carroll (see Dodgson), published 1872.

Alice (see Alice’s Adventures in Wonderland) walks in a dream through the looking-glass into Looking-Glass House, where she finds that the chessmen, particularly the red and white queens, are alive; meets with Tweedledum and Tweedledee and Humpty-Dumpty; and so forth. The story ends with Alice, who has the red queen in her arms, ‘shaking her into a kitten’ (for she had gone to sleep playing with the black and white kittens). The well-known verses about the Jabberwock and the Walrus and the Carpenter occur in the course of the story.

THUBRON, Colin (1939– ), novelist and travel writer, born in London. His travel writings began in the eastern Mediterranean and include Mirror to Damascus (1967), The Hills of Adonis (1968), and Journey into Cyprus (1975), which provided the setting for his first novel, The God in the Mountain (1977). Later travel books took on increasingly difficult terrain, and include Among the Russians (1983, a journey to Moscow, the Caucasus, the Ukraine, and the Crimea), Behind the Wall (1987, a journey through China), and The Last Heart of Asia (1994). His novels, which also tend to emphasize man’s essentially solitary or estranged condition, include Emperor (1978), A Cruel Madness (1984, set in a mental institution), and Falling (1989). Turning back the Sun (1991) is set in an unnamed country where the doctor Rayner, a lonely idealist, tries to prevent the persecution of the ‘savage’ natives who are suspected of violence against the white population and of spreading a new plague. Distance (1996) is an exploration of time, love, and memory through the narration of an astrophysicist suffering from amnesia.

THUCYDIDES (c.460–c.395 BC), Athenian historian who left a brilliant account of the disastrous war Athens waged against Sparta. Outstanding talent as a writer enabled him to bestow on his subject the inevitable character of a tragedy. He was prepared to trace effects to rational causes; his handling of eyewitness accounts (all-important in a contemporary history) was securely scientific; and although his obvious desire to trace the psychological laws underlying political action has been held to have damaged his standing as a pure historian, some readers have found his political speculations of interest. Like other difficult Greek authors, Thucydides was little read before the 19th cent., although there was a translation by T. Niccols (1550) and one by Hobbes (1629) which he said was intended to display the follies of democracy. Then in 1829 S. T Bloomfield produced an annotated translation. In 1830–5 T. *Arnold published a commentary in which he tried to derive lessons for his own time from the text of Thucydides, and *Jowett’s elegant translation followed in 1881.

Thunderer, The, a nickname given to The Times in the middle of the 19th cent., in allusion to the style of writing of Edward Sterling (1773–1847), a member of its staff, and father of John *Sterling, *Trollope similarly alludes in some of his novels to The Times as ‘The Jupiter’ (from Jupiter Tonans).

THURBER, James Grover (1894–1961), American humorist, many of whose essays, stories, and sketches appeared in the New Yorker, including one of his best-known short stories, ‘The Secret Life of Walter Mitty’ (1932), which describes the colourful escapist fantasies of a docile husband.
Thurio, 'a foolish rival to Valentine' as Silvia's suitor in Shakespeare's *The Two Gentlemen of Verona.

Thurloe, Edward, second Baron Thurloe (1781–1829), public servant and minor writer, who contributed frequently to the Gentleman's Magazine. In 1810 he published an edition of Sidney's A Defence of Poetry and in 1813 his own Poems, followed by further volumes. In 1822 he published Angelica, an attempted continuation of Shakespeare's The Tempest.

Thwaite, a character in Fielding's Tom Jones.

Thyris, A Monody, to commemorate the author's friend, Arthur Hugh Clough, who died at Florence, 1861', a poem by M. *Arnold, first published in Macmillan's Magazine, 1866. The poem is a pastoral elegy lamenting *Clough as Thyris, recalling his 'golden prime' in the days when he and Arnold wandered through the Oxfordshire countryside, their youthful rivalry as poets, and Clough's departure for a more troubled world, where his poetry took on 'a stormy note! Of men contention-tossed'. It invokes the *Scholar-Gypsy as an image of hope and perpetual quest: 'Roam on! The light we sought is shining still.'

Tibert, the cat in Reynard the Fox. The name is the same as Tybalt (see the exchange between Mercutio and Tybalt in Romeo and Juliet, III.i. 75 ff.: 'Tybalt, you rat-catcher . . . Good King of Cats, nothing but one of your nine lives').

Tibullus, Albius (c.48–19 BC), Roman elegiac poet, noted for the refinement and simplicity of his plain style and his idealization of the countryside. Of the three books that bear his name, the first is a celebration of his love for a mistress (Delia) and a boy (Marathus), the second a short account of his love for a woman whom he calls Nemesis, and the third a collection of poems by members of his literary circle. His influence has been discerned in T. *Campion and *Herrick, and *Dryden compared him to *Sedley.

Ticke11, Thomas (1685–1740), educated at The Queen's College, Oxford. He contributed verse to the Guardian, the Spectator and other publications, and was author of various poems, including Oxford (1707), On the Prospect of Peace (1715), and Kensington Garden (1722); his sentimental ballad Lucy and Colin (1725) was much admired by *Gray and *Goldsmith. But he is chiefly remembered as a friend and supporter of *Addison; he may have occasionally the quarrel between *Pope and Addison by publishing in 1715 a translation of the first book of the Iliad at the same time as Pope, at Addison's instigation, as Pope supposed. He edited Addison's works (1721), publishing in the first volume an elegy on Addison's death.

Tilburina, the heroine of Mr Puff's tragedy The Spanish Armada in Sheridan’s The Critic. It is she who observes that even an oyster may be crossed in love.

Till Eulenspiegel, see EULENSPIEGEL.

Tillotson, John (1630–94), educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, a latitudinarian who became archbishop of Canterbury. His sermons, which were very popular, show a marked difference from the earlier *metaphysical style of *Donne and *Andrewes; they were both plainer and shorter, and were extolled as models of lucidity and good sense through most of the 18th cent.

Tillyard, E(ustace) M(andeville) W(etenhall) (1889–1962), scholar and critic. Among weightier publications such as Milton (1930), Shakespeare's Last Plays (1938), Shakespeare's History Plays (1944), and Shakespeare's Problem Plays (1950), probably his short essay The Elizabethan World Picture (1943) has been the most influential. The Personal Heresy, his debate with C. S. *Lewis about the value of a writer's true state of mind through his works, was first published in 1939.

Tilney, General, his sons Henry and Frederick, and his daughter Eleanor, characters in J. Austen's Northanger Abbey.

Timber, or Discoveries Made upon Men and Matter, by *Jonson, printed in the folio of 1640, a collection of notes, extracts, and reflections on miscellaneous subjects, made in the course of the author's wide reading, varying in length from a single sentence to short essays. They are, for the greater part, adapted from Latin writers.
Time and Tide: An Independent Non-Party Weekly Review, a periodical founded in 1920 by Viscountess Rhondda (Margaret Haig Thomas, 1883–1958), with the support of R. *West, Cicely Hamilton, and others. Originally a strongly left-wing and feminist publication, under the editorship of Helen Archdale, it went through many shades of political opinion before its disappearance in 1977. Its contributors included D. H. *Lawrence, V. *Woolf, S. *Jameson, G. B. *Shaw, and Robert *Graves; in 1929 it serialized E. M. *DelafIELD’s Diary of a Provincial Lady; *Betjeman’s poem ‘Caprice’ describes how he was sacked from his post as its literary adviser in 1953.

Times, The, founded under the name of ‘The Daily Universal Register’ on 1 Jan. 1785 by John Walter, the name being changed to The Times in 1788. The founder and his son, also John Walter, introduced great improvements both in the mechanism of newspaper printing and in the collection of intelligence. Among the famous editors of The Times have been Thomas Barnes (1817–41) and John Thaddeus Delane (1841–77). The latter was followed by Thomas Chenery, and in 1884 by G. E. Buckle. The Times was one of the first papers to employ special foreign correspondents (H. C. *Robinson was sent to north Germany in this capacity in 1807) and war correspondents (W. H. Russell in the Crimea). Among notable men of letters who contributed to The Times in early days were *Borrow (from Spain), Leigh *Hunt, and B. *Disraeli (‘Runnymede Letters’).

In the 20th cent. The Times has been edited by G. Robinson (1912–19); H. W. Steed (1919–22); G. Dawson (1922–41); R. M. Barrington Ward (1941–8); W. F. Casey (1948–52); W. Haley (1952–66); W. Rees-Mogg (1966–81); H. Evans (1981–2); C. Douglas-Home (1982–5); C. Wilson (1985–90); S. Jenkins (1990–2); P. Stothard (1992– ). The most dramatic change in the appearance of the paper during this period was the removal, on 3 May 1966, of the column marked ‘Personal’ from the front page, and its replacement by news. Of the three weekly supplements published by The Times group, the *Times Literary Supplement was founded in 1901, the Times Educational Supplement in 1910, and the Times Higher Educational Supplement in 1971. In 1967 both The Times and the *Sunday Times came under the control of Times Newspapers Limited, a group set up by Lord Thomson of Fleet (1894–1976). Because of strike action both papers and the supplements closed down for some months in 1978–9: in 1981 they were all acquired by the News Corporation Limited, of which Rupert Murdoch is chief executive.

Times Literary Supplement (1902– ), a weekly literary periodical of high international standing which first appeared with *The Times in 1902, then in 1914 became a separate publication. The first editor, Bruce *Richmond (later knighted), supported and encouraged many writers of his time, including V. *Woolf, T. S. *Eliot, J. M. *Murry, E. *Blunden, the historians *Namier and E. H. Carr, and many others, both by commissioning articles from them and by giving publicity to their own works. Reviews continued to be anonymous until 1974 when under the editorship of John Gross they began to be signed. The journal endeavours to cover most of the important works of literature and scholarship, and remains influential.

Timias, in Spenser’s *Faerie Queene, Prince *Arthur’s squire, may represent *Ralegh. When wounded (III. v), he is healed by *Belphoebe. The incident of Timias and *Amoret, in IV. vii. 35 and 36, may allude to Ralegh’s relations with Elizabeth Throckmorton.

Timon, a misanthropical citizen of Athens who lived about the time of the Peloponnesian War, the subject (1) of one of *Lucian’s finest Dialogues; (2) of Shakespeare’s *Timon of Athens.

Pope’s Timon, in *Moral Essays IV. 98, an example of ostentatious wealth without sense or taste, was said to be drawn from the duke of Chandos, but Pope repudiated this charge, apparently to the duke’s satisfaction, and it is more likely to be a composite portrait.

Timon of Athens, a drama by *Shakespeare, probably in collaboration with *Middleton, written probably about 1607 and apparently left unfinished; it was not printed until the First Folio of 1623. The material for the play is in *Plutarch’s Life of Antony, Painter’s *Palace of Pleasure, *Lucian’s Timon, or the Misanthrope, and possibly an anonymous play Timon among the Dyce MSS in the Victoria and Albert Museum.

Timon, a rich and noble Athenian of good and gracious nature, having ruined himself by his prodigal liberality to friends, flatterers, and parasites, turns to the richest of his friends for assistance in his difficulties, and is denied it and deserted by all who had previously frequented him. He surprises these by inviting them once more to a banquet; but when the covers are removed from the dishes (Timon crying, ‘Uncover, dogs, and lap’, III. vi), they are found to contain warm water, which with imprecations he throws in his guests’ faces. Cursing the city, he betakes himself to a cave, where he lives solitary and misanthropical. While digging for roots he finds a hoard of gold, which has now no value for him. His embittered spirit is manifested in his talk with the exiled Alcibiades, the churlish philosopher Apeamentus, the thieves and flatterers attracted by the gold, and his faithful steward Flavius. When the senators of Athens, hard pressed by the attack of Alcibiades, come to entreat him to return to the city and help them, he offers them his fig-tree, on which to hang themselves as a refuge from affliction. Soon his tomb is found by the seashore, with an epitaph expressing his hatred of mankind.
TINA SASTRI | 'TIS PITY SHE'S A WHORE

Tina Sastri, a character in G. Eliot’s ‘Mr Gilfil’s Love-Story’ (see SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE).

TINDAL, Matthew, see Deism.

TINDALL, William, see Tyndale.

TINDALL, Gillian (1938–), novelist, short story writer, critic, and historian, born in London, and educated at Oxford. Her works, which show a keen and sensitive interest in contemporary social and moral issues, and frequently feature the dilemmas of the liberal conscience, include The Youngest (1967), in which a mother gives birth to a deformed child; Fly away Home (1971), an exploration in diary form of an early marriage and its consequences, set in Paris, London, and Israel; Dances of Death (1973, stories centred on a subject which, she suggests, had replaced sex as a 20th-cent. taboo); The Traveller and His Child (1975), a novel about parental responsibility, set in North London and France; The Intruder (1979, novel); The China Egg (1981, stories); and Journey of a Lifetime (1990), which collects stories connected by the themes of travel, death, memory, and age. The Fields beneath (1977) is a topographical study of Kentish Town, a North London neighbourhood; City of Gold (1981) is a ‘biography’ of Bombay; and Célestine (1995) is a study of a French village: all show her sense of the influence and importance of place.

Tintagel, a castle on the north coast of Cornwall, of which ruins remain. It figures in Malory as the castle where Uther Pendragon was wedded to Igraine, and which ruins remain. It figures in Malory as the castle where Uther Pendragon was wedded to Igraine, and subsequently as the home of King Mark of Cornwall.

‘Tintern Abbey’, Lines Composed a Few Miles above, on Revisiting the Banks of the Wye during a Tour, a poem by Wordsworth published in the first edition of the Lyric Ballads (1798).

Wordsworth had visited Tintern in 1793; the second visit recorded in this work was with his sister Dorothy, who is addressed in its closing passage, and the poem was composed as they walked towards Bristol. Written in blank verse, its style is far removed from the deliberately ‘low’ manner of the ballads, and Wordsworth himself referred to ‘the impassioned music of the versification’, which resembled the elevation of an ode. It is a central statement of Wordsworth’s faith in the restorative and associative power of nature; he describes the development of his own love of nature from the ‘coarser pleasures’ of boyhood, through the ‘aching joys’ and ‘dizzy raptures’ of young manhood, to the more reflective, moral, philosophic pleasures of maturity, informed by ‘the still, sad music of humanity’.

TIPPETT, Sir Michael (1905–98), English composer, and, with Britten, one of the most important to reach maturity after the Second World War. He made his first substantial impression with the oratorio A Child of Our Time (1944). At an early stage in its creation he had interested T. S. Eliot in writing the libretto, but Eliot finally declined, suggesting Tippett would do better to write the words himself. He followed this advice and adopted the same procedure in the four operas of his maturity, The Midsummer Marriage (1955), King Priam (1962), The Knot Garden (1970; influenced by R. D. Laing), and The Ice Break (1977).

There are two important song settings from the earlier period, both for solo voice and piano: the cantata Boyhood’s End (1943), to words by Hudson, and the passionate song cycle The Heart’s Assurance (1951), to poems by A. Lewis and Keyes. His choral works include settings of E. Sitwell (the motet The Weeping Babe, 1944), C. Fry (the cantata Crown of the Year, 1958), *Shelley and Yeats (Music for Words Perhaps, 1960). But perhaps Tippett’s most important work is The Vision of St Augustine (1965), a dense and complex setting of words from St Augustine and the Bible, arranged by the composer himself as a mystical testament of his own beliefs.

‘Tiresias’, a dramatic monologue in blank verse by Tennyson, published 1885, but composed in 1833. The prophet Tiresias, blinded and doomed to ‘speak the truth that no man may believe’ as a consequence of glimpsing Athene naked, urges Menoeceus, son of Creon, to sacrifice himself for Thebes.

TIRSO DE MOLINA, the pseudonym of Gabriel Téllez (1583–1648), a Spanish dramatist, famous outside Spain principally as the creator of the prototype of Don Juan in his play El burlador de Sevilla (1630, The Seville Deceiver or Jester).

‘Tis Pity She’s a Whore, a tragedy by J. *Ford, printed 1633.

The play deals with the guilty passion of Giovanni and his sister Annabella for each other. Being with child, Annabella marries one of her suitors, Soranzo, who discovers her condition. She refuses to name her lover, though threatened with death by Soranzo. On the advice of Vasques, his faithful servant, Soranzo feigns forgiveness, Vasques undertaking to discover the truth, which he does. Soranzo invites Annabella’s father and the magnificoes of the city, with Giovanni, to a sumptuous feast, intending to execute his vengeance. Although warned of Soranzo’s intentions, Giovanni boldly comes. He has a last meeting with Annabella just before the feast and, to forestall Soranzo’s vengeance, stabs her himself. He then enters the banqueting room with her heart on his dagger, defiantly tells what he has done, fights with and kills Soranzo, and is himself killed by Vasques.

‘Tis Pity is an obsessive, passionate play, focusing on the sensualist incest taboo, but treating it seriously and with penetrating honesty (see i. ii). It is portrayed, with rich symbolic imagery, as doomed but intensely beautiful, and this has made it Ford’s most famous play, in the study and on the stage.
Titania, in Shakespeare’s A Midsummer Night’s Dream, the queen of the fairies, and wife of Oberon. The name is given by Ovid in the Metamorphoses to Latona, Pyrrha, Diana, and Circe, as descendants of the Titans.

Tit-Bits, a popular weekly magazine, founded in 1881 by G. *Newnes. It ceased publication in 1984. The original formula included jokes, quizzes, correspondence, short stories and serialized fiction, snippets of news, etc., ‘from all the Most Interesting Books, Periodicals and Contributors in the World’, and over the years such ingredients as comic strips, cartoons, and sports coverage were added. In its early years it attracted short stories by Arnold *Bennett, *Conrad, and other aspiring literary figures.

‘Tithonus’, a dramatic monologue in blank verse by *Tennyson, published in the Cornhill in 1860, then by 1864, but composed in 1833 and described by the poet as ‘originally a pendant to the “Ulysses” in my former volume’. Tithonus is granted perpetual life but not perpetual youth by Aurora, and in a dramatic monologue he longs for death; like *In Memoriam, the poem reflects Tennyson’s anxiety about the nature of personal immortality.

TITIAN (c.1487–1576), Venetian painter, whose handling of oil paint is unrivalled. Titian’s output was prodigious and he excelled in every kind of painting; in religious and history paintings, scenes from allegory and mythology; landscape and portraiture. He was a close friend of *Aretino, whose letters and poems describe his works. Titian’s early pictures were influenced by *Giorgione and Bellini; his mature works are more dramatic and glow with rich colour. His pagan subjects, such as the Bacchus and Ariadne (1523, London, National Gallery), are radiantly sensuous and joyful. The Death of St Peter Martyr (completed 1530), once his most famous picture, was destroyed by fire in 1867. From 1532 the Emperor Charles V became a powerful patron; for him and for the Farnese family Titian created increasingly opulent portraits and, for *Philip II of Spain, a series of erotic “poesie”. His late style is characterized by its extraordinarily free and expressive handling and tragic mood. ‘Titian’s warmth divine’ (*Pope: ‘Epistle to Mr Jervas’) has always been popular with the literary English; E. Panofsky suggested that Shakespeare’s interpretation of Adonis as a reluctant lover (Venus and Adonis, l. 811–16) may have been inspired by Titian’s Adonis Taking Leave of Venus (Madrid, Prado). Travellers on the Grand Tour invariably commented on the Venus of Urbino (1538, Uffizi, Florence) which then hung in the Tribuna with the Medici Venus. The Romantics—*Haydon, *Hazlitt, Sir T. *Lawrence—admired the Bacchus and Ariadne; this picture inspired *Keats’s description of the ‘swift bound of Bacchus’ in Sleep and Poetry.

Titmarsh, (1) Michael Angelo, a pseudonym used by *Thackeray for much of his early journalism. ‘Michael Angelo’ is a comic reference to his broken nose and to his aspirations to be an artist. (2) Samuel, a character in his The Great Hoggarty Diamond.

Tito Melema, a character in G. Eliot’s Romola.

Titurel, a German *Grail legend of the 13th cent., left incomplete by *Wolfram von Eschenbach. Titurel (the great-grandfather of Parsifal) is entrusted by heaven with the guardianship of the Grail, and he builds a chapel at Mount Selvagge (Montsalvatsch) where he reposes it and organizes a band of defenders for it.

Titus Andronicus, a tragedy by *Shakespeare. It is probably his earliest tragedy and may date from 1590; in 1594 it was published in a quarto which was reprinted twice before its appearance in the First Folio of 1623, with an added scene (III. iii). Shakespeare’s authorship has been questioned, but it is now generally agreed that he was responsible for the whole play. Various sources for Titus Andronicus have been put forward, including the Hecuba of *Euripides; *Seneca’s Thyestes and Troades contributed to the plot, as did *Ovid’s version of ‘the tragic tale of Philomel’, in Metamorphoses Book 13, and Plutarch.

The first half of the play deals with the return of Titus Andronicus to Rome after his sixth victory over the Goths. He brings with him their Queen Tamora and her three sons, the eldest of whom, Alarbus, is sacrificed to avenge his own sons’ deaths. Titus is offered the imperial mantle, but gives it instead to the late emperor’s son Saturninus, to whose marriage with his daughter Lavinia Titus consents. Saturninus’ brother Bassianus claims Lavinia as his own and, while taking her off, Titus kills his son Mutius, who had tried to block his way. Saturninus now changes his mind, renounces Lavinia, and marries Tamora, who engineers a false reconciliation between the emperor and Titus, whom she plans to destroy. She does this with the help of her lover Aaron, the Moor, who gets Tamora’s sons Chiron and Demetrius to murder Bassianus, whose body is thrown into a pit, rape Lavinia, and cut off her tongue and hands. Titus’ sons Quintus and Martius are then lured by Aaron to fall into the pit, where they are found and accused of Bassianus’ murder. Aaron tells Titus that his sons will not be executed if he sacrifices his hand and sends it to the emperor. Titus does this, but gets it back again with the heads of his two sons.

In the second half of the play Titus discovers who raped and mutilated his daughter, and with his brother Marcus, and last remaining son Lucius, vows revenge. Lucius leaves Rome, but returns with an army of Goths, which captures Aaron and his child by Tamora. Tamora and her sons Demetrius and Chiron visit Titus disguised as Revenge, Rapine, and Murder and ask him to have Lucius’ banquet at his house, where the emperor and the empress and her sons will be brought. Titus recognizes his enemies and with the help of Lavinia slits the throats of Chiron and Demetrius and... uses their flesh in a pie, some of which Tamora eats at the banquet before Titus kills her. He also stabs Lavinia, but is killed by Saturninus, who is in turn killed by Lucius. He is elected emperor and sentences Aaron to be buried breast-deep in the ground and starved to death.

Critical judgement of the play has tended to be unfavourable. It was dismissed by its Restoration adapter Edward Ravenscroft, with the sentence: ‘It seems rather a heap of Rubbish than a Structure.’ More recent critics have related the play to *revenge tragedy, and praised it for its anticipation of Shakespeare’s great tragedies, in particular *Othello and *King Lear. A drawing ascribed to Henry *Peacham depicting ‘Tamora pleading for her sonnes going to execution’ perhaps dated 1595 is at Longleat and is the first known surviving illustration of one of Shakespeare’s plays.

(Andronicus in the play is accentuated thus, on the second syllable; in Latin it is Andronicus.)

TITUS LIVIUS FOROJULIENSES, an Italian in the service of Duke *Humphrey of Gloucester, who wrote, about 1440, a chronicle of the reign of Henry V.

Toad of Toad Hall, a dramatic adaptation by A. A. *Milne of K. *Grahame’s The Wind in the Willows.

‘To Autumn’, a poem by *Keats, written Sept. 1819, published 1820. It was his last major poem, and although usually included in a discussion of the Odes (see under odes), it was not so labelled by Keats himself.

The poem, in three stanzas, is at once a celebration of the fruitfulness of autumn (lightly personified as a figure in various autumnal landscapes) and an elegy for the passing of summer and the transience of life, and its mood has been generally taken to be one of acquiscience. The association of autumn and early death in the mind of Keats is poignantly revealed in a letter to Reynolds (21 Sept. 1819), written immediately after the composition of the poem, in which he says, ‘I always somehow associate Chatterton with the autumn.’

Toby, Uncle, Captain Tobias Shandy, in Sterne’s Tristram Shandy.

TOCQUEVILLE, Alexis de (1805–59), French sociologist and historian. Until the coup d’état of 1851 he was active in the judicature and in politics, serving for a time as foreign minister. An official visit to the United States in 1851 produced the first of his two classic works, La Démocratie en Amérique (1835 and 1840), a subtle and prescient analysis of the strengths and weaknesses of a democratic society in evolution. The second, L’Ancien Régime (1856), is a profound social and political study of pre-revolutionary France, regarded as the source rather than the contradiction of the revolution that destroyed it. No 19th-cent. historian discerned with greater exactness the tensions hidden in large-scale contemporary communities. He corresponded extensively with J. S. *Mill.

Todgers, Mrs, in Dickens’s Martin Chuzzlewit, mistress of a boarding house.

TÓIBÍN, Colm (1955– ), Irish novelist, journalist, and travel writer. His first novel The South (1990) told of an Irish Protestant living in Spain, who then returns to Dublin for a bitter-sweet reunion with her son; The Heather Blazing (1992), an account of a retired couple’s strained marriage, was similarly lyrical and compassionate. The Story of the Night (1996) described a young man’s gradual awakening to his homosexuality against a finely drawn backdrop of Argentinian society. Like his fiction, Tóibín’s travel writing (including Homage to Barcelona, 1990) is distinguished by its political awareness and refreshing lack of machismo.

TOKLAS, Alice B., see Stein.

TOLAND, John (1670–1722), freethinker, born on Inishowen in Donegal (Ireland). ‘Educated from the cradle in the grossest superstition’, as he says in his Apology (1697), he threw off Roman Catholicism at the age of 15. After studying at universities in Scotland and Holland, he settled in Oxford where he completed Christianity not Mysterious (1696), which made him notorious. It also began the Deist controversy (see Deism) and initiated the one great epoch of Irish philosophy.

In 1702 he travelled to Berlin, where he discussed theology with the queen of Prussia. To her he addressed his Letters of Serena (1704), whose materialistic pantheism—he coined the word ‘pantheist’ in 1705—he flamboyantly expressed in Pantheisticon (1720). He was a prolific controversialist. In 1698 he wrote a life of Milton and edited his prose works. Toland’s Tetradyamus (1720) contains perhaps the first essay on the esoteric/exoteric distinction. *Pope ridiculed him; *Swift called him ‘the great Oracle of the Anti-Christians’.

TOLKIEN, J(ohn) R(onald) R(euel) (1892–1973), Merton professor of English language and literature at Oxford, 1945–59. He published a number of philosophical and critical studies, such as ‘Beowulf: The Monsters and the Critics’ (in Proceedings of the British Academy, 1936), and became internationally known for two books based on a mythology of his own: The Hobbit (1937) and its sequel The Lord of the Rings (3 vols, 1954–5). The Silmarillion (1977), which has an earlier place in this sequence of stories, was published posthumously. A life by Humphrey Carpenter was published in 1977. See also FANTASY FICTION.

TOLLER, Ernst (1893–1939), German revolutionary poet and dramatist, associated with the short-lived Bavarian communist government of 1918. He was imprisoned for five years after the war, during which period he wrote Expressionist plays such as Die Maschinenstürmer (1922; The Machine Wreckers).
Toller in 1936 in Portugal and translated the lyrics for Tomalin, *Arnold, G. B. *Shaw, *Galsworthy, E. M. banning of many of his works by the censors, and to his Resurrection Kreutzer Sonata Peace!, his satirical musical play Me. Works were translated 1899–1902 and have been by Anna Karenina, The Death of Ivan Ilyich (1886), The Invisible Woman: The Story of Nelly Ternan and Charles Dickens (1990), Mrs Jordan’s Profession (1994, a study of the actress Mrs *Jordan, inspired by her research into the theatrical profession during her work on Ellen Ternan), and Jane Austen: A Life (1997).

Tom and Jerry, the two chief characters in *Egan’s Life in London; hence used in various allusive senses, e.g. of riotous behaviour: they gave their names to the well-known cartoon characters.

Tom Brown’s Schooldays, see Hughes, T.

Although very long, the novel is highly organized, and was thought by *Coleridge to have one of the three great plots of all literature. The kindly, prosperous Mr Allworthy, a widower, lives in Somerset with his ill-humoured unmarried sister Bridget. Late one evening Allworthy finds a baby boy lying on his bed. He is charmed with the mysterious baby, names it Tom, and adopts it, adding the surname Jones on the assumption that the mother is Jenny Jones, a maid servant to the wife of the schoolmaster Partridge, who is eventually accused of being the father and dismissed his post. Both Jenny and Partridge vanish from the neighbourhood. Meanwhile Bridget marries the obnoxious Captain Blifil and they have a son, Master Blifil, who is brought up with Tom. They are taught by the brutish chaplain Thwackum, and the philosopher Square, and have as family neighbours the bluff fox-hunting Squire Western, his sister, and his daughter Sophia, as well as Allworthy’s gamekeeper Black George Seagrim and his wife and daughters.

The story moves on to the point when Tom is 19, and begins to find that his childhood affection for the beautiful and sweet-natured Sophia (whose portrait Fielding founded upon his own wife) has grown into adult love. However, Sophia is destined by her father for Master Blifil, and Tom allows himself to be distracted by the charms of Molly Seagrim. By clever misrepresentation the scheming young Blifil converts Allworthy’s affection for Tom into anger, and with the help of Thwackum and Square he succeeds in having the harum-scarum Tom expelled from the house. Filled with despair that he has alienated his beloved foster-father and is leaving all he loves, Tom sets off for Bristol intending to go to sea. Meanwhile Sophia, disgusted by Blifil’s courtship, runs away with her maid Honour, hoping to find her kinswoman Lady Bellaston in London. Amid numerous adventures on the road, during which he falls in with redcoats and is deflected from his plan of going to sea, Tom encounters Partridge, once supposed to be his father, who is now travelling the country as a barber-surgeon. Unknown to Tom, he and Sophia both find themselves in an inn at Upton, but because of Partridge’s malicious stupidity Sophia believes that Tom (now in bed with Mrs Waters, of whom we are to hear more) no longer loves her, and flees towards London. Tom follows, and in London
Tomkins, Thomas (1572–1656), Welsh composer and organist, who studied under Byrd. He is chiefly remembered as a composer of madrigals, but also wrote many sacred works, published posthumously as Musica Deo Sacra (1668).

Tomkins, Thomas (?1580–?1634), fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and author of two university comedies, Lingua: Or The Combat of the Tongue and the Five Senses for Superiority (1607) and Albumazar (1615). The latter was acted before James I at Cambridge. Albumazar (historically an Arabian astronomer, 805–85) is a rascally wizard who transforms the rustic Trincalo into the person of his master, with absurd consequences. It was revived (1668) with a prologue by Dryden, wrongly charging Jonson with adopting it as a model for The Alchemist. It was again revived by Garrick.

Tomlinson, H(enry) M(ajour) (1873–1958), novelist and journalist, born in Poplar, the son of a foreman at the West India Dock; his early love of ships and the sea is reflected in his life and works, e.g. The Sea and the Jungle (1912, an account of a voyage to Brazil and up the Amazon), London River (1921, essays and reflections), and his first novel, Gallions Reach (1927). All Our Yesterdays (1930) is an anti-war novel about the First World War. As a journalist he contributed to the radical Morning Leader and the English Review, and was literary editor of the Nation from 1917 to 1923.

Tom o’ Bedlam, a wandering beggar. After the dissolution of the religious houses, where the poor used to be relieved, there was for long no settled provision for them. In consequence they wandered over the country, many assuming disguises calculated to obtain them charity. Among other disguises some affected madness, and were called Bedlam beggars (so in *Gammer Gurtons Needle ’Diccon the Bedlam’). Edgar, in *King Lear, ii. iii, adopts this disguise:

Of Bedlam beggars, who, with roaring voices, Strike in their numb’d and mortified bare arms Pins, wooden pricks, nails, sprigs of rosemary.

In Dekker’s Belman of London (1668) Tom of Bedlam’s band of mad caps’ are enumerated among the species of beggars. Some of these Bedlam beggars sang mad songs, examples of which are given in Percy’s Reliques. They were also called Abraham-men’, from the name, it is said (Brewer), of one of the wards in Bedlam.

Tom Sawyer, The Adventures of, a novel by Mark *Twain, published 1876.

Tom, a lively and adventurous lad, lives with his priggish brother Sid and his good-hearted Aunt Polly in the quiet town of St Petersburg, Missouri. His companion is the irrepressible Huckleberry Finn, and together they embark on many exploits, during one of which they happen to observe Injun Joe stab the town doctor to death and attempt to incriminate the drunk-en Muff Potter. Tom is later able to absolve Potter at his trial. Tom and his sweetheart Becky Thatcher wander away from a school picnic and are lost for three days in a cave, where Tom spies Injun Joe; after the children are rescued Injun Joe is found dead and his treasure is divided between Tom and Huck. Huck’s subsequent escapades become the subject of the classic sequel The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn.

Tom Thumb, a Tragedy, a farce by H. *Fielding, performed and published 1730, and published in a different version 1731 under the title of The Tragedy of Tragedies, or, The Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great.

The most successful of Fielding’s many plays, this is an exuberant farce in the mock-heroic manner, ridiculing the ‘Bombastic Greatness’ of the fashionable grandiose tragedies of authors such as N. *Lee and J. Thomson, and similar in form to Buckingham’s The Rehearsal. It was published with a heavy apparatus of absurd scholarly notes, and a frontispiece by *Hogarth. *Swift declared that he had laughed only twice in his life, once at a Merry-Andrew and once at a performance of Tom Thumb.

TONSON, Jacob (1656–1737), publisher and bookseller, the son of a barber-surgeon; he established himself in 1678 with his brother Richard (d. 1689) and eventually took his nephew Jacob into the business, in whose favour he resigned in 1720; the firm was continued by a great-nephew of the same name. He published the foremost poets and playwrights of the age; his long association with Dryden began in 1679, with the publication of his version of Troilus and Cressida, and his other writers included A. Behn, Ottway, Cowley, Rowe, Addison, and Pope, he also acquired the profitable copyright of Paradise Lost. He was well known for his Miscellanies, in six parts, of which the earliest were edited and largely written by Dryden; they appeared between 1684 and 1709, and contained translations from Horace, Ovid, Lucretius, Virgil, etc., as well as original work by Pope, A. Philips, Swift, and others. A conspicuous figure in literary society, he was secretary of the Kit-Cat Club (which occasionally met at his home in Barnes) and the butt of satire from Dryden; he mocked his ‘two left legs, and Judas-coloured hair’) and Pope, who took up the theme of his ungainly legs in the Dunciad.

Toodle, Polly and Robin (‘Rob the Grinder’), her son, characters in Dickens’s Dombey and Son. Polly was Paul Dombey’s foster-mother.

TOOKE, John Horne (1736–1812), radical politician, and the son of a poulterer named Horne; he added the name of his friend William Tooke of Purley to his own in 1782. He vigorously supported Wilkes in connection with the Middlesex election, but later quarrelled with him. He was more than once in conflict with the authorities, and was tried for high treason and acquitted in 1794. His varied acquaintance included Boswell, Bentham, Godwin, Paine, and *Coleridge. His principal work, "Επεξεργασία της αποκαλύψεως της, or The Diversions of Purley (1786–1805, two volumes of a planned three) established his reputation as a philologist and was extremely popular; it was much admired by James *Mill and the utilitarians, but its philosophical (rather than historical or philological) approach to language and grammar and its wildly speculative etymologies delayed for decades, it has been alleged, the introduction of the new and sounder philology from the Continent. See H. Aarsleff, The Study of Language in England, 1780–1860 (1967).

Too True to Be Good (1931), a three-act political extravaganza by Bernard *Shaw which opens in one of the richest cities in England, in a patient’s bedroom inhabited by a ‘poor innocent microbe’ apparently made of luminous jelly, and then moves to a sea beach in a mountainous country patrolled by the omnipresent Private Meek, Shaw’s imaginative portrait of T. E. *Lawrence. The surreal plot, which progresses by means of a series of fantastical illusions and proliferating identities, contains echoes from The Pilgrim’s Progress and The Tempest, and reaches its climax in a long peroration on the place of human beings in the evolution of the world.*

Top Girls, a play by Caryl *Churchill, first performed at the *Royal Court Theatre in 1982. The first act is set in a London restaurant as Marlene celebrates her promotion as managing director of the ‘Top Girls’ employment agency: her guests are five historical and quasi-historical characters, Isabella *Bird, the 13th-century Japanese courtesan Lady Nijo, Dull Gret (who is drawn from an image in a *Bruegel painting), Pope Joan, and Patient Griselda. The second and third acts, which move between the agency office and the poor East Anglian home of Marlene’s sister, reveal the hard choices Marlene has made to achieve her success, which include the loss of her illegitimate and slow-witted daughter Angie to her childless sister Joyce. Each member of the all-female cast (apart from Marlene) plays several parts. The play explores the changing social, sexual, and above all financial expectations of British women in the 1980s, and contrasts them both with historical attitudes and with contemporary American aspirations.

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague (1740–78), from 1768 vicar of Broad Hembury, remembered for his hymns, especially ‘Rock of Ages’, published in the Gospel Magazine in 1775. At first influenced by Wesley, he later became his bitter opponent, and an extreme Calvinist.

topographical poetry, described by Dr *Johnson as ‘local poetry, of which the fundamental object is some particular landscape . . . with the addition of . . . historical retrospection or incidental meditation’. Cooper’s Hill (1642) by *Denham is an early example of a genre that flourished principally in the 18th cent.: see Dyer; Garth; Jago; Thomson, J. (1700–48), for example. Many topographical poems are also ‘prospect poems’, i.e. written from a high point, surveying a large view, and many were written in praise of particular parks, estates, and gardens, evidently in the hope of patronage. The genre had a renewed vogue in the late 20th cent., when the emphasis has been less on the country estate, more on the vanishing rural scene; distinguished examples include Remains of Elmet (1793) and the less precisely located River (1983), both by Ted Hughes.

Topsy, the lively little slave girl in H. B. Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin, who asserted that she had neither father nor mother, and being asked who made her, replied, ‘I 'spect I grow’d’. One of Mrs Stowe’s most original creations, she forms a contrast to the virtuous, ethereal Little Eva, and is carried off to Vermont after Eva’s death by Eva’s aunt, the orderly Miss Ophelia.

Torquemada, Tomás de (1420–98), a Spanish Dominican monk, appointed in 1483 the first inquisitor-general by Ferdinand and Isabella. He was famous for the untiring energy with which the work of the Inquisition in Spain was carried on under his direction. Hence his name became a synonym for a cruel persecutor. The Instrucciones Antiguas, a code of instructions for the application of torture, begun in 1481, which Torquemada himself expanded and developed over the next 15 years, set out in great detail the procedures for the torture, mutilation, and execution of heretics. In the course of his 18-year term of office some 2,000 heretics were burnt alive, and many more were mutilated.

Torre, Sir, in Malory, the illegitimate son of a cowherd’s wife and King Pellinore; his knighting before Gawain by Arthur causes further rancour amongst the sons of King Lot whose father had been slain by Torre’s father Pellinore, developing the long feud between their two houses.

To the Lighthouse, a novel by V. Woolf published 1927, which draws powerfully on the author’s recollections of family holidays at St Ives, Cornwall, although the setting is ostensibly the Hebrides; her parents, as she acknowledged, provided the inspiration for the maternal, managing, gracious, much-admired Mrs Ramsay, and the self-centred, self-pitying, poetry-reciting, absurd, and tragic figure of the philosopher, Mr Ramsay, who become the focus of one of her most profound explorations of the conflict between the male and female principles.

The novel is in three sections, of which the first and longest, ‘The Window’, describes a summer day, with the Ramsays on holiday with their eight children and assorted guests, who include the plump and lethargic elderly poet Augustus Carmichael; the painter Lily Briscoe (who represents in part the struggle and cost of female creativity); and the graceless lower-middle-class academic Charles Tansley. Family tension centres on the desire of the youngest child, James, to visit the lighthouse, and his father’s apparent desire to thwart him: the frictions of the day are momentarily resolved around the dinner table, and a triumphant bœuf en daube, as Mrs Ramsay reflects that ‘something … is immune from change, and shines out … in the face of the flowing, the fleeting, the spectral, like a ruby’. The second section, ‘Time Passes’, records with laconic brevity the death of Mrs Ramsay and of her son Andrew, killed in the war, and dwells with a desolate lyricism on the abandoning of the family home, and its gradual post-war reawakening; it ends with the arrival of Lily Briscoe and Mr Carmichael. The last section, ‘The Lighthouse’, describes the exhausting but finally successful efforts of Lily, through her painting, to recapture the revelation of shape-in-chaos which she owes to the vanished Mrs Ramsay, and the parallel efforts of Mr Ramsay, Camilla, and James to reach the lighthouse, which they also accomplish, despite the undercurrents of rivalry, loss, and rebellion that torment them. The novel represents a heroic exploration and re-creation of the bereavements and (real or imagined) tyrannies of the past; it also displays Woolf’s technique of narrating through stream of consciousness and imagery at its most assured, rich, and suggestive.

Tottel, Richard (c.1530–93), a publisher who carried on business at ‘The Hand and Star’ within Temple Bar from 1553 to 1594, is chiefly known as the compiler (with Grimald) of Sonnets, known as Tottel’s Miscellany (1557), comprising the chief works of Wyatt and Surrey. He also published, besides law-books, Sir T. More’s Dialoge of Comfort (1563) and Surrey’s Aeneid (1557).

Slender, in Shakespeare’s The Merry Wives of Windsor, had ‘rather than forty shillings’ he had Tottel’s ‘book of Songs and Sonnets’ with him when courting Anne Page; and the grave-digger in Hamlet mumbles Lord Vaux’s song from the same collection.

Touchett, Mr, Mrs, and Ralph, characters in H. James’s The Portrait of a Lady.

Touchstone, the jester to the exiled Duke Senior’s court in Shakespeare’s As You Like It.

Tourneur, Cyril (1757–1626), dramatist. Practically nothing is known of his life. He appears to have worked for a time in the Netherlands, and died at Kinsale in Ireland after accompanying Sir Edward Cecil to Cadiz in 1625 on an unsuccessful raid of Spanish treasure ships. His small known output includes an allegorical poem, The Transformed Metamorphosis (1600), a lost play, The Nobleman (1612), The Atheist’s Tragedy (1611), an elegy on the death of Prince Henry (1613), and several minor and disputed works. The Renegar’s Tragedy, printed anonymously in 1607, was first ascribed to him in 1656 by Edward Archer in a play list, and was generally accepted as his until the end of the 19th cent., when *Middleton was proposed as the author. Since then there has been prolonged debate over attribution, with Middleton gradually emerging as the most likely candidate, a view confirmed by recent statistical analysis, though some critics and editors still favour Tourneur. G. Parfitt, after a brief summary of the arguments in his edition The Plays of Cyril Tourneur (1978), concludes that ‘unless new evidence emerges ... the play has to be regarded as anonymous.’ The Complete Works were edited by Allardyce Nicoll (1930). (See also REVENGE TRAGEDY.)

TOUSSAINT L’OUVERTURE, François (1743–1803), to whom *Wordsworth addressed a sonnet, the leader of Saint-Domingue: it has been acclaimed as the only successful slave uprising in history. For some years Toussaint administered the colony (which was eventually to achieve independence as Haiti) with great skill, but he was overcome by a military expedition sent out by Napoleon, and was transported to France, where he died in prison in the Jura mountains. He remained a hero to radical writers: H. *Martineau published a life of the author. Since then there has been prolonged debate over attribution, with Middleton gradually emerging as the most likely candidate, a view confirmed by recent statistical analysis, though some critics and editors still favour Tourneur. G. Parfitt, after a brief summary of the arguments in his edition The Plays of Cyril Tourneur (1978), concludes that ‘unless new evidence emerges ... the play has to be regarded as anonymous.’ The Complete Works were edited by Allardyce Nicoll (1930). Townley, Revd James (1714–78), educated at Merchant Taylors’ School and St John’s College, Oxford, and headmaster of Merchant Taylors’ from 1760. He was a friend of *Garrick, and author of the successful farce *High Life below Stairs (1759).

Townly, Lord, in Vanbrugh and Cibber’s *The Provok’d Husband, the title character.

Town Mouse and Country Mouse, a fable told by *Horace (Sat. 2. 6) and by *La Fontaine (though the latter substitutes rats for mice). The city mouse, contemptuous of the country mouse’s cave and humble fare, invites it to a sumptuous supper in its palace. But the feast is disturbed by an alarm, and the mice scurry away. The country mouse concludes that it prefers its safe wood and cave and its homely fare.

M. *Prior was part-author of The Hind and the Panther Transvers’d to the Story of the Country Mouse and the City Mouse.

TOWNSHEND, Charles, second Viscount Townshend (1674–1738), a distinguished statesman of the reign of George I. He carried on at Rainham agricultural experiments which earned him his nickname of ‘Turnip’ Townshend. *Pope (Imitations of Horace, Ep. 2. 2. 273) refers to Townshend’s turnips, and in a footnote states that ‘that kind of rural improvement which arises from turnips’ was ‘the favourite subject of Townshend’s conversation’.

Tow-ouse, Mr and Mrs, characters in Fielding’s *Joseph Andrews.

Toxophilus, see Ascham.

TOYNBEE, Arnold Joseph (1889–1975), historian, educated at Winchester and Balliol College, Oxford. He was professor of Byzantine and modern Greek language, literature, and history at King’s College, London, 1919–24, the director of studies at the Royal Institute of International Affairs, and research professor of international history until he retired in 1955. His great work A Study of History, published in ten volumes between 1934 and 1954, is a survey of the chief civilizations of the world, and an enquiry into cycles of creativity and decay. His view that the fragmentation and waning of Western civilization could already be detected, and that hope lay in a new universal religion which would recapture ‘spiritual initiative’, aroused much controversy. His other works include Civilization on Trial (1948) and The World and the West (1953). Comparing Notes: A Dialogue across a Generation (1963) was written with his son, novelist, critic, and journalist Philip Theodore Toynbee (1916–81). Polly Toynbee, daughter of Philip, is a distinguished journalist and writer on social policy.

Traddles, a character in Dickens’s *David Copperfield.

TRADESCANT, John (d. 1638), traveller, naturalist, and gardener, probably author of A Voigag of Ambasad (1618), a manuscript account of a voyage under Sir Dudley Digges to Archangel, containing the earliest known account of Russian plants. From the expedition (1620) against the Algerian pirates he brought back the ‘Algier apricot’. He established a physic (i.e. medicinal) garden at Lambeth. His son John Tradescant (1608–62) was likewise a traveller and gardener. He published Musaeum Tradescantianum in 1666, and gave his collection to *Ashmole, who presented it to the University of Oxford. Both Tradescants held the appointment of gardener to Charles I. See Mea Allan, The Tradescants (1964).

tragedy, a word of uncertain derivation, applied, broadly, to dramatic (or, by extension, other) works in which events move to a fatal or disastrous conclusion. Aristotle’s *Poetics was the first attempt to define the characteristics of tragedy and its effect upon the spectator, and it profoundly influenced the neo-classic concept of tragedy in France and England. Shake­speare and other English dramatists of the Elizabethan period evolved new tragic conventions (see REVENGE TRAGEDY), partly derived from *Seneca, and the genre continued to flourish in the *Jacobean period (see WEBSTER, J.; MIDDLETON, T.; BEAUMONT, F.; FLETCHER, J.). A period of predominantly dull and frigid *neo-classicism followed, and tragedy as a form, with odd exceptions, did not seriously revive until the 20th cent., when the works of *Ibsen, *Strindberg, *O’Neill, A. *Miller, T. *Williams, and S. *Beckett brought it a new seriousness, relevance, and urgency.

TRAHERNE, Thomas (1637–74), son of a shoemaker in Hereford. It seems possible that both his parents died while he and his brother Philip were infants, and the boys were brought up by a wealthy innkeeper, Philip Traherne, twice mayor of Hereford. They evidently had a good education, but no record exists of their attending Hereford Cathedral School. Thomas went up to Brasenose College, Oxford, as a commoner in Mar. 1653 and took his BA in Oct. 1656. In 1657 the parliamentary commissioners appointed him rector of Credenhill, Herefordshire, but he seems not to have resided there until 1661. He was ordained in 1660, and the following year took his Oxford MA. At Credenhill he joined the religious circle centring on Susanna Hopton at Kington, for whom he was to write the Centuries. During this period he evidently travelled to Oxford to work on Roman Forgeries in the Bodleian. Probably in recognition of this work he gained his BD in 1669, and also his appointment the same year as chaplain to Sir Orlando Bridgeman, lord keeper of the great seal, which necessitated his moving to London. He was buried at Teddington.

Traherne led a ‘single and devout life’, according to A. *Wood. He left five houses in Hereford in trust for the poor people of All Saints parish. He told *Aubrey that he had visions, seeing, on one occasion, the phantom of an apprentice who was asleep in the same house, and on another a basket of fruit sailing in the air over his bed. Traherne’s Centuries and many of his poems were discovered in a notebook (now in the Bodleian) which was picked up for a few pence on a London bookstall in the winter of 1896–7 by W. T. Brooke. Bertram Dobell identified Traherne as the author, and edited the Poetical Works (1903) and the Centuries of Meditations (1908). More poems, prepared for publication by Traherne’s brother Philip as ‘Poems of Felicity’, were discovered in a British Museum manuscript and published by H. I. Bell in 1910. A further manuscript of Select Meditations has since come to light, and is in the collection of the late J. M. Osborn. In his lifetime Traherne published Roman Forgeries (1673), which exposes the falsifying of ecclesiastical documents by the Church of Rome, concentrating in the mid-19th-cent. collection known as the ‘False Decretals’ which had, in fact, already been decisively discredited by several 16th-cent. scholars. His Christian Ethicks (1675) was prepared for the press before he died. But his major achievement comprises the Centuries, the poems, and the Thanksgivings, written in exuberant, unconventional verse, and at times foreshadowing *Whitman, which appeared in 1893. He expresses a rapturous joy in creation unmatched by any other 17th-cent. writer, and his memories, in the Centuries, of his own early intuitions are the first convincing depiction of childhood experience in English literature. He is also among the first English writers to respond imaginatively to new ideas about infinite space, and at times virtually equates infinite space with God. The boundless potential of man’s mind and spirit is his recurrent theme, as is the need for adult man to regain the wonder and simplicity of the child. In both, his thought is influenced by *Neoplatonism, especially by the Hermetic books. Centuries, Poems and Thanksgivings, ed. H. M. Margoliouth (2 vols, 1958); Christian Ethicks, ed. C. L. Marks and G. R. Guffey (1968); G. Wade, Thomas Traherne (1944); K. W. Salter, Thomas Traherne, Mystic and Poet (1964).

This play was highly successful both before and after the Civil War; *Pepys saw it several times and praised it highly. It is based on the assassination of the Florentine Duke Alessandro de’ Medici by his kinsman Lorenzo. Unlike the hero of the best-known play on this subject, de *Musset’s Lorenzo, Shirley’s Lorenzo is a scheming villain who talks of republicanism and liberty only to gain the support of others. The plot interweaves a number of devices already used by earlier dramatists. Lorenzo encourages the duke’s lust for Amidea, sister of Sciarrha, while simultaneously urging Sciarrha to take revenge on the duke. The duke, though unmoved by a moral masque presented him by Sciarrha, is nearly converted by Amidea’s courageous virtue. Later, however, Lorenzo persuades him to blackmail her into yielding to save her brother’s life. Sciarrha, to test Amidea’s virtue, threatens to kill her unless she accepts this proposal; she, to save him from the guilt of murder, pretends to accept, whereupon he stabs her for dishonouring him. Her final act of virtue is to pretend that her death was suicide. When the duke comes to her bed, he finds only a corpse. Lorenzo then seizes the opportunity to kill him, and he and Sciarrha kill each other in the ensuing scuffle.

Transatlantic Review, a literary periodical edited from Paris by F. M. *Ford, from Jan. 1924 to Jan. 1925, in which he published *Joyce, E. E. *Cummings, and others. B. *Butting worked for a while as sub-editor. The title was revived in 1959 by J. McCrindle; the new Transcendental Club, a group of American intellectuals who met informally for philosophical discussion at *Emerson's house and elsewhere during some years from 1836, the embodiment of a movement of thought, philosophical, religious, social, and economic, produced in New England between 1830 and 1850 by the spirit of revolutionary Europe, German philosophy, and *Wordsworth, *Coleridge, and *Carlyle. The philosophical views of this Transcendentalism may be gathered from Emerson's short treatise *Nature (1836). Its literary organ was the *Dial.

Its social and economic aspects took form in the Brook Farm Institute (1841–7) of George Ripley, a self-supporting group of men and women, who shared in manual labour and intellectual pursuits.

transition: an international quarterly for creative experiment, a periodical founded in 1927 in Paris by Eugène and Maria Jolas, and edited for some ten years by Jolas and Elliot Paul. It proclaimed 'the revolution of the word', and published new and experimental work by *Joyce, G. *Stein, Dylan *Thomas, *Durrell, *Beckett, etc.; its distinguished art coverage included work by Duchamp, Miró, and Man Ray.

translation, theory and art of. Literary translation is almost as ancient as literature itself, but Roman renderings of Greek originals gave the art its foundations and first recorded theorists in the West. *Cicero proclaimed himself primarily a translator of ideas and styles; his objections to literalism were endorsed and extended by *Horace, *Quintilian, and St *Jerome, and echoed in the 20th cent. by theorists such as W. *Benjamin. Issues such as the impossibility of exact fidelity were raised especially sharply by the translation of the *Bible, first into Latin, then into the European vernaculars.

After some translation of Christian texts in the Old English period, the first major English literary practitioner is *Chaucer. But his versions of individual French and Latin works are of less aesthetic interest than his transformations of e.g. *Boccaccio, *Virgil and *Ovid, involving translation in a broader sense. Medieval English translations were predominantly of devotional works, fashionable French literature, and occasionally Latin classics. To the Renaissance period of extensive experiment, dedicated primarily to the enhancement of the vernacular languages and literatures, belong the names of *Chapman, *Marlowe, *Golding, and *Jonson. It saw the arrival of Greek literature in English; the rise of the specialist translator; the 'conquest' (as Philemon *Holland revealingly says) of almost the whole Latin canon; and greatly increased attention to European languages such as Italian and Spanish. The 'colonizing' English attitude was exaggerated and theorized by the 17th-cent. French 'Belles Infidèles' translators, who aimed to improve the classics by adapting them to current sensibilities.

Translation was central to the *Augustan programme to classicize English literary culture. As translators *Dryden and *Pope are best known for their complete Virgil (1697) and *Homer (1715–26) respectively. These are dialogues with, not copies of, the originals, and represent a full creative commitment. Questions about the boundaries between translation and imitation, also an increasingly popular form, are raised by Dryden, who in 1689 proposes a tripartite classification of translations as 'metaphrase' (literal), 'paraphrase' ('with latitude'), or 'imitation'. Such questions are differently answered at the end of this period in Alexander Tytler's *Essay on the Principles of Translation (1791), a systematic discussion favouring close translation.

An expanding theoretical literature in the 19th cent. owes much to the German Romantics, including *Schlegel, who translated Shakespeare. They focus debate on the necessity of 'foreignizing', of retaining features specific to the foreign text even and especially when not assimilable to the norms of the target language and literature. In Britain such issues came to a head over M. *Arnold's *On Translating Homer (1861). For Arnold, Homer was most faithfully represented by modern English hexameters and in contemporary language, but for his 'foreignizing' opponents only antiquated poetic forms and obsolete words gave the true flavour. A rash of Homeric translations on one principle or the other ensued.

TRAPIDO, Barbara (1941– ), South African-born novelist, resident in England since 1963. Her first... novel Brother of the More Famous Jack (1982) tells the story of Katherine, a timid student, and her sentimental education at the hands of the bohemian Goldman family. This and its successors Noah’s Ark (1984) and Temples of Delight (1990) established her reputation as a writer of tart, witty, but endlessly surprising novels where the traditional distinction between comedy and tragedy is often transgressed. In Juggling (1994), where the story of identical twins purposely recalls The Comedy of Errors, Trapido began to push the boundaries of the realistic novel even further in her zeal for comic coincidence, and this trend continued with The Travelling Hornplayer (1998), which revisits the character of Katherine only to find her sadder and wiser, and uses an intricate, labyrinthine plot to reunite all the protagonists in a final scene of joyous implausibility.

TRAPNEL, Anna (fl. 1642–60). Daughter of a Popular shipwright, this vociferous rhyming prophetess of the Fifth Monarchist movement was associated with John Simpson's revolutionary church at All Hallows the Great in London. Her spiritual and political extemporizations flowed forth in trances and were transcribed in shorthand. She achieved notoriety by a 12-day ecstasy at Whitehall attacking Cromwell’s Protectorate, after which she travelled to Cornwall, was arrested on suspicion of sedition, and committed to Bridewell, a journey she vividly recorded in Anna Trapnel’s Report. Trapnel published six inflammatory pamphlets 1654–8.

Traveller, The, or A Prospect of Society, a poem by Goldsmith, published 1764, and the first production under his own name. It is dedicated and addressed to his brother, a country clergyman.

The poet as traveller, from a vantage point in the Alps, surveys and compares the social, political, and economic conditions of the various countries spread before his eyes and his imagination, and endeavours to illustrate that (in the words of his preface) 'there may be equal happiness in states, that are differently governed from our own'. The vividly drawn landscapes of Italy, the Loire valley, and the 'slow canals' of Holland are clearly based on Goldsmith's own continental tour in 1755. The poem ends with a lament for rural decay in the face of growing commerce that foreshadows the theme of The Deserted Village. Dr *Johnson, who greatly admired the poem, contributed nine lines to it, II. 420, 429–34, 437–8.

Travels in Arabia Deserta, see DOUGHTY.

Travels in France, a record of travel in that country during the years 1787–90, by A. Young, published 1792. The first journey takes him through the southwest (Berri, Poitou, Languedoc), the second through Brittany and Anjou, the third through Alsace-Lorraine, the Jura, Burgundy, and Provence. Visiting France shortly before and during the revolution, Young draws attention to the defective social and economic conditions of the ancien régime. The work was translated into various languages and has always been highly valued in France. It contains the famous phrase 'The magic of property turns sand into gold.' It was edited by M. Betham-Edwards (1892) and C. Maxwell (1929).

Travels through France and Italy, a work by Smollett, published 1766. The book covers the period of Smollett's main sojourn abroad, between mid-1763 and mid-1765. It is sharply observant, prejudiced and idiosyncratic, often highly entertaining, and almost universally derogatory about all levels of French and Italian society. Smollett's attitude induced Sterne to describe him in A Sentimental Journey as 'the learned Smelfungus'. In search of better health, Smollett travelled with his wife and a party of three others, starting at Boulogne, proceeding to Paris, Lyons, Montpellier, and eventually to Nice. In that distance he asserts he met only one pleasant innkeeper. But although manners, arts, and religion are generally deprecated (sometimes with humour but more often with disgust), Smollett's enjoyment of food, drink, and the company of other travelling or expatriate Britons is conveyed with relish. His party was based in Nice, where the scenery, walking, bathing, reading, and the bounty of the countryside delighted him, and where his health intermittently improved. During this time he travelled for two months in Italy, visiting Pisa, Florence, and Rome, in all of which the art and architecture greatly impressed him. After many wearisome episodes on road and sea, they returned to Nice, and then with relief to England. The Travels were reviewed kindly, sold well, quickly reprinted, and translated into German; but not into French or Italian.

Travel writing. Early examples of travel writing widely popular in Britain included the fabulous 14th-cent. travel book ascribed to Sir John *Mandeville, and the supposedly factual accounts of Marco *Polo’s journey to China. The great Elizabethan age of navigation, and the discovery of the Americas and the West Indies, produced the reports of *Hakluyt, Sir W. *Ralegh, Sir F. *Draké and others, which were widely read and continued to inspire novelists and poets, particularly during the Romantic period. In the 17th cent. Thomas *Coryate’s accounts of his travels through Europe and on to India established his reputation as one of the first great British eccentrics of the genre. Travellers at home, whose works have been of lasting historical and social value, include Celia *Fienness, *Defoe, and *Cobbett. The 18th cent. produced the literature and art of the *Grand Tour. The Victorian traveller ventured far afield, sometimes, like David *Livingstone, in the guise of a missionary-explorer. Several women writers and travellers of this period made lasting names for themselves; examples include Mary *Kingsley, with accounts of West Africa, and Isabella *Bird, with descriptions of the Far East.
Travel writing developed into a genre in its own right in the 19th and 20th cents: British writers have been particularly attracted to the Arab countries of the Middle East (see for example under KINGLAKE, STARK, and THESIGER). In recent decades the form has continued to flourish: distinguished practitioners include Norman *Lewis; Jan *Morris; Eric Newby (1919— ), author of many works based round the Mediterranean; and Gavin Young (1928— ), whose works include Return to the Marshes (1977), describing time spent with the Marsh Arabs of Iraq; Iraq: Land of Two Rivers (1980), and Slow Boats to China (1980). Paul *Theroux, Bruce *Chatwin, Colin *Thubron, and Jonathan *Raban in the 1970s and early 1980s found radically different approaches to new and old material as the age of mass tourism impinged on the terrain of the solitary travel writer. Since then, in notable additions to and variations on the canon, American author Bill Bryson (1951— ) has explored England; Redmond O’Hanlon (1947— ) has travelled up the Congo and the Amazon and visited Borneo with James *Fenton (Into the Heart of Borneo, 1984); the Australian Robyn Davidson (1951— ) has crossed the Australian desert on a camel (Tracks, 1980); Duncan Fallowell has created the gay travelogue; B. *Bainbridge in The Birthday Boys (1991) has drawn on the polar narratives of R. F. *Scott and Apsley Cherry-Garrard, and poets Simon *Armitage and Glyn *Maxwell (Moon Country, 1996) have visited Iceland in the footsteps of *Auden and *MacNeice. See Ian Jack (ed.), The Granta Book of Travel (1991) and Lisa *St Aubin de Terán (ed.), The Virago Book of Wanderlust and Dreams (1998).

TRAVEN, B. (1882–1969), novelist and short story writer, whose first stories appeared in German in Berlin in 1925 as Die Baumwollpflücker (The Cotton-pickers) followed by his highly successful novel The Death Ship (1925). It recounts the wanderings of an American seaman after the First World War, bereft of passport and nationality. Traven, whose identity remained for many years shrouded in mystery, went to Mexico in the 1920s, whence appeared some 12 novels and collections of stories, including The Treasure of Sierra Madre (1934), filmed by John Huston in 1947. The Man Who Was B. Traven (1980) by W. Wyatt established that he was Albert Otto Max Feige, later known as Ret Marut, born in Swiebodzin, a Polish town then in Germany, of working-class origins, a radical pamphleteer and survivor of the German revolution of 1919. He eschewed publicity, appearing in later years to visitors under the guise of his own ‘translator’, Hal Croves.

TRAVESTIES, Ben, see under FARCE.

Travesties, a comedy by T. *Stoppard, performed 1974, published 1975. The play is largely set, with various time shifts, in Zurich during the First World War, where Lenin, *Joyce, and Tristan Tzara happened to be residing; they appear as characters, as does the marginally historical figure of Henry Carr (1894–1962), through whose memories much of the action is portrayed. Stoppard takes a minor incident from *Elliott’s life of Joyce, describing a semi-amateur performance in Zurich in 1918 of *The Importance of Being Earnest, in which both Joyce and Carr were involved, and builds from it an extravaganza which plays on *Wilde’s original (in terms of stylistic parody and of the plot of assumed and mistaken identities) to produce a theatrical, informative, and witty commentary on the birth of *Dada, the writing of *Ulysses, and the genesis of the doctrine of *Socialist Realism, and on the nature of the artist as revolutionary or conformist. Stoppard uses a dazzling range of literary and theatrical effects, from Wildean epigram to a scene written entirely in limericks, from a suggestion of strip-tease to a lecture on Marxist theory.

Treasure Island, a romance by R. L. *Stevenson, published in book form 1883. It had previously appeared in Young Folks, July 1881–June 1882, under the title ‘The Sea Cook or Treasure Island’, and the concept grew from a map that Stevenson and his stepson Lloyd Osbourne devised together on holiday in Scotland. The flamboyant one-legged anti-hero Long John Silver was suggested by Stevenson’s friend *Henley.

The narrator is Jim Hawkins, whose mother keeps the Admiral Benbow inn somewhere on the coast in the west of England in the 18th cent. An old buccaneer takes up his quarters at the inn. He has in his chest information, in the shape of a manuscript map, as to the whereabouts of Captain Flint’s treasure. Of this his former confederates are determined to obtain possession, and a body of them, led by the sinister blind pirate Pew, makes a descent on the inn. But Jim Hawkins outwits them, secures the map, and delivers it to Squire Trelawney. The squire and his friend Dr Livesey set off for Treasure Island in the schooner Hispaniola taking Jim with them. Some of the crew are the squire’s faithful dependants, but the majority are old buccaneers recruited by Long John Silver. Their design to seize the ship and kill the squire’s party is discovered by Jim, and after a series of thrilling fights and adventures is completely thwarted; and the squire, with the help of the marooned pirate Ben Gunn, secures the treasure.

Treatise of Human Nature, A, a philosophical work by *Hume, written in France 1734–7, published in three volumes in London 1739–40. The work was recast as three separate and simpler works published between 1748 and 1757: An Enquiry (originally Philosophical Essays) Concerning Human Understanding, An Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals, and A Dissertation on the Passions. Scholars differ as to whether these recastings involve any significant changes in Hume’s philosophical position.

Hume’s work has been traditionally depicted as the culmination of one of two philosophical traditions. His contemporary critic T. *Reid established the common view that Hume was heir to a tradition set by *Locke and *Berkeley, notwithstanding Berkeley's rejection of the central theses of Locke's philosophy. Equally influential in the 20th cent. has been the view of Kemp Smith (1941) that Hume sought to extend and redirect the philosophy of *Hutcheson. Hume indicates his familiarity with their writings, and with the writings of other (otherwise incompatible) British predecessors like B. de *Mandeville and J. *Butler, but cites them mostly for their pioneer work on the science of human nature. Current biographical research suggests that the main formative influences on Hume's thought were his reading of *Cicero (on *Stoicism and *scepticism), *Descartes, Nicolas Malbranch (1638–1715), and *Bayle.

Hume saw the disputes of philosophers as centred upon the conflicting roles of reason and instinct or sentiment, and tried to define these roles for metaphysics in Book I of the Treatise and for the passions and morals in Books II–III. He agreed with Locke, against Descartes, that there are no innate ideas, and that all the data of reason stem from experience, and derived from Descartes the thesis that whatever may be conceived distinctly may be distinct. He argued that reason has insufficient data in experience to form adequate ideas of the external world, distance, bodily identity, causality, the self, and other minds, and that any beliefs we form about these must fall short of knowledge. Reason can attain certainty only in abstract mathematics—from which, in the Treatise, he even excluded geometry, owing to the empirical basis of our idea of space. We also employ reason when we use the experience of acquired associations to identify causes and effects, past events and future contingencies; this does not warrant the name 'certainty' and the process cannot be independently justified. It ceases to be rational altogether, and is then due to the imaginative faculty, when, as in religion, it involves inferences beyond the bounds of familiar experience.

Compensating for the inadequate data of experience and the infirmity of unaided reason are certain 'natural instincts' by which the imagination forges its own links between distinct ideas according to certain principles of association and habituation. Through these acquired but unavoidable associations, which Hume assumed to be explainable in terms of the brain science of the day, we project onto the world a sense of the continuity and externality of bodies, or of the necessity which we feel when some particular sequence of cause and effect has become habitual with us. In calling these mental constructions 'fictions' Hume meant only that they are not directly given in experience. Taken on their own, they can indeed lead us into false judgements, e.g. in misidentifying our sense impressions as the external object. But 'philosophical decisions are nothing but the reflections of common life, methodized and corrected' by the balanced interplay of reason, sense, and natural instinct, a standpoint Hume characterized in the first Enquiry as 'mitigated scepticism'. Hume was, however, dissatisfied with his account of the self as 'a bundle or collection of different perceptions' appropriately associated, because he thought this failed to explain the sense each person has of the unity of consciousness.

In regard to morals, Hume again argued for an accommodation between reason and experience on the one hand (in determining facts and consequences) and sentiment on the other (in so far as moral distinctions are felt, not judged). Hume shared Hutcheson's belief in a moral sense, but not the theological framework or the psychological simplicity of Hutcheson's theory. In so far as there is a common structure of human nature, which approves whatever quality or character gives happiness to the parties affected without giving unhappiness to others, and enables us by the mechanisms of association or sympathy to share the sentiments of others, there is general consensus as to the motives and acts that are accounted morally virtuous and vicious. Hume's distinction between natural and artificial virtues was widely misconstrued in his lifetime: artificial virtues, e.g. justice, involve the determination and application of appropriate conventions in circumstances of need, where merely spontaneous virtues like benevolence are inadequate.

TREE, Sir Herbert Beerbohm (1853–1917), one of the most successful actor-managers of his day, and half-brother to Max *Beerbohm. He was famed for his spectacular productions (embellished with waterfalls, horses, and other special effects) and his many roles included Svengali in Trilby (1895) and Higgins in Shaw's Pygmalion.

TRECE, Henry, see New Apocalypse.

TRELAWNY, Edward John (1792–1881), of Cornish descent, born in London. He is remembered principally for his connection with and records of Shelley and *Byron. When he met Shelley in Pisa in Jan. 1822 Trelawny had survived unhappy years as a midshipman in the navy, followed by marriage and divorce: from this time he attached himself first to Shelley (he was present at Livorno when Shelley was drowned) and later to Byron, whom he accompanied to Greece in July 1823. Byron had remarked on first meeting that 'Trelawny was 'the personification of my Corsair', and he did his best to live up to that image. He was the author of the notable Adventures of a Younger Son (1831), an autobiographical novel published with the encouragement of Mary *Shelley (who provided its title); it tells the story of a handsome, romantic, buccaneering youth, a lawless daredevil, warped in youth by the harshness of his father, who deserts from the navy and takes to a life of wandering during which he becomes involved in many wild escapades and desperate ventures. It is highly unreliable as autobiography, but written with much verve. His other publication was Recollections of the Last Days of Shelley... and Byron (1858), again unreliable, but again written with great poetry and panache; it was later expanded to Records of Shelley, Byron, and the Author (1878). See William St Clair, Trelawny: The Incurable Romancer (1977) and David Crane, Lord Byron's Jackal (1998).

TREMAIN, Rose (1943– ), novelist, short story writer, and playwright, born in London, educated at the Sorbonne in Paris and at the University of East Anglia. Her first novel, Sadler's Birthday, was published in 1976 and was followed by Letter to Sister Benedicta (1979), The Swimming Pool Season (1985), and The Cupboard (1989). Her best-known work of fiction, Restoration, published in 1989, is a first-person historical novel in which the central character, Robert Merivel, the son of a glove-maker and a student of anatomy, is taken up by Charles II but suffers the king's disfavour after he marries Celia Clémence, Charles's former mistress. As a result, Merivel exiles himself from Suffolk farmland to Nashville, Tennessee, in its exploration of gender and identity, was published in 1992. Her short stories have been collected as The Colonel's Daughter (1984), The Garden of the Villa Mollini (1987), and Evangelista's Fan (1994). The Way I Found Her (1997) describes a hot summer in Paris, seen through the eyes of precocious 13-year-old Lewis Little. He is emotionally obsessed by voluptuous Valentina Gavril, a novelist whose works his mother is translating from French, and the mood of adolescent eroticism and quest is heightened by frequent reference to *Alain-Fournier's Le Grand Meaulnes. She has also written radio plays.

TRENCH, Frederic Herbert (1865–1923), born in Co. Cork and educated at Keble College, Oxford. He travelled widely in southern Europe and the Near East, and was from 1909 to 1911 artistic director of the Haymarket Theatre. His own plays had little success. Of his various poetic works, the most interesting is 'Apollo and the Seaman' (1907), a haunting narrative poem with echoes of the *Ancient Mariner, in which Apollo and the seaman debate the sinking of the great ship, Lost Immortality, and the future of the soul.

TRENCH, Richard Chenevix (1807–86), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards dean of Westminster and archbishop of Dublin. He was the author of works dealing with history and literature, poetry, divinity, and philology. As a philologist, and notably by his On the Study of Words (1851) and English Past and Present (1855), he popularized the scientific study of language. The scheme of the *Oxford English Dictionary originated in a resolution passed at his suggestion in 1858 by the *Philological Society. He also published several volumes of poetry, and his anthology Sacred Latin Poetry, Chiefly Lyrical (1849) drew attention to the masterpieces of Latin hymnody.

TRESSELL, Robert, the pen-name of Robert Noonan (?1870–1911), a house painter of Irish extraction, remembered for his posthumously published novel The Ragged Trousered Philanthropists, which first appeared in 1914, edited from a manuscript left in the care of his daughter. It draws on his experiences while working for a builder in Hastings, where he settled in 1902 after various wanderings. He died of tuberculosis in Liverpool. An abridged edition of his novel appeared in 1918, but on the discovery of the original handwritten manuscript in 1946 it became clear that the author's intentions had been widely altered, and it reappeared, edited by F. C. Ball, in 1955. The action takes place during one year in the lives of a group of working men in the town of Mugsborough, and the novel is a bitter but spirited attack on the greed, dishonesty, and gullibility of employers and workers alike, and on the social conditions that gave rise to these vices. Debates on socialism, competition, employment, and capitalism are skilfully interwoven with a realistic and knowledgeable portrayal of skilled and unskilled labour in the decorating and undertaking business, and with the human stories of the families of the workers. Principal characters include Frank Owen, socialist craftsman and atheist; Barrington, socialist son of a wealthy father, intent on first-hand experience of labour; the inadequate but well-intentioned Eastons with their unfortunate baby whom they feed on fried bacon; and Sylme, a canting and unprincipled teetotaller. Noonan's coining of names for local worthies—Sweater, Didlum, Grinder, Botchit, etc.—indicates his attitude towards the widespread corruption and hypocrisy that he exposes, and the book has become a classic text of the Labour movement. The ironically named 'philanthropists' of the title are the workers who for pitiful wages 'toil and sweat at their noble and unselfish task of making money' for their employers, while making no effort to understand or better their lot.

TREVELYAN, G(eorge) M(acaulay) (1876–1962), historian, son of Sir G. O. *Trevelyan, educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a member of the *Apostles. He was appointed Regius professor of modern history at Cambridge in 1927, and master of Trinity in 1940. He was author of three remarkable works on Garibaldi, Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic (1907), Garibaldi and the Thousand (1909), and Garibaldi and the Making of Italy (1911), which owe some of their vividness of narrative and description to the fact that Trevelyan himself, a tireless walker, retraced on foot every mile of the scenes of campaign. His many other works include lives of John Bright (1913), Lord Grey (1920), and Grey of Falloden (1937); a three-volume work on England under Queen Anne (1930–4); and his popular and nostalgic English Social History (1944). In Layman's Love of Letters TREVISA, Sir George Otto (1838–1928), nephew of *Macaulay, educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge. He entered Parliament as a Liberal in 1865 and held several important offices. Some of his early humorous writings were collected in *The Ladies in Parliament (1869), others mainly about India included *The Hawk Bungalow (1863, a comedy), *The Competition Wallah (1864), and *Cawnpore (1865). The first of his great works, *The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay, appeared in 1876, and was followed by *The Early History of George the Third and Charles Fox (1912–14).

TREVISAN, John of (?1340–1402), born in Cornwall, a fellow of Exeter (1362–9) and the Queen’s (1369–79) colleges, Oxford. He was expelled from Oxford for ‘unworthiness’ and became vicar of Berkeley. In 1387 he translated the *Polychronicon of *Higden, adding a short continuation and an introduction; part of this has become famous as an account of the state of the English language in its time (see K. Sisam, *Fourteenth Century Verse and Prose, 1921, no. XIII). The Polychronicon translation is written in a vigorous and colloquial style, though he also has claims to a more elaborate manner; his principles of translation are declared in two short essays prefixed to the Polychronicon. He also translated Egidio Colonna’s *De Regimine Principum, one of the sources of *Hoccleve’s *Regiment of Princes, and in 1398 the *De Proprietatibus Rerum of *Bartholomaeus Anglicus. In the edition of his *Dialogus by A. J. Perry (EETS OS 167, 1925—also containing works by other writers) there is a good account of his life.

TREVOR, William (William Trevor Cox) (1928– ), Anglo-Irish novelist and short story writer, born in Co. Cork and educated at Trinity College, Dublin; he has spent much of his life in Ireland, which provides the setting for many of his works. His novels include *The Old Boys (1964), *Mrs Eckdorf in O’Neill’s Hotel (1969), *Elizabeth Alone (1973), and *Fools of Fortune (1983); collections of short stories include *The Day We Got Drunk on Cake (1969), *Angels at the Ritz (1975), and *Beyond the Pale (1981). A Penguin collection of his stories appeared in 1983. The title story of *The Ballroom of Romance (1972), which like many of Trevor’s works, has been successfully televised, is a characteristically low-key, poignant evocation of a rural Ireland where men drink and women wait whereas that of *Lovers of Their Time (1978) deals with middle-aged romance in a hotel bathroom at Paddington, and the novel *The Children of Dynmouth (1976) describes an English seaside resort terrorized by a delinquent teenager. Trevor writes with insight of the elderly, the lonely, and the unsuccessful, and his more recent works (e.g. *Attracta, 1978, the story of an ageing schoolmistress) show an increasing preoccupation with the effects of terrorism in Northern Ireland. Other story collections include *The News from Ireland (1986) and *Family Sins (1989). Two novellas, *Two Lives, appeared in 1991. Collected editions of his short stories were published in 1983 and 1992. Amongst later novels are *The Silence in the Garden (1988) and *Felicia’s Journey (1994), which won the *Sunday Express Book of the Year Award and the Whitbread Novel Award and is a powerful account of a young girl’s journey from her home in rural Ireland to industrial Britain. *Excursions in the Real World (1994) is a collection of personal essays on childhood, people, and places.

Triamond, in Spenser’s *Faerie Queene (iv. iii. iv), the Knight of Friendship. After an inconclusive fight with *Cambello in the contest to decide to which of her suitors *Canacee (Cambello’s sister) is to be awarded, Triamond and Cambello swear eternal friendship. In the tournament arranged by *Satyrane, Triamond, though wounded, returns to rescue Cambello. He marries Canacee.

Tribulation Wholesome, the fanatical Puritan elder in Jonson’s *The Alchemist.

*Trilby, a novel written and illustrated by George *du Maurier, published 1894.

The setting of the story reflects the writer’s years as an art student in Paris, and the three student friends of Trilby O’Ferrall (the Laird, Little Billee, and Taffy) are portraits of friends. The charming Trilby, an artist’s model, slowly falls under the mesmeric spell of Svengali, a German-Polish musician, who trains her voice and establishes her as a famous singer. His power over her is such that when he dies her voice collapses, she loses her eminence, languishes, and finally dies herself. The novel was immensely popular for many years, and in 1895 was dramatized with Beerbohm *Tree as Svengali. Trilby’s hat, a soft felt with an indented crown, is the origin of the ‘trilby’.

TRILLING, Lionel (1905–75), American critic, whose many works include *The Liberal Imagination (1950), *The Opposing Self (1955), and *Sincerity and Authenticity (1972). His works are written from the standpoint of liberal humanism (increasingly conceived as being under threat) and manifest a marked admiration for *Freud, ‘one of the few great Plutarchian characters of our time’, without in any way committing themselves to doctrinaire *Freudian criticism. Trilling’s wide range of subjects includes *Keats, H. *James, J. *Austen, *Wordsworth, F. S. *Fitzgerald, S. *Ander- son, etc. His works appeared in a 12-volume edition, 1978–80. He also wrote one novel, *The Middle of the Journey (1947).

trilogy, in Greek antiquity, a series of three tragedies (originally connected in subject) performed at Athens at the festival of Dionysus. Hence any series of three related dramatic or other literary works.

Trim, Corporal, the devoted servant of Toby in Sterne’s Tristram Shandy.

trimmer, originally applied to one who trims between opposing parties in politics; hence, one who inclines as his interest dictates. But Halifax in his Character of a Trimmer (1682) accepted the nickname in the sense of ‘one who keeps even the ship of state’.

Trimmer, Character of a, see Halifax.

TRIMMER, Mrs Sarah, née Kirby (1741–1810), known as ‘Good Mrs Trimmer’, the author of the popular children’s book The History of the Robins, originally entitled Fabulous Histories (1786), and of many exemplary tales, educational works, and textbooks for charity schools. In her periodical The Guardian of Education (1802–6) she attacked traditional children’s literature, and in particular fairy stories, describing Cinderella as a tale inculcating ‘envy, jealousy, a dislike for mothers-in-law and half-sisters, vanity, a love of dress’.

Trinculo, companion to Stephano in Shakespeare’s The Tempest.

triolet, a poem of eight lines, with two rhymes, in which the first line is repeated as the fourth and seventh, and the second as the eighth.

triplet, three successive lines of verse rhyming together, occasionally introduced among heroic couples, e.g. by Dryden.

Trip to Scarborough, A, a musical play by R. B. Sheridan, produced 1777. The play is based on Vanbrugh’s The Relapse, but it was considerably rewritten, coarse language was carefully expunged, and music and songs were added. In Sheridan’s version Berinitha is no longer altogether an unscrupulous coquette; she tempts Loveless in order to punish Towneley (the Worthy of the earlier play) for deserting her in favour of Amanda, Loveless’s wife.

Eventually it is his sense of shame and honour, and not the threat of exposure, that restores Loveless to Amanda.

‘Tristram and Iseult’, a poem in three parts by M. Arnold, published 1852. This is the first modern version of the story that was made familiar by *Wagner and Tennyson; it deals with the death of Tristram (Tristan, in earlier editions of the same work), who lies dying, watched over by Iseult of Brittany, and dreaming in his fever of his love for Iseult of Ireland, the wife of Marc. She arrives, and after a brief passionate dialogue he dies. In Part III Iseult of Brittany tells her children the story of Merlin, entranced by Vivian.

Tristram and Iseult (Tristan and Isolde). The long story of Tristram de Lyones is the fifth of Vinaver’s eight works of *Malory. The love of Tristram and Iseult is much older than the corresponding Arthurian story of the love of Launcelot and Guinevere, and it was incorporated into the Arthurian legends only at a late stage. Denis de Rougemont (Passion and Society, 1940) declares Tristan to be the prototype of the courtly lover, a view corroborated by repeated references to him in courtly love lyrics and romances (see courtly love). It is thought likely that there was a Tristan romance (since lost) by *Chretien de Troyes in the 1170s, and it is possible, judging from repeated references in the poetry of the troubadours, that there was an early Provençal Tristan. There are three versions surviving from the 12th cent.: Béroul’s fragment of 4,485 lines (c.1190) in the Norman dialect; Thomas’s French fragment (c.1170); and the version in literary Rhenish German by Eilhart (c.1170). The most authoritative medieval version is by Gottfried von Strassburg (c.1200; nothing is known of his life) in German, of which the last sixth is missing and which is based to some extent on Thomas. The best English translation (by A. T. Hatto, 1960) supplies the last sixth from Thomas’s version. The first English version is Sir Tristrem, a northern 3,344-line romance in 11-line stanzas, dating from c.1300 (unpersuasively attributed to Thomas of Erceldoune). In Malory, Tristram is the child of Meliodas, king of *Lyonesse, and Elizabeth, the sister of King Mark of Cornwall, who dies soon after his sorrowful birth. The sad child is brought up at the court of King Mark whose attitude to the boy varies in different versions from great affection to jealousy. Tristram defeats and kills Sir Marhalt (Marhaus), the brother of Iseult, queen of Ireland. Tristram is sent to Ireland to be cured of his wounds by Iseult the queen, and he falls in love with her daughter Iseult; when the queen discovers that this knight (whom she too holds in special esteem) is the slayer of her brother, Tristram returns to Cornwall. Later King Mark sends Tristram as ambassador in seeking for him the hand of the younger Iseult. The princess and her maid Brangwayn return by ship to Cornwall; Brangwayn has been given a love potion by Queen Iseult to be given on their wedding-night to Iseult and King Mark, which will bind them in unending love. By mistake the love potion is drunk by Tristram and Iseult who are bound thereafter in endless passion, though Iseult has to marry Mark. The rest of the story is concerned with the fated love of Tristram and Iseult (in a manner broadly reminiscent of the Irish epic stories of *Deirdre and the sons of Usnach, and Diarmait and Grainne), and the subterfuges (often ingenious and morally reprehensible) which the lovers have to adopt; as in Chretien’s Lancelot, love is represented as a value that transcends morality. Tristram leaves Mark’s court and, while fighting for Howel of Brittany, falls in love with and marries a third Iseult (Isole of the White Hands). But, on the invitation of Iseult of Ireland, he returns to Cornwall where he is killed by Mark while playing his harp before Iseult. In some versions his Tristram’s love for Queen Iseult, his marriage to Iseult of Brittany, and his death. W. *Morris, whose own conception, and deliberately providing no consistent plot or conclusion. Sterne’s wayward typography, which includes rows of asterisks, dashes, diagrams, blank pages, various typefaces and other devices, paradoxically emphasizes his cheerful view of the unreality of the ‘novel’ form which he is himself using.

The chief character of the book is the narrator, Tristram, through whose thoughts, feelings, and observations we encounter the people and events about which he writes. He is shrewd and bawdy, delighting in the idiosyncrasy of the Shandy household, and filled with such vitality his words can scarcely keep up with his headlong thought. The main characters he introduces are his excitable and devoted father Walter, whose flamboyant eloquence flows on through philosophy, paradox, and hypothesis, filled with references to the classics, history, science, medicine, law, the arts, and all learning run wild; Uncle Toby, Walter’s soldier brother, whose portrait *Hazlitt described as ‘one of the finest compliments ever paid to human nature’, a man benign and practical, whose most passionate interest is aroused only by the problems of military fortifications and, more fleetingly, by the widow Wadman; Corporal Trim, Toby’s devoted and loquacious servant, who shares his master’s passion for fortifications; the bewildered Mrs Shandy; the impulsive and argumentative parson Yorick; Dr *Slop, an incompetent physician; the Shandys’ neighbour Mrs Wadman, who designs to marry Toby; and the irresponsible household servant Obadiah. Tristram’s persistent interest and amusement in sexual matters (such as his own conception or Toby’s wound in the groin) is demonstrated in frequent ironical parades of discretion, indiscretion, and innuendo.

A sketch of the ‘story’ may be attempted but cannot be very helpful. In volume i Tristram is noted as arriving in ‘the scurvy and disastrous world’, and with much learned digression and other distraction his family and friends are introduced and described. Volume ii concentrates chiefly on the past military experiences of Toby and Corporal Trim, and their present enthusiasms, and on a lengthy discussion of a controversial sermon read aloud by Trim. Tristram’s birth is now fully described in volume iii, but only after many diversions and asides, including the mighty curse of Ernulphus of Rochester—at which time the author finds occasion to produce his overdue Preface. Volume iv contains Walter’s exposition to his bewildered brother Toby of Slawkenbergius’s Latin treatise on noses (for which the Shandys are famous), and an account of the misnaming of the infant ‘Tristram’ instead of ‘Trismegistus’. Volume v covers the death of Tristram’s brother Bobby and Walter’s response, the reflections of Trim on death, and the devising of the Tristapaedia for Tristram’s education. Volume vi relates the pathetic tale of Lieutenant Le Fever and his son, together with Toby’s great kindness to them; includes the ludicrous bedtime discussion between Mr and Mrs Shandy on the putting of Tristram into breeches; describes the tremendous model of military earthworks constructed by Toby and Trim in the garden; and begins the story of Toby’s amour with the widow Wadman. In volume vii the Shandy family narrative is broken by a description of Tristram’s travels and adventures in France. Volume viii follows the complex emotions developing between Toby and Mrs Wadman, and Trim’s attempt to tell his story of the king of Bohemia. Volume ix includes the pathetic tale of mad Maria (who appears again in *A Sentimental Journey) and continues the story of Toby’s love affair, until its sad collapse. The final brief episode of the book contains a confused conversation about Walter’s bull.

L—d! said my mother, what is all this story about?—A
COCK and a BULL, said Yorick—And one of the best of its kind, I ever heard.'

The first version of volumes i and ii was rejected by *Dodson, and Sterne had a revised version of them published in York in 1759. The rest of the work was published in London between 1761 and 1767 and enjoyed great general success, although Dr *Johnson, *Richardson, *Goldsmith, and certain other literary figures expressed their reservations on both literary and moral grounds.

Triumph of Life, The, an unfinished visionary poem by P. B. *Shelley, written in the bay of Lerici in summer 1822, published from rough drafts 1824.

Composed in *terza rima, the poem is strongly influenced by *Dante’s *Inferno, *Petarch’s *Trionfi, and the carvings of Roman triumphal processions Shelley had seen in the Forum. The ‘triumph’ or masquerade (as the *Mask of Anarchy) belongs to the cruel Chariot of Life, here shown as one of Shelley’s Tyrant-figures. Life appears to vanquish the hope and ideals of all men, dragging in its train even the greatest, like Plato, Alexander, or Napoleon. Only the ‘sacred few’, like Jesus and Socrates, who early ‘Fled back like eagles to their native noon’, escape compromise and captivity. The poetry has a bitter, lucid directness that is new to a kind, I ever heard.’

Alexander, or Napoleon. Only the ‘sacred few’, like Jesus and Socrates, who early ‘Fled back like eagles to their native noon’, escape compromise and captivity. The atmosphere of the poem, full of images drawn from the sea, is darkly hypnotic.

Triumph of Peace, The, a masque by J. *Shirley, acted and printed 1634.

This was the best known of all 17th-cent. *masques, mainly because of the spectacular torchlight procession (or ‘triumph’) of the masquers, from Holborn to Whitehall, which preceded the masque proper. It was an expression of loyalty to the Crown on the part of the four Inns of Court, after *Prynne—a member of Lincoln’s Inn—had published his Histriomastix (1633) with a dedication to his fellow benchers at the Inn. Shirley’s plot is simple: the chief anti-masquer, Fancy, presents a series of interludes showing the benefit and abuses of Peace; these are finally driven away by the entry of Peace, Law, and Justice—qualities which, the lawyers were eager to point out, cannot flourish apart from one another. The masque was designed by I. *Jones, and its score (by W. *Lawes and Simon Ives) is among the few examples of masque music that have survived.

TRIVET, Nicholas (c.1258–?1334), of a family with connections in Norfolk and Somerset, a Dominican who studied at Oxford and Paris. He made early commentaries on a number of classical texts, including *Boethius, but he is most celebrated as the writer of three histories in the 1320s: his Anglo-Norman Chronicle, extending from the Creation to 1285, surviving in eight manuscripts and containing the tale of Constance, told by *Gower in Confessio Amantis and by Chaucer’s Man of Law (see *CANTERBURY TALES, 5); secondly, Annals of Six Kings of England 1136–1307, pro-Angevin and particularly useful for the reign of Edward I; and third, the Historia ab Orbe Condito (1327–9), an encyclopaedic history influenced by *Vincent of Beauvais.

Trivia, or The Art of Walking the Streets of London, a poem by J. *Gay in three books, published 1716. It is a town eclogue, owing ‘some hints’ to *Swift, whose ‘City Shower’ (1710) is in the same vein. Gay conducts the reader through the streets of London, by day and then by night, offering advice on coats and boots (Book I contains a mock-heroic derivation of the word ‘pattern’), on the hazards of pavement, gutters, and rubbish, and on the characters he will encounter—boot-boys, ballad-singers, footmen, bullies, fishwives, etc. It is a lively, affectionate, and entertaining piece, and a mine of information. ‘Trivia’ means ‘streets’, from the root meaning of ‘road junction’, and Gay, who invokes Trivia as a goddess of the highways, also refers to the murder of Laius by Oedipus at the crossroads in Book III, l. 217.

Trivium, the lower division of the Seven Liberal Arts, consisting of the methodological subjects Grammar, Rhetoric, and Logic, as distinct from the mathematically based sciences of the *Quadrivium. The Trivium had great importance throughout the period of the Roman Empire, and it was taught from the time of Aristotle in Greek. Its period of greatest importance was the 11th and 12th cents, at Chartres and in such writers as *John of Salisbury. Gradually logic became the all-important member, so that in the 12th cent, the Trivium was redefined as grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, regarded as sub-sections of logic; in the 13th cent, concern for argumentative precision meant that the literary aspects of the Trivium disappeared almost entirely, and grammar and rhetoric as expressive skills ceased to be taught. The derogatory adjective ‘trivial’ (first found in English in the 16th cent.) reflects this progressive decline.

TROCCHI, Alexander (1925–84), novelist, poet, translator, and editor, born in Glasgow, and educated at Glasgow University. He lived in Paris during the 1950s, where he published several novels (as ‘Frances Lengel’) for the *Olympia Press, notably the haunting canal-drowning mystery Young Adam (1954) and edited, with C. *Logue, the short-lived but influential magazine Merlin (1952–5) which published work by *Beckett, *Genet, *Neruda, and others. He is best remembered for Cain’s Book (USA 1961, UK 1963), a classic story of heroin addiction.

Troilus and Cressida, a tragedy by *Shakespeare probably written 1602, perhaps with a performance at one of the Inns of Court in mind. It was first printed 1609, in a quarto of which there are two issues, with different title-pages, one of which has a prefatory epistle, 'A never writer, to an ever reader. News.' This was not included in the First * Folio, where *Homer's and *Chaucer's handling of material was not included in the first * Folio, where the death of Hector at the hands of Achilles: Troilus contains much formal debate, and takes the story up to agree with *Coleridge's view that 'there is none of the events of the poem take place in Shakespeare knew of Henryson's *Testament of Cresseid, *Caxton's Recuyell of the Histories of Troye, and *Lydgate's Troy Book, and drew on *Ovid's Metamorphoses Books 11 and 12. R. *Greene's Euphues His Censure to Philautus (1587) and *Chapman's Seven Books of the Iliads (1598).

Shakespeare's treatment of the love of Troilus and Cressida and its betrayal, against the setting of the siege of Troy by the Greeks, is conventional. The play contains much formal debate, and takes the story up to the death of Hector at the hands of Achilles: Troilus fails to kill his rival Diomedes, and the cynically railing Thersites escapes death. Modern criticism has tended to agree with *Coleridge's view that 'there is none of Shakespeare's plays harder to characterise.'

Troilus and Criseyde, *Chaucer's longest complete poem, in 8,239 lines of rhyme-royal, probably written in the second half of the 1380s (J. D. North, RES, 1969, has shown that the events of the poem take place in calendar circumstances corresponding on astronomical evidence to dates between 1385 and 1388). Chaucer takes his story from *Boccaccio's Il filostrato, adapting its eight books to five and changing the characters of Criseyde and *Pandarus. In Boccaccio Troilus falls in love with Criseida whose cousin, Trollop's friend Pandaro, persuades her, not unwillingly, to become Troilo's lover. In the end Criseida has to leave the Trojan camp to join her father who had defected to the Greeks; in the Greek camp she betrays Troilo by falling in love with Diomede. While following the same narrative pattern, Chaucer deepens the sense of seriousness in the story by making Pandaro Criseida's uncle and guardian, by showing her deliberating at more length (this series of exchanges between uncle and niece in Book II is one of the most admired and anthologized parts of the poem), and by introducing deliberative material, principally from *Boethius, calling into question the lovers' freedom of action. The poem ends with an adjuration to the young to repair home from worldly vanity and to place their trust, not in unstable fortune as Troilus did, but in God. Discussion of the poem has centred largely on the appropriateness of the epilogue to the preceding action, on the attitudes to love (courteously in particular) in the poem, and on the personality of the narrator and his effect on the narrative. The love story has no basis in classical antiquity but is the invention of *Benoit de Sainte-Maure in his Roman de Troie, which was based on the pretended histories of Troy by *Dares Phrygius and *Dictys Cretensis. Boccaccio's intermediate source was *Guido delle Colonne (see TROPEHE). After Chaucer, the story was treated by Henryson in *The Testament of Cresseid and by Shakespeare in *Troilus and Cressida.

TROLLOPE, Anthony (1815–82), born in London. His Autobiography, written 1875–6, published posthumously 1883, describes his life with a characteristic blend of candour and reticence. His father, a fellow of New College, Oxford, before his marriage, failed both as a lawyer and as a farmer. The family's poverty made Trollope miserable at school (he went to both Harrow and Winchester), and when financial difficulties became acute, the family moved to Belgium, where Trollope's father died. Mrs Frances *Trollope had already begun to support the family through her belated career as an author; she was already in her fifties when her successful Domestic Manners of the Americans was published in 1832. Trollope became a junior clerk in the General Post Office in London in 1834, but only began to make any professional progress when transferred to Ireland in 1841. He married Rose Heseltine of Rotherham in 1844; they had two sons, the younger of whom was to settle in Australia. Trollope did not return permanently to England until 1859, although he travelled extensively on Post Office business; he undertook important postal missions at various times to Egypt, the West Indies, and the United States. By the end of his professional career Trollope had become a successful and important if also highly individual civil servant. Among his achievements is the introduction in Great Britain of the pillar-box for letters. He resigned from the Post Office in 1867, and stood unsuccessfully for Parliament as a Liberal in 1868. Trollope thought that a seat in Parliament ought to be 'the highest object of ambition to every educated Englishman'. He edited the St Paul's Magazine, 1867–70.

His literary career began with the appearance of The Macdermots of Ballycloran in 1847, but not until his fourth novel, *The Warden (1855), did he establish the manner and material by which he is best known. This, the first of the 'Barsetshire' series, was followed by *Barchester Towers (1857), *Doctor Thorne (1858), *Framley Parsonage (1861), *The Small House at Allington (1864), and *The Last Chronicle of Barset (1867). The action of these novels is for the most part set in the imaginary West Country county of Barset and its chief town, Barchester, of which Trollope says in the Autobiography, 'I had it all in my mind,—its roads and towards his art, as well as on its sheer quantity. He concerned with character than with plot, and made himself had lived with the characters in his lifelike characters a fundamental test of his or her merit.

Travelling by rail and sea, and as soon as he finished one fanatical devotion to hunting). He also wrote when he also prided himself on his workmanlike attitude and regularity of composition. He trained himself to produce a given number of words an hour in the early morning before going off to his post office duties. He attributed his remarkable output, which included 47 novels, several travel books, biographies, as well as collections of short stories and sketches, to a disciplined regularity of composition. He trained himself to produce a given number of words an hour in the early morning before going off to his post office duties (which he also managed to combine with an almost fanatical devotion to hunting). He also wrote when travelling by rail and sea, and as soon as he finished one novel began another. He was always much more concerned with character than with plot, and made the degree to which an author really knows his characters a fundamental test of his or her merit.

In the Autobiography Trollope writes eloquently of the novelist’s need to live with his creatures ‘in the full reality of established intimacy. They must be with him as he lies down to sleep, and as he wakes from dreams.’ He also stresses the importance of recording change and the effects of time: ‘On the last day of each month recorded, every person in his novel should be a month older than on the first.’ Trollope attributed whatever success he had obtained to the intimacy with which he himself had lived with the characters in his lifelike imagination. His popularity was at its peak during the 1860s; readers admired his treatment of family and professional life, the variety and delicacy of his heroines, and the photographic accuracy of his pictures of social life.

Apart from the two series, Trollope’s other principal novels include: The Three Clerks (1857), The Bertrams (1859), Orley Farm (1862), The Belton Estate (1866), The Claverings (1867), He Knew He Was Right (1869), The Vicar of Bullhampton (1870), The Way We Live Now (1875), The American Senator (1877), Doctor Wortle’s School (1881), Ayala’s Angel (1881), Mr Scarborough’s Family (1883). The Autobiography records that, down to 1879, his publications had brought him some £70,000, which he thought ‘comfortable, but not splendid’. Despite a sometimes overbearing public manner, Trollope became a popular figure in London and literary society in his later years. He was on good terms with the major novelists of his day: he greatly admired *Thackeray, of whom he nevertheless wrote a clear-sighted study (1879), and was a close friend of G. Eliot and G. H. *Lewes. In an obituary essay on Trollope written in 1883, H. *James summed up his achievement by saying that ‘His great, his inestimable merit was a complete appreciation of the usual . . . Trollope’s great apprehension of the real, which was what made him so interesting, came to him through his desire to satisfy us on this point—to tell us what certain people were and what they did in consequence of being so.’ See D. Smalley (ed.), The Critical Heritage (1969); Letters, ed. N. John Hall (2 vols, 1983).

TROLLOPE, Frances (1780–1863), a woman, and writer, of indefatigable energy, who made an unfortunate marriage, conducted several ventures into, for instance, farming, and when she was past 50 wrote the first of over 40 books, by which she proceeded to support her large family, and eventually achieved wealth and fame. After the failure of their farm at Harrow (later to appear in her son Anthony Trollope’s Orley Farm she sailed to New Orleans in 1827 with Utopian aspirations and three of her children, and opened an exotic bazaar in Cincinnati. This venture failing, she travelled for 15 months in America, then in 1832, back in England, published her caustic Domestic Manners of the Americans. Its resounding success brought contracts to write on the Belgians, the French, the Austrians, and others, and she lived for the next few years on the Continent. Paris and the Parisians appeared with great success in 1835, Vienna and the Austrians in 1838, and in 1842 Visit to Italy (where she became the friend of the *Brownings, *Dickens, and *Landor). Meanwhile, by working both early and late every day, she was writing a long sequence of popular novels, some of which, like Michael Armstrong, the Factory Boy (1840), dealt with social issues, and by the early 1840s was earning a considerable income. (See Social Problem Novel.) She built a house at Penrith, and was invited to meet the elderly *Wordsworth (whom she disliked). *

railroads, its towns and parishes, its members of Parliament, and the different hunts which rode over it. I knew all the great lords and their castles, the squares and their parks, the rectors and their churches . . . Throughout these stories there has been no name given to a fictitious site which does not represent to me a spot of which I know all the accessories, as though I had lived and wandered there.’ Trollope regarded The Last Chronicle of Barset as his best novel, taken as a whole. The Barset novels are also interconnected by characters who appear in more than one of them, and Trollope developed this technique in his second series, known as the ‘Political’ novels or—perhaps more appropriately—as the ‘Palliser’ novels, after Plantagenet Palliser, who appears in all of them. This series began with Can You Forgive Her? (1864) and continued with Phineas Finn (1869), The Eustace Diamonds (1873), Phineas Redux (1876), The Prime Minister (1876), and The Duke’s Children (1880). The two series taken together thus span over 20 years of Trollope’s writing life. Trollope established the novel sequence in English fiction. His use of reappearing characters had been anticipated by *Balzac (who uses them on an even grander scale), but there is no evidence that Trollope was in any way indebted to the French author. The characters of Palliser and his wife Lady Glencora, together with that of Mr Crawley from The Last Chronicle of Barset, seemed to Trollope to give his work its best chance of survival. The Palliser novels also allowed Trollope to express his views on political matters.

Although modest in claiming literary excellence, Trollope prided himself on his workmanlike attitude towards his art, as well as on its sheer quantity. He attributed his remarkable output, which included 47 novels, several travel books, biographies, as well as collections of short stories and sketches, to a disciplined regularity of composition. He trained himself to produce a given number of words an hour in the early morning before going off to his post office duties (which he also managed to combine with an almost fanatical devotion to hunting). Trophee, an unknown writer mentioned by *Chaucer in 'The Monk's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales, 19):
At bothe the worldes endes, seith Trophee,
In stide of boundes he [i.e. Hercules] a pileer sette.

A marginal note in the Ellesmere and Hengwrt manuscripts says 'Ille vates Chaldeorum Tropheus'.
*Lydgate says that Chaucer in his youth made a translation of a book called in the Lombard tongue Trophe, and that he later named it 'Troilus and Cressida'. No such book, or author, is known; of the explanations offered, the most likely is either that the Latin word for the pillars (of Hercules), tropea, has been interpolated and interpreted as an author's name, or that *Trophea represents *Guido delle Colonne ('Pillars') and that it is he that Chaucer is indicating.

Troubadours, poets composing in *Provençal during the 12th and early 13th cents (and perhaps earlier). They were famous for the complexity of their verse forms in the lyric, and for the conception of *courty love which is founded to an important degree in their poems. Guilhem IX (1071–1127), count of Poitiers and duke of Aquitaine, is the first known troubadour; Jaufre Rudel (d. before 1167) developed the theme of 'amor de lonh', love from afar. The most admired troubadour love poets are Bernart de Ventadorn (fl. 1140–75), Raimbaut d'Aurenga (c.1144–73), Guiraut de Bornel (c.1165–1212: the most admired in his own time, the 'maestre dels trobadors'), and Arnaut Daniel (fl. 1180–1200), whom *Dante and *Petrarch admired most, an admiration shared in the 20th cent. by *Pound, who composed excellent translations of Daniel. The troubadours flourished in the courts of Spain, Italy, and northern France, as well as in the south of France, and courtly poetry in Provençal was being written and cultivated in Italy in the later 13th cent. (see Sordello and Dante) when it was disappearing in the Midi. Through their influence on the northern French poets (such as *Chrétien, and the writers of the *Roman de la rose) and on the German poets of the minnesang (see MINNESINGERS) they had a major effect on all the subsequent development of European lyric poetry. Though love was their major subject, it was not their only one; they also composed moralizing, satirical, and political poems called sirventes (of which Guiraut de Bornel was the recognized master), and military poems in which Bertran de Born (c.1140–c.1215) excelled. See A. R. Press (ed. and trans.), Anthology of Troubadour Lyric Poetry (1971: parallel text); L. T. Topsfield, Troubadours and Love (1975).

Troubles, literature of the. The term 'the Troubles' is used to refer both to the years of the war for Irish independence, which followed the Easter Rising of 1916 and ended with the ceasefire of 1923, and to the later (not unconnected) post-1968 period of the Northern Irish Troubles. In the first sense, the Troubles inspired work by *Yeats, *O'Casey, *O'Flaherty, and many other Irish patriots and critics of Irish nationalism, and gave a title to J. G. *Farrell's *historical novel Troubles (1970). The latter period has also produced an important body of work. The [Northern Irish] Troubles came in October 1968,' writes Seamus *Deane in Reading in the Dark, an enigmatic work of fiction about a family and a society scuppered by inherited blight which was published nearly 30 years later in 1996. The intervening years had thrown up a good deal of 'Troubles' writing, in prose as well as poetry, though little of the former to equal the extraordinary poetic efflorescence which coincided with the years of upheaval. 'Troubles' fiction tends to encompass the activities of IRA 'godfathers' and their adversaries, as in M. S. Power's 'Children of the North' trilogy, beginning in 1985 with The Killing of Yesterday’s Children, or to consist of low-key accounts of life in fraught circumstances such as Mary Beckett's Give Them Stones (1986).

Silver's City (1981) by Maurice Leitch points up a ravaged Belfast while tackling Protestant terrorism, graft, and brutality; and Naomi May's Troubles (1976) has as one of its themes the defeat of liberalism among unionists during the 1960s, with the consequent cataclysm. John Morrow brings a blackly comic imagination to bear on the Troubles, particularly in The Essex Factor (1982), which has an unfortunate Englishman, an opposition backbencher on a fact-finding trip to Northern Ireland, trying and failing to make sense of the imbroglio. One of Anne Devlin's stories, 'Naming the Names', in The Way-Paver (1986), gets to the heart of republican disaffection in the mutilated streets of west Belfast. A 'Troubles' memoir which reads like a novel is Mary Costello's high-spirited Titanic Town (1992), which includes such details as the man who has to ring home every lunchtime to let his wife know he has not been shot, the school whose classrooms are a repository for explosives, and the jangle of bin-lids livening up the night. Violent lives, violent times; these conditions might suit the thriller-writer down to the ground, but no really high grade thriller appeared before Brian *Moore's Lies of Silence (1990) about a hotel manager in the hands of gunmen. Eugene McElldowney's A Kind of Homecoming (1994) looked as though it might be the start of a 'police-procedural' series set in the north, but for its sequel McElldowney shifted the scene of action to Howth, near Dublin.
B. *MacLaverty's *Cal (1983) dramatizes the ironies inherent in the situation through a doomed love affair. *Shadows on Our Skin (1977), by J. *Johnston, deals with sectarian imperatives. Glenn Patterson’s * Burning Your Own (1988) goes back to 1969 and a Protestant housing estate in Belfast to show up sectarian posturing and rancour. Many other writers have been drawn to the topic, from the exuberant Robert McLiam Wilson (One by One in the Darkness, 1996); but no one more compellingly than Benedict Kiely ( Proxoepera, 1977; *Nothing Happens in Cairncross, 1985)—an ebullient author whose imagination is exercised by the degradation of republicanism. At some point along the line, as Kiely sees it, a break occurred between the integrity of the republican ideal and the enormities later sanctioned under this tag. Like W. *Trevor, who has treated the subject only peripherally—in, for example, the title story from *Beyond the Pale, 1982), he is crucially aware of present-day adulterations, along with the deforming pressures of history. The great 'Troubles' novel may not yet have been written, but enough thought-provoking and illuminating work has appeared to constitute a distinctive genre.

Trouvères, poets composing narrative, dramatic, satiric, comic, and especially lyric verse in the north of France during the late 12th and 13th centuries. They were either professional entertainers (overlapping with *jongleurs), clercs, or (when courtly society developed and the lyrics lost their energy) feudal lords composing fashionable verse. *Chrétiens de Troyes was a *clerc; other prominent trouvères were Conon de Béthune (d. C.1224), a Picard nobleman who composed crusading songs, Gâcé Brulé (d. c.1220), *Blondel de Nesle (late 12th cent.), and Thibaut de Champagne, count of Champagne and king of Navarre. Their poetry was much influenced by that of the Provençal * troubadours (which however it never equalled) one of whom, Bernart de Ventadorn, came north to the court of *Eleanor of Aquitaine, who was herself the granddaughter of Guilhem IX of Aquitaine, the first known troubadour. The most successful poets are those around 1200, particularly Gâcé Brulé; thereafter their poetry becomes feebler and less inspired.

Troy, Sergeant, a character in Hardy’s *Far from the Madding Crowd.

Troynevant, see Brut.

True Law of Free Monarchies, The a political treatise attributed to James I, published 1598, and written to combat the Calvinist theory of government advocated by G. *Buchanan in his *De Jure Regni (1579). It sets forth the doctrine of the divine right of kings and of the king’s responsibility to God alone.

Truewit, the gallant and chief wit of Jonson’s *Epicene, a model for the wits of Restoration comedy.

Trumpet Major, The, a novel by T. *Hardy, published 1880. The story is set during the Napoleonic wars, at a time in which there were busy preparations against the threat of invasion. It tells of the wooing of Anne Garland, whose mother is tenant of a part of Overcombe Mill, where the dragons come down from the nearby camp to water their horses. One of these dragons is John Loveday, the trumpet-major, the gentle, unassuming son of the miller. He loves Anne Garland, but has a rival in his brother Bob, a cheerful, light-hearted sailor. Her third suitor is the boorish yeoman Festus Derriman. In the course of events Anne meets King George III, on a military inspection, and later watches the departure of the *Victory for Trafalgar. The story ends with the discomfiture of Festus and the success of Bob’s courtship, while John marches off with his dragons, to die on a battlefield in Spain.

Tsvetayeva, Marina Ivanovna (1892-1941), Russian poet and prose writer. Born in Moscow, the daughter of a professor of art and a gifted pianist, she spent much of her childhood in western Europe. She published her poetry of 1907-9 privately as *Evening Album (1910) with great success. In 1912 she married Sergei Yakovlevich Efron, who became an officer in the tsarist army, and published a second book of poetry. She totally rejected the October Revolution and wrote a cycle of poems *The Encampment of the Whites (Munich 1957; English trans. Robin Kemball, 1980), glorifying the White Army. At the end of the Civil War she got permission to join her husband (whom she had thought dead) in Prague, and in 1922 much of her poetry appeared in Moscow and Berlin, consolidating her reputation. In exile she engaged in an exalted correspondence with *Rilke and *Pasternak, two poets whom she greatly admired. In 1925 she moved to Paris, and in Mar. 1926 she spent two weeks in London. She became increasingly estranged from her fellow emigrants and, finding it difficult to publish, lived in great poverty, while continuing to write poetry and critical prose of lasting importance. Her husband became more and more pro-Soviet, and on the orders of the Soviet secret police he assassinated a Soviet official who had defected in the West, then fled to the USSR. Ostracized by the Emigration, Tsvetayeva decided, despite her better judgement, to return to Russia. She arrived in Moscow in June 1939 to be shunned by most of her former friends, and later that year her daughter Ariadna was arrested and her husband arrested and shot. During the war she was evacuated to the Tatar town of Yelabuga, near Kaza, where in despair she hanged herself. Much of her poetry was republished in the Soviet Union after 1961, and her passionate yet articulate and precise work, with its daring linguistic experimentation, brought her increasing recognition as a major poet. She has been much translated into English, notably in *Selected Poems (trans. E. *Feinstein, 1971, 1981) and in *A Captive Spirit: Selected Prose (trans. J. Marin King, 1986).
Tuatha Dé Danann, in Gaelic mythology, the gods, the ‘Folk of the goddess Danu’, the enemies of the *Fomors. They are represented as invaders of Ireland, subsequent to the Fomors and the *Fir Bolgs. They rout the Fomors at the battle of Moytura, and are ousted in their turn by the *Milesians. Conspicuous among the Tuatha Dé Danann are Lugh, the Gaelic sun-god, their leader; and *Ler, the god of the sea.

Tucca, Captain Pantilius, the swaggering bully of Jonson's *Poetaster, who reappears in Dekker and Marston's *Satiromastix.

Tuck, Friar, see Friar Tuck.

Tucker, Abraham (1705–74), a country gentleman and one of the first writers of the utilitarian school of philosophy. In his great work The Light of Nature Pursued, of which three volumes were published in 1768 and three after his death in 1778, he rejects the moral sense theory of *Shaftesbury and *Hutcheson and finds the criterion of moral conduct in general happiness, and the motive of the individual in his own happiness. The coincidence of these two is almost, but not quite, complete. There comes a point where virtue requires a self-sacrifice that prudential motives do not justify. Here Tucker finds the place for religion and its promise of a future life, where ‘the accounts of all are to be set even’, and the sacrifice of personal happiness required by virtue is to be made good.

Tucker’s writings are diffuse and unmethodical, but marked by humour and quaint illustration and comment. His theories were systematized by *Paley.

Tuirenn, The Fate of the Sons of, one of the ‘three sorrowful tales of Erin’, a mystical tale in which the three sons of Tuirenn are punished for killing Cian, the father of the hero-god Lugh, by being required, by way of a fine, to achieve a number of quests, in the last of which they perish.

Tulkinghorn, a character in Dickens’s *Bleak House.

Tulliver, Mr and Mrs, Tom and Maggie, the principal characters in G. Eliot’s *The Mill on the Floss.

Tully, see Cicero.

Tunnyng of Elynour Rummyng, The, a poem by *Skelton, a vigorous description of contemporary low life. Elynour Rummyng is an alewife who dwells beside Leatherhead and brews ‘nappy ale’ for ‘travel-lars, to tynkers, to swarters, to swynkers, And all good ale drynkers’, and the poem, coarse but full of humour and life, describes the mixed company who throng to drink it.

Tupman, Tracy, in Dickens’s *Pickwick Papers, one of the members of the Corresponding Society of the Pickwick Club.

Tupper, Martin Farquhar (1810–89), prolific writer of verse and prose, educated at Christ Church, Oxford. His Proverbal Philosophy (1838–76, 4 series), present-with *Thackeray, *Trollope, *Carlyle, R. *Browning, *Tennyson, the *Rossettis, and *Swinburne, and in correspondence with *Gissing. He was one of the earliest admirers of H. *James, who first met him in Paris in 1875 and on whom he had a substantial influence. Perhaps the greatest English debt to him is owed by G. A. *Moore, whose mature career was given shape by the discovery of Turgenev's artistry, and who, in *The Lake (1905), came as close as anyone to writing a Turgenev novel in English. A *Hunter's Notes was translated into English by J. D. Meiklejohn in 1855, and by 1890 most of Turgenev's major work had appeared in English. The most complete early translation is C. *Garnett's *Turgenev—The Novels and Tales (1894–9), the edition through which he exerted his influence on such writers as *Galsworthy, *Conrad, and V. *Woolf.

TURGOT, Anne-Robert-Jacques, see physiocrats.

Turkish Spy, Letters Written by a, eight volumes, published 1787–94. The first is a translation of L'Espion du Grand Seigneur by Giovanni Paolo Marana, a Genoese residing in Paris, published in French in 1684–6, partly itself a translation from an Italian version. The work inaugurated a new genre in European literature, the pseudo-foreign letter, of which the Lettres persanes of *Montesquieu is the chief example.

A continuation to the Letters, probably by *Defoe, was published in England in 1718.

TURBULL, George (1698–1748), educated at Edinburgh, regent at Marischal College, Aberdeen, 1721–7, and teacher of T. *Reid. He was an early member of the *Rankenian Club, and his published lectures (Principles of Moral and Christian Philosophy, 2 vols, 1740) and surviving correspondence show him as an ardent follower of *Shaftesbury in his advocacy of civic virtue and educational reform, and the prominence he attached to the sense of beauty. He sought to turn natural science to the service of religion, and to construct a moral science based on experimental laws of human nature, in which the association of ideas had a central role. His *Treatise on Ancient Painting (1739), which figures in a caricature by *Hogarth, discusses the place of the fine arts in education. Turnbull stresses the links between the sense of beauty and the moral sense, and between beauty and truth, and sees a close parallel between the didactic moral function of good painting and good poetry.

TURNER, (Joseph) M(allowd) W(illiam) (1775–1851), English landscape painter, whose mature works convey a Romantic vision of the violence of the elements. He travelled in England and in France, Switzerland, and Italy, and his subjects and styles are astonishingly varied. He moved from conventional topographical watercolours of *picturesque subjects to historical landscapes which vie with the grandeur of *Poussin and *Claude; in his late, increasingly violent, and almost abstract works (Snowstorm at Sea, 1842; Rain, Steam and Speed, 1844, both London, National Gallery) forms are dissolved in the sweep of light and brilliant colour patterning the surface of the canvas. Turner was devoted to the 18th-cent. doctrine of *Ut Pictura Poesis ('as is painting, so is poetry': *Horace, Ars Poetica, 361) and was often inspired by contemporary poetry. He was committed to the values of the *Royal Academy, where he was appointed professor of perspective in 1807 and lectured in 1811, and sought to ennoble the genre of landscape painting by suggesting that it could attain the imaginative power and complexity of poetry. From 1798 many of his pictures exhibited at the Royal Academy were accompanied by verses printed in the catalogue; from 1800 he added lines composed by himself. His quotations are frequently from James *Thomson (1700–48), who influenced his literary style, and in 1811 his picture *Thomson's Aeolian Harp was accompanied by 32 lines honouring the poet. *Snowstorm; Hannibal and His Army Crossing the Alps (1812, London, Tate Gallery) was exhibited with the first quotation taken from his gloomy 'M. S. P. Fallacies of Hope'. There is no trace of this projected epic poem beyond excerpts in Royal Academy catalogues; it was influenced by Akenside's *Pleasures of Imagination and Campbell's *Pleasures of Hope. Between 1806 and 1815 Turner frequently wrote poems beside the drawings in his sketchbooks; they have been transcribed by Jack Lindsay in *The Sunset Ship (1968). In the 1830s Turner did many designs for book illustrations, amongst them charming vignettes for *Rogers's *Italy (1830) and *Poems (1834). He also illustrated works by *Milton, *Byron, Sir W. *Scott, and T. *Campbell. Turner endured much ridicule, including *Hazlitt's famous description of his work as 'pictures of nothing and very like', but *Ruskin became his passionate admirer and the first volume of *Modern Painters (1843) was written in his defence.

TURNER, Sharon (1768–1847), a lawyer who became an enthusiastic student of Icelandic and Anglo-Saxon literature, and found much new material, especially among the unexplored Cottonian manuscripts (see COTTON, R. B.). His interest was, however, more historical than literary. Between 1799 and 1805 he published his *History of the Anglo-Saxons from the Earliest Period to the Norman Conquests, which was greatly admired, by H. *Hallam, *Southey, and Sir W. *Scott, among others. He continued his histories up to the death of Queen Elizabeth I. His insistence on the use of original first sources was important to the future writing of history. He has a place in literary history as the legal adviser to *Thomson (The Seasons, 1726–30) and one of the first defenders of Byron's *Don Juan. He was also legal adviser to the *Quarterly Review.

TURNER, Walter James Redfern (1884–1946), born in Melbourne. He came to London in 1907. He was music critic of the *New Statesman, drama critic of the with the governess, dies in her arms as she battles for they are simply the hysterical fantasies of the young reader to decide whether these ghosts and their design exist for anyone else in the story, or whether they are simply the hysterical fantasies of the young governess. James himself described this story as ‘a trap for the unwary’. B. *Britten wrote a chamber opera based on this tale.

Turn of the Screw, The, a *ghost story by H. *James, published 1898.

The narrator is a young governess, sent off to a country house, Bly, to take charge of two orphaned children. She has been engaged by their uncle, a handsome man to whom she feels attracted, on the understanding that she takes all responsibility for the children and the entire household. She finds a pleasant house and a comfortable housekeeper, Mrs Grose, while the children, Miles and Flora, are unusually beautiful and charming. But she soon begins to feel the presence of intense evil, and sees the figure of the ex valet Peter Quint and that of her own predecessor Miss Jessel. In fact they are both dead, and she learns of the guilty liaison that existed between them. For the young woman these apparitions emanate a fearful wickedness and she becomes convinced that, despite their denials, Miles and Flora are communicating with them. These terrible figures have returned to claim the children, to draw them into their web of sin and evil, and the governess is determined to exorcize them. After a dramatic scene by the pond, where the narrator believes that Flora is meeting Miss Jessel, the little girl is taken off to safety by the housekeeper, and Miles, left with the governess, dies in her arms as she battles for his soul with the apparition of Peter Quint. It is left to the reader to decide whether these ghosts and their designs exist for anyone else in the story, or whether they are simply the hysterical fantasies of the young governess. James himself described this story as ‘a trap for the unwary’. B. *Britten wrote a chamber opera based on this tale.

Turveydrop, father and son, characters in Dickens’s Bleak House.

TUSSER, Thomas (?1524–80), agricultural writer and poet, educated at St Paul’s School, Eton, King’s College and Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He farmed at Cattawade, Suffolk, and introduced the culture of barley to England. He published his Hundred Good Pointes of Husbandrie in 1557 (amplified in later editions) in verse of quaint and pointed expression, many proverbs being traceable to this work. It is a collection of instructions on farming, gardening, and housekeeping, together with humorous and wise maxims on conduct in general.

TWAIN, Mark, pseudonym of Samuel Langhorne Clemens (1835–1910), American writer, born in Florida, Missouri, of a Virginian family, and brought up in Hannibal, Missouri. After his father’s death in 1847 he was apprenticed to a printer, and wrote for his brother’s newspaper; from 1857 to 1861 he was a pilot on the Mississippi, and from 1862 worked as a newspaper correspondent for various Nevada and Californian magazines, adopting the pseudonym ‘Mark Twain’, familiar to him as the leadsman’s call on the Mississippi. Under this name he published his first successful story, ‘Jim Smiley and his Jumping Frog’, in 1865 in the New York Saturday Press. This comic version of an old folk tale became the title story of The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County, and Other Sketches (1867), which established him as a leading humorist, a reputation consolidated by The Innocents Abroad (1869), an account of a voyage through the Mediterranean. Roughing It (1872), an account of his adventures as miner and journalist in Nevada, appeared in the year of his first English lecture tour; England provided the background for his democratic historical fantasy The Prince and the Pauper (1882), in which Edward VI as a boy changes places with Tom Canty, a beggar, and for A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur’s Court (1889), a disturbing and not wholly amiable fantasy that satirizes both past and present. Meanwhile appeared his most famous works, both deeply rooted in his own childhood, The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876) and its sequel The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), which paint an unforgettable picture of Mississippi frontier life, and combine picaresque adventure with challenging satire and great technical innovative power. Life on the Mississippi (1883), an autobiographical account of his life as a river pilot, contains a notable attack on the influence of Sir W. *Scott, whose romanticism (‘silliness and emptinesses, sham grandeurs, sham gauds and sham chivalries’) did ‘measureless harm’ to progressive ideas and progressive works, creating, Twain alleges, the myth of the southern gentleman that did much to precipitate the Civil War.

In the last two decades of his life Clemens was beset with financial anxieties and dissipated time and money on chimerical business enterprises, trying to recoup by lecture tours (in 1895–6 he toured New Zealand, Australia, India, and South Africa) and by writing potboilers; his pessimism and bitterness were increased by the death of his wife in 1904, of two of his three daughters, and by other family troubles. In these last years, however, he wrote some memorable if sombre works, including The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg (1900), a fable about the venality of a smug small town, and The Mysterious Stranger (published posthumously in 1916, in a much-edited ver-
Twelfth Night, or What You Will, a comedy by *Shakespeare probably written 1601. John *Manningham saw a performance of it in the Middle Temple in February 1602; it was first printed in the *Folio of 1623. Shakespeare's immediate source for the main plot was 'The History of Apolonus and Silla' in B. *Rich's *Riche His Farewell to Militarie Profession (1581). This is derived from Belleforest's version, which by way of *Bandello can be traced back to a Sienese comedy *G'ingannati (The Deceived), written and performed 1531.

Sebastian and Viola, twin brother and sister and closely resembling one another, are separated in a shipwreck off the coast of Illyria. Viola, brought to shore in a boat, disguises herself as a youth, Cesario, and takes service as page with Duke Orsino, who is in love with the lady Olivia. She rejects the duke's suit and will not meet him. Orsino makes a confidant of Cesario and sends her to press his suit on Olivia, much to the distress of Cesario, who has fallen in love with Orsino. Olivia in turn falls in love with Cesario. Sebastian and Antonio, captain of the ship that had rescued Sebastian, now arrive in Illyria. Cesario, challenged to a duel by Sir Andrew Aguecheek, a rejected suitor of Olivia, is rescued from her predicament by Antonio, who takes her for Sebastian. Antonio, being arrested at that moment for an old offence, claims from Cesario a purse that he had entrusted to Sebastian, is denied it, and hauled off to prison. Olivia coming upon the true Sebastian, takes him for Cesario, invites him to her house, and marries him out of hand. Orsino comes to visit Olivia. Antonio, brought before him, claims Cesario as the youth he has rescued from the sea; while Olivia claims Cesario as her husband. The duke, deeply wounded, is bidding farewell to Olivia and the 'dissembling cub' Cesario, when the arrival of the true Sebastian clears up the confusion. The duke, having lost Olivia, and becoming conscious of the love that Viola has betrayed, turns his affection to her, and they are married.

Much of the play's comedy comes from the sub-plot dealing with the members of Olivia's household: Sir Toby Belch, her uncle, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, his friend, Malvolio, her pompous steward, Maria, her waiting-gentlewoman, and her clown Feste. Exasperated by Malvolio's officiousness, the other members of the household make him believe that Olivia is in love with him and that he must return her affection. In courting her he behaves so outrageously that he is imprisoned as a madman. Olivia has him released and the joke against him is explained, but he is not amused by it, threatening, 'I'll be reveng'd on the whole pack of you.'

The play's gentle melancholy and lyrical atmosphere is captured in two of Feste's beautiful songs 'Come away, come away, death' and 'When that I was and a little tiny boy, I With hey, ho, the wind and the rain'.

Twitcher, Jemmy, in Gay's The Beggar's Opera, one of Captain Macheath's associates, who betrays him. The nickname was given to the fourth earl of Sandwich (1718–92), who had been associated with Wilkes in the *Medmenham 'brotherhood' and yet, when Wilkes's papers were seized, was active in collecting evidence against him. The allusion is to a line in the play: ‘That Jemmy Twitcher should peach me, I own surprised me.'

Two Cultures and the Scientific Revolution, The. The Two Cultures, a phrase coined by C. P. *Snow in the Rede Lecture delivered at Cambridge in 1959 and published the same year. In it, he contrasts the culture of 'literary intellectuals' and that of 'scientists, and as the most representative, physical scientists'. He describes the increasing gulf between them, claiming that 30 years earlier the two sides could at least manage 'a frozen smile' but are now incapable of communication. His analysis of the educational attitudes that produced this situation and his recommendations for change were strongly attacked by *Leavis in his Richmond Lecture Two Cultures? The Significance of C. P. Snow (1962). (See also Thomson, Sir W., and second law of thermodynamics.)

'Two Drovers, The', a short story by Sir W. *Scott, one of the *Chronicles of the Canongate, published 1827. One of the most perfect of Scott's shorter tales, the tragedy is constructed round an opposition of racial types, Highland and Lowland. A trivial quarrel occurs between Robin Oig M'Combich and Harry Wakefield, long-standing companions on the drove-roads. Wakefield wants to settle it with his fists, English fashion; Robin Oig rejects this as beneath the dignity of a Highland gentleman. He is knocked down by his friend and in revenge kills him with his dirk. 'I give a life for the life I took,' he says, when he is arrested, 'and what can I do more?'

Two Foscari, The, a poetic drama by *Byron, published 1821.

Jacopo, son of the doge of Venice, Francesco Foscari, has twice been exiled, once for venality and once for complicity in murder. He has been brought back from exile on a charge of treasonable correspondence, and the play opens with his examination on the rack. The doge, his father, broken-hearted at his disgrace, signs the sentence for his third perpetual exile. But Jacopo's love for Venice is so intense that he dies with horror at the prospect of yet another banishment. The Council of Ten meanwhile decide to require the abdication of the old doge. He at once leaves the palace, and as he descends the steps he falls and dies.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, The, a comedy by Shakespeare, probably written about 1592–3. Some scholars, however, regard it as Shakespeare's first play, or at least his earliest comedy. There is no record of a performance before the Restoration. It was first printed in the Folio of 1623, where it is the second play in the section of comedies. The play's main source is the story of Felix and Felismena in the Montemayor.

The two gentlemen of Verona are the friends Valentine and Proteus. Proteus is in love with Julia, who returns his affection. Valentine leaves Verona to rejoin Valentine, is captured by outlaws and Proteus continues his courting of Silvia. Meanwhile Julia, pining for Proteus, comes to Milan dressed as a boy and takes service as Proteus' page, unrecognized by him. Silvia, to escape marriage with Thurio, her father's choice, leaves Milan to rejoin Valentine, is captured by outlaws and rescued from them by Proteus. Proteus is violently pressing his suit on Silvia when Valentine comes on the scene. Proteus is struck with remorse, and his contrition is such that Valentine is impelled to surrender Silvia to him, to the dismay of Proteus' page, the disguised Julia. She swoons, and is then recognized by Proteus, and the discovery of her constancy wins back his love. The duke and Thurio arrive. Thurio shows cowardice in face of Valentine's determined attitude, and the duke, approving Valentine's spirit, accords him Silvia and pardons the outlaws. Launce, the clownish servant of Proteus, and his dog Crab, 'the sourest-natured dog that lives,' provide much humour.

Two Nations, The, see Disraeli's Sybil.

Two Noble Kinsmen, The, a tragi-comedy attributed to J. Fletcher and Shakespeare, published 1634. In spite of its absence from the First Folio (1623), recent studies of the play suggest that it is probably a genuine work of collaboration between Fletcher and Shakespeare, taking more or less equal shares, written in about 1613.

The play is closely based on Chaucer's Knight's Tale (see Canterbury Tales, 1), which Shakespeare had drawn on before in A Midsummer Night's Dream. The main addition to the plot is the jailer's daughter who finally wins the confidence of his Dissenting flock. A secondary plot involves a denunciation of slavery in the United States, influenced by H. B. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, and there are also many references to the Crimean War, which brings about a crisis in Thurnall's spiritual life. Contrast the practical Thurnall is Elsley Vavasour (once an apothecary's assistant under his real name, John Briggs), an opium-taking poet evidently of the Spasmodic school, who is condemned for preferring Art to Action, and who demonstrates the dangers of unleashed emotion by running wild on Snowdon in the aptly titled chapter XXI, 'Nature's Melodrama,' before a deathbed scene in which he

Two on a Tower, a novel by T. Hardy, published 1882. Lady Constantine, whose disagreeable husband is away, falls in love with Swithin St Cleeve, an astronomer, younger than herself, who works at the top of a tower, where many of the scenes of the novel occur. Hearing her husband has died, Lady Constantine secretly marries Swithin, but later learns, first, that by so doing she had deprived him of a legacy; and, second, that her husband, though now dead, was alive when she married Swithin. Thus her marriage to Swithin is void, and she nobly insists on his leaving her, to take up employment abroad. She then finds she is pregnant by him; under pressure from her brother she accepts an offer of marriage from Bishop Helmsdale and a son is born. Swithin returns after the bishop's death, and is appalled that she is no longer a young woman. Eventually he offers to marry her, but the joy is too great and she falls dead in his arms.

Hardy's object was 'to set the history of two infinitesimal lives against the tremendous background of the stellar universe' and to show 'that of these contrasting magnitudes the smaller might be the greater to them as men.' But, as he acknowledged, the effect of the novel falls far short of his ambitions.

Two Years Ago, a novel by C. Kingsley, published 1857. In the last of his reforming novels, Kingsley describes the descent of cholera upon the little West Country fishing village of Aberalva, attacks the poor sanitary conditions and public apathy that allowed it to take hold, and praises the gallantry and dedication of various of the inhabitants. These include the much-travelled doctor, Tom Thurnall, rescued from shipwreck in the second chapter by the noble Nonconformist schoolmistress Grace Harvey, who converts him to Christianity and whose love he wins by the end of the novel, and Frank Headley, the High Church curate, also redeemed by the love of a good woman, who finally wins the confidence of his Dissenting flock. A secondary plot involves a denunciation of slavery in the United States, influenced by H. B. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, and there are also many references to the Crimean War, which brings about a crisis in Thurnall's spiritual life. Contrast the practical Thurnall is Elsley Vavasour (once an apothecary's assistant under his real name, John Briggs), an opium-taking poet evidently of the Spasmodic school, who is condemned for preferring Art to Action, and who demonstrates the dangers of unleashed emotion by running wild on Snowdon in the aptly titled chapter XXI, 'Nature's Melodrama,' before a deathbed scene in which he desires that his poetry be burned and his children be prevented ever from writing verse. This portrait caused a temporary rift with *Tennyson, who wrongly took it to be aimed at him.

Tybalt, a Capulet in Shakespeare’s Romeo and Juliet who is killed by Romeo. For the allusion in the play to Tybalt, Tyler, Tyner, Tyler, Tybalt, Tyburn, Wat (d. 1381), the leader of the Peasants’ Revolt of 1381, who with *Jack Straw led the peasants of Kent and Essex to London. He was killed by William Walworth, the lord mayor of London, in the course of a discussion with Richard II at Smithfield. He is the subject of a drama by *Southey.

Tynan, Katharine (1859–1931), poet and novelist, born in Dublin, now remembered principally for her association with the *Irish Revival and as a friend of *Yeats. Her first volume of verse, Louise de La Vallière and Other Poems (1885), was followed by many volumes of poems, fiction, and autobiography; Yeats’s Letters to Katharine Tynan, ed. R. McHugh, was published in 1953.

Tynan, Kenneth Peacock (1927–80), dramatic critic, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He wrote for various papers, most influentially for the Observer (1954–63), and championed the plays of *Osborne, *Wesker, S. *Delaney, N. F. *Simpson, *Beckett, and others, playing a leading role in the shift of taste from drawing-room comedy and the poetic drama of T. S. *Eliot and C. *Fry (which he disliked) to naturalism and ‘working class drama’. (See KITCHEN SINK DRAMA.) He also vigorously attacked theatre censorship and the lord chamberlain (The Royal Smut-Hound, 1965). His various collections of reviews and essays include Curtains (1967), The Sound of Two Hands Clapping (1975), and A View of the English Stage (1976), which pay tribute to the role of the *English Stage Company in the development of British theatre. Tynan was also a moving force in the creation of the *National Theatre, and its literary manager from 1963 to 1969. There is a life by his widow Kathleen Tynan (1987) who also edited his Letters (1994). See also THEATRE CRITICISM.

Tyndale, William (c.1495–1536), the translator of the *Bible. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge. About 1522 he formed the project of translating the Scriptures into the vernacular, but finding difficulties in England went to Hamburg for the purpose. He visited *Luther at Wittenberg, and commenced printing his translation of the New Testament at Cologne in 1525. He completed the work at Worms and introduced copies into England, which were denounced by the bishops and destroyed. He eventually settled at Antwerp, became a Zwinglian and an active pamphleteer, and engaged in controversy with Sir T. *More, writing An Answer unto Sir Thomas More’s Dialoge in 1531. He was betrayed to imperial officers and arrested for heresy, imprisoned at Vilvorde in 1535, and strangled and burnt at the stake there, in spite of Cromwell’s intercession. Tyndale was one of the most remarkable of the *Reformation leaders; his original writings show sound scholarship, but his translation of the *Bible—consisting of the New Testament (1525), *Pentateuch (1530), and *Jonah (1531)—the accuracy of which has been endorsed by the translators of the Authorized Version, is his surest title to fame. See David Daniell, William Tyndale: A Biography (1994).

Tyndall, John (1820–93), professor of natural history at the Royal Institution in 1853, and later superintendent there, who did much in his writings and lectures to popularize science. He had many friends in literary and scientific circles, including *Tennyson, C. *Darwin, H. *Spencer, and L. *Stephen. His famous address to the British Association in *Belfast in 1874, on the relation between science and theology, gave rise to acute controversy.

Typee or A Peep at Polynesian Life, a novel by H. *Melville, published 1846, first in Britain by John *Murray, under the non-fiction title *Narrative of a Four Months Residence among the Natives of a Valley of the Marquesas Islands, and shortly after by Harpers in New York, who censored some ‘sea freedoms’ and satirical attacks on imperialism and missionaries. It was Melville’s first book, and his most popular during his lifetime.

Like Melville himself, Typee’s hero Tommo and his friend Toby jump ship in the Marquesas, but the *Defoe-like factual account masks a symbolic tale of the ambiguity of innocence. Hoping to find the Johnsonian ‘Happy Valley’ (see RASSELAS) of the peaceful Happrors, Toby and the injured Tommo stumble instead upon the cannibalistic Typees, who live in an apparent Eden of sensuous plenty yet lack respect for life.
'Typhoon', a story by J. *Conrad, published 1903.

The unimaginative and imperturbable Captain MacWhirr pilots his steamer Nan-Shan through a typhoon of such violence that even he is moved to doubt the possibility of survival. Nevertheless, to avoid trouble between decks, he sends his appalled chief mate Mr Jukes down to confiscate the money of his 200 Chinese passengers. Later, the money redistributed and the ship safe in Fuchau harbour, Jukes is forced to conclude that MacWhirr 'got out of it very well for a stupid man'.

Tyranipocrit Discovered, one of the best written of the radical pamphlets of the Commonwealth, published anonymously in Rotterdam, 1649. The writer attacks the 'White Devil' of hypocrisy, which cloaks tyrannical power, idleness, and greed with Christian piety, finding it yet more pernicious than the 'Black Devil' of undisguised oppression, or the petty crimes of the poor. It is an eloquent plea for equality: 'O to give unto everyone with discretion, as near as may be, an equal portion of earthly goods, to maintain him in this life, that is the greatest actual justice that man can doe.' Extracts are printed in Orwell and Reynolds, British Pamphleteers (1948).

Tyannick Love, or The Royal Martyr, a heroic play by *Dryden, produced and published 1669.

Based on the legend of the martyrdom of St Catherine by the Roman emperor Maximin, it contains some of Dryden's most extravagant heroic verse. Possibly deliberately comic at times, it is also seriously concerned with contrasting Lucretian and Christian conceptions of God. It was ridiculed in The Rehearsal, and by *Shadwell. Dryden himself satirizes its excesses in Mac Flecknoe

Tyrwhitt, Thomas (1730–86), scholar and editor. He had an early career in politics (clerk of the House of Commons, 1762–8), but is remembered partly for his edition and exposure of *Chatterton's Rowley poems; he published them in 1777, then in an appendix in 1778 stated authoritatively that they were modern, not ancient, a view he elaborated in his Vindication (1782). His Observations and Conjectures upon Some Passages of Shakespeare (1765, dated 1766) insisted on the importance of careful collation, and criticized Dr *Johnson's edition for its lack of attention to the early texts. His greatest contribution was his edition of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (4 vols, 1775, vol. v with Glossary, 1778), which expounded *Chaucer's versification and helped to establish the canon.

Tyutchev, Fedor Ivanovich (1803–73), Russian lyric poet, who served as a diplomat in Munich (1822–37), where he was a friend of *Heine. From 1858 until his death he worked as president of the committee of foreign censorship. His first poetry appeared in 1819 and throughout the 1820s and 1830s he was widely published; he was praised by *Nekrasov and *Turgenev in the 1850s, and his first volume of poetry appeared in 1854. His poetry is notable for the delicacy and profundity of its analysis of often paradoxical or overtly tragic human feeling, and for its analysis of man's position in nature. Tyutchev's reputation waned in the period 1860–90, only to rise again in the early 20th cent. when the Russian symbolists, including *Blok, acknowledged him as a significant influence.
Ubi sunt, derived from the opening words of a type of Medieval Latin poem ('Where are they?'), taken up in Old English poems such as Beowulf and particularly The Wanderer (ll. 92–3) and in many Middle English lyrics (especially the one beginning 'Where beth they, beforen us weren', c.1300). Many later medieval French poems use the theme, most famously Villon’s ‘Ballade des dames du temps jadis’ with its refrain, 'Mais où sont les neiges d'antan?'—‘Where are the snows of yesteryear?’

UDALL, or UVEDALE, Nicholas (c.1505–56), dramatist and scholar, educated at Winchester and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, successively headmaster of Eton and Westminster. He was author of Ralph Roister Doister, the earliest known English comedy. He translated selections from Terence and other works, and wrote Latin plays on sacred subjects. Tusser (Five Hundredth Points) complains of having been severely flogged by Udall ‘For fault but small, or none at all’. Udall got into grave trouble at Eton and was sent to the Marshalsea by the Privy Council. He figures in F. M. Ford’s novel The Fifth Queen (1906).

UDOLPHO, The Mysteries of, see MYSTERIES OF UDOLPHO, THE.

UGOLINO DELLA GHERARDESCA (d. 1289), an Italian Guelf leader who twice made himself master of Pisa by treachery, in 1284 and 1288, by forming an intrigue with the Ghibelline leader Ruggieri degli Ubaldini. But Ruggieri betrayed him in turn, and he was locked with his two sons and two of his grandsons in a tower and starved to death. The story is told by Ugolino himself in Dante’s Inferno, xxxiii, and it is told among the tragedies of Fortune in Chaucer’s ‘The Monk’s Tale’ (see Canterbury Tales, 19; vii. 2407–62); though he knew the source was Dante, Chaucer tells of three sons and says the youngest was 5 years old, although three of the four in Dante were grown men. The story was used again as the basis for a poem in Heaney’s Field Work (1981).

ULFILAS, or WULFILA (AD 311–81), a Christian of Cappadocian origin, was consecrated bishop of the Arian Visigoths in 341, and subsequently migrated with them to the neighbourhood of Nicopolis in Moesia. He translated the Bible into Gothic from the Greek, inventing, it is said, an alphabet for the purpose. Fragments of this translation, chiefly of the NT, survive (e.g. the Codex Argenteus at Uppsala), and are of great value to the philological science of the Germanic languages.

Ulysses, a Greek commander in Shakespeare’s Troilus and Cressida. His speech on order and ‘degree’ occurs in 1. iii.

‘Ulysses’, a poem by Tennyson, composed 1833, published 1842. In a dramatic monologue Ulysses describes how he plans to set forth again from Ithaca after his safe return from his wanderings after the Trojan War, ‘to sail beyond the sunset’. The episode is based not on Homer but on Dante’s Inferno, which Tennyson probably read in the translation of Cary, and expresses the poet’s sense of ‘the need of going forward and braving the struggle of life’ after the death of A. H. Hallam.

Ulysses, a novel by *Joyce, serialized in the Little Review from 1918.* The editors of the Little Review were prosecuted and found guilty of publishing obscenity, which led to the novel’s publication in a non-English-speaking country: it was published in Paris by Sylvia Beach in 1922. Copies of the first English edition were burned by the New York post office authorities, and the Folkestone customs authorities seized the second edition in 1923. Various later editions appeared abroad, and, after the United States District Court found the book not obscene in 1933, the first English edition appeared in 1936, and the first unlimited edition in America and England in 1937.

The novel deals with the events of one day in Dublin, 16 June 1904 (the anniversary of Joyce’s first walk with Nora Barnacle, who became his wife), now known as ‘Bloomsday’.

The principal characters are Stephen Dedalus (the hero of Joyce’s earlier, largely autobiographical, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man); Leopold Bloom, a Jewish advertisement canvasser; and his wife Molly. The plot follows the wanderings of Stephen and Bloom through Dublin, and their eventual meeting. The last chapter is a monologue by Molly Bloom. The various chapters roughly correspond to the episodes of Homer’s Odyssey, Stephen representing Telemachus, Bloom Odysseus, and Molly Penelope. In the course of the story a pubic bath, a funeral, a newspaper office, a library, public houses, a maternity hospital, and a brothel are visited. A number of other Dublin scenes and characters are introduced. The style is highly allusive and employs a variety of techniques, especially those of *interior monologue and of *parody, and ranges from extreme realism to fantasy.

Joyce described the theme of the Odyssey to one of his students in 1917 as ‘the most beautiful, all-embracing theme . . . greater, more human, than that of Hamlet, Don Quixote, Dante, Faust, and refers to Umbriel, ‘a dusky melancholy sprite’ in Pope’s *The Rape of the Lock.

Una, in Bk I of Spenser’s *Faerie Queene, typifies singleness of the true religion. She is separated from the *Redcrosse Knight of Holiness (the Anglican Church) by the wiles of *Archimago, but meets and is protected by a lion, until the latter is killed by *Sansloy, who carries Una off to a forest. She is rescued by fauns and satyrs, and is finally united to the Redcrosse Knight.

UNAMUNO Y JUGO, Miguel de (1864–1936), Spanish writer and philosopher, born into a Basque family at Bilbao, and educated at the University of Madrid. He became professor of Greek at the University of Salamanca in 1892 and later became rector. A fierce and often eccentric critic of Spanish intellectual, social, and political life, who was at one point exiled for his views, he nevertheless opposed thoughtless ‘Euro-panization’. He wrote plays, poems, novels, travel books, and short stories, but is perhaps best known in English-speaking countries for his philosophical essays, which show the influence of *Kierkegaard, W. *James, and *Bergson. *La vida de Don Quijote y Sancho (1905) is, in his own words, ‘a free and personal exegesis’ which perceives *Don Quixote as the embodiment of the Spanish genius; *Del sentimiento trágico de la vida (1912; The Tragic Sense of Life, 1921) is a deeply unorthodox meditation on man’s religious aspirations, which suggests that ‘God is not the cause, but the consequence of man’s longing for immortality’, and concludes that all dogma, religious or anti-religious, is false: the only tenable philosophical position is that of doubt and wonder.

Uncle Silas, a novel by J. S. *Le Fanu, published 1864.

Maud Ruthyn, aged 17, is the only child of Austin Ruthyn, an elderly recluse of considerable wealth. Her mother, whom he married late in life, is dead. Austin has a younger brother Silas, suspected by many of the murder of a wealthy gambler who, years before, was found with his throat cut in mysterious circumstances at Bartram-Haugh, Silas’s Derbyshire home. Believing in Silas’s innocence, Austin at his death leaves a will designed to demonstrate his confidence in his brother: Silas is made Maud’s guardian, and her entire fortune is to go to him if she dies under age. Uncle Silas, who has been involved in many scandals and is heavily in debt, loses no time in summoning Maud to Bartram-Haugh, where he attempts to marry her to his boorish son Dudley, who is in fact already secretly married. When she refuses, he pretends that she is sending her to school in France; but when, after two days’ travel, she wakes up believing she is in Dover, she finds herself a prisoner back at Bartram-Haugh, where Silas and Dudley, aided by a grotesque and sinister French governess, Mme de la Rougierre, attempt to murder her. The plot miscarries and the governess is horribly murdered by Dudley in mistake for Maud, who escapes. The tale is one of suspense, without any supernatural element; but Maud’s mounting terror at these events, seen through her eyes, is conveyed to the reader in a masterly manner. Uncle Silas himself is a fearful figure, tall, marble-faced, with black eyebrows and long silver hair, a laudanum-taker prone to strange cataleptic trances.

Uncle Tom’s Cabin, a novel by Mrs H. E. B. *Stowe.

UNDERDOWNE, Thomas (fl. 1566–87). He translated the *Aethiopica of Heliodorus under the title An Aethiopian Historie (1569).

Underground, Poems on the, a scheme launched in Jan. 1986 to display poster-poems on the London Underground, on the initiative of American-born London-based novelist Judith Chernaik, and supported by London Transport, the *Arts Council, and other bodies. Short poems, including some newly commissioned translations, are selected by Chernaik and poets Cicely Herbert and Gerard Benson, and displayed for a limited period: they are sold to the public both in poster and volume form.

Underground poetry, a phrase used to describe the work of a number of writer-performers active in Britain between the late 1950s and mid-1970s, including A. *Mitchell, Jeff Nuttall (1933– ), Tom *Pickard, Alexander *Trocchi, Heathcote *Williams, Michael *Horovitz, and the *Liverpool poets.

UNDERHILL, Evelyn (1875–1941), writer on religious subjects, and notably on the mystics; she was much influenced by F. *von Hügel, whom she met after the publication of her study *Mysticism (1911); she became a practising Anglican in 1921. She produced editions of *The Cloud of Unknowing (1912) and W. *Hilton’s *The Scale of Perfection (1923), and wrote many books, meditations, and pamphlets on the spiritual life.

Under Milk Wood, a radio drama by Dylan *Thomas, first broadcast by the BBC on 25 Jan. 1954 and subsequently adapted for the stage; the published version was completed shortly before his death, although he was still at work on the text.

Set in the small Welsh seaside town of Llaregyb, it evokes the lives of the inhabitants—Myfanwy Price the dressmaker, and her lover Mog Edwards the draper; twice-widowed Mrs Ogmore-Pritchard; Butcher Beynon and his daughter Gossamer; the Reverend Eli Jenkins; the romantic and prolific Polly Garter; nostalgic Captain Cat, dreaming of lost loves; and many others. The poetic, alliterative prose is interspersed with songs and ballads. An earlier version of the first part of this play appeared in *Botteghe oscure in 1952 under the title ‘Llaregyb’.

UMBRIEL | UNDER MILK WOOD 1046
Under the Greenwood Tree, a novel by T. *Hardy, published 1872.

This is a gentle, humorous novel, skilfully interweaving the love story of Dick Dewy and Fancy Day with the fortunes and misfortunes of a group of villagers, many of whom are musicians and singers in Mellstock church. Dick Dewy, the son of the local ‘tranter’, or carrier, falls in love with the new schoolmistress, the pretty and capricious Fancy Day. Her other two suitors (Shiner, a rich local farmer, and Maybold, the vicar in charge of the school) are rejected, after a series of vicissitudes, and in spite of the opposition of Fancy’s father, in favour of Dick. Dick and his father are among the small band of musicians who have always sung and played the music in the gallery of Mellstock church, and who find themselves ousted by the new-fangled organ. This story of the displaced musicians reflected the true story of the Hardys’ own church at Stinsford, and Hardy originally wished to call his book ‘The Mellstock Choir’. The novel marks the first appearance of Hardy’s village rustics, who drew much critical comment, both favourable and unfavourable, and who were to reappear frequently in later novels.

Under the Volcano, a novel by M. *Lowry, published 1947, considered his masterpiece.

It opens in Quauhnahuac, Mexico, on the Day of the Dead, Nov. 1939, as film-maker Jacques Laruelle looks back on the dramatic events of the same day in the preceding year, which occupy with many flashbacks and shifts of time sequence the main action of the book. The characters are the British ex-consul Geoffrey Firmin, an alcoholic, his wife Yvonne, an ex-film star who has returned after a year’s estrangement, Laruelle, with whom she has had an affair, and the consul’s half-brother Hugh, an anti-Fascist journalist much preoccupied by the Spanish Civil War. The theme of self-destruction is linked with the menace to Western civilization, and the mood grows increasingly sombre, ending with the consul’s death. The narrative technique is complex, showing debts to *Conrad, *Joyce, and *Faulkner, and the text is packed with allusions to classical, Elizabethan, and Jacobean tragedy and to ‘poëtes maudits’ such as *Swinburne and *Baudelaire. The Mexican landscape, over which brood the two volcanoes Popocatapetl and Ixtaccihuatl, is described with much vividness. Half-way through the book the consul reflects that ‘It was already the longest day in his entire experience, a lifetime’, and Lowry’s control over the consul’s confused and alco­holic sense of time and memory is remarkable. Like most of his work, the novel is highly autobiographical.

Underwood, The, or Underwoods, a collection of poems by *Jonson, printed in the folio of 1640. It includes ‘A Celebration of Charis’, ‘An Ode to Himself’, ‘An Exe­cration upon Vulcan’ (concerning the fire in Jonson’s library in 1623), ‘An Epigram on the Court Pucelle’, and the ode to Sir Lucius Cary and Sir Henry Morison. Like Jonson’s *The Forest and *Timber, the title was suggested by Latin silva, which meant both ‘collection’ and ‘wood’.

Underwoods (1887) is also the name (confessedly adopted from Jonson) of a book of poems by R. L. *Stevenson.

Unfortunate Traveller, The, or The Life of Jacke Wilton, a prose tale of adventure by T. *Nashe, published 1594, the earliest *picaresque romance in English, and the most remarkable work of the kind before *Defoe. It is dedicated to the earl of Southampton.

Jack Wilton is ‘a certain kind of an appendix or page’ attending on the court of Henry VIII at the time of the siege of Tournay. He lives by his wits, playing tricks on a niggardly old victualler and other gullible occupants of the camp, and gets whipped for his pains. He goes to Münster, which the Anabaptists are holding against the emperor, and sees John of Leyden hanged. The earl of Surrey, the lover of the Fair Geraldine, takes him to Italy as his page. During their travels they meet Erasmus, Sir Thomas More, Cornelius Agrippa, and Aretino. They hear Luther disputing at Wittenberg. Wilton passes himself off as the earl of Surrey and runs away with an Italian courtesan. There is a pleasant scene where the true earl discovers them and treats the escapade with singular good humour. After a tourney at Florence, where the earl defeats all comers in honour of the Fair Geraldine, Wilton leaves him, and is at Rome during an outbreak of the plague. Here, turning from lighter themes, he depicts scenes of violence and tragedy, rapes, murders, tortures, and executions. Depressed by what he has seen, he is converted to a better way of life, marries his courtesan, and is last seen at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, in the king of England’s camp. The book includes much literary parody and pastiche.

UNGARETTI, Giuseppe (1888–1970), Italian poet. He founded *hermeticism with his first two collections of poems L’allegria di naufragi (Gaiety of Shipwrecks, written 1914–15) and Il porto sepolto (The Buried Port, 1916), in which he used neither rhyme nor punctuation. His later poems, of which the best are in Il dolore (Sorrow, 1947) and Sentimento del tempo (1933: The Feeling of Time, 1950), depart from hermeticism by reviving the tradition of *Leopardi and *Petrarch. He translated *Blake’s visionary poems (Visioni di William Blake, 1965) and has himself been translated by R. *Lowell.

Unitarianism, a Christian body which rejects the Trinity and the divinity of Christ in favour of the single personality of the Godhead. As an organized community it became established in Poland, Hungary, and England in the 16th–17th cents. In England John Biddle (1615–62) published Unitarian tracts in 1652–4 and from 1652 his followers (Biddelians, *Socinians, or ‘Unitarians’) began regular Sunday worship. More than 100 years later Joseph *Priestley in his Appeal to the Serious and Candid Professors of Christianity (1770) defended Unitarian principles, and in 1773 Theophilus Lindsey (1723–1808) formed the first Unitarian denomination, opening in 1774 Essex Chapel in London. Both Priestley and his friend R. *Price became original members of the Unitarian Society in 1791. In the 18th cent. Dissenting congregations, including the English Presbyterians, turned to Unitarian views. Later in the 19th cent. J. *Martineau influenced the organization of the Unitarian body in England and Ireland and led the advance from biblical to rational Unitarianism.

unities, the, principles of dramatic composition supposedly derived from Aristotle’s *Poetics. Recording the practice of the tragedians whose works he knew, Aristotle states that a play should have the unity of a living organism, and that the action it represents should last, if possible, no longer than a single revolution of the sun. It was from these hints that 16th-cent. critics developed the rule of the three unities: action, time, and place. The most influential of these critics, *Castelvetro, had a low opinion of the imaginative powers of the average audience and held that they would be upset by the time of the action lasting longer than the time of its performance and that they could not be made to accept changes of scene. Castelvetro’s ideas left their mark on neo-classical drama, especially in France, but they did not go unchallenged. The exclusion of sub-plots became the rule in France only after the controversy over *Corneille’s Le Cid (1637). The time allowed for the action of a tragedy was extended by common consent to 24 hours. The place the stage represented was allowed to shift from one point to another within a larger area: a palace or even a city. Moreover, dramatists learnt to circumvent the limitations of the unities by avoiding the mention of specific times and places. The impact of *neo-classicism on English tragedy was delayed by the disturbances connected with the Civil War and was weakened by the taste for excitation that was a legacy from Aristotle’s *Poetics. The invention of printing in a university were exemplified in the polyglot Bible produced in 1502–22 at Alcalá de Henares.

In England the University of Cambridge had power by royal charter to appoint printers to work in its precinct and sell books anywhere from 1534, mainly, no doubt, with a view to propagating defence against heresy (see CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS). It exercised the power from 1583, and Oxford followed the same year after (see OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS), apparently with only oral warrant from the queen. Costly conflicts with vested interests contesting the universities’ right to override private monopolies in such lucrative works as the *Bible in English, the Book of *Common Prayer, and the Metrical Psalms induced both universities to forgo this privilege in return for money during most of two centuries and to sponsor only works of scholarship.

The press owned, financed, and conducted by a university, as distinct from one censored and protected by it but privately financed and managed, had its origin in England and is still confined to English-speaking countries. Oxford acquired such a press in 1690, when the printing equipment and rights in copy of *Fell came to it by bequest from him. Cambridge took immediate control of its printing in 1698 and exercises it through a board of syndics.

The style of ‘university press’ is used by many publishing firms, particularly in Great Britain, the USA, and Canada, some of which also print. They are variously related to the academies from which they take their names. In the USA Cornell opened a small press in 1869, which lasted until 1894, and Johns Hopkins established an agency for publishing in 1875.
The University of Chicago has owned its printing and publishing office since 1894. Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Columbia, California, Toronto, among other North American universities, are equipped to print at least some of their publications.

University Wits, name given by *Saintsbury to a group of Elizabethan playwrights and pamphleteers, of whom *Nashe, R. *Greene, *Lyly, and T. *Lodge were the chief.

Unquiet Grave, The, (1) a ballad included in *Child’s collection, in which a lover laments his dead love for a twelvemonth and a day, at the end of which time she speaks to him from the grave, telling him to content himself and let her sleep; (2) see Connolly.

Unreason, Abbot of, see MISRULE.

UNSWORTH, Barry (1930— ), novelist, son of a mining family, born and brought up in Durham, and educated at the University of Manchester. The wide range of his subsequent travels and his interest in history are reflected in his work: his novels include The Partnership(1966), Mooncranker’s Gift(1973), Pascali’s Island(1980), and Stone Virgin(1985). Sacred Hunger( *Booker Prize, 1992) is a powerful and carefully researched narrative set in the mid-17th cent. describing the voyage (and appalling conditions on board) of a slave ship, the Liverpool Merchant, from England to Africa to America, where, after the death of Captain Thurso, some of the crew and the surviving slaves set up a commune under the influence of the principles of Rousseau. The ship’s doctor, freethinking Matthew Paris, is a leader in this new world, but is pursued by his cousin Erasmus Kemp, son of the doomed ship’s bankrupt owner, motivated by vengeance and the ‘sacred hunger’ for profit. Morality Play(1995) is a detective story set amidst a troupe of medieval travelling players, and After Hannibal(1996) a fable of greed and exploitation set in modern summer-home Umbria which incidentally foresees the earthquake that devastated Assisi in 1997.

UPDIKE, John Hoyer (1932— ), American novelist, short story writer, and poet, born in Pennsylvania (where his early works are set) and educated at Harvard. His novels include the tetralogy Rabbit, Run (1960), Rabbit Redux (1971), Rabbit is Rich (1981), and Rabbit at Rest (1990), a small-town domestic tragi-comedy which traces the career of ex-basketball champion Harry Angstrom from the early days of his precarious (but, as it turns out, lasting) marriage to alcoholic Janice, through the social and sexual upheavals of the 1960s, to the compromises of middle age. The Centaur (1963) uses a mythological framework to explore the relationship of a schoolmaster father and his teenage son and Couples (1968) is a portrait of sexual passion and realignment amongst a group of young suburban married couples in Tarbox, Massachusetts, a town which in this and succeeding works takes on an archetypal quality. Updike’s characteristic preoccupations are with the erotic, with the pain and striving implicit in human relationships, and with the sacred (at times explicitly religious) in daily life; these are conveyed in an ornate, highly charged prose which reaches its most flamboyant in an atypical work, The Coup (1979), an exotic first-person narration by the ex-dictator of a fictitious African state. Other novels include The Witches of Eastwick (1984, subsequently filmed), Memoirs of the Ford Administration (1993), and Brazil (1994). A Month of Sundays (1975), Roger’s Version (1986), and S (1988) form a linked sequence based on reworkings of Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter. His volumes of short stories (many of which were first published in the New Yorker, and several of which feature the representative and recurring marital crises of a couple called the Maples) include Pigeon Feathers and Other Stories (1962), Museums and Women (1972), Problems and Other Stories (1979), Trust Me (1987), and The Afterlife and Other Stories (1995). His reviews and essays have been collected in Assorted Prose (1965), Picked-up Pieces (1978), Hugging the Shore (1983), Just Looking: Essays on Art (1990), and Odd Jobs: Essays and Criticism (1991). His Collected Poems 1953–1992 were published in 1993.

UPWARD, Edward Falaise (1903– ), novelist, born in Essex, and educated at Repton and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, with *Isherwood, whose lifelong friend he became; at Cambridge they both wrote Barbellion-inspired diaries, and invented the surreal imaginary world of ‘Mortmere’. A long Mortmere fragment appeared in Upward’s The Railway Accident and Other Stories (1969) and its fantasies are described in Isherwood’s Lions and Shadows (1938), in which Upward appears as Allen Chalmers. Upward’s Journey to the Border (1938) describes the progress of a neurotic tutor in an upper-middle-class household towards commitment to the workers’ movement (Upward was for some years a member of the Communist Party); his trilogy In the Thirties (1962), The Rotten Elements (1969), and No Home but the Struggle (1977), published together in 1977 as The Spiral Ascent, describes the alternating political and artistic conflicts, over some decades, in the life of Marxist poet and schoolmaster Alan Sebrill. The last, and most introspective, volume affirms the narrator’s need for a union of personal and political commitment in his work.

URBAN, Sylvanus, the pseudonym of E. *Cave and, by succession, of the later editors of the Gentleman’s Magazine.

URFÉ, Honoré d’, see d’URFÉ.

Urizen, a principal character in the symbolic books of *Blake, represented as god of reason and law-maker, to some extent to be identified with the Hebrew Jehovah; Dorothy Plowman (facsimile edn, The Book of Urizen, 1929) suggests his name is taken from the Greek οὐριζεν to limit. The Book of Urizen (1794) is Blake's version of the myth of Genesis, describing the creation of the material world by Urizen from the 'abominable void', from which is engendered Urizen's opponent, *Los, and Pity, the first female form, who is named *Enitharmon. The spirit of the book is of anguish, revolt, and suffering, and Urizen, after long struggles with Los, surveys his creation in a sorrow that engenders a web, 'The Net of Religion'. In the first plate of *Europe, Urizen is portrayed majestically as an aged, Newtonian figure leaning down from the sun with a great pair of compasses to create the world.

*Urquhart, Sir Thomas (1611–60), of Cromarty, educated at King's College, Aberdeen. He fought at Turiff against the Covenanters, withdrew to London, educated at King's College, Aberdeen. He fought at Turiff against the Covenanters, withdrew to London, and was knighted in 1641. He followed Prince Charles to Worcester, where many of his manuscripts were lost, was imprisoned 1651–2, and died abroad. His best-known work is a translation of the first three books of *Rabelais, the first two 1653, the third 1693 (completed by *Motteux). He wrote a number of curious treatises on mathematics, linguistics, etc., with strange Greek titles, collected in 1774 and 1834; among them is Ekskubalauron (1651, known as 'The Jewel'), which contains in his 'Vindication of the Honour of Scotland' the story of the 'Admirable' *Ursula, (1) Hero's maidservant in Shakespeare's *Much Ado about Nothing; (2) the pig-woman in Jonson's *Bartholomew Fair; (3) one of the Brangwen sisters in D. H. Lawrence's *The Rainbow and *Women in Love.

*USK, Thomas (d. 1388), the author of The Testament of Love, formerly ascribed to *Chaucer and included in Skeat's Chaucerian and Other Pieces appended to his edition of Chaucer as vol. vii. He was under-sheriff of London in 1387, by the mandate of Richard II, and he was proceeded against and executed by the 'Merciless Parliament' in 1388. The Testament of Love is an allegorical prose work perhaps written by USK in prison to elicit sympathy; it is sometimes dated in 1385, though this seems too early for the borrowings from *Troilus and Criseyde which it contains (as well as from *Piers Plowman). Skeat noticed that the first letters of the sections formed an acrostic reading 'Margaret of virtu have merci on TSKNVI', and Henry Bradley rearranged the text so that the last letters read THINUSK, i.e. 'thine USK'. This cryptogram is typical of the allusiveness of the poem, part of which is now impenetrable. C. S. *Lewis (The Allegory of Love, 1936, 222–31) regards the way Margarete is at once real and symbolic as the great interest of the work, while attributing its flaws in style to the excessive influence of Chaucer's *Boece from which the work borrows its form as instructive debate.

*Urn Burial, see Hydriotaphia.

*Ussher, James (1581–1656), educated at the newly founded Trinity College, Dublin. He became archbishop of Armagh in 1625 and came to London in 1640. He wrote much on theological subjects, and was learned in patristic literature and ancient Irish history. His chief work is the Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti, a chronological summary in Latin of the history of the world from the Creation to the dispersion of the Jews under Vespasian, said to be the source of the dates later inserted in the margins of the Authorized Version of the Bible, which fix the Creation at 23 Oct. 4004 BC. He bequeathed his collection of books and manuscripts to Trinity College, Dublin.

*Uther Pendragon, in the Arthurian legend, king of the Britons and father of *Arthur. Pendragon means 'chief dragon', and Uther has been variously explained; it may be a misreading as a proper name of the Welsh word uthr, 'terrible' (an interpretation that squares with *Geoffrey of Monmouth's calling him 'Utherpen-dragon', undivided). After he became king of the Britons, heusted after *Igraine, wife of Gorlois, duke of Cornwall. He picked a quarrel with Gorlois and was transformed by Merlin's magic into his shape, whereupon he slept with Igraine. After the death of Gorlois he married Igraine who bore him two children, Arthur and Anna. See Geoffrey of Monmouth, The History of the Kings of Britain, trans. L. Thorpe (1966), 151–211 (summary 368–9).

*Utilitarianism, an essay by J. S. *Mill, first published in a series of articles in *Fraser's Magazine in 1861, in book form 1863. The term 'utilitarian' was first adopted by Mill in 1823, from Galt's *Annals of the Parish. In this work, Mill, while accepting the Benthamite principle (see BENTHAM) that Utility, or the greatest happiness of the greatest number, is the foundation of morals, departs from it by maintaining that pleasures differ in kind or quality as well as in quantity, 'that some kinds of pleasure are more desirable and more valuable than others'; also by recognizing in 'the conscientious feelings of mankind' an 'internal sanction' to be added to Bentham's 'external sanctions'. The social feelings of mankind, the desire to be in unity with our fellow creatures' constitute 'the ultimate sanction of the greatest happiness, morality'.

*Utopia, the principal literary work of Sir T. *More, is a speculative political essay written in Latin. The work was published in 1516 at Louvain, *Erasmus supervising the printing. The form was probably suggested by the narrative of the voyages of Vespucci, printed 1507. The subject is the search for the best possible form of government. More meets at Antwerp a traveller, one Raphael *Hythloday, who has discovered 'Utopia', 'Nowhere land'. Communism is there the general law, a national system of education is extended to men and women alike, and the freest toleration of religion is recognized. The work at once became popular, and was translated by Ralph Robinson into English in 1551, and into French (in 1550), German, Italian, and Spanish. The rapid fame of the book is shown by the reference to Utopians by Rabelais (iii. i, pub. 1546).

The name 'Utopia' ('no place'), coined by More, passed into general usage, and has been used to describe, retrospectively, Plato's *Republic, and many subsequent fictions, fantasies, and blueprints for the future, including Bacon's *New Atlantis, Harrington's *The Commonwealth of Oceana, Morris's *News from Nowhere, and Bellamy's *Looking Backward. Satirical utopias include Swift's *Gulliver's Travels and Samuel Butler's *Erewhon, and the word 'dystopia' ('bad place') has been coined to describe nightmare visions of the future, such as Huxley's *Brave New World, Zamyatin's We, and Orwell's *Nineteen Eighty-Four, in which present-day social, political, and technological tendencies are projected in an extreme and unpleasant form. Many works of *science fiction use the utopian and dystopian forms.

UTTLEY, Alison (1884–1976), born on a farm in rural Derbyshire. She published many popular children's books, and is best remembered for her 'Little Grey Rabbit' series (of which the first was published in 1929) and for her 'Sam Pig' series (1940 onwards). The Country Child (1931) is a vivid and largely autobiographical account of a country childhood. (See also CHILDREN'S LITERATURE.)
VACHELL, H(oracle) A(nnlesley) (1861–1955), prolific novelist and playwright, educated at Harrow and Sandhurst. He is best remembered for The Hill: A Romance of Friendship (1905), a story of an intense schoolboy relationship between young Harrovian John Verney and Henry Desmond, who is later to die in the Boer War. Other titles include Her Son (1907), The Fourth Dimension (1920), and The Fifth Commandment (1932); Distant Fields (1937) is a memoir.

Vala, see Four Zoas, The.

Valentine, (1) one of The Two Gentlemen of Verona in Shakespeare’s play; (2) one of Orsino’s court in his Twelfth Night.

Valentine and Orson, the subject of an early French romance. Bellisant, sister of King Pepin, is married to Alexander, emperor of Constantinople. The archpriest treacherously accuses Bellisant to her husband and she is banished. A bear carries away one of her children (Orson), who is reared as a wild man. The other (Valentine) is found by Pepin and brought up as a knight. Valentine meets Orson, conquers him, brings him to the court, and tames him. Numerous adventures follow, the principal of which is the imprisonment of Valentine and Orson and their mother Bellisant in the castle of Clerimond, sister of the giant Ferragus, and their rescue by Pacolet, the dwarf messenger of Ferragus, who has a little magic horse of wood which conveys him instantly wherever he wishes.

The story appeared in English about 1510 translated by Henry Watson as the 'History of two Valyannte Brethren, Valentyne and Orson'. A ballad in Percy’s Reliques deals with it.

Valentinian, The Tragedy of A play by J. Fletcher, performed between 1610 and 1614, published 1647.

A sensational drama with elements of *revenge tragedy, it deals with the vengeance of Maximus, a general under Valentinian III, for the dishonour of his wife by the emperor, and her suicide. A dense web of intrigue and treachery results in the slow death of Valentinian by poisoning (to the accompaniment of the well-known lyric ‘Care charming sleep’), and the subsequent death of Maximus, poisoned, again to musical accompaniment, by the widowed empress Eudoxa, as he is inaugurated as Valentinian’s successor.

Valentine, the husband of St Cecilia, whose story is told in Chaucer’s ‘The Second Nun’s Tale’ (see Canterbury Tales, 21).

VALÉRY, Paul (1871–1945), French poet, essayist, and critic. As a young man he was deeply influenced by the symbolists and, in particular, by the work of *Mal-larmé. He became widely known for the poetry of La Jeune Parque (1917) and the collection Charmes (1922). The latter contains ‘Le Cimetière marin’ (English trans., ‘The Graveyard by the Sea’, 1932, and, by *Day-Lewis, 1946). He wrote little poetry after 1922, but published essays on a variety of literary, philosophical, and aesthetic subjects (Variété, 1924–44) and two Socratic dialogues, Eupalinos ou l’architecte and L’Âme et la danse (1923). His notebooks (Cahiers, covering the years 1894 to 1945, were published posthumously.

Valley of Humiliation, in Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, the place where *Christian encounters *Apollyon. There is a beautiful description of it in Pt II, where Mr *Great-heart explains its true character.

Valley of the Shadow of Death, see Psalm 23: 4. Christian, in Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, passes through it, ‘a very solitary place’, with a dangerous quag on one side and a deep ditch on the other, and the mouth of hell is close by one side of it, from which issue flames and fiends.

VANBRUGH, Sir John (1664–1726), dramatist and architect, son of a London tradesman, whose father, a merchant of Ghent, had fled to England from Alva’s persecutions. He was imprisoned in France between 1688 and 1692 for spying. In 1696 he produced The Relapse, or Virtue in Danger, with immense success, and The Provok’d Wife in 1697. His other principal comedies are The Confederacy (1705) and The Provok’d Husband, which he left unfinished and C. Cibber completed and brought out in 1728. His collected dramatic works appeared in 1730. He, together with *Congreve, was specially attacked by Jeremy Collier in his Short View.

Vanbrugh’s first building was Castle Howard, 1699–1726. This already shows the grandeur and dramatic quality of his style, which reaches its climax in Blenheim Palace. Hawksmoor assisted him in many of his projects. Vanbrugh was Clarenceux king-of-arms and in 1714 was the first man knighted by George I. (See Restoration.)

van der POST, Sir Laurens Jan (1906–96), writer, soldier, farmer, and explorer, born in South Africa, whose many works of travel, anthropology, and ad-
Van Dyck, Sir Anthony (1599–1641), Flemish painter, born in Antwerp, who worked in *Rubens’s studio in his youth. In 1623 he came to England as court painter to Charles I. He was knighted and enjoyed great success, painting many portraits of the royal family and the court. He married a lady of the Scottish house of Ruthven in 1640. He died in England and was buried in Old St Paul’s. Van Dyck’s success lay in his ability to portray the poetic ideals that sustained the Caroline court. He painted the king both as warrior monarch and as perfect gentleman; his mythological portraits (Venetia, Lady Digby, as Prudence) and those which convey an Arcadian mood suggest the atmosphere of the *masque. Van Dyck was the friend of men of letters and of the most cultivated patrons of his day; among others, he painted the earl of Arundel, *Laud, E. *Porter, and T. *Killigrew the elder. *Waller praised his portraits for showing ‘Not the form alone, and grace but art and power of a face’.

Vane, Frances Anne, Viscountess, née Hawes (1713–88), was the source of the notorious chapter 81 of *Peregrine Pickle, ‘Memoirs of a Lady of Quality’, in which the said lady relates her scandalous adventures to Peregrine. It is probable that *Smollett compiled the memoirs for her, though whether from a written or verbal account remains uncertain. Horace *Walpole referred to Lady Vane as ‘that living academy of love-life’.

Vanessa, *Swift’s name for Esther Vanhomrigh.

Vanity Fair, in Bunyan’s *Pilgrim’s Progress, a fair in the town of Vanity, on the way to the Celestial City: the ‘Vanity’ tradition begins in Eccles. 1: 2 (‘Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher . . .’). Here Bunyan satirizes Restoration society in which all ‘merchandise’ is for sale, including houses, wives, souls, and precious stones, and which penalizes disidents who only ‘buy the truth’. The episode culminates in the trial and martyrdom of Faithful, who is burnt to death after being abused by Judge Hategood, a compound personification of Puritan-hounding judges such as Kel-lyne and Jeffreys.

Vanity Fair, a novel by *Thackeray, published in numbers 1847–8, illustrated by the author. The story is set at the time of the Napoleonic wars, and gives a satirical picture of a worldly society, which Thackeray intended to be applied also to his own times. It follows the fortunes of two sharply contrasted characters, Rebecca (Becky) Sharp, the penniless orphaned daughter of an artist and a French opera dancer, and Amelia Sedley, the sheltered child of a rich City merchant. The two girls, as unlike in character as they are in fortune, have been educated at Miss Pinkerton’s Academy for young ladies. Becky, having failed to force a proposal of marriage from Amelia’s elephante brother Jos, ‘the Collector of Boggley Wallah’, becomes governess to the children of Sir Pitt Crawley, a coarse, brutal old man who bullies his fading second wife. Becky manages to charm the Crawley family, and becomes a favourite of Miss Crawley, Sir Pitt’s rich and capricious sister. When his wife dies Sir Pitt proposes to Becky, but she has to confess that she is already married, to his younger son Rawdon. The young couple abruptly fall from favour with Miss Crawley, and have to live on Becky’s wits.

Meanwhile Amelia’s apparently secure life has been disrupted. Her father has lost all his money, and her engagement to George Osborne, the handsome but vain and shallow son of another City magnate, has been broken off in consequence. William Dobbin, George’s awkward, loyal friend, who is secretly in love with Amelia, persuades George to defy his father and go on with the marriage, and Mr Osborne disinherits his son.

George, Rawdon, and Dobbin are all in the army, and Amelia and Becky accompany their husbands to Belgium, where Becky carries on an intrigue with George Osborne. George is killed at Waterloo, and Amelia, with her baby son Georgy, goes to live in poverty with her parents, while Becky and Rawdon manage to make a brilliant display in London society on ‘nothing a year’. Amelia’s devotion to her son is contrasted with Becky’s neglect of hers, but she is finally forced by poverty to part with Georgy, who is growing up to be much like his father, to his grandfather. Dobbin, despairing of ever winning Amelia’s love, for she is dedicated to the memory of her husband, has spent ten years in India. Becky and Rawdon part, after Rawdon has discovered his wife in a compromising situation with Lord Steyne, who has, it turns out, been paying for Becky’s extravagances. Becky leads an increasingly disreputable life on the Continent, and it is hinted that she may be responsible for the death of Jos Sedley, who has insured his life in favour. Rawdon, who has become governor of Coventry Island, dies of fever. Amelia steadfastly refuses to marry Dobbin, until a chance meeting with Becky, who tells her of George Osborne’s infidelity. Disillusioned, she marries Dobbin, but by then his love for her has lost much of its intensity.

Vanity of Human Wishes, The, a poem by Dr *Johnson, published 1749, in imitation of the Tenth Satire of *Juvenal. Less topical than his other long poem, *London, it owes its success to its moral seriousness and to its weighty but well-illustrated generalizations. Johnson comments on the vanities of various ambitions—for power, learning, military glory, and beauty—and cites the examples of Wolsey, *Clarendon, *Laud, and others: the passage on Charles XII of Sweden is perhaps the finest in the poem, 'quite perfect in form', according to T. S. *Eliot. Johnson's deep religious faith transforms the *Stoicism of the original's conclusion: 'Still raise for good the supplicating voice, /But leave to heav'n the measure and the choice.' This was the first complete work to which he put his name.

Vasari, Giorgio (1511–74), Italian painter, architect, and author of The Lives of the Most Excellent Italian Architects, Painters and Sculptors (1550 and 1568), for generations the main source for the history of Italian art. Selections translated by G. Bull appeared in 1965 and 1987.

Vathek, an Arabian Tale, by W. *Beckford, published in English 1786. The book was written in French and translated into English, with the author's assistance, by Samuel Henley. It was one of the most successful of the *Oriental tales then in fashion. The cruel and sensual Caliph Vathek, whose eye can kill with a glance, is compelled, by the influence of his sorceress mother and by the unbridled pride of his own nature, to become a servant of Eblis, the Devil. He makes a sacrifice of 50 children, and sets off from his capital, Samarah, to the ruined city of Istakar, where he is promised the sight of the treasures of the pre-Adamite sultans. On the way he falls in love with Nouronihar, the exquisite daughter of one of his emirs, who accompanies him on his journey. After various exotic and terrifying incidents, he obtains admission to the great subterranean halls of Eblis, only to discover the sickening worthlessness of the riches that he sees there, and to receive the penalty of his sin, when his own heart and the hearts of all the damned burst into flame in their living bodies. The febrile excitement of the story is sustained by the use of rapid action, exotic locales, and exaggerated passions, often cruel or prurient. *Hazlitt objected to 'the diabolical levity of its contempt for mankind', but critics disagree as to whether the tale is related with a sly irony. Beckford wrote three further 'Episodes' (the last unfinished) for insertion in the story, and included them in his French version of 1815.

vaudeville, a light popular song or a stage performance of a light and amusing character interspersed with songs, from vaude vire, in full chanson du Vau de Vire, a song of the Valley of the Vire (in Calvados, Normandy). The name is said to have been first given to songs composed by Olivier Basselin, a fuller of Vire (15th cent.).

VAUGHAN, Henry (1621–95), born at Newton-upon-Usk, Breconshire, the eldest son of a Welsh gentleman, Thomas Vaughan of Tretower, and his wife Denise. Henry’s twin brother Thomas (below) became a controversial ‘natural magician’. Probably in 1628 a third brother William was born. Henry and Thomas were brought up bilingual in Welsh and English, tutored by Matthew Herbert, a noted schoolmaster at Llangatock. By May 1638 Thomas was at Jesus College, Oxford, and Henry almost certainly accompanied him, though his residence is not recorded. Around 1640 Henry probably went to London to study law, though it is not known which inn attended him. He may have come within the orbit of the literary set of which *Jonson had been the leader. He returned to Breconshire, probably at the outbreak of the Civil War, and after a spell as clerk to Sir Marmaduke Lloyd, chief justice of the sessions, he saw military service on the Royalist side. About 1646 he married Catherine Wise. They had a son, Thomas, and three daughters. His wooing of Catherine is apparently recalled in the poem ‘Upon the Priory Grove’ printed in Poems with the Tenth Satire of Juvenal Engli shed (1646), his first collection. His second, Olor Iscanus (The Swan of Usk), has a dedication... bearing the date 1647, but was not published till 1651. The poems in these two volumes are almost wholly secular, including fashionable love verses and translations from *Ovid, Ausonius, *Boethius, and the Polish Jesuit Latin poet Casimir Sarbiewski (1595–1640). There is little in them that anticipates the great religious poetry of Vaughan’s next volume, Silex Scintillans (Flashing Flint, 1650). The poems suggest that a profound spiritual experience, connected with the death of his brother William in 1648 and the defeat of the Royalist cause, accounted for the despair and renewal which inspired the composition of Silex. Further devotional works followed: The Mount of Olives, or Solitary Devotions (1652) and Flores Solitudinis (1654), which consists of three pious prose translations and a life of St Paulinus of Nola. In 1655 appeared the second edition of Silex Scintillans, with a second part added, and also a translation of the Hermetical Physick of Henry Nollius. A translation of The Chymists Key by the same author followed in 1657. Vaughan’s first wife having died, he married her younger sister Elizabeth, probably in 1655. They had a son, Henry, and three daughters. According to a letter he sent to *Aubrey in 1673 he had by that date been practising physic ‘for many years with good success’. There is no record of a medical degree. His brother Thomas died in 1666, and in 1678 Thalia Rediviva, containing poems by both twins, was published. His later life was marred by litigious feuds between his first and second families.

Vaughan’s religious poetry is uneven, but its best moments, like the start of ‘The World’ (‘I saw Eternity the other night’), have a quality which is wholly distinctive, and which has prevailed with critics to class him as a mystic; his lyrics (‘The Bird’, ‘The Water-Fall’, ‘The Timber’) show a sense of man’s unity with and God’s love of creaturely life, and he believed (with his brother) that nature would be resurrected at the end of time, and that even stones had feeling. He was seized with the idea of childish innocence, and the child’s recollections of prenatal glory. He writes, in ‘The Retreat’, of his own ‘Angel-infancy’, when he would muse on clouds and flowers and see in them ‘Some shadows of eternity’. He acknowledged, in the preface to the second part of Silex Scintillans, his great debt to G. *Herbert, ‘whose holy life and verse gained many pious Converts, (of whom I am the least)’. Vaughan’s fascination with hermeticism, and particularly with the idea of sympathetic bonds uniting microcosm and macrocosm, is clear in his poems, many of which share ideas and even phrases with his brother Thomas’s treatises. On the title-pages of Olor Iscanus and Silex Scintillans Vaughan calls himself a ‘Silurist’, presumably because his native Brecon was anciently inhabited by the British tribe of Silures.

Oxford Elegy (1949), from M. Arnold's 'The Scholar Gipsy' and 'Thrysis' is an effective experiment with speaker, chorus, and orchestra. Vaughan Williams also contributed to the liberation of English opera. Hugh the Drover (1924) was a pioneering work, leaning heavily on folk song, and Sir John in Love (1929) counterposed an English *Falstaff to *Verdi's. Riders to the Sea (1937) is a highly successful, intense, and economical setting of *Synge's tragedy. Vaughan Williams' last opera, The Pilgrim's Progress (1951), was based on *Bunyan.

VAUENARGUES, Luc de Clapiers, marquis de (1715–47), French moralist. After serving as an army officer in the War of the Austrian Succession, he was forced by broken health into premature retirement. His Introduction à la connaissance de l'esprit humain, suivie de réflexions et de maximes (1746) put him in the literary tradition of *Pascal and *La Rochefoucauld. Less sceptical than the first and less cynical than the second, he sought in the natural feelings of men and women the source of their best thought and the springs of their moral energy.

VAUX, Thomas, second Baron Vaux of Harrowden (1509–56), educated at Cambridge and employed by Wolsey and Henry VIII until 1536, when he fell out of favour until Mary’s accession. He was a contributor to *Tottel's Miscellany and *The Paradise of Dainty Devices. He is chiefly remembered now as the author of 'The Aged Lover Renounceth Love', the song mumbled by the grave-digger in *Hamlet, v. i. His poems were edited by L. P. Vonalt (1966).

Vauxhall, or Fox Hall (originally 'Falkes Hall', said to be from Falkes de Breauté, captain of King John's mercenaries, and lord of the manor in the early 13th cent.), famous for the gardens laid out there in the middle of the 17th cent., and at first called 'the New Spring Gardens', because they replaced the old Spring Gardens adjoining St James's Park. Vauxhall Gardens are frequently referred to from that time by dramatists and other writers, including *Pepys. Sir Roger de Coverley, a noble Venetian youth, has secretly married Belvidera, daughter of a proud senator, Priuli, who has repudiated her. Jaffeir, reduced to poverty, begs Priuli for assistance, but is met with insults. Pierre, a foreign soldier with a grievance against the Venetian republic, stimulates Jaffeir’s desire for revenge, confides to him a plot that is hatching against the state, and introduces him to the conspirators. As a pledge of his loyalty to them Jaffeir places Belvidera in the charge of their leader, Renault, but without explaining the reason. Renault tries to rape her in the night. She escapes to her husband, who, in spite of his pledge to the contrary, makes known to her the conspiracy. To save her father, who as one of the senators is to be killed, she persuades Jaffeir to reveal the plot to the Senate, but to claim as reward the lives of the conspirators. These are arrested. Jaffeir, loaded by them with insults, is overwhelmed with remorse. The senators, in spite of their promise, condemn the conspirators to death. Jaffeir threatens to kill Belvidera unless she secures her pardon from her father. She succeeds, but Priuli’s intervention is too late. Belvidera goes mad. Jaffeir stabs his friend Pierre on the scaffold and then himself, and Belvidera dies broken-hearted.

The play, with *Betterton as Jaffeir and Mrs *Barry as Belvidera, was very well received and frequently revived. It was popular throughout the 18th and early 19th cents, and is still occasionally performed. The bawdy comic scenes in which the masochistic senator Antonio is kicked and abused by his whore Aquilina ('Nicky-Nacky') are strikingly different in tone from the rest of the play, and were at first popular, though by 1750 it was customary to cut them. Antonio is a caricature of *Shaftesbury.

Venus and Adonis, an Ovidian poem by Shakespeare, published 1593, the same year in which Marlowe's Hero and Leander was registered, and dedicated to Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, who has been connected with the Sonnets. The poem is written in sesta rima, a quatrain followed by a couplet, which Spenser used in Astrophel (1595) and Lodge in Silvae Metamorphosis (1589). Shakespeare's poem was probably his first publication, and was first printed by Richard Field, another Stratford man, in 1593: it was extremely popular, being reprinted at least 15 times before 1640.

Venus, in love with the youth Adonis, detains him from the chase and woos him, but cannot win his love. She begs him to meet her the next day, but he is then to hunt the boar. She tries in vain to dissuade him. When the morning comes she hears his hounds at bay; filled with terror she goes to look for him and finds him killed by the boar.

Vercelli Book,* The,* an Old English manuscript, made in England before the year 1000, now in the possession of the chapter of Vercelli in north Italy. It contains prose sermons and about 3,500 lines of Old English poetry; its most distinguished contents are the poems Dream of the Rood and Andreas, and two of the four signed poems of Cynewulf: Elene and The Fates of the Apostles.

VERDI, Giuseppe (1813–1901), Italian composer, mainly of operas, three of which are based on Shakespeare and two on Byron. I due foscarî (1844) and Il corsaro (The Corsair, 1848) are relatively early works. Macbeth (1847), the most remarkable of the operas before Rigoletto, is in a different class. Verdi gave his librettist (Francesco Piave) a more than usually rough passage in his determination to get the text as he wanted it; he took immense pains over the first production, and subjected the opera to a thorough revision for Paris in 1865. The Paris version, in which the opera is now heard, betrays its dual origin, yet remains a work of nobility, and Verdi was stung by Parisian criticism that he did not know his Shakespeare: 'Maybe I haven’t done Macbeth justice,' he wrote, 'but that I don’t know, don’t feel, don’t understand Shakespeare—no, for God’s sake no. I have had him in my hands from earliest youth, and I read and re-read him continually.'

This preoccupation continued throughout his life, although his next project, for a King Lear, proved abortive, probably because of dissatisfaction with the text. It was the problem of the libretto that made Verdi hesitate to set Shakespeare. But at the end of his life, after he had apparently concluded his career with Aida and the Requiem Mass, he found in Boito a librettist who could give him what he needed. The story of their collaboration is touching, and its outcome the two greatest of all Shakespeare operas. Otello (1887) is perhaps the more remarkable achievement, particularly from a man in his seventies, yet the fleeting, boisterous tender wisdom of Falstaff (1893) and the technical perfection of its musical realization make this work Verdi's most personal expression of love for the English writer.

VERGA, Giovanni (1840–1922), Italian novelist, dramatist, and writer of short stories, born at Catania. His finest works portray life at the lower levels of society in his native Sicily. The novels I malavoglia (1881) and Mastro-don Gesualdo (1889) deal respectively with a family of poor Sicilian fisherfolk and an ambitious master stonemason and were first printed by Richard Field, another Stratford man, in 1593: it was extremely popular, being reprinted at least 15 times before 1640.

Verges, head borough or petty constable to Dogberry's constable in Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing, his name suggests a possible spelling of verjuice and so his sowness.

VERGIL,* the Roman poet, see VIRGIL.

VERGIL, Polydore (?1470–?1555), a native of Urbino, who came to England in 1502 as sub-collector of Peter's pence, and held various ecclesiastical preferments; he was archdeacon of Wells 1508–54. He was a friend of Sir T. *More and other English humanists. He published his Anglice Historiae Libri XXVI in 1534–55, a chronicle of special value for the reign of Henry VII. He was also author of a Proverbiorum Libellus (Venice, 1498) anticipating the Adagia of Erasmus.

verismo, a movement in 19th-cent. Italian literature akin to Naturalism, whose greatest writer was the Sicilian Verga. The affirmation of dialects, after the Unity of Italy (1870), ran counter both to state policies for linguistic unification and to *Manzoni's literary programme for a standard language. Literature was to document social conditions—particularly the 'southern question' which arose in the unified country because of exploitation of southern resources by the industrializing north. Verismo influenced the early works of the southern writers d’Annunzio and Pirandello, and it relates to post-war *neo-realism.

Verlaine, Paul (1844–96), French poet. Some of his poems appeared in Le Parnasse contemporain of 1866; his Poèmes saturniens were published in the same year, and his Fêtes galantes in 1869. From the end of 1871 he came under the influence of Rimbaud and their violently emotional homosexual relationship culminated in Verlaine’s arrest and imprisonment, in 1873, for wounding Rimbaud with a revolver. His most interesting work, characterized by an intense musicality and metrical inventiveness, appeared in Romances sans paroles in 1874. His influential Art poétique (‘De la musique avant toute chose’) dates from the same time, but remained unpublished for ten years. Sagesse (a religious work, written after his conversion to Catholicism) appeared in 1881, Jadis et naguère in 1884, and in the same year he published a number of short studies of contemporary poets (including Malarmé, and Rimbaud) under the title Les Poètes maudits. Verlaine’s relationship with Rimbaud is the subject of a play by Christopher Hampton, Total Eclipse (perf. 1968, pub. 1969).

Verne, Jules (1828–95), French novelist, who achieved great popularity with a long series of books combining adventure and popular science. Among his most successful stories are: Voyage au centre de la terre (1864; Journey to the Centre of the Earth, 1871); Vingt mille lieues sous les mers (1870; 20,000 Leagues under the Sea, 1872), the adventures of Captain Nemo and his crew aboard the submarine Nautilus; and Le Tour du monde en quatre-vingts jours (1873; Around the World in Eighty Days), recounting the travels of the Englishman Phileas Fogg and his valet Passepartout.

vers de société, a term applied to a form of light verse dealing with events in polite society, usually in a satiric or playful tone, sometimes conversational, sometimes employing intricate forms such as the villanelle or the rondeau. English writers noted for their vers de société include Prior, Goldsmith, Praed, Calverley, Dobson, and Locker-Lampson.

vers libre, a term used to describe many forms of irregular, syllabic, or unrhymed verse, in which the ordinary rules of prosody are disregarded: Whitman pioneered a form of vers libre in America, and its independent evolution in France and Belgium (in the works of Laforgue, Maeterlinck, and others in the 1890s) had a great influence on the early Modernists such as T. S. Eliot and Pound.

Vernon, George (1684–1756), engraver and antiquary, whose notes for a history of the arts in Britain are a major source of information. His notebooks were sold to Horace Walpole, who used them as a basis for his Anecdotes of Painting in England: they were published separately by the Walpole Society (6 vols, 1930–55).

Verper, Adam and his daughter Maggie, characters in The Golden Bowl by H. James.

Very Woman, A, see Massinger.

Vesey, Mrs Elizabeth (?1715–91), an Irishwoman, the first, and perhaps the most loved and successful, of the Blue Stocking hostesses. In the early 1750s she determined, with the support of her husband, who was an Irish MP, to open her doors to literary and fashionable society for an entirely new kind of evening party. Vivacious, intelligent, but always modest, she liked to break her parties into small, ever-changing groups; Horace Walpole, a devoted attendant at all Blue Stocking functions, described her gatherings as ‘Babes’. She set the pattern of Blue Stocking evenings for the next 50 years and, according to Hannah More in her poem Bas Bleu, shared with Mrs Montague and Mrs Boscawen the ‘triple crown’ among Blue Stocking hostesses.

‘Vicar of Bray, The’, a well-known song of unknown authorship, dating from the 18th cent. The subject is a time-serving parson, who boasts that he has accommodated himself to the religious views of the reigns of Charles, James, William, and George, and that ‘whatsoever king may reign’ he will remain vicar of Bray.

Various suggestions have been made as to who this vicar was. Haydn (Dictionary of Dates) quotes Fuller as stating that Symon Symonds, vicar of Bray, Berkshire, in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth, was twice a papist and twice a Protestant. When charged with being a time-server he is said to have replied, ‘Not so, neither, for if I changed my religion, I am sure I kept true to my principle, which is to live and die the vicar of Bray’ (see D’Israel, Curiosities of Literature, s.v. Vicar of Bray).

Vicar of Bullhampton, The, a novel by A. Trollope, published 1870.

Carry Brattle is a ‘fallen woman’, and her brother Sam is accused of the murder of a local farmer. A feud ensues between the arbitrary old marquis of Trowbridge and the vicar, Frank Fenwick, one of the best of Trollope’s worldly and energetic clergy, who takes the side of the Brattles. Sam’s name is cleared and Carry is restored to her family at the mill. A sub-plot concerns the love of Fenwick’s friend Harry Gilmore for Mary Lowther. Against her own better judgment and over-persuaded by the Fenwicks, she accepts him, but breaks her engagement when her previous suitor Walter Marrable unexpectedly comes into the family estate.

This minor classic was sold for £60 by Dr Johnson on Goldsmith's behalf, to prevent the author's arrest for debt. Dr Primrose and his wife Deborah live an idyllic life in a country parish with their six children, the most important of whom are George and Moses, Olivia and Sophia. On the eve of their son George's wedding to Arabella Wilmot, the vicar loses all his young people cannot marry. George is sent away to with joy, and they proceed home, only to find a terrible woman being ejected from an inn, and discovers she is warned her against Thornhill. The vicar receives her for debt. Dr Primrose and his wife Deborah live an estate. Many references are made to the reputed worthiness of the squire's uncle, Sir William Thornhill. A poor, eccentric friend, Mr Burchell, rescues Sophia from drowning, but her attraction to him is not encouraged by her ambitious mother. Another period of frugal happy family life is disrupted by the attentions of the dashing squire, who captivates Olivia and encourages the social pretensions of Mrs Primrose and her daughters to a ludicrous degree. Two fashionable ladies from London offer 'places' to Olivia and Sophia, and the girls angrily dismiss Burchell's warnings. Then the girls hear, to their indignation, that because of a letter of Burchell's that Thornhill re-appears, unrepentant, and offers to find a husband for Olivia, who is not after all dead, was apparently legally wed to Thornhill after all, and he thus loses Arabella's fortune. All proceed home, where Sophia and Sir William, Arabella and George, are married at a double ceremony.

The well-known poems 'The Hermit', the 'Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog', and 'When lovely woman stoops to folly' are placed at three turning points of the story.

His most important work is Principi di una scienza nuova intorno alla natura delle nazioni (Principles of a New Science of Nations, 1725, rev. 1729–30, 1744), in which he developed his theory of historical change as a redemptive design based on 'corsi' and 'ricorsi'—recurring cycles of barbarism, heroism, and reason. To each of these phases correspond cultural, linguistic, and political modes, and at the end of each cycle of phases there is a fall into disorder from which the next cycle is born. The language of poetry, being metaphorical and sensuous, flourishes in the heroic age. It is typified by the Homeric epics, for which Vico was first to postulate collective authorship. Prose enters with the age of reason. This scheme of cycles was put to artistic use by Joyce.

At this point Sophia appears with Burchell. She explains how he rescued her from abduction by Thornhill, and in his gratitude the vicar offers her to Thornhill as his wife. Meanwhile George has recognized Burchell as none other than the good Sir William Thornhill. The nephew is denounced as a scheming villain, and Arabella, disabused, is united with George. Olivia, who is not after all dead, was apparently legally wed to Thornhill after all, and he thus loses Arabella's fortune. All proceed home, where Sophia and Sir William, Arabella and George, are married at a double ceremony.

Vidal, was the story of a Nonconformist army veteran, and undertaken in all weathers, by pony and on foot, with lengthy pauses for spartan picnics and to watch Prince Albert shoot. More Leaves covered the years 1862–3 and appeared in 1883. Apart from her huge official correspondence, the queen’s lively and heavily underlined letters to her eldest daughter Vicky have been published, and also a selection of her daughter’s replies.

In her diaries the queen notes her reading, which included many sermons; some Shakespeare; some *Macaulay; F. *Burney and J. *Austen. She took an interest in the novelists of her own reign, including Sir W. *Scott, *Dickens, the *Brontës, Mrs *Gaskell, G. *Eliot, and *Disraeli. But she preferred poetry (‘in all shapes’), a preference which led to her friendship with *Tennyson, whom she regarded as the perfect poet of ‘love and loss’. Their correspondence has been published. Among many biographical studies, mention may be made of L. *Strachey’s highly unauthorized life (1921) and E. Longford’s authorized version (1964).

Vidal, Gore (Eugene Luther Jr) (1925—), American novelist and essayist, born at West Point, New York, where his father was an instructor at the US Military Academy. He saw army service during the Second World War, the experience of which was drawn on for his first novel, Williwaw (1946). In a Yellow Wood (1947) was the story of a Nonconformist army veteran, and this was followed by The City and the Pillar (1948), a study of homosexuality, and The Season of Comfort (1949), about the conflict between a boy and his mother. In A Search for the King (1950), concerning the affection of a troubadour for Richard the Lionheart, he signalled his interest in the utilization of history, often as a means of analysing the present. Novels in this vein include Julian (1964), about the Roman emperor Julian the Apostate; Two Sisters (1970), which juxtaposes the Roman world of the 4th cent. with contemporary life; and Creation (1981), set in the 5th-cent. world of Darius, Xerxes, and Confucius. A sequence of ‘Narratives of a Golden Age’, chronicling the history of America from the mid-19th cent., includes Washington, D.C. (1967), 1876 (1976), Lincoln (1984), Empire (1987), Burr (1973), and Hollywood (1990). His most celebrated novel, Myra Breckinridge (1968), wittily chronicled the adventures of a transsexual; its sequel, Myron, was published in 1974. Other works include Dark Green, Bright Red (1950), about an American army officer caught up in a Latin American revolution; The Judgement of Paris (1952), a contemporary version of the classic tale; Kalki (1978), a satire on feminism; and Duluth (1983), set in the late 20th cent. Live from Golgotha (1992) was a satirical fiction on television culture. A collection of stories, A Thirsty Evil, was published in 1956. His essays—elegant and pungent in equal measure—on history, literature, culture, and politics have been collected in Rocking the Boat (1962), Reflections upon a Sinking Ship (1969), Homage to Daniel Shays (1973), Matters of Fact and of Fiction (1977), The Second American Revolution (1982), Armageddon (1987), and A View from the Diner’s Club (1991). He has also written plays for television and the stage, including Visit to a Small Planet (1956), and detective stories under the pseudonym Edgar Box. A candid memoir of Vidal’s life up to the age of 40, Palimpsest, was published in 1995.

Vigny, Alfred de (1797–1863), French poet. His ten-year career as an army officer was undistinguished, and he was discharged in 1827. His career as a poet, however, consistently upheld a basic romantic value: stoic pride as the only valid response to the inflexibility of Divine Justice. His historical novel Cinq-Mars (1826), based on a conspiracy against Cardinal *Richelieu, his three tales Servitude et grandeur militaires (1835), illustrating the self-sacrifice of Napoleon’s armies, and his play Chatterton (1835), on the fate of the solitary poet in the world, form part of what he called his ‘epic of disillusionment’ which argued in favour of a reasoned pessimism as a condition for survival. A number of powerful individual poems, such as ‘La Mort du loup’, ‘Le Mont des oliviers’, and ‘La Bouteille à la mer’ (collected posthumously in 1863), proclaim a more positive, though equally romantic, faith in ‘man’s unconquerable mind’.

Village, The, a poem by *Crabbe, published 1783. The poet contrasts the cruel realities of country life with the Arcadian pastoral favoured by poets. He was assisted in the writing of the work (which Dr *Johnson found ‘original, vigorous, and elegant’) both by his patron *Burke and by Johnson. The poem established Crabbe’s reputation as a writer.

Villanelle, a poem, usually of a pastoral or lyrical nature, consisting normally of five three-lined stanzas and a final quatrains, with only two rhymes throughout. The first and third lines of the first stanza are repeated alternately in the succeeding stanzas as a refrain, and form a final couplet in the quatrains [OED]. The form has been much employed in light verse and *vers de société by *Lang, *Dobson, and others, and in the 20th cent. was used to more serious purpose by *Auden, *Emerson (‘Slowly the poison the whole blood stream fills’), Dylan *Thomas (‘Do not go gentle into that good night’), and others.

Villehardouin, Geoffroi de (c.1152–1212), a member of a powerful French crusading family which ruled over a great court at Achaia, marshal of Champagne. He was an eyewitness of the events described in his Conquête de Constantinople, an account of the so-called Fourth Crusade, the first great literary work in French prose. Villehardouin relates with vigour and picturesque the negotiations with the doge of Venice, the departure of the crusading host, its diversion from its proper purpose to various more secular undertakings, including the capture of Constantinople, the subsequent dissensions and intrigues, culminating in the crowning of Baldwin of Flanders as emperor of the East, and the grant of the kingdom of Macedonia to Boniface of Montferrat. See M. R. B. Shaw, Chronicles of the Crusades: Joinville and Villehardouin (1963).

Villette, a novel by C. *Brontë, published 1853.

The novel, like its predecessor The Professor (then unpublished), is based on the author’s experiences in Brussels, here renamed Villette, and also has as its centre a pupil–teacher relationship. The narrator, Lucy Snowe, poor, plain, and friendless, finds herself a post as teacher in a girls’ school in Villette, where she wins the respect of the capable, if unscrupulous, headmistress, Mme Beck, and gains authority over the boisterous girls. She becomes deeply attached to the handsome John Bretton, the school’s English doctor, in whom she recognizes an acquaintance from her childhood, the son of her own godmother; she watches his infatuation with the shallow and flirtatious Ginevra Fanshawe, followed by a happier love for his childhood friend Pauline Home, and represses her own strong feelings for him. These feelings gradually attach themselves to the waspish, despotic, but good-hearted little professor, M. Paul Emmanuel, Mme Beck’s cousin, whose own response to her changes from asperity to esteem and affection, despite Mme Beck’s attempts to discourage the friendship. His generosity leaves her mistress of her own school when he is called away on business to the West Indies; the ending is ambiguous, and the reader is left to decide whether he returns to marry her or is drowned on his way home. The novel combines a masterly portrayal of Belgian daily life with a highly personal use of the elements of Gothic fiction; Charlotte Brontë uses hints of the supernatural (the story of a ghostly nun, a visit to the mysterious and deformed Mme Walravens) to heighten the impression of her heroine’s nervous isolation and heroic fortitude; but all the apparitions are found to have realistic explanations, and in Paul Emmanuel she successfully creates an unromantic hero very far removed from the *Byronic Rochester of *Jane Eyre.

Villiers de l’Isle-Adam, Philippe-Auguste (1838–90), French novelist, dramatist, and aesthete. His best-known work, the visionary drama Axél (1890, English trans. Fineberg, 1925), which first appeared in symbolist reviews, is a Wagnerian narrative of love and death set in an isolated German castle, which enshrines Rosicrucian mysteries. Its symbolic subtleties have exerted an influence on English writing which has only recently begun to be recognized; it provided a title for E. Wilson’s study of symbolist writers, Axel’s Castle (1931).

Villon, François (1431–after 1463), French poet. He studied at the University of Paris, gaining a master’s degree in 1452. The little that is known of his life suggests nearly constant turmoil: he was imprisoned several times for violent crime and theft, and narrowly escaped death by hanging in 1463. His surviving work consists mainly of Le Lais (or Petit Testament) and Le Testament (or Grand Testament); the latter contains the famous ‘Ballade des dames du temps jadis’, with its refrain, ‘Mais ou sont les neiges d’antan?’ In addition to these two works a number of short poems survive, including Villon’s own epitaph, ‘Frères humains qui après nous vivez’, written under sentence of death. He is now recognized as pre-eminent among the poets of medieval France. He has been frequently translated into English since the 19th cent.; there are versions of individual poems by *Rossetti, *Swinburne, and R. *Lowell, among others.

Vincent of Beauvais, the Dominican author of Speculum Naturale, Historiale, Doctrinale (c.1250), an enormous compilation of all the knowledge known at the time. He is mentioned by Chaucer in one version of the prologue to The Legend of Good Women (G 307).

Vincentio, (1) Lucentio’s father in Shakespeare’s The Taming of the Shrew, (2) the duke in his Measure for Measure.

Vincy, Fred and Rosamond, characters in G. Eliot’s Middlemarch.

Vindication of a Natural Society, A, a treatise by E. *Burke, published anonymously 1756, his first substantial work. It is an ironical answer to Bolingbroke’s indictment of revealed religion, in imitation of his style and in the form of a reductio ad absurdum; it was so successful a parody that even Warburton was deceived by it, and in 1765 Burke published another edition with a preface explaining his ironical stance. Bolingbroke had exalted the claims of natural religion by pointing to the unfortunate results of religious creeds; Burke points to the evil results of artificial society and the artificial division of rich and poor, but expects his exposition to reinforce ‘the necessity of political institutions, weak and wicked as they are’.

Vindication of the Rights of Woman, A, by M. Wollstonecraft, published 1792.

In this work the author attacks the educational restrictions and ‘mistaken notions of female excellence’ that keep women in a state of ‘ignorance and slavish dependence’. She argues that girls are forced into passivity, vanity, and credulity by lack of physical and mental stimulus, and by a constant insistence on the need to please; she attacks the educational theories of the ‘unmanly, immoral’ *Chesterfield, of *Rousseau (who in her view made false and discriminatory distinctions in his approach to the sexes in Emile), and of other writers, concluding that ‘From the tyranny of man . . . the greater number of female follies proceed.' The work was much acclaimed, but also inevitably attracted hostility; Horace *Walpole referred to its author as 'a hyena in petticoats'.

virelay, a song or short lyric piece, of a type originating in France in the 14th cent., usually consisting of short lines arranged in stanzas with only two rhymes, the end-rhyme of one stanza being the chief one of the next [OED].

Virgdemiarum, Sex Libri, by J. *Hall, two volumes of English satires, 1597 and 1598. The first volume, called ‘Toothless’, satirez certain literary conventions in the spirit of *Martial and *Horace; the second volume, Juvenalian in character, ‘bites’ fiercely into such ills as sexual promiscuity, ostentatious piety, impostures in astrology and genealogy, economic injustices, etc. The title means ‘a sheaf of rods’, with which the satirist delivers his blows. The books were condemned by the high commission in 1599, along with satires by *Marston, *Nashe, and others; but Hall’s books were reprinted.

Virgil (Publius Vergilius Maro) (70–19 BC), the greatest of Roman poets, valued particularly for his craftsmanship, love of nature, and sense of pathos. Maturing at a time when the Romans were struggling to produce a literature that would match the Greek, he imitated successively the pastoral of *Theocritus, the didactic poems of *Hesiod and *Aratus, and the epics of *Homer, making original contributions to all three genres. In his Eclogues he added a new level of meaning to the pastoral’s idealization of country life by alluding to topics of contemporary interest; in the Georgics he transformed the bald didacticism of his models into a panegyric of Italy and the traditional ways of rural life; and in the Aeneid he committed the epic to the presentation of a major patriotic theme. He began like most poets of his generation by working within the conventions of *Hellenistic poetry, but later, when he came to enjoy the patronage of Augustus, he widened his stylistic range and, drawing also on earlier and more naïve authors, created a diction and a manner of presentation that were all his own.

Everyone who could read Latin (and until the latter half of the 19th cent. that covered all educated persons) read Virgil; and although it is easy to trace borrowings from his works, these fall far short of representing the totality of his influence, which was pervasive rather than specific. Many generations found in him their main gateway to the sublime. In the Middle Ages he was regarded as a seer and a magician, and the ‘Messianic Eclogue’ (below) led *Dante to choose him as a guide through hell and purgatory. His *Aeneid served as a model for all the Latin epics of the medieval period and then for the new classical epic of the Renaissance. There are Virgilian similes in *Spenser, Virgilian motifs in Shakespeare’s *Rape of Lucrece and Milton’s *Paradise Lost. The *Georgics, comparatively neglected earlier, came into their own in the 18th cent., when they provided a model for descriptive poets like J. *Thomson and were seriously discussed by writers on agriculture. In the 19th cent. came *Wordsworth’s ‘Laodamia’ and *Tennyson’s avowal in ‘To Virgil’ of an indebtedness beyond the obvious.

A legion of translators was attracted to Virgil. *Dryden’s version of his works (1697) remains probably the finest in spite of its occasional defects. Gavin *Douglas, writing in Scots, produced a vivid *Aeneid (1513) and W. *Morris a ponderously medieval one (1885). There have been interesting translations by C. *Day-Lewis of the *Georgics (1940) and the *Aeneid (1952).

‘Virgil’s Fourth or Messianic Eclogue’, written 40 BC, celebrated the coming birth of a child who would bring back the Golden Age and preside over a world at peace. Christian scholars from *Augustine to the present have read the poem as a prophecy of the birth of Christ, an interpretation that appeared the more plausible because of similarities to passages in Isaiah believed by Christians to be Messianic prophecies. It is possible that Virgil was familiar with the Septuagint text of Isaiah 7: 14 which predicts that a virgin will conceive, but it is more likely that he was drawing on Sibylline writings originating in a south Italian culture that had come under Phoenician influence.

Virginia, a daughter of the centurion Lucius Virgininius. Appius Claudius, the decemvir, became enamoured of her and sought to get possession of her. For this purpose she was claimed by one of his favourites as daughter of a slave, and Appius in the capacity of a judge gave sentence in his favour and delivered her into the hands of his friend. Virgininius, informed of these proceedings, arrived from the camp, and plunged a dagger into his daughter’s breast to save her from the Virginians, The, a *historical novel of the American Revolution by *Thackeray, published in numbers, Nov. 1857–Oct. 1859, and illustrated by the author. George Washington plays a prominent part in the narrative, a fact which offended some American readers. The novel takes up the story of the Esmond family a generation after the events of *The History of Henry Esmond, and mainly concerns the fortunes of Esmond’s twin grandsons, George and Harry Warrington, in America and England. Their mother, Esmond’s only daughter Rachel, favours her younger son Harry, and is capricious and autocratic in her treatment of George. The boys are alike in appearance, but totally different in character, George being serious and scholarly, Harry cheerful, volatile, and attractive. However, they always remain close friends. When George disappears in a military expedition against the French and is presumed dead, Harry, now the heir, visits England, and meets his Castlewood relations, whose corrupt behaviour is in marked contrast to Harry’s New World innocence. Under their influence Harry plunges into gambling and dissipation, and is inveigled into an engagement to his much older cousin Maria. He is arrested for debt and imprisoned in a sponging-house. He is rescued by the sudden reappearance of George, who has escaped from the French and come to England. Maria releases Harry from his engagement, and she leaves money to him in her will. Harry joins the army, and is with Wolfe at the capture of Quebec. He falls in love with Fanny Mountain, the daughter of his mother’s housekeeper, and marries her rather than Hetty Lambert, Theo’s sister, who is in love with him. When the War of Independence breaks out, Harry joins Washington, and George, who is in the British army, resigns his commission rather than run the risk of fighting against his brother. He settles on the Warrington estates in England, and gives up the Virginian property to Harry. George Warrington in *Pendennis is a descendant of the Warrington family of this novel.

Virgin Martyr, The, a tragedy by *Massinger and Dekker, printed 1622.

The Emperor Diocletian bids his daughter Artemia choose whom she will marry. She chooses Antoninus, a brave soldier, son of Sapritius, governor of Caesarea. He declines the dangerous honour, being moreover devoted to Dorothea, a maid of the Christian sect, which is at the time subject to persecution. Theophilus, a zealous persecutor, and his secretary Harpax, ‘an evil spirit’, betray Antoninus and Dorothea to Artemia, who finds them together, and at once orders them to execution, but presently allows Theophilus to send his daughters to Dorothea to convert her to the pagan religion. The daughters, instead, are converted by Dorothea to Christianity, and on their boldly professing it are killed by their own father. Dorothea, attended by her ‘good spirit’ Angelo, is subjected to extremes of torture and indignity and finally executed, Antoninus dying by her side. In the last act, Angelo and Harpax, the good and evil spirits, contend for the soul of Theophilus. Theophilus, summoned before Diocletian, proclaims his conversion to Christianity, courageously suffers torture, and dies. The same story has been treated in poems by *Swinburne and G. M. *Hopkins.

Vision of Judgement, A, a poem in hexameters by R. *Southey, published 1821, at the time when he was *poet laureate.

The preface, written in defence of this metrical innovation, contains, in a digression, a violent attack on the works of *Byron, ‘those monstrous combinations of horrors and mockery, lewdness and impiety’. Byron retorted with his parody The Vision of Judgement (below).

The poet in a trance sees George III (who had died in 1820) rise from the tomb and, after receiving from the shade of Perceval news of affairs in England, proceed to the gates of heaven. The devil, accompanied by *Wilkes, comes forward to arraign him, but retires discomfited, and the king, after receiving a eulogy from Washington, is admitted to Paradise, where he is greeted by previous English sovereigns, the worthies of England, and finally by his family.

In 1821 appeared *A Vision of Judgement by *Southey, which in its preface described Byron as the leader of the ‘Satanic school’ of poetry. Byron replied with an exuberant travesty of Southey’s poem. George III, at the celestial gate, is claimed by Satan, who catalogues his crimes against freedom and the national and individual woes that he condoned: Satan then calls a crowd of witnesses, including the ‘merry, cock-eyed’, and forgiving sprite of *Wilkes and the unforgiving *Junius, to testify to the king’s disastrous reign. Southey is swept up from the Lake District by a devil, and is mocked by Byron for his Vision of Mirzah, The', an allegory by *Addison, published in the *Spectator (No. 159). Mirzah has a vision of human life as a bridge over which multitudes are passing, some dropping through concealed trapdoors into the flood beneath; he also sees the happy islands of the virtuous dead.

*Vivian Grey, a novel by B. *Disraeli, published 1826, with a continuation in 1827.

This was the first of Disraeli's novels, published anonymously when he was 22 and written, as he later observed, 'with imagination acting upon knowledge not acquired by experience'. The first of a group of three novels (the others were Alroy and *Contarini Fleming), it represented, in its author's words, 'my active and real ambition'. Vivian, a brilliant and difficult boy, is expelled from school, and discovers that by clever manipulation of his charm and social skills he can advance himself in the world of politics. He becomes the protégé of the marquis of Carabas, a powerful but disappointed politician, and by cynically playing on the follies of various discontented peers and MPs builds a faction round the marquis. His secret efforts to create a new party are exposed by the tempestuous Mrs Lorraine (a reminiscence of Lady Caroline *Lamb). Vivian is challenged to a duel by the outraged Cleveland, leader-designate of the party, whom Vivian kills. All hopes destroyed, the young man leaves England and begins a desultory life of intrigue, adventure, and lost love among German princlings and principalities. The last four books were added by popular demand in 1827.

Disraeli came to dislike the novel, and the character of the unprincipled Vivian dogged him for many years: he tried to suppress the book, but pirated editions abroad forced him to reprint, and in 1853 he drastically revised the work. Among various identifications, the kindly, scholarly Mr Grey represents Disraeli's father, Isaac *D'Israeli, the dashing Lord Alhambra has something of *Byron, the marquis of Carabas of John *Murray (who was extremely angry), and Cleveland of *Lockhart.

Vizetelly, Henry (1820–94), son of a publisher and engraver, of a family Italian in origin, but long settled in England; he became an engraver, publisher, journalist, and editor, whose defiance of censorship and policy of issuing cheap reprints had a considerable impact on the literary scene. In 1885 he joined forces with G. A. *Moore to publish a cheap one-volume edition of A Mummer's Wife, an act which did much to break the power of the circulating *libraries and the three-decker novel; in 1886 with H. *Ellis he founded the *Mermaid Series of unexpurgated reprints of 'Best Plays of the Old Dramatists'. He also published translations of *Flaubert, *Gogol, *Tolstoy, the *Goncourts, etc., and 17 novels by *Zola; it was his publication of Zola's La Terre that led to his three-month imprisonment in 1888 on an obscenity charge, despite the protests of *Bradlaugh, *Gosse, Ellis, and others. This bankrupted his publishing company. Vizetelly had many friends in the artistic and literary world, including *Thackeray, *Doré, and *Sala, and his memoirs, Glances back through Seventy Years (1893), give a lively portrait of bohemian society.

Volney, Constantin François de Chassebœuf, comte de (1757–1820), French historian, travel writer, and philosophe, author of Les Ruines, ou méditation sur les révolutions des empires (1791), in which contemplation of the ruins of Palmyra becomes the occasion for reflections on the rise, progress, and decline of ancient civilizations and the prospect for modern ones. The soul of the narrator, enlightened by a spirit, the Genius of Tombs and Ruins, comprehends through a conception of human history that man's miseries have at all times been the result of his ignorance, greed, and neglect of natural law; but that, guided by Nature and Reason, he will at last come to know his own best interest. Putting aside the dual tyranny of religious superstition and political despotism, he will perfect his nature and establish freedom, equality, and justice. Les Ruines was translated into English in 1795 and (generally known as Ruins of Empire) had a certain currency in England through the early 19th cent., especially among rationalists and freethinkers. It was a favourite book of *Shelley's, providing the plan for his *Queen Mab; in Mary Shelley's *Frankenstein it is one of four books by means of which the monster receives his education.

Volpone, or The Fox, a comedy by *Jonson, performed by the King's Men in 1605–6, printed 1607.
Volpone, a rich Venetian without children, feigns that he is dying, in order to draw gifts from his would-be heirs. Mosca, his parasite and confederate, persuades each of these in turn that he is to be the heir, and thus extracts costly presents from them. One of them, Corvino, even attempts to sacrifice his wife to Volpone in hope of the inheritance. Finally Volpone over-reaches himself. To enjoy the discomfort of the vultures who are awaiting his death, he makes over his property by will to Mosca and pretends to be dead. Mosca takes advantage of the situation to blackmail Volpone, but rather than be thus defeated Volpone chooses to reveal all to the authorities. They direct that Volpone shall be cast in irons until he is as in the presence of such as he pretended to be, Mosca whipped and confined to the galleys, Corvino made to parade in ass's ears, and his wife returned to her family with a trebled dowry. A secondary plot involves Sir Politic Would-be, an English traveller who has absurd schemes for improving trade and curing diseases, and his Lady, a loquacious, hectoring pedant. Sir Politic is chastened when Peregrine, a wiser English traveller, pretends to have him arrested for treason. The names of the principal characters, Volpone (the fox), Mosca (the fly), Voltore (the vulture), Corbaccio (the crow), Corvino (the raven), indicate their roles and natures.

Volscius, Prince, a character in Buckingham's The Rehearsal. He is torn between love and honour, and comes on the stage with one boot on and one off, his legs illustrating his distraction.

Volsunga saga, a prose version of a lost cycle of heroic songs of which fragments survive in the poetic Edda, dealing with the families of the Volsungs and the Niblungs. It has been translated by W. Morris and E. Magnusson (1888). For the treatment in it of the story of Sigurd and Brunhild, see SIGURD THE VOLSUNG.

Voltaire, pseudonym of François-Marie Arouet (1694–1778), French satirist, novelist, poet, dramatist, polemicist, moralist, critic, and correspondent. Voltaire was the universal genius of the Enlightenment. Welcomed in the free-thinking circles of Parisian society, he was committed to the Bastille for his satires in 1717–18, and again exiled to England in 1726–9. The remainder of his life was divided between long periods of retreat in the provinces (first in Champagne with Mme du Châtelet, finally at Ferney near Geneva) and brief returns to metropolitan centres (Paris, Versailles, Berlin). His literary principles were fundamentally neo-classical: his epic poem La Henriade (1723 and 1728), on the career of Henry of Navarre, and his heroic tragedies, notably Zaire (1732), a Turkish tale of fated love, exhibit all the formality, decorum, artificiality, and lucidity of the mode. His political principles were essentially liberal. The Lettres philosophiques (1734, English version 1733), inspired by his residence in England, which mention *Congreve and *Addison, attack the abuses of the ancien régime in the name of tolerance and liberty, while his history Le Siècle de Louis XIV (1751) disregards providence as an explanatory principle, seeking instead evidence of social and moral progress. His most characteristic works, however, were his philosophical tales, notably Zadig (1747) and Candide (1759) in which the rapidity, cleverness, and precision of his mind are put to the service of elaborating a rational protection against the basic evils of life. His relentless mockery of the cruelty and obscurantism of the civil and ecclesiastical establishments was the source of both his persecution and his immense prestige.

Volumnia, in Shakespeare's Coriolanus, the mother of Coriolanus. A proud, imperious Roman matron, she rejoices in her son's exploits; but it is her eloquence that saves Rome from the Volscians, at her son's expense.

von Arnim, Elizabeth (1866–1941), novelist and cousin of K. *Mansfield, born Mary Annette Beaucamp in Sydney, Australia. In 1890 she married Count Henning August von Arnim-Schlagenthin, who appears as 'the Man of Wrath' in her best-known work, Elizabeth and Her German Garden, published anonymously in 1898; it describes her family life and the garden she created at Nassenheide in Pomerania. E. M. *Forster and Hugh *Walpole were tutors to her children there. After von Arnim's death she was married in 1916 to Bertrand *Russell's brother, the second Earl Russell. She published many novels, including Pastor's Wife (1914), Vera (1921), and The Enchanted April (1922, adapted for film in 1992), and a quirky autobiog­raphy, All the Dogs of My Life (1936). Noted for its descriptive power and irreverent wit, her work reveals a keen sense of women's struggle for autonomy within marriage.

von Hügel, Friedrich, baron of the Holy Roman Empire (1852–1925), Roman Catholic theologian and philosopher. He was born in Florence and after a cosmopolitan education settled in England in 1867. He studied natural science, philosophy, and religious history, adopting the critical views of the Old Testament. In 1905 he founded the London Society for the Study of Religion, which brought him into touch with thinkers and scholars of the most diverse views. His works include The Mystical Element of Religion (1908), Eternal Life (1912), and The Reality of God (published posthumously, 1931).

Vonnegut, Kurt (1922– ), American novelist and short story writer who attended Cornell before serving in the air force in the Second World War. Captured by the Germans, he survived the bombing of Dresden in 1945, an experience that he would later use in his most famous novel, Slaughterhouse-Five; or The Children's Crusade (1969). His earlier works drew on science fiction and fantasy to satirize the increasing mechanization and dehumanization of the post-war world. His first novel, Player Piano (1952), envisages a New York factory town whose automated structure turns its workers and scientists into virtual robots. In The Sirens of Titan (1959) the human race is stumbled upon by aliens searching for a new spaceship; whilst Cat’s Cradle (1963) imagines how a scientific discovery threatens to destroy the planet. He has also written plays, of which Happy Birthday Wanda June (1970) is the best known, and collections of stories, chief among which is Welcome to the Monkey House (1968). Other novels include Breakfast of Champions (1973), Slapstick (1976), Jailbird (1979), and Deadeye Dick (1983).

VORAGINE, Jacobus de, see GOLDEN LEGEND.

Vorticism, an aggressive literary and artistic movement that flourished 1912–15; it attacked the sentimentality of 19th-cent. art and celebrated violence, energy, and the machine. The Vorticists, dominated by W. Lewis, included *Pound, *Gaudier-Brzeska, the painters C. R. Nevinson and Edward Wadsworth; they were associated with T. E. *Hulme, F. M. *Ford, and the sculptor Jacob Epstein (*Rock Drill, 1913, Tate Gallery, London). In the visual arts this revolutionary fervour was expressed in abstract compositions of bold lines, sharp angles, and planes; the Vorticist style was indebted to Cubism and *Futurism, although Lewis mocked the Futurist obsession with speed (E. Wadsworth, Abstract Composition, 1915, Tate Gallery, London; Wyndham Lewis, Composition, 1913, Tate Gallery, London). Blast: The Review of the Great English Vortex, published in June 1914 and edited by Lewis, was an ambitious attempt to establish in England a magazine dedicated to the modern movement and to draw together artists and writers of the avant-garde. Its long lists of the blasted and blessed, its mixture of flippancy and rhetoric, and its provocative title and typography were designed to jolt the English out of their complacent insularity. Several artists adapted the Vorticist style to First World War subjects, but the real impetus petered out after the Vorticist Exhibition held at the Döré Gallery in 1915.

Vortigern, a legendary 5th-cent. king of Britain who is reputed to have enlisted Hengist and Horsa against his former allies the Picts, thus causing the transfer of Britain to the Anglo-Saxons. He marries Renwein, the daughter of Hengist. After a lifetime of feuds and alliances with the Germanic invaders, in the course of which he meets Merlin and is astonished by his prophecies, he is burnt alive in the tower in Wales to which he had retired. The story is told in Geoffrey of Monmouth’s History (vi. 6–viii. 2) and Lamson’s Brut, 14.255–396.

Vortigern and Rowena, see IRELAND, W. H.

VOSSIUS, Gerhard Jan (1577–1649), and Isaac (1618–89), his son, eminent Dutch scholars. The father, who was invited to England and made a canon of Canterbury, was professor of history at Amsterdam and author of Historia Pelagiana. The son came to England and was a canon of Windsor 1673–89. He published editions of *Catullus and *Juvenal and Observations on classical subjects.

Vox Clamantis, see GOWER, J.

VOYNICH, Ethel Lillian, née Boole (1864–1960), novelist, born in Cork, remembered for her revolutionary novel The Gadfly (1897), set in pre-1848 Italy, which sold in vast quantities in translation in the Soviet Union. She married a Polish revolutionary, and worked in London for the periodical Free Russia.

VOZNESSENSKY, Andrey (1933– ), Russian poet, born in Moscow and trained as an architect at the Moscow Institute of Architecture. His first successful volume, Mosaika (1960), was followed by others including Antimiri (trans. as Antiworlds 1963, by Max Hayward, R. *Wilbur, *Auden, and others) and On the Edge: Poems and Essays from Russia (trans. R. McKane, 1991). His poems are lyrics of contemporary life: he is a defender of *Modernism, with a strong visual sense and an interest in the visual arts, culminating in his development of the genre of the ‘video-poem’ in the 1990s.

Vulgar Errors, see PSEUDODOXIA EPIDEMICA.

Vulgate, the, from the Latin vulgatus, ‘made public or common’, a term applied more particularly to St *Jerome’s Latin version of the Bible completed in c.404. The Clementine text of this, a recension made by order of Clement VIII (1592–1605), is the authorized Latin text of the Roman Catholic Church. See BIBLE.

Vulgate Cycle, the, a very important group of Arthurian romances in French prose, dating from 1215–30. It comprises the three romances which make up the Prose Lancelot (Lancelot itself, the Queste del Saint Graal, and Mort Artu) and two others: the Estoire del Saint Graal, and a version of Robert de Borons partially surviving Merlin. The group is the most influential version of the Arthurian legends between *Geoffrey of Monmouth and *Malory. Ed. H. O. Sommer (7 vols, 1908–13); see chs. 22–3 by J. Frappier and H. Micha in Arthurian Literature in the Middle Ages (1959).

VYAZEMSKY, Prince Pyotr Andreevich (1792–1878), Russian poet and intimate friend of *Pushkin. His poetry is elegant, polished, and witty; as a critic he is one of the main theorists of Russian Romanticism. His use of the term in an article of 1817 is considered to be the first mention of it in Russia. He was a great admirer of *Byron and Sir W. *Scott, and did much to advance their reputation in Russia. In 1838 Vyazemsky visited England, taking a cure of sea-bathing at Brighton, spending time in the circle of Lady *Morgan, and meeting Horace *Smith. He visited the Royal Pavilion, discussed the woman question with Lady Morgan in the light of her book The Woman and Her Master, listened to the Chartist O’Connor, visited the duke of Norfolk’s estate at Arundel and the Isle of Wight, read the *Spectator, and discussed the Irish question (Vyazemsky's mother was an Irishwoman by the name of O'Reilly, and he made vague attempts to trace his ancestors). He then spent some time in London, visiting Westminster, Newgate Prison, and Drury Lane. His impressions of England are contained in the thirteenth of his 'Notebooks'. His conclusion is uncannily like that of *Zamyatin 80 years later: 'In English life there is nothing unexpected, imprévu, and therefore the general result must be boredom.'

WACE (c. 1100–after 1171) wrote in French verse of 15,000 short couplets the Roman de Brut (or Geste des Bretons), completed 1155 and dedicated to *Eleanor of Aquitaine, which is based on *Geoffrey of Monmouth’s Historia Regum Britanniae. This work was the principal source of *La3amon’s Brut. He also wrote a Roman de Rou (i.e. Rollo) (or Geste des Normands), a history of the dukes of Normandy in the course of which he provided some apparently autobiographical information. He was made a canon of Bayeux by Henry II. The Roman de Brut is circumstantial, commonsensical, and well written, adding substantially to Geoffrey’s version. It survives in 22 manuscripts, including the four manuscripts of *Gaimar in which Wace’s poem has been substituted for Gaimar’s account of the Historia. It retained considerable influence up to the 14th cent.

Ed. I. Arnold (2 vols, 1938–40); trans. in E. Mason, Arthurian Chronicles (1912).

Wackles, Mrs and the Misses Melissa, Sophy, and Jane, in Dickens’s *The Old Curiosity Shop, kept a ‘Ladies’ Seminary’ at Chelsea.

WADDELL, Helen Jane (1889–1965), medieval scholar and translator, born in Tokyo, and educated at Queen’s University, Belfast. She is best remembered for her popular study of the ‘vagantes’ of the Middle Ages, The Wandering Scholars (1927), for her anthology of imaginative but sometimes misleading translations from their works in her Medieval Latin Lyrics (1929), and for her novel Peter Abelard (1933), based on the life of *Abelard.

Wade, Miss, a character in Dickens’s *Little Dorrit, a suspicious, venomous woman who entices away Tattycoram from the Meagles family.

Wade’s boat in *Chaucer’s ‘The Merchant’s Tale’ (see Canterbury Tales, 10):

And eek thise olde wydwes, God it woot,
They konne so muchel craft on Wades boot,
So muchel broken harm, whan that hem leste

(iv. 1423–5)

According to *Skeat’s note, Wade was a famous hero of antiquity who is mentioned in various poems and in *Malory (Caxton vii. ix; interestingly, it appears to be Caxton’s addition, not being in Vinaver’s Sir Gareth from the Winchester manuscript: Works, 188). The ‘tale of Wade’ is also mentioned in *Troilus and Criseyde, III. 614. Speght in his 1598 edition of the Tales forbears from telling the story of Wade on the ground that it is too familiar. Wade (mentioned in the Old English *Widsith, 22) was the father of Wayland, who in Norse legend built a famous boat to escape his pursuers.

Wadman, Widow, or Mrs, in Sterne’s *Tristram Shandy.

Wagg, Mr, in Thackeray’s *Vanity Fair and *Pendennis, a parasitical journalist and diner-out, based on T. *Hook.

It tells how Benjamin the Waggoner, driving home his team of eight horses through the night among the Lakeland hills, escapes the temptation of the Swan Inn, but falls victim to that of the Cherry-Tree, and loses his place in consequence. But no one else can drive the team, and Lakeland loses both waggoner and wain.

Wagner, the attendant of Faust in Marlowe’s *Dr Faustus and in *Goethe’s Faust.

WAGNER, Richard (1813–83), German composer, dramatist, and writer, whose theories and works were the subject of vigorous controversy throughout the second half of the 19th cent. He set himself to create a new synthesis of music and drama for which he wrote both words and music. His ideas, like his personality, were on the grandest scale: Der *Ring des Nibelungen (based on the *Nibelungenlied), planned as a single drama, developed backwards (each episode requiring previous explanation for its proper understanding) until the finished work required four separate evenings and eventually the construction of a new type of theatre. His theoretical writings reached beyond the musical field: a revolutionary in 1848–9, he later came under the influence of *Schopenhauer, and his writings contain much that has social, political, and cultural implications. His first champion in this country was G. B. *Shaw; later Ernest Newman became ‘the perfect Wagnerite’. (See MUSIC, LITERATURE OF.) His complete prose works were translated into English by W. Ashton Ellis (8 vols, 1892–9). Among the English musical public early resistance gave way to passionate involvement: *Swinburne wrote poems on the preludes to Lohengrin and Tristan and an elegy, ‘The Death of Richard Wagner’ (all in A Century of Roundels, 1883) and D. H. *Lawrence’s The Trespasser (originally entitled The Saga of Siegmund) is deeply Wagnerian in its symbolism, as is much of Lawrence’s later work.

G. A. *Moore and C. *Morgan also make substantial reference to Wagner, as do three of the most influential works of the 20th cent., *The Waste Land, *Ulysses, and WAIN, John Barrington (1925–94), poet, critic, and novelist, born in Stoke-on-Trent and educated at Newcastle under Lyme and St John’s College, Oxford. He lectured at Reading, 1947–55, and was professor of poetry at Oxford 1973–8. His first novel, Hurry on down (1953), is an episodic and picaresque account of the career of Charles Lumley, who, on leaving university, rejects his lower-middle-class origins by working as window-cleaner, crook, hospital orderly, chauffeur, and bouncer. It has been linked with the novels of W. *Cooper, K. *Amis, and J. *Braine as a manifestation of the spirit of the *'Angry Young Men' of the 1950s. Other novels include The Contenders (1958), A Travelling Woman (1959), and Strike the Father Dead (1962), again a novel about a rebellious young man, who runs away from school and the expectations of his ‘red-brick’ professor father to become a jazz pianist. As a poet Wain was associated with the Movement and contributed to New Lines. He published several volumes of verse, collected in Poems 1949–79 (1981), a volume of autobiography, Sprightly Running (1962), and a biography of Dr Johnson (1974). Later fiction includes The Young Visitors (1965), The Pardoner’s Tale (1978), Young Shoulders (1982), Where the Rivers Meet (1988), Comedies (1990), and Hungry Generations (1994), his last novel which, with the two previous, make up his Oxford Trilogy.

WAINEWRIGHT, Thomas Griffiths (1794–1852), apprentice painter, soldier, then art journalist. He wrote as an art critic for the London Magazine, 1820–3 and became the friend of *Hazlitt, *Lamb, *De Quincey, and others. He exhibited at the *Royal Academy, 1821–5, began to live far beyond his means, and forged an order on the bank. In 1827 he published The Life of Egmont Bonnot Esq., largely consisting of sneers at writers. After insurance frauds, a poisoning, and prison in Paris, he was tried and transported to Tasmania, where he died. He is the original of Vanrey in Bulwer-Lytton’s Lucretia and the victim in *Dickens’s story ‘Hunted Down’.

One of the most influential plays of the post-war period, it portrays two tramps, Estragon and Vladimir, trapped in an endless waiting for the arrival of a mysterious personage named Godot, while disputing the appointed place and hour of his coming. They amuse themselves meanwhile with various bouts of repartee and word-play, and are for a while diverted by the arrival of whip-cracking Pozzo, driving the oppressed and burdened Lucky on the end of a rope. Towards the end of each of the two acts, a boy arrives, heralding Godot’s imminent appearance, but he does not come; each act ends with the interchange between the two tramps, ‘Well, shall we go?’ ‘Yes, let’s go’, and the stage direction, ‘They do not move.’ There are strong biblical references throughout, but Beckett’s powerful and symbolic portrayal of the human condition as one of ignorance, delusion, paralysis, and intermittent flashes of human sympathy, hope, and wit has been subjected to many varying interpretations. The theatrical vitality and versatility of the play have been demonstrated by performances throughout the world. (See also Absurd, Theatre of the.)

WALCOTT, Derek Alton (1930– ), poet and playwright, born in St Lucia, in the West Indies, and educated at the University College of the West Indies. He founded the Trinidad Theatre Workshop in 1959, and many of his own plays had their first performances there. These include Dream on Monkey Mountain (1967, pub. 1971), The Joker of Seville (1974, pub. 1978; based on Tirso da Molina’s El burlador de Sevilla), O Babylon! (1976, pub. 1978; set amongst a Rastafarian community in Kingston, Jamaica), and Viva Detroit (1992). His collections of poetry include In a Green Night: Poems 1948–60 (1962), The Castaway and Other Poems (1965), Sea Grapes (1976), The Fortunate Traveller (1982), Midsummer (1983), Collected Poems (1986), The Arkansas Testament (1987), and his epic Caribbean Odyssey Omeros (1989). Both plays and poetry show a preoccupation with the national identity of the West Indies and their literature, and with the conflict between the heritage of European and West Indian culture (‘the choice of home or exile, self-realization or spiritual betrayal of one’s country’, in his own words). Walcott’s plays mingle verse and prose, Creole vocabulary and the rhythms of calypso, and his poems, many of which are confessional and self-questioning, are rich in classical allusion and evoke with equal vividness both Caribbean and European landscapes. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1992. See also post-colonial literature.

Walden, or Life in the Woods, see Thoreau.

Waldenses, or Waldensians (in French, Vauquois), the adherents of a religious sect which originated in the... south of France about 1170 through the preaching of Peter Waldo, a rich merchant of Lyons. They rejected the authority of the pope and various rites, and were excommunicated in 1184 and subjected to persecution. But they survived and eventually became a separately organized church, which associated itself with the Protestant Reformation of the 16th cent. and still exists, chiefly in northern Italy and the adjacent regions. Their persecution by the duke of Savoy in 1655 led to *Milton’s sonnet, ‘Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints’, and caused *Cromwell to insist on his new ally, France, putting an instant stop to the massacre.

‘Walderhe’, the name given to two short fragments of an Old English poem in a manuscript of the late 10th cent., totalling 63 lines. It is thought that the poem they come from is an epic of considerable length, perhaps 1,000 lines. The manuscript is in the Royal Library at Copenhagen. We know from other sources that Waldhere was the son of a king of Aquitaine, who was given up to Attila the Hun and became one of his generals. He escapes with Hilgund, a Burgundian princess to whom he has been betrothed as a child. In the course of their flight they are attacked, and Waldhere, after slaying his assailants in a fist fight, is ambushed and wounded the next day. But they are able to continue the journey and are finally married. It is paralleled by the 10th-cent. Latin poem *Waltharius. Ed. F. Norman (1933; rev. 1949).

Waley, Arthur David (1889–1966), poet and authority on Chinese and Japanese literature, which he introduced to a wide public through his well-known translations. He taught himself the languages while working in the Print Room at the *British Museum, and in 1918 published A Hundred and Seventy Chinese Poems, which went into several editions, appealing (in his own words) ‘to people who do not ordinarily read poetry’, largely through their emphasis on the concrete and particular. His translations are unrhythmed, elegant, and lucid; his use of stressed and unstressed syllables had, he believed, something in common with G. M. Hopkins’s *sprung rhythm. His other translations in prose and verse include *The Tale of Genji (1925–33), The Pillow Book of Sei Shonagon (1928, from the diary of a 10th-cent. Japanese court lady), and *Monkey (1942, translation of a 16th-cent. Chinese novel). He also published many works on oriental art, history, and culture, but, despite frequent invitations, never visited the Far East. He spent most of his life in Bloomsbury, where he was on friendly terms with many of the *Bloomsbury Group and the *Vorticists. See Alison Waley, A Half of Two Lives: A Personal Memoir (1982).

Walker, Alice (1944– ), black American novelist, poet and short story writer, best known as the writer of The Color Purple (1982), which won the *Pulitzer Prize for fiction in 1983. This epistolary novel tells the harrowing story of Celie, a young black woman in the segregated Deep South, raped by the man she believes to be her father and then forced to marry an older man she despises. Told through letters from Celie to God, and to and from her missionary sister Nettie, this story, like much of Walker’s work, celebrates the strength of women engaged in struggles against the twin oppressions of sexism and racism.

She has published four collections of poetry, including Once: Poems (1968) and Revolutionary Petunias and Other Poems (1973). Her other work includes two volumes of short stories and a collection of essays, In Search of My Mother’s Garden: Womanist Prose (1983).

Most recently she has published two novels, Possessing the Secret of Joy (1992), a harsh examination of female circumcision, and By the Light of My Father’s Smile (1998); and a memoir, The Same River Twice (1996).

Walker, Thomas (1784–1836), of Trinity College, Cambridge; called to the bar 1812; magistrate of Lambeth Police Court 1829. He is noted as the author of a weekly periodical, the Original, of which 29 numbers appeared (20 May to 2 Dec. 1835). Each number contains short articles on a variety of subjects; its purpose was to raise ‘the national tone in whatever concerns us socially or individually’, and it is especially remembered for Walker’s admirable papers on health and gastronomy.

Wallace, Alfred Russel (1823–1913). He left school at 14, was apprenticed to a schoolmaster in Leicester, then accompanied the naturalist Henry Walter Bates on a trip to the Amazon in 1848, an expedition described in Wallace’s Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro (1853). A further voyage to the Malay archipelago is described in The Malay Archipelago (1869). In 1858, during an attack of fever at Ternate in the Moluccas, the idea of natural selection as the solution to the problem of evolution flashed upon him, and he at once communicated it to C. *Darwin. The outcome, a testimony to the generosity of both, was the famous joint communication to the *Linnean Society on the theory of evolution. He published numerous other works and scientific papers and in 1905 his autobiography, My Life.

Wallace, (Richard Horatio) Edgar (1875–1932), a very successful and prolific writer of thrillers, which include The Four Just Men (1905), The Crimson Circle (1922), and The Green Archer (1923). He also wrote successful plays, and died in Hollywood, where he had been working on the screenplay of King Kong, which was produced after his death.

Wallace, Sir William (?1272–1305), Scottish patriot of the time of Edward I, who devoted his life to resistance to the English and was finally captured by treachery and executed in London. He is the subject of a long poem by *Henry the Minstrel.
WALLENSTEIN, Albrecht Eusebius von (1583–1634), a general celebrated for his campaigns in the Thirty Years War. After many victories he was defeated by Gustavus Adolphus at Lützen in 1632. He was, however, prepared to abandon the imperial cause; but Ferdinand II, suspecting his intention, removed him from his command. Wallenstein was murdered by some of his officers when he was believed to be on the point of going over to the Swedes. His career is the subject of a great historical trilogy by *Schiller, of which the two last parts were translated by *Coleridge.

WALLER, Edmund (1606–87), educated at Eton and King’s College, Cambridge. He entered Parliament early and was at first an active member of the opposition. In 1631 he married a London heiress who died in 1634. Later he became a Royalist, and in 1643 was leader in a plot to seize London for Charles I. For this he was imprisoned, fined, and banished. He made his peace with *Cromwell in 1651, returned to England, and was restored to favour at the Restoration. After the death of his first wife he unsuccessfully courted Lady Dorothy Sidney, the ‘Sacharissa’ of his poems; he married Mary Bracey as his second wife in 1644. Waller was a precocious poet; he wrote, probably as early as 1625, a complimentary piece on *His Majesty’s Escape at St Andere (Prince Charles’s escape from shipwreck at Santander) in heroic couplets, one of the first examples of a form that prevailed in English poetry for some two centuries. His verse, much of it occupied with praise of Sacharissa, Lady Carlisle, and others, is of a polished simplicity; *Dryden repeatedly praised his ‘sweetness’, describing him as the ‘father of our English numbers’, and linking his name with *Denham’s as poets who brought in the *Augustan age. His early poems include ‘On a Girdle’ and ‘Go, lovely rose’; his later *Instructions to a Painter (1666, on the battle of Sole Bay) and ‘Of the Last Verses in the Book’, containing the famous lines, ‘The Soul’s dark cottage, battered and decayed, I lets in new light through chinks that time hath made.’ His Poems first appeared in 1645, Divine Poems in 1685, and Poems, ed. G. Thorn-Dryru (2 vols, 1893).

WALMSLEY, Leo, see REGIONAL NOVEL.

WALPOLE, Horace, fourth earl of Orford (1717–97), fourth son of Sir Robert *Walpole, educated at Eton, where he formed a happy ‘Quadruple Alliance’ with friends of like tastes, T. *Gray, R. *West, and Thomas Ashton; then at King’s College, Cambridge. In 1737 his mother, to whom he was deeply attached, died, and six months later his father married his long-term mistress Maria Skerrett. In 1739–41 Walpole travelled in France and Italy with Gray, and met in Florence H. *Mann, who became one of his most valued correspondents. At Reggio he and Gray quarrelled and parted company, for reasons which have given rise to much inconclusive discussion, and were probably connected with Walpole’s more sociable and less studious notions of entertainment. Walpole was MP successively for Callington, Castle Rising, and Lynn, 1741–67. From 1741 he spent some time at his father’s new home at Houghton, where the dullness of country life was alleviated by the excellent collection of paintings, which he catalogued and described in Aedes Walpolianae (1747). His father died in 1745, and in 1747 Walpole, supported by various sinecures, settled in Twickenham in the house he made known as *Strawberry Hill: he made it into ‘a little Gothic castle’, aided by his fellow enthusiasts *Chute and R. *Bentley (the younger), and in it collected articles of virtu. In 1748 he had three poems published in *Dodsley’s Collection, and in 1757 he established his own printing press at Strawberry Hill. His first publication was Gray’s Pindaric odes; he and Gray had been lastingly reconciled in 1745. In 1758 he printed his own *Catalogue of the Royal and Noble Authors of England, a light-hearted work which later attracted much censure when it reached a wider public through a London bookseller. In the same year he printed several minor poems, essays, etc., as *Fugitive Pieces in Verse and Prose, and in 1762 his *Anecdotes of Painting in England. His Gothic novel *The Castle of Otranto (1764) appeared at first pseudonymously, purporting to be a translation from an Italian work of 1529. In 1765 he paid the first of several visits to Paris, where he received a warm welcome, and met Mme du *Deffand, with whom he formed a lasting friendship; he was less enchanted (though not himself religious) with the prevailing atmosphere of rationalism and freethinking. In 1768 he published *Historic Doubts on the Life and Reign of King Richard the Third, in which he attempted to acquit Richard of the crimes imputed to him by history, and in the same year appeared his tragedy *The Mysterious Mother. In 1787/8 he met the sisters Agnes and Mary Berry, who became intimate friends of his last years; in 1791 they settled at Little Strawberry Hill, where Mrs *Clive had been his neighbour until her death six years earlier. In the same year he succeeded his nephew to the earldom, and inherited an estate loaded with debt. Although he had been plagued by severe gout for many years, and was increasingly dependent on Mary Berry’s company for his good spirits, he seems to have remained cheerful and mentally active until the end of his life. Walpole left his Memoirs ready for publication in a sealed chest, which was opened in 1818. *Memoires of the Last Ten Years of the Reign of George II was edited by Lord Holland (2 vols 1822), and *Memoirs of the Reign of King George the Third by D. Le Marchant (4 vols, 1845). His literary reputation rests largely on his letters, which are remarkable for their charm, their wit, and their autobiographical, political, and social interest. His model was Mme de *Sévigné, whose letters he greatly admired, and he clearly wrote for posterity as well as for his correspondents, who included Mann, his cousin Henry Seymour Conway, the countess of Upper Ossory, George Montagu, Mary Berry, and others to whom he could express his many varied interests. His letters to Mme de Deffand were destroyed at his own wish, possibly because he was ashamed of his imperfect French; hers to him were edited by Mrs Paget Toynbee in 1712. Some of his correspondence appeared with his works in 1798, edited by Mary Berry in her father's name: Mrs P. Toynbee's edition (16 vols, 1903–5, plus various later volumes) has been followed by the monumental Yale edition, ed. W. S. Lewis et al. (42 vols, 1937–81, with one vol. additions and corrections and 5 vols index to follow). These later editions, with 20th-cent. biographies (e.g. R. W. Ketton-Cremer, Horace Walpole, 1946), have done much to dispel the 19th-cent. image of Walpole, inspired by *Macaulay's famous attack in the *Edinburgh Review, 1833, as a malicious and affected gossip, though even Macaulay had allowed that he possessed 'irresistible charm'. His name has now also been cleared of the accusation that he hastened *Chatterton's suicide by his neglect: initially deceived by a fake manuscript sent to him by Chatterton in 1769, he later suspected a hoax and withdrew his active support, for which Chatterton bitterly reviled him, although Walpole was in no way to blame for the incident and indeed throughout treated Chatterton with consideration, and spoke of him after his death with much respect.

WALPOLE, Sir Hugh Seymour (1884–1941), novelist. He was born in New Zealand, the son of a bishop, and came to England aged 5. He was educated at King's School, Canterbury, and Emmanuel College, Cambridge; his short experience of teaching is reflected in his third novel, Mr Perrin and Mr Traill (1911), which set a vogue for novels and plays about schoolmasters. The Dark Forest (1916) is based on his wartime service with the Russian Red Cross. Other works include Jeremy (1919), the first of three stories about a young boy, and the Chesters Chronicle, a historical sequence set in Cumberland (where Walpole lived from 1924), consisting of Rogue Chesters (1930), Judith Paris (1931), The Fortress (1932), and Vanessa (1933). Although proud of his popularity, he worried that his work was 'old-fashioned' and expressed envy of the *Modernism of his friend and correspondent V. *Woolf; he was deeply offended by *Maugham's portrait of him as 'Drivel They Paid to Hear' ran one headline) but the...
Walwyn, William (fl. 1649), pamphleteer and a leader of the Leveller movement. He came from an upper-middle-class background in Worcestershire and prospered as a cloth merchant. He was imprisoned in 1649 with *Lilburne, *Overton, and T. Prince as one of the authors of England’s New Chains Discovered, and was accused of communism and atheism. He was released later that year, after the publication of Walwyn’s Just Defence. A well-read man, he advocated in his many tracts liberty of conscience and voluntary community of property, quoting *Montaigne in support of his own humane rationalism.

Wanderer, The, an Old English poem of 115 lines in the Exeter Book, one of the group known as ‘elegies’, telling of the hardships of a man who has lost his lord. It is a plangent lament for the transience of life, culminating towards its end in a powerful *ubi sunt passage. It begins and ends with a brief and bald statement of Christian consolation, but that is not the prevailing sentiment of the poem. It is paralleled in spirit and structure by the *Seafarer, particularly in the latter’s first half, and similar arguments have been advanced for and against the coherence of organization in both poems. The poem was admired by *Auden, among other modern poets, and he translated it loosely. Ed. R. F. Leslie (1966), A. J. Bliss and T. P. Dunning (1969).

Wanderer, The, a poem in five cantos by R. *Savage (1729); some of it has been attributed to his friend A. *Hill. Its design is obscure; its message, conveyed to the Wanderer by a Hermit, appears to be that ‘affliction purifies the mind’, but its most noteworthy passages are descriptive, and it contains some fresh observations of nature and landscape. Dr *Johnson observed that it was ‘a heap of shining materials thrown together by accident, which strikes... with the solemn magnificence of a stupendous ruin’.

Wanderer, The, or Female Difficulties, the last novel of F. *Burney, published in 1814. Less successful than her earlier works, it was criticized for improbabilities of plot (*Hazlitt in the *Edinburgh Review, Feb. 1815, commented that the female difficulties were ‘created out of nothing’) and for its convoluted style—according to *Macaulay ‘a sort of broken Johnsonese, a barbarous patois’. It describes the adventures of its mysterious and, for much of the novel, nameless heroine, Juliet, escaped from revolutionary France and hard pressed by poverty, unwanted male attention, and the social conventions which prevent her from earning her own living. Her friend and foil, the passionate Elinor Joddrel, who is in love with Juliet’s admirer Harleigh, provides an interesting portrait of the emancipated woman of the period, possibly based in part on Mme de *Staël, whom Burney had met in 1793 at Juniper Hall in Surrey, as one of a circle of French émigrés which included her own future husband. The novel, though full of implausibilities, has some lively passages and acute observations of social and rural life.

Wandering Jew, the, a Jew condemned to wander about the world until Christ’s second coming because, according to the legend, as Christ bore the cross to Calvary the Jew chid him, and urged him to go faster.

A pamphlet was published in Leiden in 1602, relating that Paulus von Eizen, bishop of Schleswig, had in 1542 met a man named Ahasuerus, who declared that he was the Jew in question. The story, which had previously flourished in Spain and Italy, became popular, and many instances of the Wandering Jew are recorded from the 16th to the 19th cents.

But a somewhat similar story is told much earlier by *Roger of Wendover, in his Flores Historiarum. An Armenian archbishop visited England in 1228, and, while being entertained at St Albans, was asked if he had ever seen or heard of Joseph, who was present at the Crucifixion, and was said to be still alive, as a testimony to the Christian faith. The prelate replied that the man had recently dined at his own table. He had been Pontius Pilate’s porter, by name Cartaphilus, who, when they were dragging Jesus from the Judgment Hall, had struck him on the back, saying, ‘Go faster, Jesus, why dost thou linger’, to which Jesus replied, ‘I indeed am going, but thou shalt tarry till I come.’ This man had been converted soon after and named Joseph. He lived for ever, and was now a very grave and holy person.

The legend of the Wandering Jew has been the subject of many German works; *Goethe contemplated (but did not write) a poem on the subject of a meeting of Ahasuerus and *Spinoza, and C. F. D. Schubart (1739–91) wrote a romantic version identifying the Jew with the turmoil of wild nature. There are elements of the story in Lewis’s *The Monk and Maturin’s *Melmoth the Wanderer, a ballad on the subject is in Percy’s Reliques, and *Croly wrote a version called Salathiel: A Story of the Past, the Present and the Future (1828), in

Wandering Willie, (1) Willie Steenson, the blind fiddler in Scott’s *Redgauntlet. ‘Wandering Willie’s Tale’ is an episode in the novel, an example of the author’s successful use of the supernatural. (2) The name of a song by *Burns.

WANLEY, Humfrey (1672–1726). He began life as a draper’s assistant at Coventry, but read widely and went to Oxford in 1695, and became an assistant in the Bodleian Library in 1696. He displayed remarkable skill in palaeography and assisted Edward Bernard in the preparation of the Catalogi Librorum Manuscriptorum Angliae et Hiberniae (1697). He produced in 1705 a catalogue of Anglo-Saxon manuscripts, which is still a standard work. He was librarian to the first and second earls of Oxford, and began the catalogue of the Harleian manuscripts, a work on which he was engaged when he died.

WANLEY, Nathaniel (1634–80), divine and compiler, and father of Humfrey *Wanley. He published The Wonders of the Little World (1678), a collection of tales and superstitions in which R. *Browning found the author’s successful use of the supernatural. (2) The name of a song by *Burns.

Ward, Artemus, see Browne, C. F.

Ward, Edward (’Ned’) (1667–1731), tavern keeper and writer (under various pseudonyms) of Hudibrastic. He was an indefatigable collector and owned many rare manuscripts. Most of the rare Elizabethan and Jacobean plays in his possession were through his own ‘carelessness and the ignorance’ of Betsy Baker, his servant, ‘unluckily burned or put under pye bottoms’. A list in his handwriting of the 55 destroyed and those saved, three and a fragment, has been preserved. Some of the burnt manuscripts were unique.

Warburton, Eliot (Bartholomew Eliott George) (1810–52), an Irish barrister who gave up his profession for travel and the literary life. He is remembered for his account of an eastern tour, The Crescent and the Cross; or Romance and Realities of Eastern Travel (1845), a highly successful work which covered much the same ground as his friend Kinglake’s Eothen. He also wrote two historical novels, Reginald Hastings (1850) and Darien (1852). He died at sea, when the ship on which he had embarked for the West Indies caught fire off Land’s End.

Warburton, William (1698–1779). He rose to be bishop of Gloucester in 1759. He was much engaged in theological controversy, writing with vigour and arrogance. His most famous work was The Divine Legation of Moses (1738–41), a paradoxical argument that the very absence in the Mosaic law of any reference to a future life, a necessary element in a scheme of morality, is a proof of the divine mission of the lawgiver. A View of Lord Bolingbroke’s Philosophy (1754) attacked Bolingbroke’s views on natural religion and The Doctrine of Grace (1762) the ‘enthusiasm’ of *Wesley. He brought out in 1747 an edition of Shakespeare in eight volumes which was sharply criticized as unscholarly, and in 1751 an edition of *Pope’s works. He was Pope’s literary executor, and is said to have encouraged him in the composition of The New Dunciad. A quarrelsome man who made many enemies, he was nevertheless admired by Dr *Johnson, who remained grateful for his early praise of his essay on Macbeth (1747): ‘He praised me at a time when praise was of value to me.’
The London-Spy (1698–1709), a simply told tale of a country resident who visits London, meets a cockney acquaintance, and with him ranges about the town noting sights, sounds, smells, and odd characters. His Hudibras Redivivus, a burlesque poem, was published in 1705–7.

WARD, John (1571–1638), English composer, remembered chiefly as a composer of *madrigals, including 'Come, sable night' and 'If the deep sighs'.

WARD, Mary Augusta, better known as Mrs Humphry Ward (1851–1920), granddaughter of T. *Arnold of Rugby, and daughter of Thomas Arnold, inspector of schools, whose conversion to Roman Catholicism, return to the Anglican faith, and subsequent reconversion to Catholicism caused his family much distress. In 1872 she married Thomas Humphry Ward, then an Oxford don and later on the staff of *The Times in London. Her most famous novel, Robert Emsmere (1888), is in part a vivid evocation of the Oxford of *Pater, *Pattison, and T. H. *Green, and of the many varieties of religious faith and doubt which succeeded the ferment of the *Oxford movement. Its protagonist, an earnest but questioning clergyman, resigns his orders for a life of social service in the East End, to the distress of his devout wife Catherine. The novel sold extremely well, was reviewed by *Gladstone, and initiated much debate; the author herself compared it to *Froude's The Nemesis of Faith and *Newman's Loss and Gain, novels which also dealt with the crisis of mid-Victorian faith. Most of her other novels deal with social and religious themes, frequently contrasting traditional belief with the values of progress and intellectual freedom; they include The History of David Grieve (1892), Marcella (1894), Helbeck of Bannisdale (1898), Lady Rose's Daughter (1903), and The Marriage of William Ashe (1905). She inherited the Arnold sense of high moral purpose, was an active philanthropist and a leading figure in the intellectual life of her day; she supported the movement for higher education for women, but opposed women's suffrage, on the grounds that women's influence was stronger in the home than in public life. Her A Writer's Recollections (1918) draws a striking picture of Oxford life and of the domestic influence of W. *Morris, *Burne-Jones, and Liberty prints; it also contains portraits of *Jowett, *Pater, *James, and other friends. There is a life by John Sutherland (1990).

WARD, Plumer (formerly Robert) (1765–1846), a lawyer and MP who held minor government posts and wrote much on legal and political matters. When he was 60 he became, somewhat eccentrically, an exponent of the *fashionable novel with the publication of his first novel, Tremaine, or A Man of Refinement (1825). He hoped that his works of fiction (which he did not care to call 'novels') would display 'Philosophy teaching by examples', and demonstrate how the standards of public and private morality could be upheld amid the luxury and dissipation of the times. In 1827 appeared De Vere, or The Man of Independence and in 1841 De Clifford, or The Constant Man. All are lengthy, ponderous works, in which (to use the author's own words of Tremaine) 'variety and incident are equally wanting'.

WARD, William George (1812–82), theologian, fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, and a follower of *Newman. In 1844 he published The Ideal of a Christian Church in praise of the Roman Catholic Church from which he gained the title 'Ideal' Ward. He was subsequently deprived of his degrees for heresy, and in 1845 joined the Roman Catholic Church. In later life he became increasingly controversial in his writings and joined the Ultramontane party, which upheld anti-liberal views and papal infallibility.

Warden, The, a novel by A. *Trollope, published in 1855, and the first in the *'Barsetshire' series. The income of Hiram's Hospital, a charitable institution, has grown in real terms down the centuries, but the 12 old bedesmen have not benefited. The surplus has created a pleasant sinecure for the mild-mannered old warden, the Revd Septimus Harding, a fact which Wardour Street English, a term used to describe the pseudo-archaic diction frequently affected by historical novelists (otherwise referred to in R. Wardle, Mr, a character in Dickens's *Pickwick Papers.

WARLOCK, Peter, pseudonym of Philip Heseltine (1894–1930), English composer, almost entirely of songs. Under his own name he made a distinguished contribution to musical scholarship, particularly in the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods: some of his songs, like the lovely setting of 'Sleep' (1922, poem by *Fletcher), reflect this interest but in many others the influence of his friend *Delius produced a richer harmonic idiom, while in others again the extrovert, even bawdy, side of Warlock's character finds expression. His choice of texts was varied; many of them come from the earlier periods of English literature, though some of the best of his later songs are settings of Arthur *Symons, *Bello, and Bruce Blunt. The intense and WARNER, Alan (1964— ), Scottish novelist and short story writer, born in Oban, Argyll. His acclaimed first novel, Morvern Callar (1995), is written in the voice of a semi-literate young woman living in the West Highlands of Scotland in the early 1990s. When her mysterious older boyfriend dies, he leaves her money and an unpublished manuscript: she seizes both with gusto and runs away to live a life of hedonism in Spain. The novel’s style combines spoken Scots with sophisticated poetic ideas in an intensely metaphorical way, Warner’s second novel, These Demented Lands (1997), returned to the Morvern story in what was widely seen as a more experimental but less successful sequel, evoking a *New Age nightmare of shipwreck on an offshore island, with echoes of W. *Golding and Conrad. His third, The Sopranos (1998), a more traditionally structured story about a group of drunken Highland schoolgirls on a day trip to Edinburgh, was viewed with scepticism. Warner has sometimes been seen as a leader of the so-called ‘Chemical Generation’, along with Irvine Welsh. The term refers loosely to a group of younger writers, predominantly Scottish, whose work displays a comfortable familiarity with 1990s youth culture: music, fashion, nightclubs, and drugs.

WARNER, Marina Sarah (1946— ), novelist, critic, and cultural historian, born in London of an Italian mother and English father, and educated at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. Her novels, which cover a wide cultural and geographical range, both in Europe and beyond, are In a Dark Wood (1977); The Skating Party (1983), which recounts a single day’s events as a group of friends skate down a frozen river; The Lost Father (1988); and Indigo: or, Mapping the Waters (1992), an exploration of colonialism and displacement, set on an imaginary Caribbean island and inspired in part by Shakespeare’s The Tempest. She has also published a volume of short stories, The Mermaids in the Basement (1993), which rework traditional folk tales and legends, and several books for children. Her scholarly works include Alone of All Her Sex (1976), a study of the myth and cult of the Virgin Mary; Joan of Arc: The Image of Female Heroism (1981); Monuments and Maidens (1985), which traces the often paradoxical uses of the female form in iconography and public art; and From the Beast to the Blonde (1994), a study of fairy tales. In 1994 she became the first woman to deliver the BBC’s Reith Lectures, which were published in the same year as Making Monsters: Six Myths of Our Time: these offered a feminist analysis of various aspects of popular culture, and explored the adaptation of myth and folklore to modern usage. No Go the Bogeyman (1998) is a study of ghouls and ogres.

WARNER, Rex (1905–86), poet, novelist, and translator, educated at Wadham College, Oxford, where he was a close friend of Auden and Day-Lewis. His first volume of poetry, Poems (1937), shares their Messianic revolutionary fervour, and the fourth of Auden’s six ‘Odes’ in The Orators (1932) is a buoyant address to Warner’s infant son John. Warner’s early novels, which include The Wild Goose Chase (1937), The Professor (1938), and The Aerodrome (1941; ironically subtitled ‘A Love Story’), are more sombre, Kafkaesque political parables, which reflect the gathering gloom of the 1930s, and in which the matter-of-fact and the uncanny mingle with disturbing effect. His later fiction is based largely on Greek or Roman historical subjects, and he also translated the Medea (1944), Hippolytus (1950), and Helen (1951) of Euripides, and the Prometheus Bound (1947) of Aeschylus.

WARNER, Sylvia Townsend (1893–1978), novelist and poet, born in Harrow, the daughter of a housemaster at Harrow School. She worked as one of the editors of Tudor Church Music (10 vols, 1922–9) and her love of early music is reflected in her later fiction. Her first volume of verse, The Espalier (1925), was followed by several others, including Whether a Dove or a Seagull (1933), written in collaboration with her friend and companion Valentine Ackland, and the posthumous Twelve Poems (1980); her Collected Poems appeared in 1982. Her poetry shows her admiration for Hardy, Crabbe, and E. Thomas. Her original voice is heard more strongly in her novels, which include Lolly Willows (1926), a tale of the supernatural in which a maiden aunt realizes her vocation as a witch; Mr Fortune’s Maggot (1927), which describes the visit of ex-clerk missionary Timothy Fortune to the remote South Sea island of Fanua, where he makes only one doubtful convert and in the process loses his own faith through his love of the islanders; and The True Heart (1929), set in the Essex marshes, which retells the story of Cupid and Psyche through the medium of a Victorian orphan, Sukey Bond. Her later works include a biography of T. H. White (1967), and various collections of short stories, many previously first published in the New Yorker. Her Letters (1982, ed. W. Maxwell) describe her brief friendships, notably with T. F. Powys, and her love for Valentine Ackland, with whom she lived for many years. Her diaries, ed. C. Harman, were published in 1994.

WARNER, William (c.1558–1609), an attorney in London. He published Pan His Syrinx, seven prose tales (1584), and a translation of the Menacechi of Plautus (1595) may be his. His chief work was Albions England, a metrical British history, with mythical and fictitious episodes, extending in the first edition (1586) from Noah to the Norman Conquest. It was brought up to *Elizabeth’s reign in 1592; and a continuation, reaching James I, was published in 1606. Meres, in his Palladis Tamia (1598), claimed to have heard Warner called ‘our English Homer,’ and Drayton praised him with a desolation of spirit perhaps not unconnected with his eventual suicide.
in his elegy To Henery Reynolds; the assessment of C. S. *Lewis, in more modern times, was that ‘The good things in Albion’s England are as far divided as the suns in space.’

War of the Worlds, The, a science fiction fantasy by H. G. *Wells, published 1898, and written while he was living in Woking; it describes the arrival of the Martians in Woking, driven from their own planet by its progressive cooling to take refuge in a warmer world. In a letter Wells described his plan for the work, in which: ‘I completely wreck and sack Woking—killing my neighbours in painful and eccentric ways—then proceed via Kingston and Richmond to London, selecting South Kensington for feats of peculiar atrocity; much of the novel’s power depends on the contrast between the familiar stupid bourgeois complacent reactions of the humans and the terrifying destructive intelligence of the Martians, which consist of round bodies, each about 4 feet in diameter, each body containing a huge brain. They live by the injection into themselves of the fresh living blood of other creatures, mostly of human beings, and they devastate the country before eventually falling victims to terrestrial bacteria. A radio broadcast by Orson *Welles of a dramatization of the novel in the USA on 30 Oct. 1938 caused a furore, many of its millions of listeners taking it for a factual report of the invasion by Martians of New Jersey.

WARREN, John Byrne Leicester, Baron de Tabley (1835–95), educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He published some volumes of verse under the pseudonyms ‘George F. Preston’ (1859–62) and ‘William Lancaster’ (1863–8), and two tragedies, also under pseudonyms, Philoctetes (1866) and Orestes (1867). In 1893–5 he published under his own name two series of Poems, Dramatic and Lyrical; also A Guide to the Study of Book Plates (1880). He was a botanist, and his best poems manifest his close observation of nature.

WARREN, Samuel (1807–77). After studying medicine at Edinburgh, he became successively barrister, re-friend of Dr *Johnson, contributed three numbers to the *Idler (Nos. 33, 93, 96), and was elected to the *Club in 1782. He is, however, best remembered for his valuable work The History of English Poetry (3 vols, 1774–81), the first literary history of any real scope, which combines a respect for classicism with a warm admiration for *Chaucer, the Scottish *Chaucerians, *Dante, *Spenser, and other early poets. It lacks method, but throws much light on the taste of the time and the interest in *primitivism, and has been seen as an important stage in the transition towards *Romanticism.

WASHINGTON, Booker T(aliaferro) (1856–1915), son of a black slave and a white man. He was born into slavery on a Virginia plantation. Freed, he taught himself to read, studied at the Hampton Institute in Virginia, and became the founder and head of the Tuskegee Institute, Alabama, a school for blacks. He was an eloquent speaker and a voluminous writer, and became a spokesman for his people. His works include an autobiography, Up from Slavery (1901), and Working with the Hands (1904).

Washington Square, a novel by H. *James, published 1881.

Catherine Sloper lives in Washington Square with her widowed father, a rich physician. She is plain, shy, without social graces or conversation. Dr Sloper cannot conceal his disappointment that she has nothing of her dead mother’s beauty and wit. When the handsome, but penniless and indolent, Morris Townsend begins to court her, he casts him, correctly, as a fortune-hunter. Both Catherine’s romantic hopes and Morris’s pecuniary ones are encouraged and abetted by the girl’s silly aunt, Lavinia Penniman. Dr Sloper will disinherit Catherine if she marries Morris, and although she has a certain fortune in her own right it is not enough for the greedy Morris and he jilts her. Even the dull Catherine is not deceived by his assertion that he is renouncing her to preserve her inheritance. Life in Washington Square continues soberly. Catherine, despised by her father, pitied by her aunt, refuses later chances of a suitable match and withdraws into a lonely humdrum life. After her father’s death (cautiously, he has largely disinherited her in any case) Morris reappears to try his luck again. His continued lack of success has made him less ambitious. But Catherine finds no charm in this balding middle-aged stranger. With some bitter reminders of his past cruelty, she turns him away.

It consists of five sections, ‘The Burial of the Dead’, ‘A Game of Chess’, ‘The Fire Sermon’, ‘Death by Water’, and ‘What the Thunder Said’, together with Eliot’s own ‘Notes’ which explain his many varied and multicultural allusions, quotations, and half-quotations (from *Webster, *Dante, *Verlaine, *Kyd, etc.), and express a general indebtedness to the Grail legend (see in this connection Grail, and Baly). and to the vegetation ceremonies in Frazer’s The Golden Bough. (Eliot himself was later to describe these ‘Notes’ as ‘a remarkable exposition of bogus scholarship’, written to pad out the text of the poem when it first appeared as a little book; he admits that they were a temptation to critics, and had achieved ‘almost greater popularity than the poem itself’: ‘The Frontiers of Criticism’, 1956.) The poem was rapidly acclaimed as a statement of the post-war sense of depression and futility; it was seriously praised by I. A. Richards as ‘a perfect emotive description of a state of mind which is probably inevitable for a while to all meditative people’ (Science and Poetry, 1926), and less seriously but significantly chanted as a kind of protest against the older generation by the undergraduates of the day. Complex, erudite, cryptic, satiric, spiritually earnest, and occasionally lyrical, it became one of the most recognizable landmarks of Modernism, an original voice speaking through many echoes and parodies of echoes. The Waste Land: A Facsimile and Transcript of the Original Drafts (1971), edited by Valerie Eliot, sheds much light on the circumstances of the poem’s composition, and particularly on the well-heeded and detailed textual advice offered by *Pound (through which the poem’s length was very considerably reduced); it also quotes a remark by Eliot himself, that the poem could be seen not so much as ‘an important bit of social criticism’, but as ‘the relief of a personal and wholly insignificant grouch against life; it is just a piece of rhythymical grumbling.‘

Watchman (1796), a political and literary journal, of ten issues only, produced by *Coleridge. The journal was pacifist and anti-*Pitt, and included literary contributions from, among others, *Beddoes and *Poole.

* Kingsley wrote this, his best-loved work, for his youngest son Grenville. Despite considerable didactic and satiric content, Kingsley’s imagination works with unusual ease and freedom, and the tale displays at its most attractive his knowledgeable love of the underwater world of river and sea, his sense of landscape, his open-minded interest in evolutionary theory, and his philanthropic concern. The story tells of the adventures of Tom, the chimney-sweep, employed by the bully Mr Grimes. Tom stumbles down a chimney into the bedroom of a little girl, Ellie, and for the first time he becomes aware of his own grimy body; he runs away, hounded by the household, falls into a river, and is transformed into a water-baby. In his underwater life he makes the acquaintance of many vividly realized creatures, from caddis flies to salmon, and also of Mrs Doasyouwouldbedoneby and Mrs Bedonebyasouyoud, who play a large part in the moral re-education which finally unites him with Ellie. The story was a favourite with Queen *Victoria, who read it to her children, and it remains popular with children today, though it also provides rich opportunities for psychoanalytic interpretation, much of it based on King's obsession with water, washing, and the public-school cold bath.

Waterstone’s, a chain of bookshops founded by Tim Waterstone, who, while working for W. H. *Smith, perceived the need for a store with late-hour trading and well-informed staff. He raised the money for his first shop, which opened on 1 Sept. 1982, at 99 Old Brompton Road, London. It prospered, and other branches were opened in London and the regions. The firm was sold to W. H. Smith in 1993, but bought back in 1998, at which point it became the biggest bookseller in Britain, with a successful promotional programme of poetry and prose readings.

WATKINS, Vernon Phillips (1906–67), poet, born in Wales of Welsh-speaking parents, and educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge. He lived most of his life in and near Swansea, working as a bank clerk before taking various teaching posts, and was for many years a friend of Dylan *Thomas. Their relationship is recorded in Dylan Thomas: Letters to Vernon Watkins (1957). Although in his early years he was associated with the poets of the New Apocalypse, his poetry was, as Larkin was to record, 'much more controlled than theirs and reached further back to the symbolist poets of Europe' ('An Encounter and a Re-encounter', a memorial essay in Vernon Watkins, 1970, by Leslie Norris). His first volume demonstrated his range; the title poem of Ballad of the Mari Lwyd (1941) is a long, rhetorical piece rooted in Welsh folklore and mythology, whereas 'The Collier' and other poems in the collection are marked by simplicity and a restrained compassion. Watkins's lyric gift was developed in many subsequent volumes, including The Lamp and the Veil (1945), Cypress and Acacia (1959), and Fidelities (1968), and his Selected Poems 1930–60 appeared in 1967. His work shows an awareness of, and was influenced by, German and French poetry, and he translated two cycles of poems of Heine (The North Sea, 1955), and paid tributes in his own verse to Hölderlin, Rilke, Baudelaire, and others, some of whose work he also translated.

Watson, Dr (John), companion of Sherlock *Holmes, a character created by A. C. *Doyle.

WATSON, John, see KAILYARD SCHOOL.

WATSON, Richard (1737–1816), from 1782 bishop of Llandaff. He wrote a notable Apology for Christianity (1776), in reply to Gibbon (who responded with respect), and an Apology for the Bible (1796), in reply to *Paine. *Wordsworth's long Letter to the Bishop of Llandaff, in which he supports the French republicans and attacks *Burke and the British constitution, was written in 1793 but not published until 1876; it was a reply to Watson's sermon on The Wisdom and Goodness of God in having made both Rich and Poor.

WATSON, Thomas (c.1556–92). He was possibly educated at Oxford, and was a law student in London. He published a Latin version of the Antigone of *Sophocles, with an appendix of Latin allegorical poems and experiments in classical metres (1581). His most important work was The Ekaromptiha or Passionate Centurie of Love (1582), 18-line poems, called sonnets, often based on classical, French, and Italian sources, and accompanied by learned explanatory notes. He published Latin versions of Tasso's Aminta (1585), which was translated without authority by Abraham *Fraunce (1587), and Helenae Raptus from the Greek of Coluthus (1586). He also published The First Sett of Italian Madrigalls Englisht (1590), which were set to music by W. *Byrd and an Eghlogue, in Latin and English versions, on the death of Sir Francis Walsingham (1590). His Latin pastoral Amintae Gaudia appeared posthumously (1592), and a few previously unpublished poems by him were included in The Phoenix Nest and *Englands Helicon. He was a close friend of *Marlowe, and was mentioned as 'Amyntas' in Spen­ser's *Colin Clouts Come Home Again. His 'sonnets', among the earliest in English, were an influence on Shakespeare and others.

WATSON, Sir William (1858–1935), poet, born in Yorkshire. He gained a certain reputation with Wordsworth's Grave and Other Poems (1890) and Lachrymæ Musarum (1892, verses on the death of Tennyson), but his many subsequent volumes of verse are now forgotten, and his memory lingers largely in his anthology piece 'April, April, I Laugh thy girlish laughter'.

Watsons, The, an unfinished novel by J. *Austen, written some time between 1804 and 1807. This story is regarded by some, with little justification, as an early version of *Emma. Although it is only a fragment, probably never revised, the characters are fully realized. The story is set at a social level below that of the other novels, and largely concerns the unremitting efforts of Emma's three sisters to get themselves married. Emma Watson, who has been brought up by a well-to-do aunt, returns to her family, who live unfashionably in genteel poverty in a Surrey village. A pretty, sensible girl, Emma is here surrounded by people in every way inferior to herself. Even her good-natured sister Elizabeth is as intent on a good lop as her unpleasant sisters Margaret and Pene-lope. The other principal characters are Lady Osborne, handsome and dignified; her son, Lord Osborne, a fine but cold young man; Mr Howard, a gentlemanly clergyman; and Tom Musgrave, a cruel and hardened flirt. The intention appears to have been that the heroine should marry Mr Howard, but the author left no hint as to the future course of events, or why she abandoned the novel.

WATT, Robert (1774–1819), Scottish bibliographer, who began life as a farm and road labourer, and in his boyhood met Burns—"an extraordinary character". He learned Greek and Latin, and proceeded to Glasgow and then Edinburgh University, where he studied classics, anatomy, and divinity. He became a very successful doctor, but the work for which he is remembered, and on which he spent over 30 years, is his remarkable Bibliotheca Britannica, or A General Index to British and Foreign Literature, published in 1824.

WATTEAU, Jean-Antoine (1684–1721), French rococo painter who invented the "fête-galante"—small pictures where elegant men and women, among them players from the commedia dell'arte, play music, and make love in a soft and dreamy parkland; the most famous of them is The Embarkation for [or from] Cythera (1717). Watteau died young, of consumption, and was notorious for his discontent and restlessness; his popularity declined in the late 18th cent., but Romantic writers, among them Gautier and Nerval, created around him an aura of mystery; they saw him as the tragic artist whose work is touched with mysticism and sensational plot brought it much success. These characters reappear in his novel Aylvin (1898), a curious work which he was many years writing; it recounts the love of Henry Aylvin for a Welsh girl, Winifred, his separation from her through a Gnostic curse, and his pursuit of her until their final reunion (with Sinfi Lovell's aid) on Snowdon. Its romantic mysticism and sensational plot brought it much success.

His other works include introductions to Borrow's Lavengro (1893) and The Romany Rye (1900), reminiscents sketches of Rossetti, Tennyson, etc., collected as Old Familiar Faces (1916), an article on "Poetry" in the EB (9th edn, 1885) and an essay, "The Renascence of Wonder in English Poetry" (in Chamber's Cyclopaedia of English Literature, vol. iii, 1901), in which he strongly defends the Romantic movement. He is probably best remembered, however, for his loyal support of Swinburne, whom he rescued from declining health, and who lived with him from 1879 until his death in 1909, at the Pines, Putney, in an intimacy little interrupted by Watts-Dunton's late marriage, in 1905, to a woman much younger than himself.

WAUGH, Alec (Alexander Raban) (1898–1981), novelist and travel writer, brother of Evelyn Waugh. His first novel, The Loom of Youth (1917), became a succès de scandale through its colourful suggestions of public-school homosexuality. It was followed by many others, including the late success Island in the Sun (1956), and... several autobiographical volumes, including My Brother Evelyn and Other Profiles (1967).

WAUGH, Auberon (1939– ), novelist, provocative and iconoclastic journalist, diarist, political satirist, and editor from 1986 of the Literary Review. Son of E. Waugh (below), he was educated at Downside School and Oxford University. His first novel, The Foxglove Saga (1960), was written after recovering from a serious accident with a machine gun in an army training exercise, and is based on his experiences of illness and of school and military life. His other novels are The Path of Dalliance (1963), Who Are the Violets Now? (1965), Consider the Lilies (1968), and A Bed of Flowers (1972). He has published several works of non-fiction, including collected articles from his columns in the Spectator and the Daily Telegraph, an autobiography (Will This Do?, 1991), and two volumes of diaries (1976, 1985).

WAUGH, Evelyn Arthur St John (1903–66), novelist, born in Hampstead, the son of a publisher, Arthur Waugh. He was educated at Lancing and Hertford College, Oxford, where he devoted himself more to social than to academic life; his literary and artistic interests were strengthened by new friendships, notably with H. *Acton. He took a third-class degree, then worked for some years (unhappily) as assistant schoolmaster in various posts which provided material for Decline and Fall (1928), his first and immensely successful novel, which followed the publication of an essay on the Pre-Raphaelites (1926). In 1928 he married Evelyn Gardner; in 1930 he was divorced, and received into the Roman Catholic Church. His career as a novelist prospered, with Vile Bodies (1930, set in Mayfair), Black Mischief (1932, set in Africa), A Handful of Dust (1934), and Scoop (1938), works of high comedy and social satire which capture the brittle, cynical, determined frivolity of the inter-war generation. He also established himself as journalist and travel writer with accounts of a journey through Africa (Remote People, 1931), a journey through South America (Ninety-Two Days, 1934), and Mussolini’s invasion of Abyssinia (Waugh in Abyssinia, 1936). In 1937 he married Laura Herbert, a cousin of his first wife, and from this time made his home in the West Country, first at Piers Court in Gloucestershire, then at Combe Florey in Somerset, where he cultivated the image of the country squire, with, eventually, a family of six children.

The war, however, intervened; Put out More Flags (1942) was written while he was serving in the Royal Marines, and his wartime experiences in Crete and Yugoslavia appear in his trilogy Sword of Honour (1965), originally published as Men at Arms (1952), Officers and Gentlemen (1955), and Unconditional Surrender (1961). In the interim appeared one of his most popular works, Brideshead Revisited (1945), which struck a more serious note, and a macabre comedy about Californian funeral practices, The Loved One (1948). The Ordeal of Gilbert Pinfold (1957) is a bizarre novel about a famous 50-year-old Roman Catholic novelist, corpulent, heavy-drinking, insomniac, out of tune with modern life, plagued by disgust and boredom, who sets off on a cruise to Ceylon to escape growing hallucinations, but becomes increasingly paranoid, imagining himself accused of being homosexual, Jewish, Fascist, alcoholic, a social climber, etc.; it is a self-caricature which ends in salvation. He casts an equally cold eye on himself in his revealing Diaries (1976, ed. M. Davie); see also Evelyn Waugh (1975) by Christopher Sykes. Waugh’s other works include biographies of E. Campion (1935) and R. Knox (1959), and a volume of autobiography, A Little Learning (1964); his Letters, edited by M. Amory, appeared in 1980.

Waverley, the first of the novels of Sir W. Scott, published 1814. Much of it had been written, and thrown aside, some years before.

Edward Waverley, a romantic young man, has been brought up partly by a Hanoverian father, partly by his uncle Sir Everard Waverley, a rich landowner of Jacobite leanings. Thus ambivalent in politics, he is commissioned in the army in 1745 and joins his regiment in Scotland. He visits his uncle’s friend the Baron Bradwardine, a kind-hearted but pedantic old Jacobite, and attracts the interest of his daughter Rose. Impelled by curiosity, he visits Donald Bean Lean, a Highland freebooter, and Fergus Maclvor (Vich Ian Vohr) of Glennaquoich, a young Highland chieftain, active in the Jacobite cause. At Glennaquoich, he falls in love with Fergus’s sister Flora, whose beauty and ardent loyalty to the Stuarts appeal to his romantic disposition. These visits, unwise in a British officer at a time of acute political tension, compromise Edward with his colonel. Through the intrigues of Donald Bean Lean, he is accused of fomenting mutiny in his regiment and is cashiered and arrested. He is rescued by the action of Rose Bradwardine and, influenced by a sense of unjust treatment, by Flora’s enthusiasm, and by a kind reception by Prince Charles Edward, he joins the Jacobite forces. At the battle of Prestonpans he saves from death Colonel Talbot, a distinguished English officer and friend of his family, and Talbot’s influence, after the eventual defeat and rout of the pretender’s army, secures his pardon and the rehabilitation of Baron Bradwardine. Meanwhile Edward, decisively rejected by the spirited Flora, has turned his affections to the more amenable Rose whom he marries. Fergus, convicted of treason, meets his end bravely; Flora retires to a convent.

Scott claimed to have written Waverley in haste and ‘without much skill’; in fact, it is one of the best plotted of his novels, every strand well knitted into the story, and the pace graduated carefully from the slow beginning to the tumultuous end. Equally skilful is the progress of Waverley (‘a sneaking piece of imbecility’ in Scott’s own words) from his woolly-minded ignorance at the opening to the knowledge of the world he acquires from experience. In his first novel, Scott sounded the theme of the opposition of romance and realism which was to reappear in many of his later works, though the irony with which romantic pretensions are undercut is rarely better deployed. Among the minor characters, the faithful Evan Dhu Macombich and the 'innocent', Davie Gellatley, mouthpiece of some of Scott's most beautiful lyrics, stand out.

Waves, The, a novel by V. *Woolf, published 1931, is regarded by many as her masterpiece.

It traces the lives of a group of friends (Bernard, Susan, Rhoda, Neville, Jinny, and Louis) from childhood to late middle age, evoking their personalities through their reflections on themselves and on one another: the effect is not so much of stream of consciousness as of what Daiches has called 'recitative', in that each character speaks formally his or her own thoughts, within inverted commas. There is no attempt to differentiate the speech patterns of the six friends; their individuality is presented through a highly patterned sequence of recurring phrases and images, and what we learn of their daily lives (that Susan marries a farmer, that Bernard's ambitions as a writer are disappointed, that Louis becomes a man of power and wealth) we learn obliquely. The organization of the novel is highly formal: the main text is introduced and divided by sections of lyrical prose describing the rising and sinking of the sun over a seascape of waves and shore. There is one additional character, Percival, whose thoughts are never directly presented: his death in India in his mid-twenties, halfway through the novel, becomes the focus for fears and defiance of death and mortality. One of the dominant images of the novel, used by phrase-maker Bernard, is that of a fin breaking from the water; this was, as Woolf's diary reveals, her starting point for the work ('One sees a fin passing far out', 30 Sept. 1926) and on 7 Feb. 1931, having just written the last words, she recorded in her diary, 'I have netted that fin...'. It is the most intense and poetic of all her works, and after it, significantly, she turned to a much less concentrated form in The Years.

In this study of four generations, dissecting the stultifying effects of inherited family traits and attitudes, many experiences of Butler's life are clearly visible. He completed the book some 17 years before his death, but he never revised the second half. The story (narrated by a family friend, Overton) was originally called Ernest Pontifex; Ernest is the awkward and unhappy great-grandson of John Pontifex, a village carpenter, whose natural instinctive character he comes to revere. His own father, Theo, is a tyrannical, canting parent, repeating the attitudes of Ernest's grandfather George. After his ordination the inept Ernest, taking a respectable woman for a prostitute, is sentenced to prison, where he begins to try to free himself from his immediate forebears and return to the simplicity of Old Pontifex. On his release he plunges into a disastrous union with Ellen, a drunken maidservant, and with her engages in tailoring and running a shop. Fortunately she turns out to be already married, and Ernest's beloved aunt Alethea leaves him sufficient money to devote himself to literature.

Aunt Alethea was based on Butler's friend Miss Savage, who gave him much help with the first half of the book before her death. The book received much praise, led by G. B. *Shaw, and reached the height of its success in the 1920s.

Mirabell is in love with Millamant, a niece of Lady Wishfort, and has pretended to court the aunt in order to conceal his suit of the niece. The deceit has been revealed to Lady Wishfort by Mrs Marwood to revenge herself on Mirabell, who has rejected her advances. Lady Wishfort, who now hates Mirabell 'more than a quaker hates a parrot', will deprive her niece of the half of the inheritance which is in her keeping if Millamant marries Mirabell. The latter accordingly contrives that his servant Waitwell shall impersonate an uncle of his, Sir Rowland, make love to Lady Wishfort, and pretend to marry her, having, however, first married Lady Wishfort's woman Foible. He hopes by this deception to force Lady Wishfort to consent to his marriage to her niece. The plot is discovered by Mrs Marwood, and also the fact that Mirabell has in the past had an intrigue with Mrs Fainall, daughter of Lady Wishfort. She conspires with Fainall, her lover and the pretended friend of Mirabell, to reveal these facts to Lady Wishfort, while Fainall is to threaten to divorce his wife and discredit Lady Wishfort, unless he is given full control of Mrs Fainall's property and Millamant's portion is also handed over to him. The scheme, however, fails. Mrs Fainall denies the charge against her and brings proof of Fainall's affair with Mrs Marwood, while Mirabell produces a deed by which Mrs Fainall, before her last marriage, made him trustee of her property. Lady Wishfort, in gratitude for her release from Fainall's threats, forgives Mirabell and consents to his marriage to Millamant.

Congreve enlivens the action with a fine gallery of fools, including Sir Wilfull Witwoud, Lady Wishfort's boisterous and good-natured country nephew; they serve to highlight the central contrast between the passionate and grasping relationship of Fainall and Mrs Marwood and the delicate process by which Mirabell persuades Millamant that even in such a mercenary society, love can survive into marriage. The dialogue is exceptionally brilliant, and many critics also consider the play a study of the battle between good and evil, rather than of the characteristically Restoration conflict between the witty and the foolish.
Way We Live Now, The, a novel by A. *Trollope, published 1875.

Augustus Melmotte has the reputation of a great financier, and huge quantities of money pass through his hands. He entertains the emperor of China, and is offered a seat in Parliament. Yet no one thinks to examine the nature of the Melmotte millions until Melmotte is caught forging the title deeds to one of the estates he is buying up. Subsequent enquiries into Melmotte’s prize speculation, a Central American railway, prove it to be a gigantic confidence trick, and when it becomes clear that the ‘great financier’ has tampered with his daughter’s trust fund, his disgrace is absolute. After a drunken appearance in the House of Commons he commits suicide. The sordidness of Melmotte’s career is matched by his daughter Marie’s experiences in the marriage-mart. She is treated as a commodity by the cautious Lord Nidderdale, and as a diversion by the shamelessly dissipated Sir Felix Carbury. When Carbury entices Marie to elope with him she steals the money necessary for the elopement, having gambled the money away. At the end of the novel she marries the stockjobber Hamilton K. Fisker, a leading promoter of the American railway scheme.

Trollope conceived the novel as an attack on ‘the commercial profligacy of the age’, and his perspective is shared by the upright Roger Carbury, head of the dissolute Carbury family. Lady Carbury's shifts as a glib authoress lead to an exposition of the lower levels of contemporary literary life.

weak ending, the occurrence of an unstressed or proclitic monosyllable (such as a preposition, conjunction, or auxiliary verb) in the normally stressed place at the end of an iambic line.

Wealth of Nations, An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the, a treatise on political economy by Adam *Smith, published 1776, originally delivered in the form of lectures at Glasgow.

Smith's work is the first comprehensive treatment of the whole subject of political economy, and is remarkable for its breadth of view. Smith shared the objection of the French *physiocrats to the mercantile system, but he did not share their view that land is the sole source of wealth. The Wealth of Nations sets out with the doctrine that the labour of the nation is the source of its means of life. It insists on the value of the division of labour. Labour is the standard of value, and originally was the sole determinant of price, but in a more advanced state of society three elements enter into price—wages, profit, and rent—and these elements are discussed separately.

The second book deals with capital, its nature, accumulation, and employment. With the increase of capital there is an increase of productive labour and a decrease in the rate of interest.

After this exposition the author proceeds to an elaborate attack on the mercantile system, and an advocacy of freedom of commerce and industry. His political economy is essentially individualistic; self-interest is the proper criterion of economic action. But the universal pursuit of one's own advantage contributes, in his view, to the public interest.

WEAVER, Harriet Shaw (1876–1961), editor, publisher, and benefactor, born in Cheshire. Business manager and later (1914) editor of the *Egoist, she saw *Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as-a Young Man through serial publication (1914–15), though the printer’s objections to certain passages caused her to remove the journal to others. When Joyce could find no British publisher for the book, Weaver brought it out under the imprint of the Egoist Press (with sheets from B. W. Huebsch's US publication, 1916), which also published work by T. S. Eliot, R. *Aldington, *H.D., Marianne *Moore, and others. In 1917 she anonymously provided the first of what would be many benefactions to Joyce; in this year Eliot became assistant editor of the Egoist. Under their editorship the journal published work by *Pound, Eliot, W. *Lewis, W. C. *Williams, and others, as well as early instalments of *Ulysses. It ceased publication in Dec. 1919 and the press closed in 1923. Weaver continued her financial support of Joyce and became literary executor of his estate.

WEBB, Beatrice, née Potter (1858–1943), born into a wealthy and well-connected family. She was from an early age deeply interested in both the theoretical and practical aspects of social reform, political economy, and sociology, concerns that were shared by her husband Sidney Webb (1859–1947), the son of a London shopkeeper, whom she married in 1892. Both were leading spirits in the *Fabian Society, and they produced jointly numerous works on social history, served on many royal commissions, and helped to found the London School of Economics. Beatrice also wrote two autobiographical works (My Apprenticeship, 1926; Our Partnership, 1948), and kept a remarkable diary, of which selections were published in 1952 and 1956, edited by M. Cole; a fuller four-volume edition, edited by N. and J. Mackenzie, appeared 1982–5. These show the width of her human and intellectual interests and considerable literary skill, and are a valuable record of social life and progressive thought of the period. Sidney and Beatrice Webb appear in H. G. *Wells's novel The New Machiavelli (1911) as the Baileys, 'two active self-centred people, excessively devoted to the public service . . . the most formidable and distinguished couple conceivable' (Bk II, ch. 2, 'Margaret in London').

WEBB, (Gladys) Mary, née Meredith (1881–1927), novelist, born in Shropshire, the daughter of a schoolmaster. In 1912 she married Henry Bertram Law Webb, also a schoolmaster; they lived for some years in Shropshire, working as market gardeners and selling their produce at Shrewsbury market, before moving to London in 1921. She had contracted Graves’ disease while still young, an affliction which found its fictional counterpart in the harelip of Prudence Sarn, the narrator of her most famous novel, Precious Bane (1870). The latter work is a notable variant on the popular Victorian theme of the ‘Fallen Woman’. Her last volume, a sonnet sequence called Mother and Daughter, appeared in 1895 with a preface by W. M. Rossetti.

WEBSTER, Daniel (1782–1852), born in New Hampshire. He rose to great eminence as an orator, in the law courts, in the American House of Representatives and Senate, and in public speeches, when he urged the union of the American states. He was twice secretary of state. His speeches, even in ordinary criminal trials, show a rare literary quality comparable to that of speeches by Burke. Among the best known are the discourse on the 200th anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims (1825), the Bunker Hill oration (1825), and the Adams and Jefferson speech (1826).

WEBSTER, John (c.1578–c.1626), the son of a prosperous London coachmaker of Smithfield. He was himself admitted by patrimony to the Merchant Taylors’ Company, and combined the careers of coachmaker and playwright. He wrote several plays in collaboration with other dramatists; these include Westward Hoe and Northward Hoe, with Dekker; written 1604 and 1605, both printed 1607; A Cure for a Cuckold (printed 1661, written ?1625), probably with Rowley (and possibly Heywood); and a lost play with Ford, Dekker, and Rowley, Keep the Widow Waking (1624). It has also been suggested that he had a hand in Middleton’s Anything for a Quiet Life (1661, written ?1621) and Fletcher’s The Fair Maid of the Inn (1625). He expanded Marston’s The Malcontent for the King’s Men in 1604, and published elegies on Prince Henry in 1613 with Heywood and Tourneur. In 1615 he contributed several sketches to the sixth impression of Overbury’s Characters. The Devil’s Law Case, a tragi-comedy, published 1623, written 1617–21, mentions in its dedication a lost play, Guise, which would have brought Webster’s total of single-handed plays up to four; as it is, his great reputation rests on his two major works, The White Devil (which dates from between 1609 and 1612, when it was published) and The Duchess of Malfi (pub. 1623, written 1612/13). With these two tragedies Webster has achieved a reputation second only to Shakespeare’s; they have been revived in this century more frequently than those of any other of Shakespeare’s contemporaries. However, critics have by no means agreed on his virtues. Attempts by Tate and Theobald to accommodate the plays to 18th-cent. taste were followed in 1808 by Lamb’s influential Specimens, which singled out the ‘ beauties’, in terms of poetic passages, and many 19th-cent. critics continued to complain about Webster’s poor sense of structure, his inconsistencies, his excessive use of horror. (*Saints­­­bury, 1887, on The Duchess: ‘the fifth act is a kind of gratuitous appendix of horrors stuck on without art or reason.’) The 20th cent. saw a strong revival of interest in the plays as drama, and in Webster as satirist and

WEBER, Carl Maria von (1786–1826), German composer, and one of the founders of the Romantic movement in Germany. After the success of Der Freischütz in 1821, Weber’s reputation was assured. In 1824 he was asked by Charles Kemble to write and conduct an opera for the 1825 season at Covent Garden; he accepted, at once beginning a crash course of English lessons. He acquired reasonable proficiency in the language, which stood him in good stead when he temporarily took over a task previously done by Haydn and Beethoven and provided instrumental accompaniments for 12 Scottish folk songs early in 1825. Meanwhile, he had received the first instalment of Oberon; or The Elf King’s Oath from Planché, based on an 18th-cent. English translation of the German poet Wieland’s Oberon (itself a reworking of the medieval French epic Huon de Bordeaux), the libretto’s only link with Shakespeare is the quarrel between Oberon and Titania (already incorporated by Wieland from A Midsummer Night’s Dream), and the names of Oberon and Puck among the dramatis personae. For this unpromising jumble Weber succeeded in producing music which includes much that is among the most poetic, and indeed prophetic, that he ever wrote. Oberon (1826) remains one of the great ‘sports’ in the history of opera.

WEBSTER, Augusta, née Davies (1837–94), poet and local government activist, born in Poole, Dorset, the daughter of a vice-admiral. She had a varied and mobile education and in 1867 married Thomas Webster, a lawyer. Her earliest works were published under the pseudonym ‘Cecil Home’: under her own name appeared Dramatic Studies (1866), A Woman Sold and Other Poems (1867), and Portraits (1870). These volumes show her skilled use of the dramatic monologue, particularly in the forceful presentation of female character and predicament: ‘The Castaway’ moralist. The works were edited by F. L. *Lucas (4 vols, 1927).

WEBSTER, Noah (1758–1843), American lexicographer and philologist, born in Connecticut. He was educated at Yale University, and worked subsequently as teacher, lawyer, and journalist. The chief work for which he is remembered is his great and scholarly *An American Dictionary of the English Language (2 vols, 1828), in which he challenged the parochialism of British dictionaries and, with a strong national pride and spirit, established Americanisms and American usages. He revised and expanded it himself in 1840, and it has been through several subsequent revisions. (See also Diction.)

WEDDERBURN, John (?1500–56). With his brothers James (?1495–1553) and Robert (?1510–27) he produced a metrical translation from German Protestant sources of 22 Psalms. The earliest known edition is of 1565 and the collection became known as the 'Dundee Psalms'.

WEDGWOD, Josiah (1730–95), the first English potter with an international reputation, founder of the pottery at Etruria, Staffordshire, where he produced both useful and ornamental ware, maintaining high standards of quality despite large-scale production. He contributed much to the taste for *neo-classicism in design, and was a generous patron; *Flaxman worked for him from 1775 to 1787.

Thomas Wedgwood (1771–1805), son of Josiah, was the first to produce (unfixed) photographs, and was a patron of S. T. *Coleridge.

WEDGWOD, Dame (Cicely) Veronica, OM, DBE (1910–97), historian, educated privately and at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. Her publications include *Strafford (1935), The Thirty Years' War (1938), Oliver Cromwell (1939, rev. 1973), The King's Peace (1955), The King's War (1958), and The Great Rebellion (1966).

WEEKES, Thomas (?1576–1623), English composer. With *Wilbye, he was the most important of the English madrigalists who followed the lead given by T.*Morley in 1593 and 1594. Little is known of his life before the publication of his *Madrigals to 3, 4, 5, & 6. Voices in 1597; in the next year he became organist at Winchester College and later held the same post at Chichester Cathedral. The *Balletts and Madrigals to Five Voyces came out in 1598, and the best of his works, the Madrigals of 5, and 6. Parts, Apt for the Viols and Voices, in 1600. He contributed one of the finest madrigals to The Triumphes of Oriana in 1601, but his last collection, Ayeres or Phantastickce Spirites for Three Voices (1608), is less interesting.

In the best of Weelkes's madrigals the Italianate manner of Morley is developed into a more characteristically English style, often more serious in content and laid out for larger forces with great contrapuntal brilliance and richness of harmony. As with most of the madrigalists, the authors of the texts are generally not known, though Weelkes is one of the composers whose imagination is most evidently fired by the bold and vivid imagery of the age of *Donne.

Wegg, Silas, in Dickens's *Our Mutual Friend, a one-legged impudent o rascal, with a smattering of education, who becomes reader to Mr Boffin and attempts to blackmail him.

WEIL, Simone (1909–43), French essayist and thinker. Equally independent in her life and her work, she devoted herself to resisting the oppression inherent in organized institutions and to achieving identification with the sufferings of its victims. Although an *agrégée de philosophie, she worked for a year on the shop floor of the Renault factory, joined the International Brigade in 1936, and after the outbreak of war found employment as a farm servant. Broken by her voluntary privations, and suffering from tuberculosis, she died in England where she had been engaged by the provisional French government. Her moral intellectual authority became generally apparent only posthumously. *Le Pesanteur et la grâce (1947), *L'Attente de Dieu (1950; *Waiting on God, 1951), and *Cahiers (1951–6) have earned her a unique respect for their intensity of thought, their moral commitment, and their religious inwardness.

WEIL, Kurt (1900–50), German composer, most famous for the music he wrote for *Brecht's Threepeny Opera (1928) and *Mahagonny (1930), in which, in keeping with Brecht's break with dramatic tradition and attack on the bourgeoisie, Weill mingled popular songs and jazz of the 1920s with ironic echoes of Wagnerian opera. Weill settled in New York in 1935.

Weir of Hermiston, an unfinished novel by R. L. *Stevenson, published 1896, which contains some of Stevenson's finest work.

Archie Weir is the only child of Adam Weir, Lord Hermiston, the lord justice clerk, a formidable 'hang-judge', based on the character of Robert Macqueen, Lord Braxfield (1722–99), known as 'the Jeffrey of Scotland'. His mother, a pale, ineffectual, religious woman, dies young, leaving Archie to the care of a father he dreads and dislikes. The conflict between the two comes to a head when Archie witnesses his father hounding a wretched criminal to death at a trial with sadistic glee; he publicly confronts his father, speaking out against capital punishment, and is banished to Hermiston, a remote Lowland village. There he lives as a recluse with Kirstie, his devoted housekeeper and distant relative, who is aunt to four notable brothers, the 'Black Elliotts', famed for hunting down their father's murderer. Archie falls in love with their sister, and Kirstie's niece, Christina. The novel ends as Archie, warned by the jealous Kirstie, tells Christina that their... secret meetings must end. We know from Stevenson’s notes that the novel was to end with another confrontation between father and son, in which Archie is on trial for his life for the alleged murder of Christina’s seducer Frank Innes. Archie and Christina escape to America, but the old man dies of shock. In this novel, Stevenson returns to the Edinburgh and Lowland landscapes of his youth, which he evokes with a grim but poetic power, and many have seen in Archie’s rebellion Stevenson’s rejection of his own Calvinist ancestry, though in real life he was able to achieve a reconciliation and understanding with his parents, and their approval of his career as a writer. Critics agree that it promised to be the most ambitious and profound of his works.

WEISS, Peter (1916–82), German playwright, born in Berlin, and best known in England for his Marat/Sade (The Persecution and Assassination of Marat as Performed by the Inmates of the Asylum of Charenton under the Direction of the Marquis de Sade) which was first performed in London in 1964 in an adaptation by Geoffrey Skelton and Adrian *Mitchell, directed by Peter *Brook. This was a landmark in the theatre of the 1960s, uniting elements of the Theatre of the *Absurd, the Theatre of *Cruelty, and the revolutionary Marxism of the period, and illustrating interest in attitudes to mental illness and imprisonment expressed in the writings of *Laing and *Foucault.

WELCH, (Maurice) Denton (1915–48), born in Shanghai. He spent part of his childhood in China, and was educated at Repton and Goldsmith’s School of Art. He intended to be a painter, but in 1935 was severely injured in a bicycle accident; he spent months in hospital and a sanatorium, and was an invalid for the rest of his life. A volume of autobiography, Maiden Voyage (1943), was followed by a novel about adolescence, In Youth is Pleasure (1944), and a volume of short stories, Brave and Cruel, and Other Stories (1949). His most distinctive work is the unfinished, autobiographical, posthumously published A Voice through a Cloud (1950), a vivid, heightened, and at times painfully sensitive account of accident and illness.

WELDON, Fay, née Birkinshaw (1933– ), novelist, dramatist, and television screenwriter, born in Worcester and educated at the University of St Andrews; she worked for some time in advertising before becoming a full-time writer. She is perhaps best known for her novels, which express the rising feminist consciousness of the 1970s, and which deal, frequently in tragi-comic vein, with women’s troubled relationships with parents, men, and children and with one another; these include The Fat Woman’s Joke (1967), Down among the Women (1971), Female Friends (1975), Praxis (1978), Puffball (1980), The President’s Child (1982), The Life and Loves of a She-Devil (1983, subsequently adapted for television and film), The Hearts and Lives of Men (1987), The Cloning of Joanna May (1989), Darcy’s Utopia (1990), Growing Rich (1992), Life Force (1992), Natural Love (1993), and Affliction (1994). Big Women (1998) is a sharply observed account, loosely based on real events, of a group of women who found a feminist publishing company. Her gift for realistic dialogue is manifested both in her fiction and in her many plays and free adaptations (notably of Jane *Austen) for television, and she has also been a pioneer in her bold address of many contemporary issues, such as cloning, genetic engineering, and what she sees as the questionable value of the ‘therapy culture’.

Well-Beloved, The, a novel by T. *Hardy, published serially 1892, revised and reissued 1897.

The scene is the Isle of Slingers (i.e. Portland). The central figure is Jocelyn Pierston, a sculptor of the Isle, who falls in love successively with three generations of island women: Avice Caro, her daughter, and her granddaughter, all of the same name. He is seeking in each the perfect form in woman, as he seeks it in stone. Perversity of circumstances, and the varying natures of the women, prevent him from marrying any of them. Despairing of the pursuit of art and beauty, he eventually marries an elderly widow, Marcia, when both he and she have been, like the rock of Portland, subjected to the raspings and chisellings of time.

Weller, Samuel, in Dickens’s Pickwick Papers, Mr Pickwick’s devoted servant, formerly boots at the White Hart in the Borough, a cheerful, facetious, and resourceful character, with an endless store of humorous illustrations apposite to the various incidents of life; and his father Tony, a coach-driver.

WELLES, Orson (1915–84), American actor and director, best remembered for his work in the cinema, e.g. Citizen Kane (1941); and The Magnificent Ambersons (1942), which he directed, and The Third Man (1949), script by G. *Greene, directed by Carol Reed, in which he starred. His radio version of H. G. Wells’s The War of the Worlds (1938) was a sensational success. He also directed himself in film versions of Shakespeare, notably as Macbeth (1948), Othello (1952), and as Falstaff in his own adaptation called Chimes at Midnight (1966).

WELLESLEY, Dorothy Violet, duchess of Wellington, née Ashton (1889–1956), remembered as a poet chiefly through the admiration of Yeats, who included a disproportionate number of her poems in his Oxford Book of Modern Verse (1936). His Letters on Poetry, originally written to her, were published in 1949. She herself published several volumes of poetry, collected in 1955 as Early Light. She was a friend of V. *Sackville-West, and sponsored and edited the Hogarth Living Poets series for the Hogarth Press.

WELLINGHTON, Arthur Wellesley, first duke of (1769–1852), soldier and statesman, who fought in the Indian Campaign (1799–1803), the Peninsular Campaign...
(1808–14), and was the hero of the battle of Waterloo (18 June 1815) at which Napoleon was decisively defeated. He first became a national figure with the victory of Talavera in 1809, and was created marquess of Douro and duke of Wellington in 1814. He was prime minister 1828–30, and secretary of state for foreign affairs 1834–5. Known as the 'Iron Duke', or, more familiarly, as 'Old Nosey', he was much portrayed by caricaturists, notably John Doyle (father of R. *Doyle) and William Heath ('Paul Pry', 1795–1840). Although a less romantic figure than Napoleon, his exploits and his phlegmatic utterances (e.g. 'Publish and be damned', attributed to him) caught the imagination of contemporary and later writers: the battle of Waterloo is depicted in Byron's *Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (iii. xxi, 'There was a sound of revelry by night') and in *Vanity Fair; he inspired much of the Juvenilia of C. *Brontë; and he appears in historical novels by A. C. *Doyle, *Henty, and others. By the queen's wishes he was given the most magnificent state funeral ever accorded to a subject, a pageant commemorated in *Tennyson's 'Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington' (1852). There is a biography (2 vols, 1969, 1973) by Elizabeth Longford.

WELLS, Charles Jeremiah (1800–79), author (under the pseudonym of H. L. Howard) of Joseph and His Brethren: A Scriptural Drama (1824), a verse play much admired by *Rossetti, republished in 1876 with an essay by *Swinburne, and again in 1908 by the *World's Classics.

WELLS, H(erbert) G(orge) (1866–1946), born in Bromley, Kent, the son of an unsuccessful small tradesman and professional cricketer. He was apprenticed to a draper in early life, a period reflected in several of his novels. He then became assistant teacher at Midhurst Grammar School, studying by night and winning a scholarship in 1884 to the Normal School of Science in South Kensington, where he came under the lasting influence of T. H. *Huxley. For some years, in poor health, he struggled as a teacher, studying and writing articles in his spare time; his marriage in 1891 to his cousin Isabel proved unhappy, and he eloped with his student Amy Catherine ('Jane') Robbins, whom he married in 1895 (though this did not prevent winning a scholarship in 1884 to Science in South Kensington, where he came under the lasting influence of T. WELSH, Irvine (1957– ), Scottish writer, born in Edinburgh, generally seen as the first and most important member of the so-called ‘Chemical Generation’ of younger British writers, politically disaffected, culturally sophisticated, and centrally engaged with the music, drugs, and mores of 1990s club culture. Welsh grew up in Murihouse, one of Edinburgh’s peripheral housing estates. After leaving school at 16, he did many jobs in Edinburgh and London, among them TV repair work, property development, and working for local government for the City of Edinburgh District Council. He took an MBA at Heriot-Watt University, Edinburgh, in 1990. His first novel, Train spotting (1993), about a group of young heroin addicts in 1980s Edinburgh, was sexually and scatologically explicit, written in a pungent Edinburgh vernacular, and distinguished by great comic verve. It quickly became a best-seller and cultural byword; a stage version was followed by a film adaptation (1996), which was a great success. Welsh’s subsequent works of fiction include two short story collections, The Acid House (1994) and Ecstasy: Three Tales of Chemical Romance (1996), and two novels, Marabou Stork Nightmares (1995) and Filth (1998). The language is progressively explicit but also rather repetitive in its use of obscenity and extreme violence: the poorly received Filth, the story of a corrupt Edinburgh policeman, includes the narrative ‘voice’ of the protagonist’s own excrement, and a first stage play, You’ve Had Your Hole (West Yorkshire Playhouse, 1998), centres around episodes of torture and sexual cruelty. He has claimed to be as interested in music as he is in writing, and in the mid-1990s worked as a DJ (disc jockey) in London and Amsterdam.

WELTY, Eudora (1909–), American short story writer and novelist, born in Jackson, Mississippi, her lifelong home. The stories of A Curtain of Green (1941) derive from her experiences with the New Deal’s Works Progress Administration, for which she travelled through her native state photographing inhabitants both black and white and learning ‘a story-teller’s truth ... the moment in which people reveal themselves’. Her first novel, The Robber Bridegroom (1942), is an elaborately worked fairy tale set in the Natchez Trace country c.1798. Also historical are the two most remarkable stories in her second collection, The Wide Net (1943), ‘First Love’ and ‘A Still Moment’: both exhibit intense rapport with place and concern with angles of vision. These also distinguish The Golden Apples (1949), a series of linked stories that followed her humorous, poetic, but restricted novel Delta Wedding (1946). The Ponder Heart (1954) is a

Her other plays include The Grace of Mary Travers (1985), which dealt with a woman coming to personal and political awareness during the Gordon riots of the 1780s, and Three Birds Alighting on a Field (1992), which dealt with the commercial art market at the height of the Thatcher economic boom. After Darwin (1998) uses the historical figure of Darwin and mixes past and present in an examination of evolution and extinction. She has also written frequent stage, radio, and TV adaptations, including E. Wharton’s The Children; Marivaux’s False Admissions and Successful Strategies (both for Shared Experience touring players) and his La Dispute; Anouilh’s Leocadia; Maeterlinck’s Pelléas et Mélisande; Mnouchkine’s Mephisto; Sophocles’ Theban Plays (for the RSC); and Euripides’ Hecuba. Her work, frequently directed by Max Stafford-Clark, has never been altogether final on the written page: ‘I like to work my plays in rehearsal’, she has said, ‘and even well into their run as I watch them performed in front of an audience. It’s part of the travelling you do.’

Young men wore blue coats and yellow breeches in imitation of Werther, china tea-sets were produced with scenes from the novel depicted on them, and perfumes named after Werther were sold. Goethe was later much embarrassed by this early work and by the assumption that it was autobiographical. *Thackeray wrote a well-known sardonic poem about Werther and Charlotte, and the term ‘Wertherism’ became current in English to describe a man’s early self-indulgent moods of melancholy (for example, C. *Kingsley accused his brother-in-law J. A. *Froude of catching the disease of Wertherism in his youthful novel The Nemesis of Faith, 1849).

WESKER, Arnold (1932– ), playwright, born in Stepey of Jewish immigrant parents, and educated in Hackney. He left school at 16 and worked at various jobs (including furniture-maker’s apprentice and pastrycook) before making his name as a playwright. His early work was closely associated with the *English Stage Company, although his first play to be performed, *Chicken Soup with Barley (1958), transferred there from the Belgrade Theatre, Coventry, which also put on the first productions of *Roots (1959) and I’m Talking about Jerusalem (1960), three plays now grouped together as the Wesker Trilogy. The Kitchen (1959), which first appeared at the *Royal Court, shows the stresses and conflicts of life behind the scenes in a restaurant, which culminate in tragedy; its use of the rhythms of working life was highly innovative and did much to stimulate the growth of what was to be known (though in a slightly different sense) as *kitchen sink drama. Wesker’s political commitments were also manifested in 1960–1 in his efforts to establish Centre 42, a movement which aimed to popularize the arts through trade union support. His subsequent plays include Chips with Everything (1962), a study of class attitudes in the RAF during National Service; The Four Seasons (1965), about a love affair; Their Very Own and Golden City (1966) and The Friends (1970), both of which deal in different ways with the disappointment of political and social hope; The Merchant (1977; subsequently retitled Shylock), which treats the story of Shylock in a manner that constitutes an attack on anti-Semitism; Caritas (1981), which shows the spiritual anguish of a 14th-cent. anchoress who realizes she has mistaken her vocation; and Annie Wobbler (1984), one of several one-woman plays. He has also published essays, screenplays, and volumes of short stories; the title story of Love Letters on Blue Paper (1974), about the relationship of a dying trade unionist and his wife, was televised and adapted (1978) for the stage. As Much as I Dare, a volume of autobiography, was published in 1994. The Birth of Shylock and the Death of Zero Mostel (1997) is a gripping account of the disastrous events attending the New York production of Shylock.

WESLEY, Charles (1707–88), brother of John *Wesley, and also an active member of the Oxford Methodists. He accompanied John to Georgia in 1735, and like him was influenced by the Moravians, though he remained faithful to the Anglican Church and regretted his brother’s departure from it. He composed many thousands of hymns, including such favourites as ‘Jesu, lover of my soul’. He left a Journal, published in 1849.

WESLEY, John (1703–91), the fifteenth child and second surviving son of the Revd Samuel Wesley, educated at Oxford. He became a fellow of Lincoln College in 1726. In Oxford he was the centre of a group of devout Christians (including his brother Charles, above, and *Whitefield); they practised severe self-discipline and self-examination, and were nicknamed the ‘Holy Club’ or ‘Methodists’. On his father’s death in 1735 he went to Georgia on an (unsuccesful) mission; he became a member of the Moravian society at Fetter Lane. He visited the Moravian colony at Herrnhut in 1738, and appointed his first lay preacher in the same year. He then began field preaching and opened a Methodist chapel at Bristol, and for the rest of his life conducted his ministry with extraordinary energy, preaching 40,000 sermons, and travelling thousands of miles a year, mainly on horseback. His literary output was also prodigious. He published from 1737 many collections of hymns; the singing of hymns to familiar tunes by the whole congregation was a new practice and contributed greatly to the fervent Methodist spirit. He wrote educational works, practical treatises, edited *Thomas à Kempis (1735), published selections from W. *Law, by whom he was deeply influenced, and kept a Journal (standard edn ed. N. Curnock, 1909–11) remarkable not only as a record of his spiritual life and tireless organizational activities, but also for its pathos and humour. Dr *Johnson found him a good conversationalist, but ‘never at leisure’. Wesley’s impact on public and private life, notably in his concern for the illiterate industrial poor, was enormous, and has even been credited (or discredited) with preventing a proletarian revolution. An edition of his complete works (ed. F. Baker, 34 vols), containing some unpublished material, began to appear in 1975.

WESLEY, Mary (Mary Aline Siepmann) (1912– ), novelist and children’s writer. Her first novel, Jumping the Queue (1983), a tragi-comedy whose ‘happy ending’ is successful suicide, was published when she was 71. Since then she has published many novels, often with recurring characters, of which perhaps the best known is The Camomile Lawn (1984).

WESLEY, Mehitabel (Hetty) (1697–1750), the seventh surviving child of Samuel Wesley and sister of John and Charles *Wesley. Her life was erratic: in 1725 she was unhappily married to William Wright, and attacked the institution of marriage in ‘Wedlock. A Satire’, written c.1730 and published posthumously in 1862. Some verse was published and circulated during her life: ‘To an Infant Expiring the Second Day of its Birth’ appeared in the Gentleman’s Magazine, 1733.
Wessex, the name used by *Hardy to designate the south-west counties, principally Dorset, which form the setting of many of his works.

WEST, Benjamin (1738–1820), an American painter who studied in Rome and settled in London in 1763. He was a founder member of the Royal Academy in 1768 and succeeded *Reynolds as president in 1792. A mediocre painter, his importance derives from his invention of the modern history painting with *The Death of Wolfe (1770; Ottawa, National Gallery), with characters wearing contemporary dress, contrary to the dictates of the grand manner. His innovation was an important turning point in taste. Later, with *Death on a Pale Horse (1802), he anticipated *Romanticism, and with his paintings of the life of Edward III (1787–9: Windsor, Royal Collection) pioneered a medieval subject.

WEST, Jane, see ROMANTIC FICTION.

WEST, Nathanael, the pseudonym of Nathan Wallenstein (1903–40), American novelist, born in New York. He is known principally for two macabre and tragic novels, *Miss Lonelyhearts (1933), the story of a heavy-drinking agony columnist who becomes involved in the life of one of his correspondents, and *The Day of the Locust (1939), a satire of Hollywood life based on West’s own experiences as a scriptwriter. He was killed in a car crash.

WEST, Dame Rebecca, the adopted name of Cecily Isabel Fairfield (1892–1983), daughter of Charles Fairfield, of Anglo-Irish descent, who became known in London for his witty defence of extreme individualism in debates with H. *Spencer and G. B. *Shaw. He moved his family to Edinburgh, where he died, leaving his widow and four daughters in straitened circumstances. Rebecca (who adopted this name, after *Ibsen’s heroine in *Rosmersholm, at 19) was educated in Edinburgh, trained briefly for the stage in London, then became a feminist and journalist, much influenced at this stage by the Pankhursts (see WOMEN’S SUFFRAGE); from 1911 she wrote for the *Free Woman, the *New Freewoman, and the *Clarion. Many of her shrewd, witty, and combative pieces have been collected and reprinted as *The Young Rebecca (1982, ed. Jane Marcus); this includes her outspoken review of H. G. *Wells’s *Marriage (1912), which led to a ten-year love affair and the birth of a son, Anthony West. Her first novel, *The Return of the Soldier (1918), which describes the return home of a shell-shocked soldier, was followed by *The Judge (1922), *The Strange Necessity (1928), *Harriet Hume (1929), and *The Thinking Reed (1936); then, after a long gap, *The Fountain Overflows (1956) and *The Birds Fall down (1966). Meanwhile, in 1930, she had married a banker, Henry Maxwell Andrews, who accompanied her on the journey which produced her two-volume study of the Yugoslav nation, *Black Lamb and Grey Falcon (1941). She was present at the Nuremberg trials, and *The Meaning of Treason (1949) grew out of articles originally commissioned by the *New Yorker; an updated version in 1965 added accounts of more recent spy scandals (e.g. Vassall and Ward) to her study of ‘Lord Haw Haw’ (William Joyce) and others. She continued to write and to review with exceptional vigour almost until her death, at 90. The reputation of her novels tends to have been eclipsed somewhat by the aggressive panache of her reportage and journalism, and they have frequently been described as ‘too intellectual’, but feminist reassessments in the 1980s have admired her strong and unconventional heroines, and her fine craftsmanship.

WEST, Richard (1716–42), son of a lawyer. He became at Eton a close friend of T. *Gray and Horace *Walpole. Gray wrote a moving sonnet on his early death, ‘In vain to me the smiling Mornings shine’, first printed in 1775, which *Wordsworth used to illustrate his views on poetic diction in the Preface of 1800 to the *Lyric Ballads.

Western, Squire, and Sophia, characters in Fielding’s *Tom Jones.

West Indian, The, a comedy by R. *Cumberland, produced 1771.

Stockwell, having secretly married in Jamaica the daughter of his rich employer, old Belcour, has had a son by her, who has been passed off on old Belcour as a foundling, been brought up by him, and has inherited his property. Young Belcour, as he is called, comes home, but Stockwell postpones recognizing him as his son until he has made trial of his character. Young Belcour, a Rousseausque child of nature, falls in love with Louisa, daughter of the impecunious Captain Dudley, but is misled into thinking her the mistress of Charles, who is actually her brother. Charles is in love with his rich cousin Charlotte, but because of his poverty will not confess his love, although it is returned. Belcour generously comes to the financial assistance of Captain Dudley, but his impetuous gift to Louisa of some jewels entrusted to him for Charlotte leads to grave complications. The imbroglio is eventually cleared up; Belcour discovers his mistake, is pardoned by Louisa and obtains her hand, and is acknowledged by his father, Stockwell. Charles is discovered to be the real heir of his grandfather’s property, and marries Charlotte. Belcour’s generosity and simplicity are favourably contrasted with the civilized decadence of London. (See PRIMITIVISM.) The play was produced by *Garrick, and enjoyed great success.

Westminster Review (1824–1914), established by J. *Mill, an ardent supporter of *Bentham, as the journal of the ‘philosophical radicals’, in opposition to the *Edinburgh Review and the *Quarterly Review. The conservatism of the Quarterly and the quality of the Edinburgh reviewers both came under attack. Byron, Coleridge, Tennyson, and Carlyle were among the literary figures it supported, but political and philosophical attitudes were always put first. The journal survived several changes of name and ownership, and under the editorship of John Chapman from 1851 (when G. Eliot became the assistant editor) published Froude, Pattison, Pater, George Eliot herself, and other important writers. It became a monthly in 1887, and in the 20th cent. dropped its literary interests.

Westward for Smelts, a collection of tales borrowed from The Decameron and similar sources, recounted by seven fishwives who embark after selling their fish in London; by ‘Kinde Kit of Kingstone’ (1620).

Westward Ho!, see Kingsley, C.

Westward Hoe, a comedy by Webster and Dekker, printed 1607.

The main plot deals with an escapade of three merry wives and their gallants to Brentford, where their husbands find them at an inn, but their innocence is established. In the sub-plot Justiniano, an Italian merchant, convinced of his wife’s infidelity, abandons her and lives disguised, enjoying the comedy of London life. Mistress Justiniano is involved in an intrigue with a profligate earl, but conscience intervenes and repentance and reconciliation follow.

WEYMAN, Stanley John (1855–1928). He established his reputation as a historical novelist with A Gentleman of France (1893, dealing with the period of Henry of Navarre) followed by a number of other romances of a similar character, including The Red Cockade (1895), Under the Red Robe (1896, afterwards successfully dramatized at the Haymarket), Count Hannibal (1901, based on the massacre of St Bartholomew), and Chippinge (1906, in an English setting, at the time of the Reform Bill).

WHARTON, Edith, née Newbold Jones (1862–1937), American novelist and short story writer, born in New York of a distinguished and wealthy New York family. She was educated privately at home and in Europe, where she travelled widely; she married Edward Robbins Wharton in 1885 and they settled in France in 1907. The marriage was not happy; she suffered from nervous illnesses, and her husband’s mental health declined in later years. They were divorced in 1913. She devoted her considerable energy to a cosmopolitan social life, which included a close friendship with H. James, and to a literary career, which began with the publication of poems and stories in Scribner’s Magazine. Her first volume of short stories, The Greater Inclination (1899), was followed by a novella, The Touchstone (1900), but it was The House of Mirth (1905), the tragedy of failed social climber Lily Bart, which established her as a leading novelist. Many other works followed, including the less characteristic but much admired Ethan Frome (1911), a grim and ironic tale of passion and vengeance on a poor New England farm; Madame de Treymes (1907), which describes the American-born marquise de Malrive’s adjustments to aristocratic Parisian society; The Reef (1912), also set in France, at the château of Givré, where widowed Anna Leath’s expectations of a happy second marriage are frustrated when she learns of her fiancé’s fleeting past dalliance with her daughter’s governess; and The Custom of the Country (1913). The Age of Innocence (1920) describes the frustrated love of a New York lawyer, Newland Archer, for Ellen Olenska, the separated wife of a dissolute Polish count; her unconventional and artistic nature is contrasted with the timid but determined calculations of Archer’s fiancée May, who, backed by all the authority of society, keeps him within her grasp and marries him. The Mother’s Recompense (1925) concerns the struggle between runaway mother Kate Clephane and her daughter Anne for the hand of the same young man, and Hudson River Bracketed (1929) contrasts Midwest with New York society. She also published many volumes of short stories, various travel books, and an autobiography, A Backward Glance (1934). Edith Wharton’s chief preoccupation is with the conflict between social and individual fulfilment which frequently leads to tragedy. Her observant, satiric, witty portrayal of social nuance, both in America and Europe, shows her keen interest in anthropology and in what she called the ‘tribal behaviour’ of various groups. There is a biography by R. W. B. Lewis, published in 1975.

WHATELY, Richard (1787–1863), educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. He contributed to the Quarterly Review 1820–1. From 1829 to 1831 he was professor of political economy at Oxford, and was then appointed archbishop of Dublin. He was active in Irish cultural and political life, founding a professorship of political economy at Dublin in 1832 and 15 years later a Statistical Society, and involving himself in educational reform at all levels. He published a great number of works on philosophy and religion, supporting Broad Church views, but his reputation rested largely on his Logic (1826) and Rhetoric (1828).

What Maisie Knew, a novel by H. James, published 1897.

With insight and humour James takes us into the world of Maisie, the child of divorced parents who use her, neglect her, and expose her to their own world of emotional chaos.

Her father, Beale Farrange, marries Maisie’s governess, Miss Overmore, while her mother marries a handsome, weak, and younger man, Sir Claude, to whom Maisie becomes devoted. These new marriages collapse, the step-parents become lovers, and her parents enter into new amorous entanglements. A new governess, Mrs Wix, appears to offer support, but also becomes infatuated with Sir Claude. Maisie is used as a pawn in the power games of the adults who surround her; her perception of their corrupt lives leads her to an odd and disconcerting maturity, yet she is not of their world and retains a fundamental honesty and innocence.

What You Will, the subtitle of Shakespeare’s Twelfth Night; it is his only play (with the possible exception of King Henry VIII) with an alternative title—its meaning is 'whatever you want to call it’. It is clearly connected, in some way, with Marston’s What You Will which probably appeared in 1601.

Wheatley, Phillis (?1735–84), a black poet born in Africa and shipped as a child to the slave-market of Boston, where she was purchased by John Wheatley, who encouraged her literary talent. Her Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral were first published in London in 1773.

Wheeler, Peter (1931–96), dramatist, born in Staffordshire, the area that provides the setting for two of his plays, Clay (1983) and The Bright and Bold Design (1991), which specifically concerns the Stoke-on-Trent pottery industry in the 1930s. Like many of his plays, these display a humane interest in working-class history and political change and were presented by the Royal Shakespeare Company. The RSC also staged Captain Swing (1978), about peasant uprisings in the 19th cent., The Accrington Pals (1981) about a First World War battalion, and two well-received plays respectively concerning Marlowe and Shakespeare’s daughter Susanna, The School of Night (1992) and The Herbal Bed (1996). Whelan has also collaborated with Don Kinkaid on a documentary musical about the Sioux massacres, Lakota (1990), and himself written a futuristic play, Divine Right (1996), in which a character clearly based on Prince William disguises himself in order to discover the realties of a sometimes grim Britain.

Where Angels Fear to Tread, E. M. Forster’s first novel, published 1905. It is a tragi-comedy describing the consequences of the marriage of Lilia Herriton, an impulsive young widow, to the son of an Italian dentist, Gino Carella, whom she meets while touring in Tuscany, ineffectively chaperoned by well-meaning and romantic spinner Caroline Abbott. Lilia’s brother Philip is dispatched by his mother, too late, to break off the match. Lilia dies shortly afterwards in childbirth and Philip is dispatched once more to rescue the baby. He himself falls in love with Italy and with Miss Abbott, but she falls in love with Gino, the baby is accidentally killed, and all ends in inconclusive loss.

Whetstone, George (1550–87), author of miscellaneous verse, especially elegies, and prose tales, principally remembered for his Promos and Cassandra (1578), a play in rhymed verse (based on a tale in Cinthio’s Hecatommithi), which provided the plot for Shakespeare’s Measure for Measure and is an early example of English romantic comedy. There is a life by T. C. Izard (1942).

Whewell, William (1794–1866), the son of a carpenter, educated at Lancaster Grammar School and Trinity College, Cambridge. A philosopher and scientist of wide range and copious output, he was professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge from 1838 to 1855 and master of Trinity College from 1841 till his death. His principal works were The History (1837) and The Philosophy (1840) of the Inductive Sciences and Astronomy and Physics in Reference to Natural Philosophy (1833). He published and edited many other works in natural and mathematical science, philosophy, and theology, including Lectures on Systematic Morality (1846) and Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy in England (1852).

Whitchurch, Benjamin, see CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS.

Whistler, James Abbott McNeill (1834–1903), an American painter, who moved between Paris and London. He was first influenced by Courbet’s realism, but later emphasized that a painting is ‘an arrangement of line, form and colour first’. His most famous works are the Nocturnes, paintings of the Thames at dusk. G. du Maurier’s Triby describes his bohemian life as a student in Paris (1855–9). Whistler moved to London in 1859; he mixed in Pre-Raphaelite circles, and discussed his ideas on art with Swinburne; Swinburne dedicated a poem to the Little White Girl (1864, London, Tate Gallery). Whistler, notorious as a dandy and wit, was at the centre of the Aesthetic movement. In 1877 *Ruskin attacked him for ‘flinging a pot of paint into the public’s face’; Whistler sued him, won, and was awarded a farthing damages. The trial stimulated Whistler’s gifts as a polemicist; he wrote a series of pamphlets and vituperative letters to the press, later published together in The Gentle Art of Making Enemies (1890). His most serious and elegant attack on Ruskin’s belief in the moral purpose of art was his Ten O’Clock Lecture. He had discussed many of his ideas with *Wilde, whom he later accused of plagiarism; Whistler’s influence is evident in Wilde’s lectures in America (1882) and in The Decay of Lying and *‘The Critic as Artist’. After 1891 Whistler again lived in Paris, where both his writing and the shadowy beauty of his pictures were deeply admired by symbolist writers. Mallarmé, a close friend, translated his Ten O’Clock Lecture (1888). Proust’s Elstir is generally considered to be drawn from the characters of Whistler and Monet.
WHITAKER, Joseph (1820–95), publisher and at one time editor of the Gentleman’s Magazine (1856–9). He founded the Educational Register (1850), Whitaker’s Clergyman’s Diary (1850), the Artist (1855), the Bookseller (1858), and Whitaker’s Almanack (1868), a compendium of general information regarding the government, finances, population, and commerce of the world, with special reference to the British Commonwealth and the United States. (See almanacs.)

WHITE, Antonia (1899–1979), novelist and translator, the daughter of C. G. Botting, a classics master at St Paul’s School. She was educated at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Roehampton, and at St Paul’s School for Girls. In 1930 she married H. T. Hopkinson, later editor of Picture Post. Her convent childhood is described in her first autobiographical novel, Frost in May (1933), which she began to draft when she was 16. The heroine of this work, Nanda Grey, becomes Clara Batchelor in her three subsequent novels, also largely autobiographical, The Lost Traveller (1950), The Sugar House (1952), and Beyond the Glass (1954), which give a vivid account of her experiences as an actress in provincial repertory, her struggles as a freelance copy-writer attempting to write seriously at the same time, her complex relationship with her possessive father, and her descent into mental illness and confinement in an asylum. Clara is named after Clara Middleton of Meredith’s The Egoist, a novel much admired by her father. Antonia White also translated many of the novels of Colette (whose love of the sensuous, the eccentric, and the bohemian is reflected in her own work), and published an account of her reconversion to Catholicism, The Hound and the Falcon (1966). There is a life by Jane Dunn (1998).

WHITE, Edmund (1940– ). American novelist and essayist, born in Cincinnati, Ohio. Nocturnes for the King of Naples (1978) is a non-realistic novel dealing with homosexual themes which were pursued more realistically in A Boy’s Own Story (1982), a poignant, poetic, frank, yet restrained first-person narration describing the gay adolescence of a child of divorced parents, both of whom are vividly evoked. This work brought him much acclaim, and was followed by the sequels The Beautiful Room Is Empty (1988) and The Farewell Symphony (1997), the last of which moves into the AIDS era. His other works include States of Desire: Travels in Gay America (1980); Caracole (1985), a Venetian fairy story; The Darker Proof: Stories from a Crisis (1987, with A. Mars-Jones), and a biography of Genet (1993).

WHITE, Gilbert (1720–93), born at Selborne in Hampshire. He became fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, but spent most of his life as curate of Selborne, refusing various livings in order to remain in his beloved birthplace. He began in 1751 to keep a ‘Garden Kalendar’ and later a ‘Naturalist’s Journal’. He made the acquaintance of two distinguished naturalists, Thomas Pennant and Daines Barrington, with whom he carried on a correspondence from 1767 which formed the basis of his Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne (published Dec. 1788, title-page 1789), a work which displays his affectionate and detailed observations of wildlife and nature, and his love of the picturesque in landscape. It slowly gathered a wide reputation, with both scientists (Darwin read it with enthusiasm as a boy) and general readers, went through many editions, and remains a classic. A Naturalist’s Calendar, ed. Dr John Aikin, appeared in 1795, and his Journals, ed. W. Johnson, in 1931.

WHITE, Henry Kirke (1785–1806), son of a butcher, articled to a lawyer in Nottingham. His volume of verses in 1803 attracted the attention of Southey, who encouraged and assisted him. He obtained a sizarship at Cambridge, where overwork helped to bring about his early death. Southey collected his works, with a memoir, and published them in 1807. Little is remembered of his work except a few hymns, such as ‘Oft in danger, oft in woe’.

WHITE, Joseph Blanco (1775–1841), born in Seville. He became a Catholic priest, soon abandoned the priesthood, and came to England in 1810. With the help of Lord Holland (see HOLLAND HOUSE) he started a journal, El español, which ran from 1810 to 1814. He wrote for the New Monthly Magazine and later for J. S. Mill’s London Review. He went to study at Oxford and became an Anglican cleric, and the friend of *Whately, Newman, *Pusey, and R. H. Froude. His Evidences against Catholicism appeared in 1825. His other publications include Observations on Heresy and Orthodoxy (1835), translations into Spanish of Paley’s Evidences, and other ecclesiastical works. In 1828 the Bijou published his sonnet ‘Night and Death’, which Coleridge declared ‘the finest . . . sonnet in our language’.

WHITE, Patrick Victor Martindale (1912–90), Australian novelist, born in England; he was taken to Australia (where his father owned a sheep farm) when he was six months old, but educated in England, at Cheltenham College and King’s College, Cambridge. He settled in London, where he wrote several unpublished novels, then served in the RAF during the war; he returned after the war to Australia with Manoly Lascaris, who was to be his lifelong companion. His first published novel, Happy Valley (1939), set in New South Wales, was followed by The Living and the Dead (1941), set in pre-war London, and The Aunt’s Story (1948), a comic and sympathetic account of the travels of an independent Australian spinster, Theodora Goodman. The Tree of Man (1955) is an epic account of a young farmer, Stan Parker, at the beginning of the 20th cent., and his struggles to build himself a life and a family in the Australian wilderness; the epic theme was continued in Voss (1957), which returns to the heroic Australian past in its description of the doomed attempt of a Nietzschean German visionary and aspiring hero, Johann Voss, to lead an expedition across the continent in 1845. He is bound in a form of mystic communion with Laura Trevelyan, who, at home in Sydney, suffers with him and is released from fever at the moment when, already in extremis, he is decapitated by the Aboriginal boy Jackie. Voss lives on as an increasingly legendary, martyrly figure. The story was suggested by the true record of Ludwig Leichhardt, who died in the desert in 1848. These two novels gave White an international reputation, which he strengthened with several subsequent works, including Riders in the Chariot (1961); The Solid Mandala (1966); The Vivisector (1970, about a painter, Hurtle Duffield, and 'wet, boiling, superficial, brash, beautiful, ugly Sydney'); The Eye of the Storm (1973); A Fringe of Leaves (1976, a tale of shipwreck on the Australian coast in 1836); and The Twyborn Affair (1979), a baroque novel with an international canvas, which ends apocalyptically in the London Blitz; he also published Four Plays (1965), volumes of short stories, and a frank self-portrait, Flaws in the Glass (1981), which contains a brief and revealing account of his allegedly 'ungracious' reception of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1973, which he persuaded his friend, the artist Sidney Nolan, to accept in Stockholm on his behalf. A selection of letters, edited by D. Marr, was published in 1995.

White, T(ERENCE) H(ANBURY) (1906–64), best known for his novels on the Arthurian legend, published under the title The Once and Future King (1958). The first book in this sequence, The Sword in the Stone, originally published separately in 1937, is a classic children's novel, as is Mistress Masham's Repose (1947). He also wrote several adult novels. The Goshawk (1951) is an account of how he trained a hawk. The Book of Beasts (1954) is a translation from a 12th-cent. Latin bestiary. There is a life by S. T. *Warner, published in 1967. See also FANTASY FICTION.

White, William Hale (1831–1913), known as a writer under the pseudonym of 'Mark Rutherford', born in Bedford, the son of William White, Dissenter, bookseller, and later a well-known doorkeeper in the House of Commons and author of The Inner Life of the House of Commons (1897). Hale White was educated with a view to becoming an independent minister, but disillusion with his teachers and growing religious doubts led him to abandon this course, and in 1854 he entered the civil service, rising to a responsible post as assistant director of contracts at the admiralty. He supplemented his income by parliamentary and literary journalism, and in 1881 published The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford, Dissenting Minister. This relates the spiritual development of a young Dissenter, supposedly edited after his death by his friend Reuben Shapcott; Rutherford, born in a small Midlands town, attends a Dissenting college and then becomes a minister, but is beset both by theological doubts and by distress at the narrowness and hypocrisy of his colleagues and congregations. Loneliness makes him an easy prey to melancholy, and he gradually loses his faith, becoming as disillusioned by the Unitarians as he was by his own Church. It is a compact and powerful account of the progress of 19th-cent. doubt; Rutherford cannot believe in personal immortality (though he is somewhat reassured by Wordsworthian pantheism), and finally sees himself as one born 100 years too late, for whom it would be 'a mockery to think about love for the only God whom I knew, the forces that maintained the universe'. The book was well received, and was followed by other imaginative works, all under the same pseudonym: these were Mark Rutherford's Deliverance (1885), The Revolution in Tanner's Lane (1887, a novel which draws an intimate and sympathetic portrait of Dissenting circles, radical politics, and working men's lives earlier in the century), Miriam's Schooling and Other Papers (1893), Catherine Furze (1893), and Clara Hopgood (1896). His other pseudonymous works include Pages from a Journal (1900), a collection of essays and stories, More Pages from a Journal (1910), and Last Pages from a Journal (1915); works published under his own name include a life of Bunyan (1905), a writer who profoundly influenced him. His own life was overshadowed by the prolonged illness of his wife, who died in 1891, and whose patient suffering he saw as 'salvation through Crucifixion'. See a biography by C. D. Maclean, published in 1955.

White Devil, The (The White Devil; or, The Tragedy of . . . Brachiano, with the Life and Death of Vittoria Corombona), a tragedy by *Webster, written between 1609 and 1612, when it was published.

The duke of Brachiano, husband of Isabella, the sister of Francisco, duke of Florence, is weary of her and in love with Vittoria, wife of Camillo. The Marchiavellian Flamineo, Vittoria's brother, helps Brachiano to seduce her, and contrives (at her suggestion, delivered indirectly in a dream) the death of Camillo: Brachiano causes Isabella to be poisoned. Vittoria is tried for adultery and murder in the celebrated central arraignment scene (iii. ii), and defends herself with great spirit; *Lamb's phrase for her manner was 'innocence-reeking boldness', and *Hazlitt found in her 'that forced and practised presence of mind' of the hardened offender, pointing out that she arouses sympathy partly through the hypocrisy of her accusers. She is sentenced to confinement in 'a house of penitent whores', whence she is carried off by Brachiano, who marries her. Flamineo quarrels with his younger brother, the virtuous Marcello, and kills him; he dies in the arms of their mother Cornelia, who later, driven out of her wits by grief, sings the dirge 'Call for the robin redbreast, and the wren', a scene which elicits from Flamineo a speech of remorse. ('I have a strange thing in me to the which I cannot give a name, without it be I Compassion.') Meanwhile Francisco, at the prompting of Isabella’s ghost (see Revenge Tragedy), avenges her death by poisoning Brachiano, and Vittoria and Flamineo, both of whom die Stoic deaths, are murdered by his dependants.

WHITEFIELD, George (1714–70), a popular evangelical preacher. He came under the influence of John and Charles *Wesley while at Oxford, and followed them on a mission to Georgia, where he founded an orphanage. On his return he attracted much attention at large open-air meetings by his fervent and emotional sermons. His views diverged from those of the Wesleys, as he became increasingly Calvinistic. He became domestic chaplain to Lady *Huntingdon and through her patronage opened a Tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road; she was the founder of the body of Calvinistic Methodists known as ‘Lady Huntingdon’s Connexion’, and she warmly supported Whitefield in his disputes with Wesley. Whitefield died near Boston on the last of several evangelical visits to America. His Journals were published in 7 parts, 1738–41, and Hymns for Social Worship in 1753. He was ridiculed by *Foote in his play The Minor and satirized by *Graves in The Spiritual Quixote. *Garrick was said to have greatly admired his preaching, but Dr *Johnson, while respecting his ministry, found he had more ‘familiarity and noise’ than ‘knowledge, art and elegance’.

WHITEHEAD, Charles (1804–62), poet, novelist, and dramatist. He published in 1831 The Solitary, a poem which met with warm approval. His quasi-historical romances, The Autobiography of Jack Ketch (1834) and Richard Savage (1842), and his play The Cavalier (1836), were also successful. His career was ruined by intemperance and he died miserably in Australia.

WHITEHEAD, William (1715–85), educated at Winchester and Clare Hall, Cambridge. He published in 1741 a verse epistle, The Danger of Writing Verse, in which he describes the temerity of those embarking on a literary career, and the hazards of neglect, notoriety, and the whims of patrons. In his day he was best known for his successful *neo-classical tragedy The Roman Father (1750), a version of *Corneille’s Horace; this was followed by another tragedy, Creusa (1754), and a comedy, The School for Lovers (1762). A contributor to *Dodgson’s Collection of Poems (1748–59), in 1757 he was appointed *poet laureate, an elevation which caused much satiric comment, notably from Charles *Churchill; he replied both to his detractors and to his own first publication in another verse epistle, A Charge to the Poets (1762), in which he recommends his fellow poets to remain calm in the face of hostile and favourable criticism alike, and to see themselves as ‘the firm spectators of a bustling world’. His Plays and Poems were collected in 1774, and a complete edition of his poems appeared in 1788.

WHITING, John (1917–63), playwright, whose plays, at first ill-received, marked a historic break from the prevailing vogue for drawing-room comedy. A Penny for a Song (1956, pub. 1969), Saint’s Day (perf. and pub. 1951), Marching Song (perf. and pub. 1954), and The Gates of Summer (1956, pub. 1969) show a powerful and individual talent, but he did not achieve popular success until The Devils, adapted from The Devils of Loudun by A. *Huxley, was performed by the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1961. A highly theatrical piece, influenced by *Brecht, it deals with a case of hysterical demoniac possession in a French nunnery. His Collected Plays (1969, ed. R. Hayman) includes several performed posthumously.

WHITMAN, Walt (1819–92), born on Long Island, New York, and brought up partly in Brooklyn. He had little formal education, and started work as an office boy; he subsequently worked as printer, wandering schoolteacher, and contributor to and editor of various magazines and newspapers, entering politics as a Democrat, and travelling in 1848 to New Orleans, where he wrote for the Crescent. He returned to New York and the Brooklyn Times via St Louis and Chicago, and the experience of the frontier merged with his admiration for *Emerson to produce the first edition of Leaves of Grass, 12 poems saturated, as he describes it, ‘with the vehemence of pride and audacity of freedom necessary to loosen the mind of still-to-be-form’d America from the folds, the superstitions, and all the long, tenacious and stifling anti-democratic authorities of Asiatic and European past’. When Emerson was sent a copy he replied hailing the work, with good reason, as ‘the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America has yet contributed’. The second edition (1856) added 21 poems, and the third edition (1860) 122, including the group entitled ‘Calamus’, which has been taken as a reflection of the poet’s homosexuality, although in his own words they celebrate the ‘beautiful and sane affection of man for man’. The six further editions that appeared in Whitman’s lifetime were revised or added to, the work enlarging as the poet developed. During the Civil War Whitman worked as a clerk in Washington, but his real business was as a volunteer hospital visitor among the wounded, an experience which affected him deeply, as can be seen in his prose Memoranda during the War (1875) and in the poems published under the title of Drum-Taps in 1865. In the Sequel to these poems (1865–6) appeared the great elegy on Abraham Lincoln, ‘When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom’d’. In spite of his achievement, and his efforts at self-publicity, Whitman was disregarded by the public at large, some of whom were offended by his outspokenness on sexual matters, some by his pose as rough working man; his reputation began to rise after recognition in England by W. M. *Rossetti, *Swinburne (who compared him to *Blake), Mrs *Gilchrist, and E. *Carpenter. After a paralytic stroke in 1873 he left Washington and lived quietly in Camden, New Jersey, still writing, though without the originality of his early years. The free, vigorous sweep of his verse conveys subjects at once national ('Pioneers! O Pioneers!', 1865), mysteriously sexual ('I sing the body electric', 1855), and deeply personal ('Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking', 1866), and his work proved a liberating force for many of his successors, including H. *Miller, D. H. *Lawrence, H. *Crane, and the poets of the *Beat Generation.

WHITNEY, Geoffrey, see EMBLEM BOOKS.

WHITTIER, John Greenleaf (1807–92), American poet, born of Quaker parents at Haverhill, Massachusetts, where Thomas Whittier, his Puritan ancestor, had built the oak farmhouse described in Snow-Bound. He began life as a farmer’s boy, and supported himself while at Haverhill Academy by shoemaking and teaching. He became an ardent Abolitionist, and wrote tracts and edited various periodicals for the cause as well as writing poems on the subject of slavery, collected as Voices of Freedom (1846). He was a regular contributor to the *Atlantic Monthly, which he helped to found. A prolific and popular poet, he wrote in many genres; his first book, Legends of New-England in Prose and Verse (1831), which demonstrates his lifelong interest in local history, was followed by many volumes of verse on political and rural themes, by verse narratives, sonnets, and ballads. Among his best-known works are ‘The Barefoot Boy’ (1856), a celebration of rural boyhood which manifests his admiration for *Burns, and Snow-Bound (1866), a recollection of winter evenings with his family in the old homestead.

WHITTINGTON, Richard (d. 1423), son of Sir William Whittington, a mercer in London. He rose to be lord mayor of London, 1397–8, 1406–7 (a year of plague), and 1419–20. He was a liberal benefactor of the city, leaving legacies for rebuilding Newgate Prison and other purposes (including a city library). The popular legend of Dick Whittington and his cat, the germ of which is probably of very remote origin, is not known to have been narrated before 1605, when a dramatized version and a ballad were licensed for the press. The story of a cat helping its owner to fortune has been traced in many countries of Europe. It is also suggested that it is based on a confusion between ‘a cat’ and the French achat, in the sense of ‘trade’. According to the story, Whittington, when in the service of Mr Fitzwarren, a London merchant, sent his cat, the only thing he possessed, as part of one of his master’s trading ventures; the king of Barbary, who was plagued with rats and mice, purchased the cat for an enormous sum. Meanwhile Whittington, ill-treated by the cook under whom he served as scullion, ran away. He rested at Holloway, and hearing Bow Bells ringing, as he fancied, the words, Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London, returned to Fitzwarren’s house.

Whole Duty of Man, The, a devotional work published 1658, in which man’s duties in respect of God and his fellow men are analysed and discussed in detail. The book was at one time attributed to Lady Dorothy Pakington (d. 1679). She was, however, probably only the copyist. The book, by internal evidence, is the work of a practised divine, acquainted with Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic, probably Richard Allestree (1619–81), chaplain in ordinary to the king, Regius professor of divinity, and provost of Eton. It had enormous popularity, lasting for over a century; it is comparable in this respect to *Thomas à Kempis’s De Imitatio Christi and *Law’s Serious Call.

Who’s Who, an annual biographical dictionary of contemporary men and women. It was first issued in 1849 but took its present form in 1897, when it incorporated material from another biographical work, Men and Women of the Time; earlier editions of Who’s Who had consisted merely of professional lists, etc. The entries are compiled with the assistance of the subjects themselves, and contain some agreeable eccentricities particularly in the section labelled ‘Recreations’. The first Who Was Who 1897–1916 appeared in 1920, and the eighth (1981–1990) in 1991. These decennial volumes contain the biographies removed from Who’s Who on account of death, with final details and date of death added.

WHYTE-MELVILLE, George John (1821–78), born in Fife, educated at Eton. He joined the 93rd Highlanders, then the Coldstream Guards, and served in the Crimean War. He then returned to England and devoted his time to field sports on which he was an authority. Most of his literary works were novels, sometimes historical, and hunting figures largely in many of them. His first, Digby Grand, was published in 1853; *Galsworthy, at Oxford, fell under the spell of the ‘Bright Things’ in Whyte-Melville’s novels and Digby Grand was Jolyon’s (in *The Forsyte Saga) first idol. He achieved fame with Holmby House (1859), a historical romance describing the Civil War. Market Harborough (1861) and The Gladiators (1863), also very popular, were followed by several others. Riding Recollections (1879) was a notable book on horsemanship. He was killed in a hunting accident.

WHYTHORNE, Thomas (1528–96), educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. After three years as ‘servant and scholar’ in the household of J. *Heywood he became a teacher of music and composer of madrigals. His autobiography, A Book of Songs and Sonnets, discovered in manuscript in 1955, was edited by James M. Osborn and published in 1961. It is not only an interesting document of Tudor life, poetry, and music, but also, because Whythorne wrote in his own phonetic system, a key to the pronunciation of his day.

Wickfield, Mr and Agnes, characters in Dickens’s David Copperfield.

Wickham, Anna, pseudonym of Edith Alice Mary Harper (1884–1947), poet, born in Wimbledon, and educated in Queensland and New South Wales, Australia. She returned to London in 1905 to study singing, went to Paris to be coached for opera by de Reszke, but married in 1906 Patrick Hepburn, solicitor and astronomer, by whom she had four sons. More popular in the USA and France than at home, she was an original and copious poet; in imagery and subject matter in advance of her time, she charted the struggle of a woman artist to achieve freedom to work as well as to fulfill herself as wife and mother. Her friends included D. H. *Lawrence, M. *Lowry, Dylan Thomas, and Kate O’Brien. Her publications include The Contemplative Quarry (1915), The Little Old House (1921), and Thirty-Six New Poems (1936); a collection, The Writings of Anna Wickham (1984), was edited by R. D. Smith.

‘Widdicombe Fair’, the title of a popular song. ‘For some reason or other, not exactly known,’ writes S. Baring-Gould in English Minstrelsy, ‘this has become the accepted Devonshire song . . . The date of words and tune is probably the end of the last [18th] century.’

Tom Pearse lends his grey mare to carry a party (including Old Uncle Tom Cobbleigh) to Widdicombe Fair, but the mare takes sick and dies, and is still to be seen haunting the moor at night. Widdicombe, or Widecombe-in-the-Moor, is near Ashburton.

Widmerpool, a character in Dickens’s Widowers’ Houses, a play by Bernard Shaw, first performed 1892, published 1893, and published (with The Philanderer and Mrs Warren’s Profession) in Plays Unpleasant (1898). It is designed to show the manner in which the capitalist system perverts and corrupts human behaviour and relationships, through a demonstration, in Shaw’s words, of ‘middle-class respectability and younger son gentility fattening on the poverty of the slum as flies fatten on filth’.

Dr Harry Trench, on a Rhine holiday, meets Blanche Sartorius, travelling with her wealthy father, and proposes marriage to her: Sartorius is willing to permit the match if Trench’s family (including his aunt Lady Roxdale) agrees to accept her as an equal. All seems well, until it is revealed in Act II that Sartorius is a slum landlord. Trench is horrified, refuses to accept Sartorius’ money, suggests that he and Blanche should live on his £700 a year, and is even more horrified when Sartorius points out that this income is derived from a mortgage of Sartorius’ property, and that he himself and his miserable rent collector Lickcheese are merely intermediaries: ‘You are the principal.’ Blanche, revealing a passionate and violent nature, rejects Trench for his hesitations. In the third act Lickcheese, himself now rich through dubious dealings in the property market, approaches Sartorius with an apparently philanthropic but in fact remunerative proposition, which involves Lady Roxdale as ground landlord and Trench as mortgagee. Trench, now considerably more cynical, accepts the deal, and he and Blanche are reunited.

Widsith, a poem of 143 lines in Old English, named from its opening word, in the Exeter Book. It is constructed around three ‘thulas’ (i.e. mnemonic name-lists), connected by the ostensible experience of the eponymous minstrel: the first names great rulers; the second lists the tribes among whom the minstrel claims to have travelled; and the third speaks of people that the minstrel sought out. The poem, although it contains some later interpolations, is thought to date substantially from the 7th cent. and thus to be the earliest poem in the language. Both the editions are important, and Malone’s contains a very full bibliography. Ed. R. W. Chambers (1912); K. Malone (1962).

Wife of Bath, (1) see Canterbury Tales, 6; (2) the title of an unsuccessful comedy by J. Gay (1713).

Wife of Usher’s Well, The, a ballad of the Scottish Border. The wife sends her three sons to sea, and soon gets tidings of their death. Their ghosts come back on one of the long nights of Martinmas, and the mother, deceived by the apparitions, orders a feast; but at cock-crow they disappear.

Wife’s Lament, The, an Old English poem of 53 lines in the Exeter Book, one of the group usually called ‘Elegies’. That the speaker is female is established by feminine grammatical endings in the first two lines, making it (like Wulf and Eadwacer) a rare early English example of a Frauenlied. It is a poem about the pain of separation, apparently visited on the speaker by the absent husband/lover and his family. The precise situation is impossible to determine; the speaker has been made to live in an earth-barrow so the poem can plausibly be interpreted as a revenant voice from the grave. Like the other Elegies, the situation seems primarily to be an image of the separation of the soul from God; but, as in The Seafarer (the opening of which this poem echoes closely), the obscure literal location is hauntingly evoked. By the 20th cent. it had become one of the most admired Old English short poems.

WILBERFORCE, William (1759–1833), educated at St John's College, Cambridge, and an MP for Yorkshire. He devoted himself to the abolition of the slave trade and to other philanthropic projects. He published in 1797 A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians, a work which was influential and widely read. He was the leading layman of the evangelical Clapham Sect, and he lived just long enough to see carried the second reading of the Bill abolishing slavery.

WILBUR, Richard Purdy (1921– ), American poet, born in New York City, and educated at Amherst College and Harvard. His elegant, urbane, and witty poetry appears in several collections, from Ceremony (1950) to Seven Poems (1981), and he has also translated several plays by Molière into English verse.

WILBYE, John (1574–1638), English composer, with *Weelkes, the most important of the English madrigalists who followed the lead given by *Morley in 1593 and 1594. Born in Norfolk, Wilbye spent most of his life in the service of the Kytson family at Hengrave Hall, in Suffolk; he published only two sets of *madrigals, the first in 1598, the second in 1609, and contributed one madrigal to The Triumphes of Oriana in 1601.

As a madrigalist Wilbye stays closer than Weelkes to the Italianate manner pioneered by Morley: 'Adieu, sweet Amaryllis' is a famous example of the delicate balance he achieved in this style. In the second set, generally regarded as the finest of all the English madrigal collections, he brought together a poetic understanding, purity of style, musical expressiveness, subtlety and variety of texture, and structural power that make madrigals like the six-part 'Draw on sweet night' outstanding.

WILCOX, Ella Wheeler (1850–1919), American poet, born in Wisconsin, whose many volumes of romantic, sentimental, and mildly erotic verse (with titles such as Poems of Passion and Poems of Cheer) brought her a vast readership. She also wrote short stories and novels, and two volumes of autobiography.

WILD, Jonathan (?1682–1725). He worked as a buckle-maker in London, became head of a large corporation of thieves, and opened offices in London for the recovery and restoration of property stolen by his dependants. He gained notoriety as a thief-taker, and was ultimately hanged at Tyburn. His 'Life and Actions' were related by *Defoe (1725). For Fielding's satire, see Jonathan Wild the Great. There is a life by G. Howson, Thief-Taker General (1970).

Wildair, Sir Harry, a character in Farquhar's The Constant Couple and in its sequel, Sir Harry Wildair.

WILDE, Oscar Fingal O'Flahertie Wills (1854–1900), born in Dublin, the son of Sir William Wilde, Irish surgeon, and Jane Francesca Elgee, well known as writer and literary hostess under the pen-name 'Speranza'. A brilliant classical scholar, Wilde studied at Trinity College, Dublin, then at Magdalen College, Oxford, where in 1878 he won the Newdigate Prize for his poem 'Ravenna'. His flamboyant aestheticism attracted attention, much of it hostile; he scorned sport, collected blue china and peacock's feathers, and proclaimed himself a disciple of *Pater and the cult of *'art for art's sake' mocked in *Gilbert and Sullivan's Patience (1881). Wilde successfully lived up to the image of the satirist, and its impetus took him on a lecture tour of the United States in 1882, after the publication of his first volume of Poems (1881). In 1883 he attended the first night of his play Vera in New York but it was not a success. In 1884 he married, and in 1888 published a volume of fairy stories, The Happy Prince and Other Tales. In 1891 followed Lord Arthur Savile's Crime, and Other Stories and his only novel, The Picture of Dorian Gray, a Gothic melodrama which had aroused scandalized protest when it appeared in Lippincott's Magazine (1890). Wilde claimed in his preface, 'There is no such thing as a moral or an immoral book. Books are well written or badly written. That is all.' In 1891 he published more fairy stories, A House of Pomegranates. His second play, The Duchess of Padua (1891), is a dull verse tragedy, but epigrammatic brilliance and shrewd social observation brought theatrical success with Lady Windermere's Fan (1892), A Woman of No Importance (1893), and An Ideal Husband (1895). His masterpiece was The Importance of Being Earnest (1895). Salomé (now known chiefly by R. *Strauss's opera), written in French, was refused a licence, but performed in Paris in 1896 and published in 1894 in an English translation by Lord Alfred *Douglas with illustrations by *Beardsley. Lord Alfred's father, the marquess of Queensberry, disapproved of his son's friendship with Wilde and publicly insulted the playwright. This started a chain of events which led to Wilde's imprisonment for homosexual offences in 1895. He was declared bankrupt while in prison and wrote a letter of bitter reproach to Lord Alfred, published in part in 1905 as De Profundis; in it he provided an apologia for his own conduct, claiming to have stood 'in symbolic relations to the art and culture' of his age. He was released in 1897 and went to France where he wrote The Ballad of Reading Gaol (1898), inspired by his prison experience. In exile he adopted the name Sebastian Melmoth, after the romance by *Maturin. He died in Paris. His other writings include critical dialogues ('The Decay of Lying' and 'The Critic as Artist', in Intentions, 1891 and *The Soul of Man under Socialism, a plea for individualism and artistic freedom, which Wilde wrote after hearing G. B. *Shaw speak, and which was first published in the *Fortnightly Review in 1891. The publication of his Collected Works (1908) was organized by his loyal friend Robert *Ross.

Wilde-Goose Chase, The, a comedy by J. *Fletcher, acted with great success in 1621, printed 1652; it was very popular on the *Restoration stage.

Mirabell, the ‘wild goose’, a boastful Don Juan with an aversion to marriage, is ‘chased’ by Oriana, his betrothed, who tries various wiles to bring him to the altar. She feigns madness for love of him, but he sees through the pretence, and she finally traps him in the disguise of a rich Italian lady. His two companions, Pinac and Belleru, with less assurance and more at the mercy of their high-spirited mistresses, alternately pursue and are pursued by Rosalura and Lililia-Bianca. *Farquhar’s comedy The Inconstant is based on this play.

Wilder, Thornton Niven (1897–1975), American novelist and dramatist, born in Wisconsin. The Bridge of San Luis Rey (1927) is the best known of his novels, but The Ides of March (1948), among others, is also notable. He scored considerable success in the theatre with Our Town (1938), The Skin of Our Teeth (1942), and The Merchant of Yonkers (1938), a comedy which was revised as The Matchmaker (1954) and adapted as the musical comedy Hello, Dolly! (1963).

Wildefe, Damon, a character in Hardy’s *The Return of the Native.

Wildfell Hall, see Tenancy of Wildfell Hall, *The.

Wild Huntsman, the, a spectral huntsman of German folklore, the subject of a ballad (‘Der wilde Jäger’) by Gottfried August Bürger (1747–94), imitated by Sir W. *Scott. Scott’s version was included in The Chase and William and Helen: Two Ballads from the German, published anonymously in 1797. The legend is that a wildgrave (keeper of a royal forest), named Falken- and Pinac and Belleru, with less assurance and more at the mercy of their high-spirited mistresses, alternately pursue and are pursued by Rosalura and Lililia-Bianca. *Farquhar’s comedy The Inconstant is based on this play.

Wild Oats, a play by J. *O’Keeffe.

Wilfer family, characters in Dickens’s *Our Mutual Friend.

WILKES, John (1727–97), the son of a Clerkenwell distiller. He studied at Leiden, and after marrying an heiress ten years older than himself (who bore him his much-loved daughter Polly) led a life of dissipation and became a member of the *Medmenham Abbey fraternity. He was elected MP for Aylesbury in 1757 and in 1762 founded the North Briton in which, aided by his friend Charles *Churchill, he attacked Bute’s government. In the notorious No. 45 he denounced the King’s Speech, and was arrested for libel on a general warrant, but released; he was then expelled from Parliament for publishing an obscene libel, the Essay on Woman (a parody of Pope, and retired to Paris. (For Lord Sandwich’s role in this affair, see Twitcher.) He returned in 1768, and after various setbacks (see Present Discontents) took his seat unopposed as MP for Middlesex in 1774, in which year he was also lord mayor of London.

A man of wit, learning, and ability, and a popular hero in the cause of liberty, he secured important legal rights, including the illegality of general warrants, the freedom of choice of the electorate, and the freedom of the press. His friendly meeting over dinner with his old political adversary Dr *Johnson, on 15 May 1776, provides one of the finest moments of *Boswell’s Life.

WILKIE, William (1721–72), author of The Epigniad, an epic poem in heroic couplets, in nine books, on the theme of the siege of Thebes: it was modelled on *Homer and inspired by the ‘heroic Tragedy’ of *Sophocles, and went into two editions (1757, 1759). It was highly regarded by *Hume and by Adam *Smith. Wilkie was raised on a Scottish farm, and claimed to have ‘shaken hands with poverty up to the very elbow’; he became a skilled classicist and mathematician and was appointed professor of natural philosophy at St Andrews. He was a member of the *Select Society.

Wilkins, Peter, see Peter Wilkins.

Willett, John, in Dickens’s Barnaby Rudge, the host of the Maypole Inn, and Joe his son, finally the successful wooer of *Dolly Varden.

William of Cloudesley, see Adam Bell.

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY (c.1095–1143), the first full-scale writer of history in England after *Bede. He was educated at Malmesbury Abbey in Wiltshire of which he became librarian. He was a polymath who may have been influenced by the historiographical traditions of Worcester and Evesham. His major works were the Gesta Regum Anglorum, a history of England from 449 to 1120; the Gesta Pontificum Anglorum, an ecclesiastical history of England from 597 to 1125; the Historia Novella, the sequel to the Gesta Regum, dealing with 1128 to 1142 and left unfinished at his death in 1143; De Antiquitate Glastoniensis Ecclesiae (a work which has led to the speculation that he may have lived at Glastonbury, written between 1129 and 1139); and the Life of St Dunstan, a hagiographical work. As well as being an authoritative and serious historian, William was a picturesque and circumstantial writer who enlivened his narrative with topographical observation, anecdote, reminiscence, and comment. The Gesta

WILLIAM OF NEWBURGH (1135/6–798), a canon of the priory of Newburgh (near Richmond) in Yorkshire who began in 1196 his Historia Rerum Anglicarum, suddenly abandoned in 1198, presumably at his death. The work was commissioned by Ernald, abbot of the Cistercian abbey of Rievaulx. The Historia deals with events from 1066 to 1198, especially the reigns of Stephen (with its hardships) and Henry II. It is a well-written, critical, and personal work with regard for historicity; it exposes the Historia, of *Geoffrey of Monmouth, for instance, as legend rather than fact.

WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM (1324–1404), bishop of Winchester and chancellor of England, founder of New College, Oxford (1379), and Winchester College (1382). He was first employed as clerk of the king’s works at Windsor, and he administered the rebuilding of Windsor Castle for Edward III. He became chancellor in 1367 but was dismissed, as a symbol of the clerical establishment, in 1371. He was one of the leaders of the bishops who opposed *John of Gaunt, and he was a lifelong opponent of Wyclifitism. His political power waned with the ascendance of Gaunt, perhaps best known for his stage play AC/DC (1970), a powerful innovative piece about the effects of the new technology and the media (what the author has described as ‘psychic capitalism’), and for his three ‘ecological epics’ of poems with pictures, Whale Nation (1988), Falling for a Dolphin (1989), and Sacred Elephant (1989). Other plays include The Speakers (1964), Hancock’s Last Half Hour (1977), and The Immortalist (1978).

WILLIAMS, Charles Walter Stansby (1886–1945), poet, novelist, and theological writer who worked for many years at the *Oxford University Press. His novels, which have been described as supernatural thrillers, include War in Heaven (1930), Descent into Hell (1937), and All Hallows Eve (1944). Of his theological writings the most important was The Descent of the Dove (1939). His literary criticism included a study of *Dante, The Figure of Beatrice (1943). In verse he wrote a number of plays on religious themes, including Thomas Cranmer (1936) and Seed of Adam (1948), but his most original poetic achievement is perhaps his cycle on the Arthurian legend, Taliesin through Logres (1938) and The Region of the Summer Stars (1944), afterwards reissued in one volume (1974) together with Arthurian Torso, a study of Williams’s poetry by his friend C. S. Lewis. He was a member of Lewis’s group ‘the *Inklings’.

WILLIAMS, Helen Maria (17617–1827). She published her first poem, a ballad, Edwin and Eltruda, in 1782, and travelled in 1788 to Paris, where she was chiefly to reside. She became friendly with the leading Gironists, and made the acquaintance of M. *Wollstonecraft; her Letters (1790–5) contain interesting information on the state of Paris and France just before and during the revolution. She was a friend of *Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, whose Paul et Virginie she translated (1796); she also translated A. von *Humboldt’s travels (1814–29). *Wordsworth’s first printed poem was ‘Sonnet on Seeing Miss Helen Maria Williams Weep at a Tale of Distress’ (1787, under the pseudonym ‘Axiologus’), but despite its title he appears not to have met her until 1820 in Paris.

WILLIAMS, Hugo (1942– ), poet, born in Windsor, the son of the actor Hugh Williams, who is portrayed in Writing Home (1985). Educated at Eton, he worked as an editorial assistant on the *London Magazine for two years before leaving to travel round the world, which provided material for All the Time in the World (1966). His first collection of poems, Symptoms of Loss, was published in 1965, the year of his marriage. He returned to work on the London Magazine until 1970, the year in which his second volume of

WILLIAMS, Isaac (1802–65), poet and theologian, educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he was influenced by *Keble and participated in the *Oxford movement. He was author of poems in Lyra Apostolica and other poetical works including The Cathedral (1838) and The Baptistery (1842). His contribution to Tracts for the Times on 'Reserve in communicating Religious Knowledge' lost him the election to the chair of poetry (1842). His autobiography (edited by Sir G. Prevost, 1892) is an interesting record of the days of the Oxford movement.

WILLIAMS, John, known as Anthony Pasquin (1761–1818), a voluminous satirist and miscellaneous writer, often threatened with prosecution for libel. The Children of Thespis (1786–8) was his most successful poem, but he produced various volumes of poetry, biography, politics, satire, and plays.

WILLIAMS, Nigel (1948– ), novelist, and playwright, born in Cheshire, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford. His novels include the ambitious Witchcraft (1987), which evokes the horrors of the Civil War through the medium of a contemporary screenwriter. He is best known for his suburban comedies, The Wimbledon Poisoner (1990), which describes Henry Farr's abortive attempt to murder his wife, and its derivative, Scenes from a Poisoner's Life (1994). They Came from SW19 (1992, the first-person adolescent tale of the son of a spiritualist mother) and East of Wimbledon (1993) are also set in south London.

WILLIAMS, Raymond (1921–88), critic and novelist. The son of a railway signalman, he was born in Pandy, near Abergavenny, where he attended the grammar school. His studies at Trinity College, Cambridge, were interrupted by wartime service in an anti-tank regiment. He taught first as an adult education tutor in Sussex from 1946 to 1961, then at Cambridge as fellow of Jesus College and later as professor of drama. His best-known book, Culture and Society, 1780–1950 (1958), surveys the history of the idea of 'culture' in British thought; and his later works, beginning with The Long Revolution (1961), attempt to extend this concept in more democratic directions than those envisaged by T.S. *Eliot and others. His scope of critical investigation included television and other modern forms of communication, as well as the history and sociology of drama and fiction. More traditional literary studies include The English Novel from Dickens to Lawrence (1970) and The Country and the City (1974). A leading figure of the British 'New Left', he tried to move beyond the limits of previous *Marxist literary criticism into a more dynamic materialist view of cultural changes, explored in Marxism and Literature (1977) and other books. His early novels, including Border Country (1960) and Second Generation (1964), are semi-autobiographical works in the realist tradition which, as a critic, he defended against the new orthodoxy of Modernism.

WILLIAMS, Tennessee (Thomas Lanier Williams) (1911–83), American dramatist, born in Mississippi, the son of a travelling salesman, and brought up there and in St Louis; he studied at Washington, St Louis, and Iowa, and in New York, while embarking on a career as a playwright with American Blues (1939, pub. 1945) and Battle of Angels (1940, pub. 1945; revised 1957 as Orpheus Descending). He achieved success with the semi-autobiographical The Glass Menagerie (1944, pub. 1945), a poignant and painful family drama set in St Louis, in which a frigid and frustrated mother's dreams of her glamorous past as a Southern belle conflict with the grimness of her reduced circumstances, as she persuades her rebellious son Tom to provide a 'gentleman caller' for her crippled daughter Laura. His next big success was A Streetcar Named Desire (1947), a study of sexual frustration, violence, and aberration, set in New Orleans, in which Blanche Dubois's fantasies of refinement and grandeur are brutally destroyed by her brother-in-law Stanley Kowalski, whose animal nature fascinates and repels her. Williams continued to write prolifically, largely in a Gothic and macabre vein, but with insight into human passion and its perversions, and a considerable warmth and compassion; his other works include The Rose Tattoo (1950), a comedy about a Sicilian woman and her quest for love; the symbolic and anti-naturalistic Camino Real (1953); Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1955), a Freudian family drama which takes place at wealthy cotton planter Big Daddy's 65th birthday celebration, while his daughter-in-law Maggie fights to save her marriage to the alcoholic and despairing Brick; Suddenly Last Summer (1958); Sweet Bird of Youth (1959); The Night of the Iguana (1962); and a novella, The Roman Spring of Mrs Stone (1950), about an ageing actress's affair with a gigolo. He also published collections of poems, and his Memoirs appeared in 1975.

WILLIAMS, William Carlos (1883–1963), American poet, novelist, short story writer, and, for many years, a paediatrician in his home town of Rutherford, New Jersey; his profession as doctor deeply affected his literary life, giving him, in his own words, an entry into 'the secret gardens of the self... a badge to follow the poor, defeated body into those gulfs and grottos' (Autobiography, 1951). In his student days he was a friend of *Pound and H. *Doolittle, and some early poems (Poems, 1909; The Temper, 1913) are Imagist, although he was to move from *Imagism to what he called Objectivism. (See also under ZUKOFSKY.) His poems range from the minimal, eight-line, 16-word 'The Red Wheelbarrow' (1923) to his most ambitious production, Paterson (1946–58), a long, five-part, freeverse, collage-mixed evocation of a characteristic industrial city, with the mystic motif, 'man is himself a city'. The title of his last collection, Pictures from Brueghel (1963), suggests the plain, poverty-stricken subjects of some of his verse and prose; and his skill at painting the ordinary with freshness and compassion is manifested in his short stories, collected as The Farmers' Daughters (1961). Other prose works include In the American Grain (1925), an important series of essays exploring the nature of American literature and the influence of Puritanism in American culture, and urging his own faith that 'all art begins in the local.' Despite his growing reputation at home, Williamson's work was more or less disregarded in Britain until the 1950s; Leavis in 1933 somewhat prematurely dismissed it as already outdated, and only a handful of writers, such as D. H. *Lawrence and B. *Bunting, took him seriously. Recently interest has increased considerably, and he is now established as one of the masters of *Modernism.

WILLIAMSON, David (1942— ), Australian playwright, born in Melbourne. While he began his career in the counter-cultural 'New Wave' drama of the late 1960s and 1970s in Melbourne, Williamson has charted the lives of his own generation of well-educated middle-class Australians with unerring satiric wit and comic flair. Each play captures a current social predicament or preoccupation, particularly power plays in groups or institutions. The Club (1978) and The Department (1975) are concerned with a football club and an academic department, while corruption in business, government, the law, and the press is criticized in Sons of Cain (1985), Emerald City (1987), and Top Silk (1989). After the Ball (1998) employs autobiography to reflect on Australia's social changes over the past 30 years. The satire and social criticism often seem blunted by the plays' many brilliant one-liners and sheer comic verve, which may earn critical censure but delight audiences.

WILLIAMSON, Henry (1895–1977), born in south London, the son of a bank clerk, educated at Colfe's Grammar School, Lewisham. He joined the army in the First World War and was commissioned in 1915; his experience of warfare permanently affected him, convincing him of the futility of war and the need for understanding between nations. After the war he worked briefly in Fleet Street while writing his first novel, The Beautiful Years (1921: vol. i of The Flax of Dream quartet). In 1921 he moved to north Devon, and embarked on a modest country life (much influenced by R. *Jefferies) which produced his most widely known work, Tarka the Otter (1927), a remarkably observed, unsentimental tale which was much admired and remains a popular classic. This was followed by other tales of wildlife and the countryside, including Salar the Salmon (1935). In the 1930s Williamson became an admirer of Hitler and Sir Oswald Mosley, addressing Hitler in a notorious foreword to The Flax of Dream (1936) as 'the great man across the Rhine, whose life symbol is the happy child'. This led, in the short term, to a brief internment at the outbreak of the Second World War, and in the long run, his admirers maintain, to the neglect of his most ambitious work, a series of 15 novels known under the collective title A Chronicle of Ancient Sunlight, a panoramic survey which opens in the mid-1890s with The Dark Lantern (1951) and closes with The Gale of the World (1969). This traces the career of Philip Maddison, writer, from birth to the aftermath of the Second World War and the point at which he resolves to write a series of novels 'to reveal the past' of his own generation to the next, and to explain the true meaning of his Mosley- *Birkin character's philosophy. Less politically tendentious is Williamson's short, devastating account of trench warfare, The Patriot's Progress (1930), seen through the eyes of a naive, suffering Everyman, City clerk John Bullock, which was one of the most telling of the anti-war novels of the 1930s, and admired by T. E. *Lawrence. Williamson wrote about his friendship and correspondence with Lawrence in Genius of Friendship (1941).

Willie His Avisa, one of the books which, with G. *Harvey's and T. *Nashe's satirical works, was called in by the high commission in 1599. The poem, first published in 1594, consists of 74 serviceable but uninspired songs and a few other poems by Henry Willowy (?1574–796). They narrate the unsuccessful courting of Avisa, a country innkeeper's wife, by a nobleman before her marriage, and by four foreign suitors after it. The last of these has a 'familiar friend W.S.' as a companion; he has been identified with Shakespeare, who is also mentioned as author of The Rape of Lucrece in prefatory verses.

WILLS, W(illiam) G(orman) (1828–91), a highly successful but unremembered Irish verse dramatist, whose first play, A Man and His Shadow, was produced in London in 1865. A long succession of popular plays led to his appointment as 'Dramatist to the Lyceum', for which he wrote many historical dramas, including Charles I (1872, with H. *Irving). He produced a version of Faust in 1885, and a long poem, Melchior, dedicated to R. *Browning, in the same year. He was also a successful portrait painter.

WILSON, Andrew N(orman) (1950– ), novelist, biographer, and reviewer, born in Stone, Staffordshire, and educated at Rugby and New College, Oxford. From 1981 to 1983 he was literary editor of the Spectator. His novel writing began in a vein of slightly acid social comedy with The Sweets of Pimlico (1977) and Unguarded Hours (1978), both written somewhat in the shadow of Evelyn *Waugh. Satire was blended with

WILSON, Sir Angus Frank Johnstone (1913–91), born in Bexhill, educated at Westminster and Merton College, Oxford. During the war he worked on decoding at Bletchley Park, returning in 1946 to the *British Museum where he became deputy superintendent of the Reading Room, a post he resigned in 1955 to become a freelance writer. His first two volumes, The Wrong Set (1949) and Such Darling Dodos (1950), were of short stories, followed by Hemlock and After (1952), a novel about the doomed attempts of a middle-aged novelist, Bernard Sands, to establish a writer’s centre in a country house. Anglo-Saxon Attitudes (1956, novel) also has a middle-aged protagonist, historian Gerald Middleton, separated from his grotesque Danish wife and his ex-mistress Dolly, and involved in an attempt to reconstruct and understand the past, including the mystery of a possible archaeological forgery, reminiscent of the Piltdown case. A Bit off the Map (1957, short stories) was followed by The Middle Age of Mrs Eliot (1958), a novel about the reversed fortunes of Meg Eliot, the sociable, handsome, and contented wife of an apparently wealthy barrister, who finds herself suddenly widowed in reduced circumstances. The Old Men at the Zoo (1961), about a doomed attempt to set up a large natural reservation for wild animals, reflects Wilson’s concern with conflicts between the wild and the tame, the disciplined and the free, and ends with a portrayal of Europe at war. Late Call (1964), set with telling accuracy in a New Town, tells of the search for purpose and understanding of the retired hotel manageress Sylvia Calvert, obliged to live with her widowed headmaster son Harold and his family. No Laughing Matter (1967), his most ambitious novel, is a family saga covering some 50 years in the history of the Matthews family, but despite its subject it marks a departure from the realism of earlier works, mingling parody and dramatization with direct narration in a rich and complex evocation of family politics and neuroses. As if by Magic (1973) follows through various parts of the world the adventures of Hamo Langmuir, breeder of ‘magic’ rice, and his god-daughter Alexan-

WILSON, Colin Henry (1931– ), born and brought up in Leicester. He left school at 16, and after working at a variety of jobs and reading widely in his spare time, published The Outsider (1956), a work which enjoyed a considerable vogue. It describes the sense of alienation of the man of genius, using a mixture of texts, from Barbusse, Camus, Sartre, T. E. Lawrence, Hesse, etc. and did much to popularize a version of existentialism in Britain; it appeared in the same week as Osborne’s Look Back in Anger, and Wilson was promptly labelled an *Angry Young Man, though he had little in common with others allocated to the same group. Wilson has since written many works on mysticism, existentialism, the occult, etc., and published many novels in various genres (Ritual in the Dark, 1960; The Philosopher’s Stone, 1969; The Space Vampires, 1976, etc.).

WILSON, Edmund (1895–1972), American author, born in New Jersey, and educated at Princeton (where A. *Noyes, whom he did not admire, was at the time professor of poetry). He served abroad during the First World War, an experience which inspired verse and short stories published in a lively and eccentric little anthology about death, The Undertaker’s Garland (1922, with his friend J. P. Bishop). He then worked for various magazines, including Vanity Fair (1920–1), the New Republic (1926–31) and the New Yorker (1944–8). His novel I Thought of Daisy (1929, rev. 1967) is set in bohemian literary New York, and his short stories, Memoirs of Hecate Country (1946), are also set largely in New York. He is principally known for his influential, wide-ranging, and independent works of literary and social criticism, which include Axel’s Castle (1931), a study of symbolist literature (Yeats, Valéry, Stein, and others, including Villiers de l’Isle-Adam, whose play Axel gave the volume its title); The Triple Thinkers (1938); To the Finland Station (1940), which traces socialist and revolutionary theory from Michelet and R. Owen through Marx to Lenin; The Wound and the Bow (1941), a series of studies with a *Freudian angle, taking its title from an essay on the Philoctetes of *Sophocles; and Patriotic Gore: Studies in the Literature of the American Civil War (1962), a comprehensive survey of major and minor writers of the period, and the war’s roots in the national psyche. His other works include experimental plays, collections of articles and reviews, and memoirs of early and later life (A Prelude, 1967; Upstate, 1971). His third wife was the novelist Mary *McCarthy, and he was a friend from college days of F. S. *Fitzgerald, whose posthumously published works he edited.

WILSON, Harriette, née Dubochet (1786–1846), courtier, daughter of a Swiss-born London shopkeeper, who left a spirited account of her adventures and amours in the fashionable Regency world in Memoirs of Harriette Wilson, Written by Herself (1825), which went through many editions. It opens with panache, with the sentence ‘I shall not say why and how I became at the age of fifteen, the mistress of the earl of Craven’, and proceeds to describe with much frankness and some art her impressions of and friendships with *Brummell, Prince Esterhazy, the dukes of *Welling­ton, Argyle, Beaufort, Leinster, etc. She also wrote two slight novels, Paris Lions and London Tigers (1825) and Clara Gazu (1830), both romans à clef.

WILSON, John (?1627–96), educated at Oxford. He became recorder of Londonderry. His two principal plays, of which the first was popular, are The Cheats (1663) and The Projectors (printed 1665, no recorded performance); they are Jonsonian satires in which sharks, gulls, usurers, and astrologers are vigorously and effectively displayed.

WILSON, John (1785–1854). He enjoyed a brilliant university career at Glasgow and Oxford, and was in youth a friend of *Wordsworth and *Coleridge (to whose *Friend he contributed). He joined the editorial staff of *Blackwood’s shortly after its foundation and became its most copious single contributor. For the ‘Maga’ he provided more than half the series Noctes Ambrosianae, in which he appears as ‘Christopher North’; he was part-author of the notorious Chaldee MS; he wrote a ferocious attack on Coleridge’s Biographia Literaria; and joined in *Lockhart’s prolonged onslaught on the *Cockney School. He supported *Shelley, and dubbed *Wordsworth, *Scott, and *Byron, as poets, ‘the three great master-spirits of our day’. But his praise alternated bewilderingly with derision and he declared, ‘I like to abuse my friends.’ He wrote some poetry and three sentimental novels of Scottish life, Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life (1822); The Trials of Margaret Lyndsay (1823); and The Foresters (1825), which Wordsworth described as ‘mawkish stuff’. In 1820 he was appointed, for political reasons, to the chair of moral philosophy at Edinburgh, but his inadequacy was such that for many years a friend wrote his lectures for him.

WILSON, John Dover (1881–1969), Shakespearian scholar and editor. Using the methods of the new bibliography, he was responsible for editing most of the plays in the New Cambridge Shakespeare series which was begun in 1921. As well as this and many other scholarly works he produced several popular and influential books about Shakespeare, notably the ‘biographical adventure’ The Essential Shakespeare (1932), What Happens in Hamlet (1935), and The Fortunes of Falstaff (1943).

WILSON, Thomas (c.1523–81), educated at Eton and King’s College, Cambridge. He was privy counsellor and secretary of state in 1577. He published The Rule of Reason, a work on logic (1551); and the Arte of Rhetorique (1553; revised and improved, 1560). The Arte is a notable landmark in the history of English prose. Wilson provides interesting examples of epistles and orations in a variety of English styles. Most of them are for emulation, but some of the more amusing, such as the famous “inkhorn” letter from a Lincolnshire clergyman seeking preferment, exhibit the worst excesses of Latinism and affectation:

> There is a Sacerdotal dignitie in my native Countrey contiguete to me, where I now contemplate: which your worshipfull benignitie could some impetrate for mee, if it would like you to extend your sedules, and collaude me in them to the right honourable lord Chaunceller, or rather Archgrammarian of Eng­lande.

The Arte of Rhetorique was edited by G. H. Mair (1909).

Wilton House, in Wiltshire, seat of the earls of Pembroke, is associated with Sir P. *Sidney, who is said to have written much of the first version of the Arcadia there while staying with his sister Mary, countess of Pembroke. According to *Aubrey, 'In her time Wilton house was like a College, there were so many learned and ingeniose persons.' She was undoubtedly a literary patroness, but the claim made to W. J. *Cory in 1865 that Shakespeare was her guest and Wimble, Will, in the *Spectator, a friend of Sir Roger de Coverley, introduced in No. 108 as a good-natured fellow ‘who hunts a pack of dogs better than any man in the country’ and is generally esteemed for the obliging services he renders to all.

WINCHILSEA, Anne Finch, countess of, née Kingsmill (1661–1720), poet, born near Newbury, the daughter of Sir William Kingsmill, and orphaned when young; she was probably brought up by her mother’s brother. She was a maid of honour to Mary of Modena, wife of the duke of York, and in 1684 married Colonel Heeneage Finch who succeeded his nephew to the title in 1712. She was a friend of *Pope, *Swift, *Gay, and *Rowe. Her Miscellany Poems on Several Occasions appeared in 1713, at first anonymously; they were admired by *Wordsworth, who found affinities in them, and chose a selection for an album (1819). Her best-known poem is her *ode ‘The Spleen: A Pindaric Poem’ (pub. 1701 in Charles Gildon’s *New Collection of Poems): her couplet about the jonquil and ‘aromatic pain’ was echoed by Pope in his *Essay on Man, and J. M. *Murphy, in his preface to his 1928 selection, singles out from the same poem the lines ‘Nor will in fading silks compose I Faintly the inimitable rose.’ V. Woolf in *A Room of One’s Own (1928) concluded that she ‘suffered terribly and with her wings weighted with gold. Milly travels to Europe with her rich aunt Maud Lowder. While on a visit to New York Densher meets Milly Theale, an orphaned, gentle girl who is immensely rich. Her wings were weighted with gold. Milly travels to Europe with her friend Susan Stringham, and in London she is gathered into Mrs Lowder’s circle. She is anxious to meet Densher again and is disturbed to learn, from a disapproving Mrs Lowder, of his interest in Kate. While in London she learns that she is doomed and is advised by the sympathetic doctor Sir Luke Strett to seize what joy she can from life. She installs herself in a palazzo in Venice, and with their varying motives her friends gather round her: Kate and Mrs Lowder, Densher, the fortune-hunting Sir Mark, the faithful Susan Stringham, and even the London doctor. Kate and Densher become lovers while Milly is deliberately misled into believing that Kate does not return Densher’s interest. The predatory Kate persuades a reluctant Densher to make a show of love for Milly in the hope that, dying, she will provide for him—and for them. After Milly’s death Densher does indeed discover that she has done so. But Kate has reckoned without his growing unease and distaste for the role he has been forced to play; Densher finds himself unable to accept the money, and Kate. Their very success in this dreadful game has brought about the death of their relationship.

In this novel James, for the first time, takes passionate human love as his central theme. The handsome and clever Kate Croy allows herself to be taken up by her rich aunt Maud Lowder. WINSTANLEY, Gerrard (c.1609–76), radical pamphleteer and leader of the Diggers, or True Levellers. He was born in Wigan, the son of a mercer, went to London as a clothing apprentice in 1630, and set up for himself in 1637, unsuccessfully; by 1643 he described himself as ‘beaten out of both trade and estate’, and he worked subsequently as a hired labourer. He published several religious pamphlets in 1648, and in 1649 with a group of comrades started digging and planting crops on St George’s Hill, in Surrey, in a bold but short-lived attempt to claim the common land for ‘the common people of England’. His first Digger manifesto, The True Levellers' Standard Advanced, is dated 20 April 1649, and it was followed by others putting forward his political and collectivist programme, e.g. A Watchword to the City of London, and the Army (1649), Fire in the Bush (1650), ending with his last and most systematic work, The Law of Freedom, in a Platform (1652), which also expresses his disillusion at the collapse of his agrarian experiment. He believed that the sin of covetousness had brought mankind into bondage, and his work expresses a deep compassion for the poor, while remaining remarkably fair-minded and free of sectarian virulence. His prose is powerful and lucid, addressed to plain readers, and avoiding 'the traditional, parrot-like speaking' of the universities, which in his view drew a veil over truth with 'dark interpretation and glosses': many of his metaphors are drawn from daily life, but he can also express himself with poetic and passionate intensity, and with a personal and inventive use of biblical imagery that prefigures *Blake. Nothing is known of his later years, and his contribution to literature and political thought was neglected until the 20th cent., no doubt because of the apparent failure of his ideas, but there has been a considerable revival of interest, and he is now acclaimed by many as one of the most original and prophetic writers of his time. Winterborne, Giles, a character in Hardy's *The Woodlanders.

WINTERS, (Arthur) Yvor (1900–68), American poet and critic, whose own poems exemplify his critical doctrine of classicism, restraint, moral judgement, and 'cold certitude'. (See New Criticism.) His In Defense of Reason (1947) contains three earlier works, Primitivism and Decadence (1937), Maule's Curse (1938), and The Anatomy of Nonsense (1943), all of which attack obscurantism and *Romanticism, and an essay on his friend, the highly dissimilar Hart *Cranes, for whom he also wrote an elegy, 'Orpheus'.

WINTONSON, Jeanette (1959– ), novelist, born in Manchester. She became the adopted daughter of Pentecostal evangelist parents. Her upbringing and training for evangelistic service, as well as the realization of her lesbian identity, were drawn on heavily, and to brilliant effect, for her first novel, Oranges Are Not the Only Fruit (1985), which won the Whitbread Award for a first novel and was successfully adapted for television in 1990. She was educated at Accrington Girls’ Grammar School and, after a period of miscellaneous employment, read English at St Catherines College, Oxford. Boating for Beginners (1985), a comic fable based on the story of Noah, was followed by The Passion (1987), a bawdy historical fantasy in which a French peasant, Henri, who worships Napoleon, becomes his hero’s chicken chef and falls in love with a bisexual Venetian girl with webbed feet. Her fourth novel, Sexing the Cherry (1989), transforms the fairy tale of the 12 dancing princesses, juxtaposing 17th-cent. characters with their counterparts in the 20th cent. Its main character, the Dog Woman, and her foster-son Jordan, fished from the Thames as a baby, are notable creations. Written on the Body (1992) is an exploration of gender within a triangular relationship. The controversial Art and Lies (1994) develops Winterson’s unconventional narrative style even further through the deployment of three separate voices named Handel, Picasso, and Sappho.

Winter's Tale, The, a play by *Shakespeare written 1610 or 1611, in which year it was performed at the Globe (recorded by *Forman). It was one of the plays put on to celebrate the marriage of Princess Elizabeth and the elector palatine in 1612–13 and was first printed in the *Folio of 1623 where it is the last play in the section of comedies. Its main source is Greene's *Pandosto.

Leontes, king of Sicily, and Hermione, his virtuous wife, are visited by Leontes’s childhood friend Polixenes, king of Bohemia. Leontes presently convinces himself that Hermione and Polixenes are lovers, attempts to procure the death of the latter by poison, and on his escape imprisons Hermione, who in prison gives birth to a daughter. Paulina, wife of Antigonus, a Sicilian lord, tries to move the king’s compassion by bringing the baby to him, but in vain. He orders Antigonus to leave the child on a desert shore to perish. He disregards a Delphian oracle declaring Hermione innocent. He soon learns that his son Mamillius has died of sorrow for Hermione’s treatment, and shortly after that Hermione herself is dead, and is filled with remorse. Meanwhile Antigonus leaves the baby girl, Perdita, on the shore of Bohemia, and is himself killed by a bear. Perdita is found and brought up by a shepherd. Sixteen years pass. When she grows up, Florizel, son of King Polixenes, falls in love with her, and his love is returned. This is discovered by Polixenes, to avoid whose anger Florizel, Perdita, and the old shepherd flee from Bohemia to the court of Leontes, where the identity of Perdita is discovered, to Leontes’s great joy, and the revival of his grief for the loss of Hermione. Paulina offers to show him a statue that perfectly resembles Hermione, and when the king’s grief is intensified by the sight of this, the statue comes to life and reveals itself as the living Hermione, whose death Paulina had falsely reported in order to save her life. Polixenes is reconciled to the marriage of his son with Perdita, on finding that the shepherd-girl is really the daughter of his former friend Leontes. The rougeries of Autolycus, the pedlar and 'snapper-up of unconsidered trifles', add amusement to the later scenes of the play; and his songs ‘When daffodils begin to peer’ and ‘Jog on, jog on, the footpath way’ are famous.
WISE

William James (1859–1937), bibliographer, collector, and editor, who formed the great Ashley Library (see LIBRARIES). In 1934 his credit as a bibliographer was gravely damaged by the publication of a number containing the laws of cricket, scores of 100 and upwards from 1850 to 1863, records of extraordinary matches, etc. The publication continues, and it remains the cricket enthusiast's vade-mecum.

Wisdom (also Mind, Will and Understanding or Wisdom, Who Is Christ), a morality play from c.1460, one of the group called Macro plays, describing the seduction by Lucifer of Mind, Will, and Understanding in a series of dances. Ed. Mark Eccles in The Macro Plays (EETS 262, 1969).

WISE, Thomas James (1859–1937), bibliographer, collector, and editor, who formed the great Ashley Library (see LIBRARIES). In 1934 his credit as a bibliographer was gravely damaged by the publication of a book (An Enquiry into the Nature of Certain 19th-Century Pamphlets by J. Carter and G. Pollard) which proved that a large number of rare pamphlets whose authenticity depended upon Wise's statements were in fact forgeries—in particular an edition of E. B. Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese said to have been published in Reading in 1847.

WISHART, William (c.1692–1753), Scots cleric and controversialist, and co-founder of the Rankenian Club. An early collaborator with Arbuckle, Turnbull, and Hutcheson, he was an energetic exponent of the moral sense philosophy of Shaftesbury and Hutcheson. In addition to sermons, he published anonymous satires on Berkeley's Alciphron in 1734 and Doddridge's Life of Col. Gardiner in 1747. As principal of Edinburgh University, he led the successful opposition to Hume's appointment as a professor in 1744–5.

Witch, The, a play by T. Middleton, written before 1616, not printed until 1778.

The principal part of the plot is based on the story of the revenge exacted by Rosamond in 572 on her husband Alboin, ruler of Lombardy. In Middleton's play the duchess is obliged by her husband to drink a health at a banquet out of a cup made from her father's skull and, to avenge herself, purchases by her pretended favours the help of a courtier Almachides, to kill her husband. *(The same subject is treated in D'Avenant's Albovine, and in Swinburne's Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards.) In this and the subordinate intrigue, the assistance of the witch Hecate is called in, and part of the interest of the play lies in the comparison between Middleton's Hecate and the witches in Shakespeare's Macbeth. Lamb in his Specimens indicated the difference between them.

Witch of Atlas, The, a fantasy poem by P. B. Shelley, written in the summer of 1820, on his return from a solitary pilgrimage to Monte San Pellegrino, Lucca, in Italy, published 1824.

Shelley composed this playful work of 78 stanzas in ottava rima within the space of three days. The beautiful Witch (whom he had presumably met on his pilgrimage) is the daughter of Apollo, and the spirit of mischief and poetry. She bespots herself amid pyrotechnic imagery of magic boats, airships, storms, and fireballs. Her mysterious companion is the Hermaphrodite, and together they circle the globe, weaving spells over recalcitrant kings, priests, soldiers, and young lovers (whose inhibitions are blissfully dissolved). Mary Shelley disliked the poem; Shelley replied in verse, asking if she were 'critic-bitten'.

Witch of Edmonton, The, a tragi-comedy by Dekker, Ford, Rowley, 'etc.' (possibly Webster?), first performed probably 1621, not published until 1658. It is partly based on the story of Elizabeth Sawyer, who was hanged as a witch in April 1621.

Frank Thorney marries his fellow servant Winifred, without his father's knowledge and against his will. To save himself from being disinherited, at his father's bidding he also marries Susan Carter, and presently, to extract himself from his embarrassment, murders her and attempts to throw the guilt on her two rejected suitors, but is discovered and in due course executed.

In a second distinct plot, the old woman of Edmonton is persecuted by her neighbours because she is, in her own words, 'poor, deform'd and ignorant', and to revenge herself she sells her soul to the devil, who appears to her in the form of a dog. 'Some call me witch; And being ignorant of my self, they go About to teach me how to be one.' Her character is notable for the characteristic sympathy shown by Dekker for the poor outcast, and the tone of the play is markedly humane. Both plots reflect the theme of revenge, but are otherwise little connected.

WITHER, George (1588–1667), poet and pamphleteer, born at Bentworth in Hampshire, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. His satires Abuses Stript and Whipt, published 1613, in spite of the innocuous character of their denunciations of Avarice, Gluttony, and so on, earned him imprisonment in the Marshalsea. There he wrote five pastorals under the title of The Shepherds Hunting, a continuation of The Shepheard's Pipe, which he had written in conjunction with William Browne, the 'Willie' of these verses. In the second of these, Wither (in the character of Philarete) describes the 'hunting of foxes, wolves and beasts of prey' (the abuses) which got him into trouble with the government. His Fidelia, a poetical epistle from a faithful nymph to her inconstant lover, appeared in 1617 (privately printed 1615) and again, with the famous song ‘Shall I, wasting in despair’, in 1619; it was this song, printed by Percy in his Reliques, that was to rescue Wither’s reputation from a century of neglect.

Wither’s self-aggrandizing Motto: Nec Habeo, nec Careo, nec Curo (1621) led to another, but not his last, spell of imprisonment. In 1622 appeared Faire-Virtue, the Mistresse of Phil’Arete, a long sequence of poems in various verse forms (octosyllabics, sonnets, diamond-shaped verses, etc.) in praise of his semi-allegorical mistress. From this time Wither’s poetry became increasingly religious and satirical in tone, which led to accusations that he was a Puritan, and his portrayal as ‘Chromonomastix’ in Jonson’s masque Time Vindicated (1623). He published The Hymnes and Songs of the Church in 1623, a poem on the plague in 1628, a book of emblems in 1634–5, and Heleluiah in 1641. During the Civil War he raised a troop of horse and wrote many pamphlets for Parliament, and in 1642 was captain and commander of Farnham Castle, but after the war devoted much energy to petitions and litigation on behalf of his own lost property.

No complete edition of Wither’s work has been published, but several collections were printed by the Spenser Society from 1871, and there is a two-volume edition with a biographical introduction by F. Sidgwick (1902).

Wittiterly, Mr and Mrs, in Dickens’s Nicholas Nickleby, typical snobs.

Wits, The, a comedy by *D’Avenant, published 1636, revised by him after the Restoration, and generally considered his best comedy.

Young Pallatine, a wit, who lives in London on an allowance, but finds it unequal to his wants, is in love with Lucy, who sells her jewels to provide him with money and is in consequence turned out by her cruel aunt, who suspects her of misconduct. She takes refuge with Lady Ample, the rich ward of Sir Tyrant Thrift, who proposes to force an unwelcome marriage on his ward before he loses control over her. Meanwhile Pallatine’s wealthy elder brother comes to town, with old Sir Morglay Thwack, for a spell of dissipation. He tells young Pallatine that he will never more give him money, but that he must live by his wits, as he himself and Thwack propose to do. In pursuit of this purpose they become involved in a series of adventures, are thoroughly fooled, and the elder Pallatine is released from his troubles only on making liberal provision for his brother and Lucy. Thrift is likewise fooled and held to ransom.

WITTGENSTEIN, Ludwig Josef Johann (1889–1951), born in Vienna, and educated at Linz and Berlin. He came to England in 1908; he lived most of his adult life in Cambridge, where he was professor of philosophy (1939–47). Trained as an engineer, he came to philosophy through the study of the philosophy of mathematics with B. Russell. He himself published only the Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus (1922); in this aphoristic and difficult book he presents the view that the only meaningful use of language is as a picture of empirical, scientific fact; otherwise language will be tautological, as in logic and mathematics, or nonsensical, as in metaphysics and judgements of value. About 1930 he began to doubt the correctness of this approach; he gradually developed the view that language had a vast multiplicity of uses, which he likened to the multiplicity of tools in a carpenter’s tool-bag, and that the traditional problems of philosophy arose from a misunderstanding of the use of those concepts in terms of which the problems arose; this misunderstanding he likened to mental cramp or bewilderment, and held that the problems could be dissolved by carefully bringing out the true character of the language in which they were framed. Thus there were no philosophical results, in the form of answers to questions, but only the growth and dissolution of philosophical puzzlement. Among other posthumously published writings, the Philosophical Investigations (1953) contain a full account of this later position.

Wives and Daughters, the last and unfinished novel of E. *Gaskell, published in the Cornhill Magazine, 1864–6, and in volume form 1866.

This novel, Mrs Gaskell’s masterpiece, centres on two families, the Gibsons and the Hamleys. Mr Gibson, surgeon in the little country town of Hollingford, is a widower with one daughter, Molly, who is a child when the story starts, but as she grows up her father feels he ought to marry again for her sake, and proposes to a widow, Mrs Kirkpatrick, formerly governess in the family of Lord Cumnor, the local magnate. Molly passionately resents her father’s marriage, and is made unhappy by her graceful stepmother’s shallowness, but she loyally tries to accept the new situation, and her lot is improved when her stepmother’s daughter by her previous marriage, Cynthia, who has been brought up in France, joins the household. Cynthia is a fascinating beauty, more sincere than her mother, but with few moral principles.

The Hamleys are an ancient county family—the proud and hot-tempered squire, his invalid wife, their elder son Osborne who is handsome and clever and his parents’ favourite, and a younger son, Roger, sturdy, honest, and a late developer. Molly Gibson often stays with the Hamleys, and discovers by accident that Osborne is secretly married to a French nursery-maid. Molly, who at first found Roger unattractive, has begun to love and admire him, but he becomes engaged to Cynthia, and, being by now a successful scientist, goes off on an expedition to Africa. Cynthia is in fact already secretly engaged to Preston, Lord Cumnor’s clever but ill-bred agent, and she enlists Molly’s help in extricating herself from this entanglement, by a series of secret meetings which compromise Molly’s reputation. Osborne Hamley is bitterly estranged from his father, but when Osborne dies and the secret of his marriage is revealed, Squire Hamley, repenting his harshness, adopts Osborne's baby son. Cynthia throws over Roger Hamley and marries a man more suited to her, and when Roger returns he has realized that it is Molly whom he really loves. Like the plants and insects that Roger shows Molly through his microscope, the habits, loyalties, prejudices, petty snobberies, rumours, adjustments of a whole countryside hierarchy are displayed by Mrs Gaskell with minute and loving observation, equally acute for the aristocratic Lady Cumnor and her satirical and kind-hearted daughter Lady Harriet, who befriends Molly, and for old Silas, Squire Hamley's dying gamekeeper. Unlike some of Mrs Gaskell's earlier novels, Wives and Daughters is expertly constructed, convincing in all its incidents and dialogues, and peopled by fully realized characters.

WODEHOUSE, Sir Pelham Grenville (1881–1975), born in Guildford, the son of a civil servant who became a judge in Hong Kong. He spent much of his childhood in England in the care of various aunts, and was educated at Dulwich College, which he always remembered with affection. He soon abandoned a career with the Hong Kong Bank for literature; he began by writing short stories for boys' magazines, and later published extensively in the Strand Magazine, Punch, etc., establishing himself as one of the most widely read humorists of his day. His first novel was published in 1902, and his prolific output, of over 120 volumes, included The Man with Two Left Feet (1917), the collection of stories which first introduced Jeeves and Bertie Wooster; a series of Jeeves volumes (My Man Jeeves, 1919; The Inimitable Jeeves, 1923; Carry On, Jeeves, 1925, etc.); and other works featuring such favourite characters as Lord Emsworth (and his prize sow, the Empress of Blandings), Mr Mulliner, Psmith, several redoubtable aunts, and many patrons of the Drones Club. Wodehouse's amiable career, which also embraced successes in musical comedy, the theatre, and Hollywood, was interrupted by the Second World War, when he was captured by the Germans at Le Touquet in 1940. He was interned and then released, but not allowed to leave Germany, and unwisely accepted an invitation to broadcast to America. Despite the innocuous nature of the broadcasts, this caused a scandal in England, and after the war he settled in America (where he had previously lived for some years), taking American citizenship in 1955. He continued to write prolifically until the end of his life, and to retain the warm admiration of his many readers. See Frances Donaldson, P. C. Wodehouse (1982).

WOFFINGTON, Peg (Margaret) (c.1714–60), celebrated actress, daughter of a Dublin bricklayer. She was engaged by J. *Rich for Covent Garden in 1740, and was immediately successful, acting in a great number of leading comic roles. She had many lovers, and lived for some time with *Garrick. She is the subject of Masks and Faces (1852), a play by C. *Reade and Tom *Taylor, on which Reade based his novel Peg Woffington (1853).

WOLCOT, John (1738–1819), satirist, who wrote under the pseudonym 'Peter Pindar'. He began his career as a physician, took holy orders, then returned to the practice of medicine until 1778, when he came to London and began the writing of vigorous and witty satirical verses. Among these were Lyric Odes to the Royal Academicians (1782–5), mocking their painting; a *mock-heroic poem, The Louisa, published in five cantos between 1785 and 1795, and various other satires on George III. Bozzy and Piozzi, in which *Boswell and Mrs *Thrale set forth their reminiscences of Dr *Johnson, appeared in 1786, as did his Poetical and Congratulatory Epistle to James Boswell. In 1787 appeared Instructions to a Celebrated Laureate, which professes to teach *Warton how he should celebrate the visit of George III to Whitbread's brewery.

WOLFE, Charles (1791–1823), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, curate of Donoughmore, Co. Down, from 1818 to 1821. He was the author of the well-known lines on The Burial of Sir John Moore, his own poem of note, apparently based on Southey's narrative of Dr *Johnson, appeared in 1786, as did his Poetical and Congratulatory Epistle to James Boswell. In 1787 appeared Instructions to a Celebrated Laureate, which professes to teach *Warton how he should celebrate the visit of George III to Whitbread's brewery.

WOLFE, Thomas Clayton (1900–38), American novelist, born in North Carolina, the son of a stonemason, and educated at the university there and at Harvard, where he studied playwriting. He made his name with his autobiographical novel Look Homeward, Angel (1929), which describes at length and with much intensity the adolescence of Eugene Gant; this was followed by a sequel, Of Time and the River (1935), and various posthumous works, which include The Web and the Rock (1939) and its sequel You Can't Go Home Again (1940). Passionate, proflix, rhetorical, and shapeless, Wolfe’s novels lacked discipline; he was unable or unwilling to prune his own work, which owed much in its published form to editorial assistance, but its emotional power won many readers, particularly among the young. He died of an infection following pneumonia.

WOLFE, Tom (1931– ), American novelist and journalist; born Thomas Kennerly Wolfe Jr in Richmond, Virginia, he began his career as a journalist reporting for the Washington Post (1959–62). With his contemporaries Joan Didion and Hunter S. Thompson he opened a school at Newington Green in 1784 with her sister Eliza and a friend; there she made the acquaintance of R. Price and other eminent Dissenters. In 1786, after writing Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1787) (see EDUCATION, LITERATURE OF), she went to Ireland as governess to Lord Kingsborough’s children; she returned in 1788 and spent some years writing reviews and translations for the radical publisher J. Johnson, who published her novel Mary (1788), her A Vindication of the Rights of Men (1790, a reply to Burke) and her most famous work, A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792). During these years she met the members of Johnson’s circle, which included W. Godwin, Holcroft, and Fuseli. In 1792 she went to Paris, where she met Gilbert Imlay, an American writer, by whom she had a daughter, Fanny, in 1794; in the same year she published her ‘View’ of the French Revolution. In 1795 she travelled through Scandinavia, accompanied by her maid and her daughter, a journey which produced her remarkable and observant travel book Letters Written during a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway and Denmark, published by Johnson in Jan. 1796. She returned to London later in 1795, where Imlay’s neglect drove her to two suicide attempts; she reintroduced herself in 1796 to Godwin, and in 1797 she married him. She died from septicaemia shortly after the birth of her daughter, the future Mary Shelley. Godwin published a memoir in 1798, edited her Posthumous Works (which included her unfinished novel Maria) in the same year, and portrayed her in his novel St Leon (1799). See C. Tomalin, The Life and Death of Mary Wollstonecraft (1974); A Short Residence, published with Godwin’s Memoirs, ed. R. Holmes (1987); The Works, ed. Janet Todd and Marilyn Butler (1989).

Woman in the Moone, The, a prose play by *Lyly, published 1597. The shepherds of Utopia ask Nature to provide a woman to comfort their ‘sole estate’. Nature creates Pandora, endowing her with the qualities of the Seven Planets. Pandora’s moods and actions vary as the planets in turn assume the ascendant, with consequent complications among the shepherds.

The narrative, related in succession by Walter Hartwright and other characters in the story, starts with his midnight encounter on a lonely road with a mysterious and agitated woman dressed entirely in white, whom he helps to escape from pursuers. When working as a drawing master in the family of Mr Fairlie, a selfish valetudinarian, he falls in love with his niece Laura, who strikingly resembles the woman in white. She returns his love, but is engaged to Sir Percival Glyde, whom she marries. It comes to light that Sir Percival, whose affairs are embarrassed, has married Laura to get possession of her wealth, that he was responsible for the confinement of the woman in white, Anne Catherick, in an asylum, and that Anne Catherick and her mother know a secret concerning Sir Percival, the revelation of which he is determined to prevent. Unable to obtain Laura’s signature to the surrender of her money, Sir Percival and his friend Count Fosco (a fat, smooth villain, admirably conceived) contrive to get Laura confined in an asylum as Anne Catherick, while Anne Catherick, who dies, is buried as Laura Glyde. The device is discovered by the courage and resource of Marian Halcombe, Laura’s half-sister, and Laura is rescued. Hartwright, who has been abroad, returns and takes Laura and Marian under his care, and discovers Sir Percival’s secret (that he was born out of wedlock and has no right to the title). Sir Percival is burnt to death while tampering with a parish register in a last effort to save his position. Fosco is forced to supply the information which restores Laura to her identity, and is killed by a member of an Italian secret society which he has betrayed.

Woman Killed with Kindness, A, a domestic tragedy by T. *Heywood, acted about 1603, printed 1607.

Frankford, a country gentleman, is the husband of Anne, a ‘perfect’ wife. But his happiness is ruined by the treachery of Wendoll, a guest to whom Frankford has shown every kindness and hospitality. Frankford discovers the adultery of Anne and Wendoll, but instead of taking immediate vengeance on her, he determines to ‘kill her even with kindness’. He sends her to live in comfort in a lonely manor-house, only to find herself loved by her new husband, offers interesting perspectives on the main plot. The play is one of the most successful examples of English domestic tragedy.

Women’s Prize, The, or The Tamer Tamed, a comedy by J. *Fletcher, written 1604–1617, printed 1647. It shows the second marriage of Petruchio, from Shakespeare’s The Taming of the Shrew. Katharine is dead, and he marries Maria, who locks him out of his house on his wedding night, and further humiliates him until he is thoroughly subdued.

Woman Who Did, The, see Allen, G.

Women Beware Women, a tragedy by T. *Middleton, published 1657, 30 years after his death; a composition date has not been established.

Set in Florence, the action involves two interwoven plots. The sub-plot is concerned with the guilty love of Hippolito for his niece Isabella. Hippolito’s sister Livia acts as go-between, persuading Isabella she is no blood relation of her uncle: Isabella then consents to marry a foolish young heir as a screen for her own passion for Hippolito.

The main plot is loosely based on the life of the historical Bianca Cappello, who became the mistress, and then the consort, of Francesco de’ Medici (1541–87), second grand duke of Tuscany. In Middleton’s version, she is at the opening of the play innocently but secretly married to the poor but honest young Leantio, a merchant’s clerk. The duke sees her at a window and falls in love with her: in II. ii, while Livia outwits Leantio’s mother at chess (a scene invoked by T. S. *Eliot in *The Waste Land), the duke gains access to Bianca and seduces her. Thereafter both she and Leantio are plunged into the corruption of the court, and consumed by it. Bianca becomes the duke’s mistress: the duke, reproved by the cardinal, his brother, for his sin, contrives the death of Leantio, who has sworn everlasting enmity to Bianca, and accepted both financial and amorous compensation for her loss. These various crimes, in the last act, meet with retribution in a wholesale massacre of the characters, through the theatrical medium of a masque accompanied by poisoned incense: Bianca destroys herself by drinking deliberately from a poisoned cup.

The sisters Ursula and Gudrun Brangwen (who first appeared in *The Rainbow) live in Beldover, a Midlands colliery town. Ursula has been teaching for some years at the grammar school and Gudrun has just returned from art school in London. Ursula is in love with Rupert Birkin (a self-portrait of Lawrence), a school inspector involved in an unsatisfactory affair with Hermione Roddice, an eccentric and dominating literary hostess. Gudrun meets Gerald Crich, friend of Birkin and son of the local colliery owner. As a boy Gerald has accidentally killed his brother and now he feels responsible when his sister Diana is drowned. His father Walter is dying and he takes over management of the mine, his ruthless efficiency being both feared and respected by the miners; but with Gudrun he becomes increasingly helpless. Birkin breaks free from Hermione and her demanding love and hopes to find with Ursula the complete union between man and woman in which he believes. Gerald suffers in his relationship with Gudrun, his mixture of violence and weakness arousing a destructive demon in her. Birkin recognizes an emptiness in Gerald, and offers him love and friendship to be based on a new intimacy between men, but Gerald is unable to accept. Ursula and Birkin are married and together with Gudrun and Gerald they take a trip to the Alps where they meet the corrupt sculptor Loerke, the ‘wizard rat’, with whom Gudrun flirts. While Ursula and Birkin move towards a real tenderness and fulfilment the relationship between Gudrun and Gerald becomes purely destructive until finally, in blankness and despair, Gerald wanders off into the snow and dies. Lawrence completed Women in Love in 1916 but was unable to find a publisher until 1920 in the USA and the following year in London where it was described by a reviewer as an ‘analytical study of sexual depravity’ and an ‘epic of vice’. Lawrence himself thought it his best book.

Women’s Press, the, see FEMINIST CRITICISM.

women’s suffrage. The campaign for women’s suffrage began in 1866 when a group of women presented a petition to J. S. *Mill requesting female enfranchisement. Mill moved an amendment to the *Reform Act of 1867 to include women, which was defeated. Thereafter organizations sprang up all over the country and joined forces to form the National Union of Women’s Suffrage Societies (NUWSS). Owing to their agitation and to that of the female textile workers, by the end of the century a majority of MPs had pledged themselves to vote for women’s suffrage bills, which passed their second readings three times only to be blocked by governments.

To invigorate the campaign Mrs Emmeline Pankhurst (1858–1928) founded in 1903 the Women’s Social and Political Union (WSPU), and her daughter Christabel (1880–1958) in 1905 initiated mildly militant tactics, designed to make the incoming Liberals take the women’s demand seriously. Because of their youthfulness militants were known as suffragettes, and members of the NUWSS, led by Millicent Garrett Fawcett (1847–1929), as suffragists.

In 1912, when it became evident that other means were failing to break Asquith’s resistance, the Pankhursters resorted to destruction of empty property on a massive scale, which antagonized the public. The war brought the campaign virtually to an end; women’s patriotism (coupled with a fear of renewed militancy) induced Parliament in 1918 to enfranchise women over 30, provided they occupied or were the wives of occupiers of premises of not less than £5 annual value.

The campaign was supported by many writers; in 1908 the Women Writers Suffrage League was founded by Cicely Hamilton (1872–1952), journalist, playwright, and novelist, and journalist Bessie Hatton. Its president was Elizabeth Robins (1862–1952), who under the pseudonym ‘C. E. Raimond’ had written several novels; her play Votes for Women (1907) was highly influential. Other supporters included O. *Schreiner, M. *Sinclair, A. *Meynell, S. *Grand, R. *West, and V. *Hunt. Suffragists and suffragettes were widely portrayed in the literature of the period: see V. *Woolf’s Night and Day, H. G. *Wells’s Ann Veronica, G. B. *Shaw’s Press Cuttings, and many other works. Accounts of the movement were also written by leading feminists, including the Pankhursts and E. Pethick-Lawrence (1867–1954). It produced many periodicals, including Women’s Suffrage Journal, the Common Cause, Votes for Women, and Women’s Dreadnought.

WOOD, Anthony, or, as he latterly called himself, Anthony à Wood (1632–95), historian and antiquary, educated at New College School, Oxford, Thame School, and Merton College, Oxford. He prepared a treatise on the history of the University of Oxford, which was translated into Latin and edited (with alterations) by *Fell and published as *Historia et Antiquitates Univ. Oxon. (1674). Of this an English version by Wood, issued by John Gutch, is the standard edition. He received much ill-acknowledged help from *Aubrey. Wood published *Athenae Oxonienses (1691–2), a biographical dictionary of Oxford writers and bishops, containing severe judgements on some of these, and was expelled from the university in 1693 at the instance of Henry Hyde, for a libel which the work contained on his father, the first earl of *Clarendon. Several antiquarian manuscripts left by Wood were published posthumously. His Life and Times, ed. A. Clark, occupy five volumes of the Oxford Historical Society’s publications (1891–1902) in which series, also edited by Clark, appeared his History of the City of Oxford (3 vols, 1889–99).

WOOD, Ellen, née Price, better known as Mrs Henry Wood (1814–87), daughter of a glove manufacturer. She lived till her marriage at Worcester, whose neighbourhood she used as the background for her Johnny Ludlow short story series (1868–89). In 1836 she married Henry Wood, a banker, and lived in the Dauphine till she returned in 1856 to spend the rest of her life in London. She had an immense success with her first novel East Lynne (1861), a celebrated example of the novel of *sensation. She subsequently owned and edited the magazine the Argosy, and wrote nearly 40 novels, among the best of which are Mrs Halliburton’s Troubles (1862), The Channings (1862), and The Shadow of Ashlydyat (1863). Her ingenious plots about murders, thefts, and forgeries, her numerous court scenes and well-planted clues, make her in such novels as Lord Oakburn’s Daughters (1864), Elster’s Folly (1866), and Roland Yorke (1869) one of the forerunners of the modern detective story. The sensational, and occasionally supernatural, events in her novels are presented in solidly detailed settings of middle-class country-town communities of doctors and lawyers, bankers and manufacturers. She often used industrial and trade union problems—slumps, unemployment, strikes—in her novels; her hostile description of a strike in A Life’s Secret (1867) caused her publisher's office to be besieged by an angry mob. In spite of a commonplace style and a strong element of moralizing, many of her novels were world best-sellers, outstripping even *Dickens in Australian sales. East Lynne was repeatedly dramatized and filmed, and translated into many languages, from Welsh to Hindustani. See C. W. Wood, Memorials of Mrs Henry Wood (1894).

Woodcourt, Allan, a character in Dickens's Bleak House.

WOODFORDE, the Revd James (1740–1803), fellow of New College, Oxford. He held curacies in Somerset, then was rector of Weston Longeville, Norfolk, from 1774 (in residence from 1776) until his death. His diary, known as The Diary of a Country Parson (5 vols, ed. J. Beresford, 1924–31), was published in extracts, and covers the period of the American War of Independence and the French Revolution, but in the main the life he describes is matter-of-fact, concerned with local friends, minor travels, and daily events. His love of food and drink is recorded in frequent descriptions of meals ('Fowls boiled, Rabbitts smothered in onions', etc.). He is uninterested in literary matters, or in landscape and the natural world (though he writes of agricultural matters). The prose is not distinguished, the prolixity is not distinguished, and the abiding popularity of the work is due more to its social interest and period charm than to its literary qualities.

Woodhouse, Mr, the heroine's father in J. Austen's Emma.

Woodlanders, The, a novel by T. *Hardy, published 1887.

The scene is set in Little Hintock, a village deep in the woods of Dorset. In this luxuriant woodland country, lovingly described, live a group of native woodlanders, whose living depends upon trees, and certain outsiders with whom their lives become entwined. Giles Winterbourne, who tends trees and travels in the autumn with his cider-press, loves and is betrothed to Grace Melbury, daughter of a well-to-do Hintock timber merchant. But when she returns from her finishing school she appears as the social superior of Giles. At about the same time Giles suffers financial misfortune, and these facts together induce Grace’s father to bring the engagement to an end and to press his daughter into marriage with Edred Fitzpiers, a handsome and attractive young doctor who has settled nearby. Meanwhile Marty South, a village girl who had always loved Giles, has to sell her splendid hair to help herself and her sick father to live. Fitzpiers is soon lured away from Grace by a wealthy widow, Felice Charmond, who has come to live in the great house. The hope is illusory, and when Fitzpiers returns from his travels with Mrs Charmond Grace flies for refuge to Giles’s cottage in the woods. Not wishing to offend her by remaining in the cottage, Giles, although ill, makes for himself a shelter of hurdles: Grace discovers his condition, drags him back into his hut, and fetches Fitzpiers to assist her, but despite their efforts Giles dies. The loving, faithful Marty meets Grace by Giles’s deathbed, and together they regularly visit his burial-place. With Mrs Charmond's death Grace and Fitzpiers are reconciled, and Marty is left alone to tend Giles’s grave.

Writing to a friend in 1912, Hardy said of The Woodlanders, 'I think I like it, as a story, the best of all.'

Woodstock; or, The Cavalier. A Tale of the Year 1651, a novel by Sir W. *Scott, published 1826. The work was written when misfortunes were heaping themselves upon the author: his financial ruin, the death of his wife, and the serious illness of his beloved grandson; and there are clear parallels between the situation of Sir Henry Lee and himself. Incredibly, thus situated, he has produced an outstanding novel. Set in the Civil War, the novel centres on the escape from England of Charles II after the battle of Worcester. The scene is laid in the royal lodge and park of Woodstock, of which the old Cavalier, Sir Henry Lee, is ranger. His nephew Everard Markham, who, to his uncle’s displeasure, has taken the Parliamentary side, is in love with Lee’s daughter Alice. Charles arrives, disguised as the page of Lee’s son Colonel Albert Lee. The climax, when Cromwell arrives to capture the king, and discovers that he has escaped, results first in Cromwell’s ordering the execution of all his prisoners, down to Sir Henry’s wolfhound, and then, more generously, in his pardoning them.

WOOLF, Leonard Sidney (1880–1969), author, Fabian, and social reformer, the second son of a Jewish barrister who died in 1892. He was educated at St Paul’s, then at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a member of the Apostles and was much influenced by G. E. *Moore. He entered the colonial service and in 1904 went to Ceylon, which was to form the background for his first novel, The Village in the Jungle (1913), a sympathetic study of the difficulties and dangers of rural life, threatened by superstition, drought, disease, and the encroaching jungle; the effect of imperial government is shown as minimal. Woolf returned to England on leave in 1911, and in 1912 left the colonial service to marry Virginia Stephen (see below). After the publication of his second and last novel, The Wise Virgins (1914), he devoted himself to social studies, journalism, and political writing, although he and his wife continued to share a close intellectual comradeship and a commitment to the *Hogarth Press; her delicate mental health exacted constant care and attention, but despite this his energy and output remained impressive. He wrote on the Co-operative movement, socialism, imperialism, the League of Nations, and international affairs, was literary editor of the Nation (1923–30), and co-founder and joint editor of the Political Quarterly (1931–59). After the Deluge (2 vols, 1931 and 1939) and *Principia Politica (1953) were his most sustained attempt to formulate a political philosophy, but the five volumes of his autobiography, written after his wife’s death, reached a wider audience: Sowing (1960), Growing (1961), Beginning Again (1964), Downhill All the Way (1967), and The Journey Not the Arrival Matters (1969) together constitute a clear-sighted view of a life devoted to social progress and international understanding, and rich in intellectual and literary friendships. See D. Wilson, Leonard Woolf: A Political Biography (1978) for an account of Woolf’s political thoughts and writings.

Woolf, (Adeline) Virginia (1882–1941), daughter of Leslie *Stephen and Julia Duckworth (1847–95), born at Hyde Park Gate, where she lived with her sister Vanessa (later Vanessa *Bell) and her brothers until her father’s death in 1904. The Stephen children then moved to Bloomsbury, where they formed the nucleus of the *Bloomsbury Group. In 1902 she began to write for the *Times Literary Supplement, a connection which lasted almost until her death. In 1912 she married Leonard *Woolf; she was already working on her first novel, The Voyage Out, published in 1915. Realistic in form but already foreshadowing the lyric intensity of her later work, it describes the voyage to South America of a young Englishwoman, Rachel Vinrace; her engagement there to Terence Hewet; and her subsequent fever and rapid death. Virginia herself had meanwhile experienced one of the bouts of acute mental disturbance from which she had suffered since her mother’s death, and it was partly as therapy for her that she and Leonard founded, in 1917, the *Hogarth Press; its first production was Two Stories, one by each of them. Her second novel, also realistic, Night and Day (1919), set in London, centres on Katherine Hilbery, daughter of a famous literary family (modelled on Virginia’s family). The novel includes *Strachey, the *Sitwells, Ottoline *Morrell, R. *Fry, and many others; her diaries (5 vols, ed. Anna Olivier Bell and A. McNeillie, 1977–84) are a unique record of the joys and pains of the creative process. See also Virginia Woolf (2 vols, 1972), a biography by her nephew Quentin Bell; Deceived with Kindness (1984), a poignant memoir by her niece Angelica Bell; and Virginia Woolf (1996) by Hermione Lee.

Woolman, John (1720–72), American Quaker, who travelled during many years preaching the faith, and both wrote and spoke against slavery. He is best remembered for his Journal (1774), notable for its purity and simplicity of style. *Lamb wrote, ‘Get the writings of John Woolman by heart, and love the early Quakers.’

Woolner, Thomas (1825–92), poet and sculptor, one of the original *Pre-Raphaelite brethren, who contributed to the *Germ two cantos of what was to become My Beautiful Lady (1863). At first he met with small success as a sculptor, and in 1852 sailed for the Australian gold fields (his departure inspiring Ford Madox Brown's picture The Last of England), but returned in 1854 and became a prosperous portrait sculptor, doing busts and statues of (among many others) *Tennyson, *Newman, C. *Kingsley, and J. S. *Mill. His other poems include the blank verse Pygmalion (1881), The Piping Shepherd, which appears as a frontispiece to Pallgrave's Golden Treasury, is by him.

Wooster, Bertram (familiarly known as 'Bertie'), an amiable, vacuous young man-about-town in the stories of P. G. *Wodehouse; the employer of *Jeeves.

Wopsle, Mr. in Dickens's Great Expectations, a parish clerk who turns actor and plays Hamlet with indifferent success.

WOORDE, Wynkyn de (d. 1535), printer from Wörth in Alsace, probably met *Caxton in Cologne and was brought by him to London in 1476. He was Caxton's principal assistant until his death in 1491/2 whereupon de Worde succeeded to the printing business which he managed until his death, moving it to Fleet Street. He printed many important literary works in the 1490s, and the catalogue of his works is evidence of bibliographical demand between 1490 and 1535: for instance he sometimes printed several editions of the same grammar in a single year. See H. R. Plomer, Wynkyn de Worde and His Contemporaries (1925); J. Moran, Wynkyn de Worde (Wynkyn de Worde Society, 1960).

WORDSWORTH, Dorothy (1771–1855), the sister of William Wordsworth and his treasured companion throughout their adult lives. After an unsettled and partly orphaned childhood, away from her three brothers, Dorothy settled with William in 1795, and from that time they lived together, through William’s marriage until his death. After a short time in Dorset they moved to Alfoxden in Somerset, to be near *Coleridge at Nether Stowey. Here in 1798, when she, William, and Coleridge walked and talked, as Coleridge wrote, 'as three persons with one soul', she began her first journal. This was the Alfoxden Journal, but the manuscript has disappeared and only the months Jan.–Apr. 1798 remain. It is, however, valuable, not only for its close description of the Quantocks and the sea, but for the revelation of the companionship of the three friends in the heady year of the Lyrical Ballads. In 1799 William and Dorothy moved to Dove Cottage at Grasmere in the Lake District. The Grasmere Journal covers the years 1800–3 and was begun 'because I shall give William pleasure by it'. The entries are again filled with her love of landscape, season, walking, and weather; her skill with words is evident in the precise descriptions both of the world about them and of the daily events of life in Dove Cottage.

Dorothy kept several other journals of travels and expeditions, which also were not published until after her death. She wrote a brief journal of a Visit to Hamburgh and a Journey... to Goslar 1798–9. In 1805 she finished Recollections of a Tour Made in Scotland 1803, which exists in five manuscripts; the earlier, less formal, versions vividly describe the wild countryside and weather, the tremulous horse, the uneatable oatcake, and the wet sheets. (Coleridge, overwhelmed, abandoned the expedition at Loch Long.) Her spirited accounts of An Excursion on the Banks of Ullswater 1805 and An Excursion up Scawfell Pike 1818 were both used by Wordsworth in his Guide to the Lakes (1823). A long Journal of a Tour on the Continent 1820 conveys her intoxication with, especially, Switzerland, and the rubs of life on the road with William. A sprightly Journal of a Second Tour in Scotland followed in 1822, and a Journal of a Tour in the Isle of Man in 1828.

It is clear from passages in his notes and from certain of his poems (for instance, the untitled Daffodils) that Wordsworth made use of his sister’s journals. Coleridge seems also to have used the Alfoxden journal for certain passages in Christabel. Several of Wordsworth's poems, as well as the famous closing lines of Tintern Abbey, are addressed to Dorothy, including 'The Glow Worm', 'Ode to Lycoris', and 'To the Same'. Dorothy died, after many years of illness and senility, from arteriosclerosis. In his life (1933) her editor Ernest de Selincourt finds her 'probably... the most distinguished of English writers who never wrote a line for the general public'.

WORDSWORTH, William (1770–1850), born at Cockermouth, Cumbria, the son of an attorney; he attended (with Mary Hutchinson, his future wife) the infants' school in Penrith and, from 1779 to 1787, Hawkshead Grammar School. His mother died in 1778, his father in 1783, losses recorded in The Prelude, which describes the mixed joys and terrors of his country boyhood with a peculiar intensity. He attended St John's College, Cambridge, but disliked the academic course. In 1790 he went on a walking tour of France, the Alps, and Italy, and returned to France late in 1791, to spend a year there; during this period he was fired by a passionate belief in the French Revolution and republican ideals, and also fell in love with the daughter of a surgeon at Blois, Annette Vallon, who bore him a daughter (see E. Legouis, William Wordsworth and Annette Vallon, 1922). (This love affair is reflected in Vaudracour and Julia, composed 1804, published 1820, and incorporated somewhat anomalously in Book IX of The Prelude.) After his return to England he published in 1793 two poems in heroic couplets, An Evening Walk and Descriptive Sketches, both conventional attempts at the picturesque and the sublime, the latter describing the Alps. In this year he also wrote (but did not publish) a Letter to the Bishop of Llandaff (see Watson, R.) in support of the French Republic. England's declaration of war against France shocked him deeply, but the institution of the Terror marked the beginning of his disillusion with the French Revolution, a period of depression reflected in his verse drama *The Borderers (composed 1796–7, pub. 1842) and in ‘Guilt and Sorrow’ (composed 1791–4, pub. in part in 1798 as ‘The Female Vagrant’). In 1795 he received a legacy of £500 from his friend Raisley Calvert, intended to enable him to pursue his vocation as a poet, which also allowed him to be reunited with his sister Dorothy (above); they settled first at Racedown in Dorset, then at Alfoxden in Somerset, where they had charge of the son of their friend Basil *Montagu. The latter move (aided by T. *Poole) was influenced by a desire to be near *Coleridge, then living at Nether Stowey, whom Wordsworth had met in 1795. This was a period of intense creativity for both poets, which produced the *Lyrical Ballads (1798), a landmark in the history of English *Romanticism. (See ANTIQUE MARINER; IDIOT Boy, The; TINTERN ABBEY.) The winter of 1798–9 was spent in Goslar in Germany, where Wordsworth wrote sections of what was to be The Prelude and the enigmatic *Lucy’ poems. In 1799 he and Dorothy settled in Dove Cottage, Grasmere; to the next year belong ‘The Recluse’, Book I (later *The Excursion), ‘The Brothers’, *‘Michael’, and many of the poems included in the 1800 edition of the Lyrical Ballads (which, with its provocative preface on *poetic diction, aroused much criticism). In 1802 Wordsworth and Dorothy visited Annette Vallon in France, and later that year William married Mary Hutchinson, his financial position having been improved by the repayment of a debt on the death of Lord Lonsdale. In the same year William moved from Allan Bank (where he had lived from 1808) to Rydal Mount, Ambleside, where he lived the rest of his life. The great work of his early and middle years was now over, and Wordsworth slowly settled into the role of patriotic, conservative public man, abandoning the radical politics and idealism of his youth. Much of the best of his later work was mildly topographical, inspired by his love of travel; it records journeys to Scotland, along the river Duddon, to the Continent, etc. He was left a legacy by Sir George Beaumont in 1827, and in 1842 received a Civil List pension of £300 a year; in 1843 he succeeded *Southey as *poet laureate. He died at Rydal Mount, after the publication of a finally revised text of his works (6 vols, 1849–50), and The Prelude was published posthumously in 1850. His prose works include an essay, Concerning the Relations of Great Britain, Spain and Portugal . . . as Affected by the Convention of Cintra (1809), castigating the supine English policy, and A Description of the Scenery of the Lakes in the North of England, written in 1810 as an introduction to Wil­kinson’s Select Views of Cumberland.

De Quincey wrote of Wordsworth in 1835, ‘Up to 1820 the name of Wordsworth was trampled underfoot; from 1820 to 1830 it was militant; from 1830 to 1835 it has been triumphant.’ Early attacks in the *Edinburgh Review and by the anonymous author of a parody, The Simpliciad (1808), were followed by criticism and satire by the second generation of Romantics; *Byron and *Shelley mocked him as ‘simple’ and ‘dull’, *Keats distrusted what he called the *egotistical sublime’, and *Hazlitt, and later *Browning, deplored him as ‘The Lost Leader’, who had abandoned his early radical faith. But these doubts were counterbalanced by the enormous and lasting popularity of much of his work, which was regarded by writers such as M. *Arnold and J. S. *Mill with almost religious veneration, as an expression in an age of doubt of the transcendent in nature and the good in man. A great innovator, he permanently enlarged the range of English poetry, both in subject matter and in treatment (a distinction he would not himself have accepted).

Workers’ Educational Association, a movement founded in 1903 by Albert Mansbridge (1876–1952) to promote ‘the Higher Education of Working Men’, which soon received recognition from most universities. It provided tutorial classes (one of the pioneer tutors being R. H. *Tawney), and continues its work today, providing day and evening classes for democratically organized voluntary groups, with courses worked out in partnership between tutor and students.

World, by 'Adam Fitz-Adam', a weekly 'paper of entertainment', owned by R. *Dodson, and edited by E. *Moore. It ran from 1753 to 1756, and its contributors included *Chesterfield, Horace *Walpole, and *Jenyns.

Worldly Wiseman, Mr. in Bunyan's *Pilgrim's Progress, an inhabitant of the town of Carnal Policy, who tries to dissuade *Christian from going on his pilgrimage.

World's Classics, the, a series of cheap reprints of standard works of English literature, launched in 1901 by G. *Richards; its first titles included *Jane Eyre, *The Vicar of Wakefield, and *Barham's The Ingoldsby Legends, and the spine decoration of the series was designed by L. *Housman. In 1905 the series was bought by Henry Frowde for the *Oxford University Press; he introduced pocket editions on thin paper and by 1907 the ordinary edition was available in eight different styles, at prices ranging from 1s. to 5s. 6d. The series (which includes some translations, e.g. of *Tolstoy, *Montaigne, and others) was relaunched in paperback in 1980 and rebranded as *Oxford World's Classics in 1998.

World Wide Web (www), a global *hypertext medium based on the Internet, invented in 1990 by Tim Berners-Lee. Viewed on a computer screen, Web pages range in appearance from plain text to complex colour graphics. Links may be followed from page to page. Search engines will locate pages containing specified words or phrases. Information can be found rapidly by a combination of these methods. A fast, cheap publishing medium less permanent than print, the Web carries a mixture of scholarly, personal, and social traffic.

The work is a kind of gazetteer of England, in which the author takes the counties one by one, describes their physical characteristics, natural commodities, and manufactures, with comments on each, some his own aphorisms ('Knives . . . are the teeth of old men'), some proverbial ('Bean-belly Leicestershire, so called from the great plenty of that grain growing therein'). After these come short biographies of the local saints, Protestant martyrs, prelates, statesmen, writers, etc., and lists of the gentry and sheriffs. This work (which was used without acknowledgement by A. *Wood) is the source of many well-known anecdotes, such as that of *Raleigh laying his cloak for the queen in 'a flashy place'.

Worthies of the World, the Nine, 'three Paynims, three Jews, and three Christian men', namely Hector of Troy, Alexander the Great, and Julius Caesar; Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabaeus; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godefroi de *Bouillon (Caxton, preface to Le *Morte D'Arthur.) The list of worthies in Shakespear's *Love's Labour's Lost, V. ii, is not quite the same, for it includes Pompey and Hercules.

Wotton, Sir Henry (1568–1639), educated at Winchester and New and Queen's colleges, Oxford, where he became a close friend of *Donne. He entered the Middle Temple, then became agent and secretary to the earl of Essex, 1595, and was employed by him in collecting foreign intelligence. He was ambassador at the court of Venice and employed on various other diplomatic missions from 1604 to 1624. While on a visit to Augsburg he wrote in his host's album his famous definition of an ambassador, 'vir bonus peregre missus ad mentiendum Reipublicae causa', which he would have been content should have been thus Englished 'An Ambassador is an honest man, sent to lie abroad for the good of his country' (I. *Walton); Scioippius mentioned this in his printed diatribe against James I (1611). Wotton was provost of Eton, 1624–39. He published Elements of Architecture (1624). A collection of his poetical and other writings appeared under the title Reliquiae Wottonianae, containing his famous 'Character of a Happy Life' and 'On His Mistress, the Queen of Bohemia' ('You meaner beauties of the night') in 1651 (enlarged edns, 1672, 1685). His life was written by his friend Izaak Walton (1651). His poems appeared in J. Hannah's edition The Courly Poets from Raleigh to Montrose (1870) and Life and Letters, by L. Pearsall *Smith, appeared in 1907.

Would-be, Sir Politic and Lady, the foolish traveller and his garrulous wife in Jonson's *Volpone.

Wrayburn, Eugene, a character in Dickens's *Our Mutual Friend.

'Wreck of the Deutschland, The', a poem by G. M. *Hopkins occasioned by the shipwreck in Dec. 1875 of a German transatlantic steamer off the Kentish coast. Among the dead were five Franciscan sisters from Westphalia; the poem identifies them as victims of Bismarck's anti-Catholic 'Falk' laws, which forced many into exile. The complex, two-part poem juxtaposes the extraordinary bravery and Christian witness of the 'tall nun' ('a prophetess towered in the tumult, a virginal tongue told') with the situation of the speaker, 'way in the loveable west, I On a pastoral forehead of Wales', who has also experienced his master's 'lightning and lashed rod'. Ultimately the speaker reconciles the terrible deaths in the 'widow-making unfathering unfathering deeps' with Christ's sacrifice and God's providence. When Hopkins joined the Society of Jesus in 1868, his scruples precluded writing poetry; in 1875, when his rector suggested that 'someone should write a poem on the subject' of the Deutschland catastrophe, Hopkins seized the opportunity. The text experiments with a new metric he 'long had haunting [his ear]', *sprung rhythm. The Month, a Jesuit journal, would not publish the poem in 1876; R. *Bridges included it in the 1918 edition of Hopkins’s poetry, but cautioned readers about ‘the dragon at the gate’. Some critics consider ‘The Wreck’ an *ode.

WREN, Sir Christopher (1632–1723), son of Christopher Wren, dean of Windsor, 1635–58, educated at Westminster School and Wadham College, Oxford. He was a prominent member of the circle of scholars who later were founder members of the *Royal Society. With them he studied anatomy, mathematics, and astronomy, being appointed professor of anatomy at Gresham College, London, in 1657 and Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford in 1661. His first architectural works were the chapel of Pembroke College, Cambridge (1663–5), and the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford (1664–9). A few days after the Fire of London in 1666, he presented a plan for rebuilding the City, but it was not adopted. He was, however, made surveyor in charge of the City churches, and designed 52 of them. He had prepared a scheme for repairing St Paul’s before the fire, and when it became clear in 1668 that it must be rebuilt he prepared designs: work began on the new building in 1675 and it was finished in 1710. Wren also designed many other buildings, including the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Tom Tower, Christ Church, Oxford. Parentalia, or Memories of the Family of the Wrens (1750) is a collection of family documents made by Wren’s son Christopher.

Wren, Jenny, the business name of the doll’s dressmaker in Dickens’s *Our Mutual Friend. Her real name was Fanny Cleaver.

WREN, P(ercival) C(hristopher) (1885–1941), born in Devon and educated at Oxford. He had a varied and much-travelled life, working at one time as a member of the French Foreign Legion, and later for some years in India as assistant director of education. His first book of stories, *Dew and Mildew (1912), was set in India, but he did not achieve popular success until the publication of *Beau Geste (1924), the first of his Foreign Legion novels, a romantic adventure story which became a best-seller, and which was followed by Beau Sabreuer (1926), Beau Ideal (1928), etc.

WRIGHT, David (1920–94), poet, born in Johannes­burg, who lost his hearing at the age of 7. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and subsequently lived in London, Cornwall, and the Lake District. His volumes of poetry include *Poems (1949), which appeared in Tambimuttu’s *Poetry London imprint: he himself was a founder editor of the quarterly review X, 1959–62. He also published translations of *Beowulf (1957) and *The Canterbury Tales (1964). Deafness: A Personal Account was published in 1969.

WRIGHT, Joseph, of Derby (1734–97), English painter, who worked mainly in Derby. Wright’s subjects are novel—scientific experiments, industrial activity—and he was celebrated for effects of light—candlelight, moonlight, the flames of a forge, the windows of a mill at night. Wright was patronized by J. *Weggwood and Arkwright, and his works reflect the scientific curiosity that dominated intellectual life in the industrial Mid­lands. He was a friend of E. *Darwin, whose poem *The Botanic Garden is close in subject and feeling to Wright’s pictures; painter and poet move easily from modern engineering to classical allegory. In the 1770s and 1780s Wright, a friend of W. *Hayley, began to choose his subjects from literature; he was attracted by the macabre and by the Romantic melancholy of contemporary literature. He painted scenes from *Shakespeare, *Milton, and from contemporary writers, including *Beattie, *Sterne, and *Langhorne. *The Dead Soldier, from Langhorne, became a highly popular engraving.

WRIGHT, Joseph (1855–1930), lexicographer and phil­ologist, of working class Yorkshire origins and largely self-educated; editor (1891–1905) of the *English Dialect Dictionary (published at his own expense) and author of the *English Dialect Grammar (1905) and several primers and grammars of Old and Middle English, Old and Middle High German, and Gothic; his wife Elizabeth Mary Wright was his collaborator in several of his works.

WRIGHT, Judith (1915– ), Australian poet, brought up in New South Wales, where she still lives. Her first book, *The Moving Image (1946), made her reputation, which has been enhanced through more than a dozen later volumes, most recently the Collected Poems of 1994. From the beginning, her poems have been shapely in form, lyrical and meditative, concerned with love (as in her classic ‘Woman to Man’), and with the rural and wild landscapes of Australia. Since the 1960s she has been much involved with the conservation movement and its political implications: this has resulted in a sharper, more combative tone, angry with what she sees as white Australia’s betrayal of the Aborigines in matters of landownership and spiritual inheritance.

WRIGHT, Kit (1944–), poet, born in Kent, educated at Oxford; he now lives in London. Wright has been much praised as a master of light verse for his comic observations of human behaviour and his character­istic offbeat wit. His poems reveal a fascination with English eccentricity, and, as in *The Bear Looked over the Mountain (1977), compassionate portraits of charac­ters who are often lost, failed, or doubting their sanity. *Bump-Starting the Hearse (1983) includes ‘The Day Room’, a moving sequence on life in a psychiatric ward, and both books are collected in *Poems 1974–1983 (1988). His third collection is *Short Afternoons (1989). Wright is also a successful children’s author.

WRIGHT, Richard (1908–60), black American writer, brought up in Memphis, and largely self-educated; he joined the Communist Party in the 1930s, but left in the 1940s, as he records in *The God that Failed (1950). His best-known novels are the powerful and violent *Native Son (1940) and The Outsider (1953), both of which deal with tragedy in the lives of black victims of poverty and politics.

Wright, Thomas (1810–77), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was instrumental in founding the Camden, Percy, and Shakespeare societies. His published works, mainly on historical, literary, and antiquarian subjects, included Biographia Literaria (1842–6) and A History of Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages (1862). Among the many volumes he edited are Queen Elizabeth and Her Times (1838), The Vision and the Creed of Piers Plowman (1842), and Anecdota Literaria (1844).

‘Wulf and Eadwacer’, an Old English poem in 19 lines of varying length, one of the group called ‘Elegies’ from the Exeter Book. Its theme seems to be the separation of lovers, but it is very unclear, despite its powerfully suggestive atmosphere. It is often translated by modern poets, including Craig Raine in Rich (1984). See also The Old English Elegies, ed. M. Green (1983).

Wulfila, see Ulfilas.

Wulfstan [d. 1023], archbishop of York, author of homilies in English including the famous ‘Address to the English’, Sermo Lupi ad Anglos, in which he describes the desolation of the country brought about by the Danish raids and castigates the vices and demoralization of the people. Like his predecessor Oswald he held the sees of Worcester and York simultaneously from 1002 to his death (whereupon he was buried at Ely); this pluralism is possibly the reason why he is called reprobus and impius by some contemporary commentators. He was bishop of London in 996 and he reformed the monastery of St Peter’s, Gloucester, in 1022. He had contacts with Ælfric, with whom he shares a distinction as a writer of sermons in rhythmical, alliterative prose; only four sermons and one Pastoral Letter can be ascribed to him with any probability, on stylistic grounds. He drafted codes of laws for Ethelred from 1008 to 1015, and for Canute, despite his earlier deploiring of the Danish raids, from his accession in 1016 to Wulfstan’s death in 1023.

Wuthering Heights, a novel by E. Brontë, published 1847.

The story is narrated by Lockwood, temporary tenant of Thrushcross Grange, who at the opening of the novel stumbles unsuspecting into the violent world of Wuthering Heights, the home of his landlord Heathcliff. The narration is taken up by the housekeeper, Nelly Dean, who had been witness of the interlocked destinies of the original owners of the Heights, the Earnshaw family, and of the Grange, the Linton family. In a series of brilliantly handled flashbacks and time-shifts, Emily Brontë unfolds a tale of exceptional emotional and imaginative force. Events are set in motion by the arrival at the Heights of Heathcliff, picked up as a waif of unknown parentage in the streets of Liverpool by the elder Earnshaw, who brings him home to rear as one of his own children. Bullied and humiliated after Earnshaw’s death by his son Hindley, Heathcliff’s passionate and ferocious nature finds its complement in Earnshaw’s daughter Catherine. Their childhood collusions develop into an increasingly intense though vexed attachment, but Heathcliff, overhearing Catherine tell Nelly that she cannot marry him because it would degrade her, and failing to stay to hear her declare her passion for him, leaves the house. He returns three years later, mysteriously enriched, to find Catherine married to the insignificant Edgar Linton. Heathcliff is welcomed by Hindley, by now widowed with a son, Hareton, and a hardened gambler. Heathcliff’s destructive force is now unleashed; he marries Edgar’s sister Isabella and cruelly ill-treats her, hastens Catherine’s death by his passion as she is about to give birth to a daughter, Cathy, and brings Hareton and Hindley under his power, brutalizing the latter in revenge for Hindley’s treatment of himself as a child. Edgar Linton dies, after doing his best to prevent a friendship between Cathy and Heathcliff’s son Linton; Heathcliff has lured Cathy to his house, and forces a marriage between her and young Linton in order to secure the Linton property. Young Linton, always sickly, also dies, and an affection springs up between her, an unwilling prisoner at the Heights, and the ignorant Hareton, whom she does her best to educate. Heathcliff’s desire for revenge has now worn itself out, and he longs for the death that will reunite him with Catherine; at his death there is a promise that the two contrasting worlds and moral orders represented by the Heights and the Grange will be united in the next generation, in the union of Cathy and Hareton.

Early reviewers tended to dwell on the novel’s morbid and painful aspects, but their neglect has been overtaken by what is now a general recognition of the mastery of an extremely complex structure, acute evocation of place, poetic grandeur of vision, and a highly original handling of Gothic and Romantic elements inherited from lesser works.

Wyatt, Sir Thomas (1503–42). He came from a Yorkshire family, and was educated at St John’s College, Cambridge. He held various diplomatic posts in the service of Henry VIII in France, Italy, Spain, and the Netherlands. His first visit to Italy in 1527 probably stimulated him to translate and imitate the poems of Petrarch. In the same year he made a version of a Plutarch essay, based on Bude’s French translation, The Quyete of Mynde, which he dedicated to the queen (Catherine of Aragon) whom the king was in process of divorcing. Wyatt’s relationship with Henry VIII’s next bride, Anne Boleyn, was more executed, along with Anne’s other lovers, in 1536, WYCHErLEY, WYCLIF 1120

Wyatt's poetry is beset by problems in three main areas; authorship, biographical relevance, and artistic aims. Though the canon of Wyatt's poems is generally taken to include all the poems in the Egerton manuscript, even this cannot be proved with certainty, and there are many other poems whose attribution to him depends mainly upon association. The authenticated poems and translations include sonnets, rondeaux, epigrams, satires, lute songs, and a version (based on Wyatt's fortunes turned, with the execution of his mistress and was not fit to be a royal consort. He was certainly closely acquainted with his friend and patron Thomas *Cromwell, which is probably referred to in the sonnet (based on Petrarch) ‘The piller pearisht is whearto I Lent’. Wyatt himself was arrested, on charges of treason, in July 1541; though released two months later he never fully regained favour. He died in Oct. 1542, of a fever contracted by hard riding on a last diplomatic errand for the king. WYCLIF, John (c.1330–84), probably born at Hipswell (near Wycliffe), a village near Richmond in north Yorkshire. He came to Oxford in 1354 and was connected with Merton, Balliol, and the Queen’s colleges during his period there, from 1354 to 1351. He was a protégé of *John of Gaunt, and it was probably at his instance that he preached against *William of Wykeham and the Good Parliament in 1376. He was a trained scholastic who lectured and wrote on logic, 1361–72, and modern accounts of him often stress the philosophical (in which area he could be called an extreme exponent of *Realism) rather than the radically reforming side of him. His attacks on the authority and abuses in the Church, and ultimately his denial of Transubstantiation, led to repeated attempts to condemn him from at least 1378 onwards; he was finally condemned in 1380, and in 1381 he retired to Lutterworth, the living of which he had held since 1374, where he remained until his death on 31 Dec. 1384. His followers were known as *Lollards, and many of them were executed in the first quarter of the 15th cent. (such as *Oldcastle in 1417 and John Badby in 1410: for the latter, see *Hoccleve’s Regiment of Princes, 285–7). He was also an influence on John Huss and his followers in Bohemia, and through them perhaps ultimately on *Luther. His great significance lies in the Bible translations which he instigated and in the importance he and his followers have in the writings of such poets as *Chaucer and *Langland. Modern authorities, such as Anne Hudson, are reluctant to attribute particular English works, at least in the versions in which they survive, to Wyclif himself rather than to the Wyclifites in general. The earliest versions of Bible translations come from the 1380s and are traditionally associated with Purvey and Nicholas of Hereford. Recently such works as the 294-item Wyclifite sermon cycle have come under scholarly scrutiny, but Hudson says their literary merit is slight.

WYKEHAM, William of, see William of Wykeham.

WYLIE, Elinor Morton Hoyt (1885–1928), American poet and novelist, who left her first husband to elope with Horace Wylie, and left Wylie to marry the poet William Rose Benét (1886–1950), brother of S. V. Benét. Her works include Nets to Catch the Wind (1921, poems); The Venetian Glass Nephew (1925, novel); and The Orphan Angel (1926; in England as Mortal Image, 1927), a novel based on *Shelley’s life after his supposed rescue from drowning, infused by her ‘patent adoration’ of Shelley, which E. *Garnett tried to dissuade her from publishing. Her Collected Poems appeared in 1932. Beautiful, vain, and histrionic, she aroused both passionate admiration and passionate hostility; the latter, notably, from V. Woolf, whom she met in London in 1926. See S. Olson, Elinor Wylie; A Life Apart (1979).

WYNDHAM, Francis (1924– ), short story writer, editor and novelist, the author of two volumes of interlinked short stories, Out of the War (1974) and Mrs Henderson and Other Stories (1985); his milieu is that of the slightly fraying nostalgic upper middle class and its bohemian fringes: and the sexuality of the Older Woman is a recurrent theme. The Other Garden (1987) is a novella set during the Second World War and narrated by a young man who observes the misery and difficulties of the domestic front, particularly those of the repressed but compelling Kay Demarest, living a tragic and second-hand life through movie stars and novels. See The Collected Fiction (1992) with an introduction by A. *Hollinghurst. Wyndham co-edited (with Diana Melly) the Letters of Jean Rhys (1984).

WYNDHAM, John, the best-known pseudonym of John Wyndham Parkes Lucas Beynon Harris (1903–69), son of a barrister, who pursued several different careers before settling to a successful life as a writer, principally of *science fiction, a genre to which he was attracted partly through his early admiration of H. G. *Wells and Verne. He preferred the description ‘logical fantasy’ for his own works, which included The Day of the Triffids (1951), The Kraken Wakes (1953), The Chrysalids (1955), and The Midwich Cuckoos (1957). Several of his works were filmed; most are distinguished by the contrast between a comfortable English background and the sudden invasion of catastrophe, usually of a fantastic or metaphysical rather than a technologically suggestive nature.

The word ‘triffid’ has passed into the language to describe almost any kind of imaginary hostile and dangerous plant: Wyndham’s species, lethal and mobile monsters on average 7 feet high, were so called because of their three-pronged roots, on which they propelled themselves.

Wynmere and Wastour, an alliterative dream-poem of about 500 lines in a north-west Midland dialect, based on events of 1352–3 and thought to have been written shortly after that, discussing the economic problems of the day. The poet says that he saw in his dream two opposing armies drawn up against each other on the plain, with Edward III encamped above them. The king sends his son, the *Black Prince, to intervene and prevent the battle. The leaders of the two armies explain their causes: with Winner (the gainer of wealth in society) are the pope and the traditionally avaricious friars; with Waster (the prodigal spender) are the nobility and the soldiery. In the king’s judgement speech (which is unfinished), he sends Waster to the markets of London to stimulate the economy and Winner to the rich courts of the pope and the cardinals. In its concerns and methods, the poem has often been compared to, and said to be an influence on, Piers Plowman. Ed. F. Berry in B. Ford (ed.), The Age of Chaucer (1959).

WYNTOUN, Andrew of (c.1350–c.1425), a canon regular of St Andrews and author of The Orygynale Cronykil (c.1420), a metrical history of Scotland in octosyllabics, from the beginning of the world to the accession of James I. He becomes a valuable authority later in the work; among his stories is that of Macbeth and the witches, and of Macduff and Malcolm. The chronicle was first published in 1795. (See HUCHOWN.) Ed. F. J. Amours (Scottish Text Society, 6 vols, 1902–5, 1914).
Xanadu, in Coleridge’s ‘Kubla Khan’, the place where the Khan decreed ‘a stately pleasure-dome’.

XAVIER, St Francis (1506–52), a Spaniard, one of the founders of the Society of Jesus, and a famous missionary in the Far East. He died on his way to China and is buried in Goa. *Dryden’s life of St Francis Xavier (1688), a translation of a French work, La Vie deSaint François Xavier (1682), by D. Bouhours, is dedicated to Mary of Modena, the queen of James II.

XENOPHON (c. 430–352 BC), Athenian historian who left an account of a military expedition in which he participated (Anabasis), a history of his own times (Hellenica), a panegyric on a contemporary monarch (Agesilaus), chatty memoirs about *Socrates (Memorabilia, Symposium), and treatises on domestic economy, horsemanship, and hunting. His most popular work was however the Cyropedia, a fictionalized biography of the Persian king Cyrus. This created a vogue for such biographies in which the fictional element became progressively greater until the world saw the emergence of a new genre—the novel. The Cyropedia was translated into English by William Barker (?1552), contributed a story to Painter’s *Palace of Pleasure (1566), and was described by *Sidney as an ‘absolute heroical poem’. *Milton, on the other hand, spoke highly of the Memorabilia, whose account of Socrates he placed on a level with *Plato’s.

Ximena (in French Chimène), the wife of the *Cid. C. *Cibber wrote an adaptation of *Corneille’s Le Cid, called Ximena, or The Heroick Daughter (1712).

XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS, Cardinal Francisco (1436–1517), a Spanish statesman and Grand Inquisitor, who founded the University of Alcalá in 1506 and recruited the team of scholars who produced the *Complutensian Polyglot Bible.
Yahoo, the name of the beasts in human form described by Swift in the fourth part of *Gulliver’s Travels: the word has become widely known as the trade name of an Internet search engine.

Yates, Dornford, the pseudonym of Cecil William Mercer (1885–1960), whose sequence of stories about ‘Berry’ Pleydell and his family includes The Brother of Daphne (1914), Berry and Co. (1920), and The House that Berry Built (1945). Both this group and Yates’s ‘Chandos’ thrillers (Blind Corner, 1927, etc.) were much influenced by Anthony Hope (*Hawkins); both reflect a world of wealth and idleness and were immensely popular between the wars. See R. Usborne, Clubland (1963, 1974) and a life by A. J. Smithers (1982).

Yates, Dame Frances Amelia (1899–1981), Renaissance scholar, educated at University College London. Some of her most important work was on *Neoplatonism and the *Rosicrucian tradition in Renaissance thought, and their connections with literature and the drama; her publications include studies of *Florio (1934), The French Academies of the Sixteenth Century (1947), *Bruno (1964), The Valois Tapestries (1959, rev. 1975), The Art of Memory (1966), and Astraeea: The Imperial Theme in the Sixteenth Century (1975).

Year books, reports of English common law cases for the period 1292–1534, of great interest from a historical as well as a legal standpoint. They were succeeded by the law ‘Reports’. F. W. *Maitland began editing them, and the work is still going on.

Years, The, a novel by V. *Woolf, published 1937.

Her longest novel, and the most traditional of her later works, it traces the history of a family, opening in 1880 as the children of Colonel and Mrs Pargiter, living together in a large Victorian London house (later described by one of them as ‘Hell’), wait for their mother’s death and the freedom it will bring; it takes them through several carefully dated and documented sections to the ‘Present Day’ of 1936, and a large family reunion, where two generations gather. Its composition caused the author much difficulty, and she was even more than usually apprehensive about its reception, fearing that her return to the ‘novel of fact’ would be seen as a false step in her career; many of her friends were critical, but it was on the whole well reviewed, and sold well.

Yearsley, Ann, née Cromartie (1752–1806). She was born at Clifton, Bristol, the daughter of a dairywoman, and pursued her mother’s trade. She married in 1774 and had several children. She published three collections of poems (Poems, on Several Occasions, 1785; Poems on Various Subjects, 1787; The Rural Lyre, 1796). She was initially patronized by Hannah *More, whom she addressed as ‘Stella’ in the persona of ‘Lactilla’, but the friendship ended in some bitterness. She also wrote a play, Earl Goodwin (1791), and a *Gothic historical novel, The Royal Captives (1795), based on the story of the Man in the Iron Mask. See R. *Southey, Lives of the Uneducated Poets (1836; ed. J. S. Childers, 1925); The Polite Marriage (‘The Bristol Milkwoman’) (1938) by J. M. S. Tompkins; Lactilla: Milkwoman of Clifton (1996) by Mary Waldron. See also PRIMITIVISM.

Yeast, a novel by C. *Kingsley, published in *Fraser’s Magazine 1848, in volume form 1851.

This was the first of Kingsley’s novels and is crude as a literary work. It deals with some of the social and religious problems of the day (the miserable conditions of the rustic labourer, the Game Laws, and Tractarianism: see OXFORD MOVEMENT), largely by means of dialogues between the hero and various other characters. The story is that of the reactions of the generous but undisciplined nature of Lancelot Smith to the influences exercised on him by the philosophical Cornish gamekeeper Tregarva, the worldly Colonel Bracebridge, the Romanizing curate Luke, Lancelot’s orthodox love Argemone Lavington, and the philanthropic banker Barnakill; he is seen suffering the loss, first of his fortune, and then of Argemone. The story ends in a vague and semi-mystical indication that Lancelot is to seek his salvation in contribution to the regeneration of England.

Yeats, Jack Butler (1871–1957), painter and illustrator, brother of W. B. *Yeats, who contributed for many years to *Punch (1910–41) under the pseudonym ‘W. Bird’, and also did many illustrations for the *Cuala Press, although he remains better known for his oil paintings of Irish life and landscape.

Yeats, John Butler (1839–1922), Irish portrait painter, father of W. B. and J. B. *Yeats; his Letters to His Son W. B. Yeats and Others, 1869–1922 (ed. J. Hone, 1946) give a vivid portrait of cultural life in Ireland, in London (where he lived for some years from 1887 in Bedford Park), and in New York, where he spent his last 14 years, renowned, in Hone’s words, less as a painter than as ‘a critic, philosopher and conversationalist’.
YEATS, William Butler (1865–1939), eldest son of J. B.
*Yeats and brother of Jack *Yeats, both celebrated painters. He was born in Dublin and educated at the Godolphin School, Hammersmith, and the High School, Dublin. For three years he studied at the School of Art in Dublin, where with a fellow student, G.
*Russell (Æ), he developed an interest in mystic religion and the supernatural. At 21 he abandoned art as a profession in favour of literature, writing John Sherman and Dhoya (1891) and editing The Poems of William Blake (1893), The Works of William Blake (with F. J. Ellis, 3 vols, 1893), and Poems of Spenser (1906). A nationalist, he helped to found an Irish Literary Society in London in 1891 and another in Dublin in 1892; and he subsequently applied himself to the creation of an Irish national theatre, an achievement which, with the help of Lady *Gregory and others, was partly realized in 1899 when his play *The Countess Cathleen (1892) was acted in Dublin. The English actors engaged by the *Irish Literary Theatre gave place in 1902 to an Irish amateur company, which produced Yeats’s *Cathleen ni Houlihan in that year. The Irish National Theatre Company was thereafter created, and, with the help of Miss A. E. *Horniman, acquired the *Abbey Theatre in Dublin. Yeats’s early study of Irish lore and legends resulted in Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry (1888), *The Celtic Twilight (1893), and The Secret Rose (1897). Irish traditional and nationalist themes and the poet’s unrequited love for Maude Gonne, a beautiful and ardent revolutionary, provided much of the subject matter for The Wanderings of Oisin and Other Poems (1889), The Land of Heart’s Desire (1894), The Wind among the Reeds (1899), The Shadowy Waters
(1900), and much of his later plays as On Baile’s Strand
(1904) and Deirdre (1907).

With each succeeding collection of poems Yeats moved further from the elaborate, *Pre-Raphaelite style of the 1890s. In the Seven Woods (1903) was followed by The Green Helmet and Other Poems (1910), Poems Written in Discouragement (1913), Responsibilities: Poems and a Play (1914), and The Wild Swans at Coole (1917). His mounting disillusionment with Irish politics came to a head in 1912 and 1913 with the controversy over the Lane Bequest of French Impressionist paintings. The Easter Rising of 1916, however, restored his faith in the heroic character of his country. The following year he married Georgie Hyde-Lees, who on their honeymoon attempted automatic writing, an event that exercised a profound effect on his life and work. His wife’s ‘communicators’ ultimately provided him with the system of symbolism described in A Vision (1925) and underlying many of the poems in Michael Robartes and the Dancer (1921), Seven Poems and a Fragment (1922), The Cat and the Moon and Certain Poems (1924), October Blast (1927), The Tower (1928), The Winding Stair (1929), Words for Music Perhaps and Other Poems (1932), Wheels and Butterflies (1934), The King of the Great Clock Tower (1934), A Full Moon in March (1935), New Poems (1938), and Last Poems and Two Plays (1939). In the poems and plays written after his marriage he achieved a spare, colloquial lyricism wholly unlike his earlier manner, although many themes of his early manhood reach their full flowering in the later period.

Yeats served as a senator of the Irish Free State from 1922 to 1928; was chairman of the commission on coinage; and in 1923 received the *Nobel Prize for literature. He died in the south of France, but in 1948 his body was brought back to Ireland and interred at Drumcliff in Sligo, where much of his childhood had

Yeats’s other publications include such collections of essays as Ideas of Good and Evil (1903), Discoveries (1907), Per Amica Silentia Lunes (1918), The Cutting of an Agate (1919), and On the Boiler (1939). Most important of the many books he edited and introduced was The Oxford Book of Modern Verse (1936), a somewhat eccentric and personal selection. He wrote good letters, and five major collections have been made: Letters on Poetry from W.B. Yeats to Dorothy Wellesley (1940), Florence Farr, Bernard Shaw and W.B. Yeats (1941), W. B. Yeats and T. Sturge Moore: Their Correspondence 1901–37 (1953), W. B. Yeats: Letters to Katharine Tynan (1953), and Allan Wade’s notable edition of The Letters of W. B. Yeats (1954). Also posthumously published were his Collected Poems (1950), Collected Plays (1952), Autobiographies (1955), The Variorum Edition of the Poems (1957), Mythologies (1959), Essays and Introductions (1961), The Senate Speeches of W. B. Yeats (1961), and Explorations (1962).

Ye Banks and Braes, a lyric by *Burns.

yellow-backs, cheap editions of novels, so called from being bound in yellow boards. They were the ordinary ‘railway novels’ of the 1870s and 1880s.

Yellow Book (1894–7), a handsome, short-lived publication, starting in its time and immediately notorious, devoted to literature and art. Published by J. *Lane and edited by H. *Harland, with the initial assistance of *Beardsley as art editor, its first issue (which included *Beerbohm’s essay ‘A Defence of Cosmetics’) provoked a public storm which did not subside during the three years of the Book’s life. Writers published included H.
*James, *Gosse, *Le Gallienne, Arnold *Bennett, and
*Dowson; among artists represented were Beardsley, Walter Sickert, and Wilson Steer.
Yeobright, Clym, Thomasin, and Mrs, characters in Hardy's The Return of the Native.

YEVTUSHENKO, Yevgeny (1933– ), Russian poet, born in Zima in southern Siberia and educated in Moscow. He travelled extensively and became widely known internationally as a writer who attempted to represent a new generation of Russian writers, who defended *Modernism and protested against censorship in the post-Stalin era. His first volume of verse appeared in 1952, and he achieved recognition with the long poem Zima Railway Station (Winter Station, 1956); this was followed by Babii Yar (literally, 'the women's cliff', 1961), a poem evoking the notorious wartime massacre of women and children near Kiev and tackling the dangerous theme of Russian anti-Semitism. Other works include his Letter to Esenin (1965), hailing *Esenin as a free spirit. A Precious Autobiography (1963) aroused much controversy when it was published in Paris.

Yiddish, derived, either directly, or through the German-Jewish jiddisch, from the German jüdisch, Jewish; the language used by Jews in Europe and America, consisting mainly of German, with Balto-Slavic or Hebrew words, and printed in Hebrew characters. One of the few Yiddish writers to achieve an international reputation is I. B. *Singer.

YONGE, Bartholomew (1560–1612). He travelled in Spain in 1578–80, and subsequently translated the Spanish romance Diana by *Montemayor; his version was published in 1598, with a dedication to Lady *Rich. It has been edited by J. M. Kennedy (1968).

YONGE, Charlotte M(ary) (1823–1901), daughter of an army officer. She was born and lived all her life in the Hampshire village of Otterbourne, and was educated at home by her parents. In 1838 she came under the influence of *Keble, then rector of the neighbouring parish of Hursley, and absorbed the Tractarian religious views which thereafter coloured all her writings. Her best-known novel is *The Heir of Redelyffe (1853); her other novels of contemporary life include Hearts-ease (1854), The Daisy Chain (1856), Dynevor Terrace (1857), Hopes and Fears (1860), The Trial (1864), The Clever Woman of the Family (1865), The Pillars of the House (1873), and Magnum Bonum (1879). She also wrote many historical romances for children (including The Little Duke, 1854; The Dove in the Eagle's Nest, 1866; and The Chaplet of Pearls, 1868) and numerous historical textbooks, short stories of village life, and a biography of Bishop Patteson (1874). For 40 years she edited a girls' magazine, the Monthly Packet.

Her chief excellence as a novelist was her loving depiction of life in large families, particularly sibling relationships, presented with convincing dialogue and unstinted incident. Her novels of her own times are incidentally a mine of information about social mobility, ecclesiastical change, and developments in education and housing. She wrote mainly for young women readers, of whom she had a worldwide following, but her books were also admired by *Tennyson, *Kingsley, *Rossetti, and W. *Morris, and were said to have been the favourite reading of young officers in the Crimean War. See G. Battiscombe, Charlotte Mary Yonge (1943); M. Mare and A. C. Percival, Victorian Best-Seller: The World of Charlotte M. Yonge (1947).

Yorick, (1) in Shakespeare's Hamlet (v. i), the king's jester, whose skull the grave-diggers throw up when digging Ophelia's grave; (2) in Sterne's Tristram Shandy, the lively, witty, sensible, and heedless parson, of Danish extraction, and probably a descendant of Hamlet's Yorick. Sterne adopted 'Yorick' as a pseudonym in his *Sentimental Journey and entitled his own homilies The Sermons of Mr Yorick, first published in 1760.

Yorick to Eliza, Letters from, by *Sterne, published 1773.

A collection of ten brief letters from Sterne to Mrs E. *Draper, written in 1767, and following the course of his growing passion for her.

Yorkshire Tragedy, A, a play published 1608, stated in the title to be by Shakespeare; but internal evidence and the late date make it extremely improbable that he had any part in its authorship. It is probably by *Middleton.

The play is based on certain murders actually committed in 1605. The husband, a brutal and depraved gamester, suddenly filled with remorse when he realizes his shame, murders his two children and stabs his docile and devoted wife. It is extremely brief and probably formed part of a composite programme of Four Plays in One.

YOUNG, Andrew John (1885–1971), born in Scotland, educated at school and university in Edinburgh, ordained a minister of the Free Church in 1912. In 1910 his father paid for the publication of his Songs of Night, the first of many slim volumes of poetry which were greatly admired by an ever-widening circle. The first Collected Poems appeared in 1936 and the verse play Nicodemus in 1937. In 1939 Young was ordained in the Church of England. The Green Man (1947) is sometimes considered his best collection. In 1952 he published a long, disturbing poem, 'Into Hades', which was later combined with the visionary 'A Traveller in Time' to create Out of the World and Back (1958), his most ambitious work. His lifelong interest in botany was reflected in a prose account of his travels and searches, A Prospect of Flowers (1945), but also in many lyrics, whose subjects also included many aspects of the natural world. His spare line, sharp specific imagery, quiet concision, and skill with conceit brought him much admiration. The influence of literary fashions barely touched him, but he acknowledged a particular debt to *Hardy, and to *Crabbe and G. *Herbert. The Complete Poems were revised in 1974.
YOUNG, Arthur (1741–1820), the son of a Suffolk clergyman, who became well known as an agricultural theorist, though unsuccessful as a practical farmer. He wrote a large number of works on agricultural subjects and edited the periodical Annals of Agriculture (1784–1809), which extended to 47 volumes (parts of another volume were published in 1812 and 1813). His power of political and social observation is shown by his Political Arithmetic (1774) and his Tour in Ireland (1780), the latter highly praised as a true account of the country by M. *Edgeworth, but his fame rests chiefly on Travels in France (1792). Young was connected with the *Burneys, and his country house, Bradfield Hall, Suffolk, is described in Fanny Burney’s Camilla. He took her to hear Hastings’s trial in Westminster Hall and she was charmed with him. The death of a much-loved daughter in 1797, and a growing religious melancholia (influenced by his friend W. *Wilberforce, darkened his later years, and he went blind about 1811. His autobiography, edited by M. Betham-Edwards, appeared in 1898, and there is a life by J. G. Gazley (1973).

YOUNG, Edward (1683–1765), born near Winchester and educated there and at Oxford. His early works include the tragedies Busiris, successfully produced at Drury Lane in 1719, and The Revenge, produced at the same theatre in 1721. In 1725–8 he published a series of satires under the title The Universal Passion (the love of fame), which were much admired until eclipsed by those of *Pope, who was a few years younger. Disappointed in more worldly ambitions, he took orders and became rector of Welwyn in 1730, where he spent the remainder of his long life; in 1731 he married Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the second earl of Lichfield, who died in 1740. Young’s most celebrated poem, The Complaint, or Night Thoughts on Life, Death and Immortality (1742–5, see Night Thoughts), is thought to commemorate her, her daughter by a previous marriage, and her son-in-law. A noted example of the *graveyard genre, it was extremely popular in both England and Europe. The Brothers, a tragedy written decades earlier, was performed and published in 1753, and Resignation, his last considerable poem, with a preface to Mrs *Boscawen, appeared in 1762. He was a friend of *Richardson, with whom he corresponded for many years. Dr *Johnson concludes his life with the words, ‘But, with all his defects, he was a man of genius and a poet.’

YOUNG, Francis Brett (1884–1954), novelist, short story writer, poet, and doctor. He was educated at the University of Birmingham, practised for some years in Devon, and served during the First World War in East Africa. He is remembered largely for his solid, traditional novels of the west Midlands, which include Portrait of Clare (1927) and My Brother Jonathan (1928), but he also wrote novels based on his African experiences, including Jim Redlake (1930) and They Seek a Country (1937). Poems 1916–1918 (1919) was written in Africa while he was convalescing from what proved permanent damage to his health, and The Island (1944) is a verse history of England, employing the verse forms of succeeding periods in strict chronological sequence.

YOURCENAR, Marguerite (1903–88), French classical scholar and historical novelist, born Marguerite de Crayencour in Brussels. Her first novel, Alexis (1929), was followed by many others, notably Mémoires d’Hadrien (1951, translated by her friend and companion Grace Frick, 1954, as Memoirs of Hadrian).

Ywain and Gawain, a northern romance from the first half of the 14th cent. of 4,032 lines in short couplets, surviving in a single manuscript. In spite of its title, the poem is principally concerned with Ywain, being a translation (with variations) from the 6,818 lines of Yvain by Chrétien de Troyes. As well as being briefer, the English translation (which is about 150 years later than the original) has some elements in common with other versions of the Ywain story (such as the Welsh Owein), and there has been much discussion of the relation it bears to the original. The English romance is much admired for its narrative life and clarity of diction.

Ywain kills the knight of a castle who seems to have magical connections with the weather, and, aided by her serving-lady Lunet, marries his widow Alundyne (Lunete and Laudine in Chrétien). Gawain persuades him to go, assisted by a lion, in search of adventure, abandoning his lady. The two knights have many adventures, ending by fighting each other incognito; but they recognize each other and are reconciled. At the end, Ywain is reconciled to Alundyne, again by the skills of Lunet. Many of the incidental themes in Chrétien (such as his commenting on *courtly love by cross-reference to Lancelot, his explanation of the name of Lunete by reference to the moon, and his general interest in the characters’ motivation) are played down or entirely suppressed in the English version.

ZAMYATIN, Evgeny Ivanovich (1884–1937), Russian writer born in central Russia, the son of a teacher. From 1902 he studied in St Petersburg and joined the Bolshevik Party (which he later left). He was arrested and exiled in 1905. From 1911 he lectured in naval architecture at the St Petersburg Polytechnic Institute: he spent 18 months in Newcastle upon Tyne, 1916–17, supervising the construction of Russian ice-breakers, and the two stories that sprang from this experience, ‘Islanders’ (1917) and ‘The Fisher of Men’ (1918), are devastating assessments of English life. After the revolution Zamyatin produced a steady flow of stories and edited collections by H. G. *Wells, G. B. *Shaw, *Jack *London, and O. *Henry. His novel *We (1920) was published abroad in the late 1920s, leading to a vicious campaign against him; he wrote to Stalin in June 1931 asking permission to emigrate and left Russia in November, eventually settling in Paris. Among Zamyatin’s best stories are ‘The North’ (1918), ‘The Cave’ (1920), ‘Mamaï’ (1920), ‘The Yawl’ (1928), and ‘The Flood’ (1929), in which his major theme, the cult of obsession and the primitive, is apparent, but he is best known for the dystopian satire *We. (See UTOPIA.) Indebted to Wells, in particular *The Time Machine, it was in turn acknowledged by *Orwell as an influence on *Nineteen Eighty-Four, though its widely suggested influence on *Brave New World was denied by A. *Huxley.

ZANGWILL, Israel (1864–1926), a noted Jewish spokesman, writer, and translator. The popular novel *Children of the Ghetto (1892) established his reputation by its realistic and sympathetically critical portrayal of London’s poor Jews, when alien immigration was a burning issue. *Ghetto Tragedies (1899), *Ghetto Comedies (1907), and *The King of Schnorrers (1894), a jeu d’esprit, contain vignettes of Jewish life. The historical *Dreamers of the Ghetto (1898) testifies both to Judaism’s inner strength and to its role in civilization. *The War for the World (1916) and *The Voice of Jerusalem (1920) combine apology with polemic. His plays are vehicles for ideas, notably *The Melting Pot (1909), which coined the phrase.

Zanis (or possibly ‘Zauzis’), a wise writer referred to by Chaucer in *Troilus and Criseyde (IV. 414), referring to Zeuxis who is a sage in the Alexander story. The form may come from a misreading of the text of *Boccaccio that Chaucer is following; but this is unlikely, since the Athenian painter Zeuxis is called ‘Zaniz’ in ‘The Physician’s Tale’ (see *Canterbury Tales, 13; VI. 16).

Zapolya, a ‘dramatic poem... in humble imitation of “The Winter’s Tale” of Shakespeare’, by S. T. *Coleridge, published 1817. Zapolya is a dowager queen of Illyria driven from the throne by the usurper Emerick. After an interval of 20 years she returns to power with her son Bethlen.

Zarathustra, see ZOROASTER.

Zarathustra, *Thus Spake, see NIECE.

Zastrozzi, see SHELLEY, P. B.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy, in Jonson’s *Bartholomew Fair, a canting, gluttonous Puritan, ‘a Banbury man’. Banbury was a town dominated by Puritans, who in 1610 had destroyed the ancient cross celebrated in the nursery rhyme.

Zeitgeist (German), the spirit of genius which marks the thought or feeling of a period.

ZÉLIDE, the name given to herself in a self-portrait by Isabella van Tuyll van Serooskerken, also known as Mme de Charrière (1740–1809), a Dutchwoman of good family, great intelligence and originality, and considerable beauty. She numbered among her many suitors *Boswell, who quickly reconciled himself to her rejection of his hand. Declining more brilliant matches, she married her brother’s Swiss tutor, the dull but worthy M. de Charrière. Her unhappy married life was brightened by friendship with *Constant, until she was ousted by Mme de *Staël. She wrote in French a number of novels, of which the best known are *Lettres neuchâtelaises (1784), *Mistress Henley (1784), and *Lettres écrites de Lausanne (1787). There is an interesting account of her life in G. *Scott’s *Portrait of Zélide.

Zelmane, in Sidney’s *Arcadia, the name assumed by Pyrocles when disguised as a woman.

Zeluco, a novel by Dr J. *Moore, published 1786.

In the author’s words, this novel ‘traces the windings of vice’ through the life of a wholly wicked man. Zeluco, a Sicilian noble, exhibits from childhood a character of cruelty, treachery, lust, and violence. He tyrannizes, maims, and murders, even killing his own child and driving its mother mad. In the end he is himself killed. The savagery is curiously interspersed with humorous episodes, several of which involve two comic Scotsmen, Buchanan and Targe.

ZENO of Elia (early 5th cent. BC), a monistic philosopher famous for his paradoxes which, revealing the inconsistencies in man’s picture of the universe, were intended to discredit belief in the multiplicity of entities. Sir T. Browne was to attack his paradoxes in the *Pseudodoxia Epidemica (1646).

Zenocratic, the wife of Tamburlaine, in Marlowe’s play of that name.

ZEPHANIAH, Benjamin Obadiah Iqbal (1958— ), poet and playwright who left school aged 13, and spent most of his teenage years in youth institutions and the criminal underworld of Birmingham. He came to public attention as a performance poet with the anti-racist demonstrations of the late 1970s and early 1980s. Job Rocking (pub. 1989) is recognized as Britain’s first rap play. In 1991 he co-wrote Dread Poets Society, a BBC-TV play, in which he played himself in a fictional encounter with Shelley, Mary Shelley, and Byron. After Streetwise (1990), he stopped writing for the stage on the grounds that most theatre did not reach ethnic minorities or the most disadvantaged communities. Collections of poetry include City Psalms (1992) and Propa Propaganda (1996). Talking Turkeys (1994) and Funky Chicken (1996) collect verse for children.

Zerbino, in Orlando furioso, a Scottish prince and perfect knight, of whom it was said that Nature broke the mould in which he had been fashioned. He was the lover of Isabella. He was rescued by Orlando when about to be executed on a false charge, but was killed by Mandrando when attempting to defend the arms that Orlando in his madness had thrown away.

zeugma, a figure of speech by which a single word is made to refer to two or more words in a sentence, when properly applying literally to only one of them; e.g. ‘See Pan with flocks, with fruits Pomona crowned’. Cf. syllipsis.

ZHUKOVSKY, Vasily Andreyevich (1783–1852), Russian poet, regarded as the father of Russian Romanticism. His 1802 translation of Gray’s Elegy, his first publication, is seen as ushering in the new age. His first ballads, ‘Lyudmila’ and ‘Svetlana’ (1808, his most famous work), both based on Bürger’s Lenore, gave rise to a fashion for the ballad. Zhukovsky served in the army, and later was tutor to the future Alexander II. He met and befriended both Shelley, Mary Shelley, and Byron. After Streetwise (1990), he stopped writing for the stage on the grounds that most theatre did not reach ethnic minorities or the most disadvantaged communities. Collections of poetry include City Psalms (1992) and Propa Propaganda (1996). Talking Turkeys (1994) and Funky Chicken (1996) collect verse for children.

ZOLA, Émile (1840–1902), the leading figure in the French school of naturalistic fiction, of which Théresse Raquin (1867) is his earliest example. The first volume (La Fortüne des Rougon) of his principal work, Les Rougon-Macquart, which he termed the ‘natural and social history of a family under the Second Empire’, appeared in 1871; 19 more volumes followed, the last (Le Docteur Pascal) in 1893. In this series of novels, which was influenced by contemporary theories of heredity and experimental science, Zola chronicles the activities of the two branches (the Rougons and the Macquarts) of a family, whose conduct is seen as conditioned through several generations by environment and inherited characteristics, chiefly drunkenness and mental instability. The result is a panorama of mid-19th-cent. French life, especially in the middle and working classes, carefully documented and focusing attention on vice, misery, and the powerful claims of human appetites and instincts. Germinal (1885) depicts the life of a mining community, La Terre (1887) the life of the agricultural peasant, Le Ventre de Paris (1873) the markets of the metropolis, L’Assommoir (1877) its taverns, Au bonheur des dames (1883) the world of the great department store, La Débâcle (1892) the catastrophe of the war of 1870. The prevailing pessimism of the cycle is relieved by passages of lyrical beauty (e.g. in La Fausse de l’abbé Mouret, 1875) and by faith in scientific and social meliorism. The essays of Le Roman expérimental (1889) establish an analogy between the novelist’s aims and practices and those of the scientist. In the later trilogy Les Trois Villes (Lourdes, 1894; Rome, 1896; Paris, 1898) Zola examines, in a mode of heightened symbolism, the claims of the religious and social organizations of the day to minister to human needs. The novels of his final, unfinished, work, Les Quatre Évangiles (Fécondité, 1899; Travail, 1901; Vérité, 1903) are optimistic presentations of social ideals. The last of these refers to the Dreyfus case in which Zola intervened with trenchant vigour, notably in his letter to the newspaper L’Aurore, ‘J’Accuse’. To foil the sentence of imprisonment for libel that followed the publication of the letter, he spent 11 months in exile in England (1898–9). Zola’s works were themselves the cause of the imprisonment in 1888 of his English publisher Vizetelly. (See ROMAN FLEUVÉ.)

Zoroaster, the Greek form of Zarathustra, the founder of the Magian system of religion, probably a historical personage who has become the subject of legends; a Persian who is believed to have lived in the 6th cent. BC during the reigns of Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius.
The Zoroastrian religion was founded on the old Aryan folk religion, but the polytheistic character of the latter was completely changed. The essential feature of Zoroastrianism is the existence of two predominant spirits: Ahura-Mazda (Ormazd) the wise one, the spirit of light and good; and Ahriman, the spirit of evil and darkness. The conflict between these two is waged in this world, and centres in man, created a free agent by Ormazd. (See also NIETZSCHE.)

ZUKOFSKY, Louis (1904–78), American poet, born in the Yiddish melting pot of New York. In 1931 with Pound’s sponsorship he edited the ‘Objectivists’ issue of *Poetry, Chicago, followed in 1932 by An ‘Objectivists’ Anthology, featuring among others Carl Rakosi, George Oppen, and B. *Bunting. Zukofsky’s lyrics, collected in the Complete Short Poetry (1991), are vividly textual, often witty, always stylish and lapidary. They are challenging and opaque or else clear as crystal. Like many of his contemporaries a deep philosophical puzzlement also attaches to his work, finally making it some of the most intellectually inimitable in the US canon. The hermeneutic drive within Objectivism, differentiating it from *Imagism’s lyric base, is fully explored in Zukofsky’s long poem A, a paean to his nuclear family. Written over 45 years in 24 categorical parts, A shows itself as a compendium of forms and forces: translation, music, drama, and reiteration hustle and contend. A *Modernist and postmodernist epic, in places it performs the play of sestina or sonnet in an absurd or unusual light; it recasts regular and irregular histories, offering speaking parts alongside dumbshow. It is moving, political, and tragi-comic, covering the Second World War and its aftermath. Its range of practices and influences dictates ultra-modern readings.

Zuleika, (1) according to Muslim tradition the name of Potiphar’s wife; (2) the heroine of Byron’s *The Bride of Abydos.

Zuleika Dobson, the eponymous heroine of *Beerbohm’s novel, a great beauty who pays a fatal visit to her grandfather, the warden of Judas College, Oxford, in Eights Week. All the young men fall madly in love with her and, when rejected, they rush ‘like lemmings’ and drown themselves in the Isis. The only survivor is the less agile Noaks, who trips on the way.

ZWEIG, Stefan (1881–1942), novelist and biographer. Born in Vienna to Jewish parents, he studied in Vienna, where he published his first collection of poetry (1901) and a biography of *Verlaine (1902). After the First World War he and his wife Frederike moved to Salzburg, where he published several collections of shorter fiction including Amok (1922) and The Invisible Collection (1927). These were followed by biographies of *Erasmus, Magellan, and *Balzac. His only novel, Ungeuld des Herzens (Beware of Pity, 1938), is a powerful psychological study of the destructive nature of pity and its implications. His autobiography, The World of Yesterday (1942), records his meetings and friendship with, among others, *Gorky, *Yeats, *Joyce, *Rilke, *Pirandello, and *Freud. His books were banned under the Nazis and Zweig eventually fled to Europe; he finally settled in Brazil where he committed suicide.

ZWINGLI, Ulrich (1484–1531), a famous Swiss leader of the Reformation. He first found his inspiration in *Erasmus and *Luther, but soon drew away from the latter, and by 1525 had rejected the mass altogether; this split Switzerland into Catholic and Protestant cantons. To Zwingli the Eucharist was purely symbolic; there was no ‘real presence’ at all, not even in the (later) Calvinistic sense, still less in the Lutheran sense of ‘consubstantiation’.
APPENDIX 1 • CHRONOLOGY

The Chronology has two related lines of information, allowing readers to review key works of English literature in relation to their time. In the left-hand column are listed the significant literary works published in a given year. In the right-hand column a parallel range of information is provided on ruling monarchs; historical and literary events; birth and death dates of important authors, thinkers, musicians, and painters; and a selection of significant works of European literature, musical works, etc.
